

THE INSTITUTES

OF

JUSTINIAN

WITH

ENGLISH INTRODUCTION, TRANSLATION, AND NOTES

BY

THOMAS COLLETT SANDARS, M.A.

BARRISTER-AT-LAW

LATE FELLOW OF ORIEL COLLEGE, OXFORD

EIGHTH EDITION

REVISED AND CORRECTED

क्षीमती पाठकर
प्रकाशक/पुणे विद्यापीठ, लखन

सांजगहन

पुणे विद्यापीठ जयकर प्रशालयास भेट

LONDON

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.

AND NEW YORK: 15 EAST 16th STREET

1888

THE INSTITUTES

OF

JUSTINIAN

WITH

ENGLISH INTRODUCTION, TRANSLATION, AND NOTES

BY

THOMAS COLLETT SANDARS, M.A.

BARRISTER-AT-LAW

LATE FELLOW OF ORIEL COLLEGE, OXFORD

EIGHTH EDITION

REVISED AND CORRECTED

क्षीमती पाठकर
प्रकाशक/पुणे विद्यापीठ/लखन

सांजनाइल

पुणे विद्यापीठ जयकर प्रशालयास भेट

LONDON

LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.

AND NEW YORK: 15 EAST 16th STREET

1888

PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE LONDON

PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO., NEW-STREET SQUARE LONDON

aman Sadashiv Deshpande

THE INSTITUTES OF JUSTINIAN

aman Sadashiv Deshpande

THE INSTITUTES OF JUSTINIAN

PREFACE

TO

THE SEVENTH EDITION.

THIS EDITION of the 'Institutes' has been carefully revised and corrected, but scarcely any additions have been made beyond that of giving at the end of the Introduction a chronological list of the chief laws and legal changes noticed in the 'Institutes.'

The object of the work is to aid those who desire to use the 'Institutes' as an introduction to the study of Roman law, or who wish to find in one volume the means of gaining a general acquaintance with the history, principles, and contents of Roman law.

In the Introduction I have endeavoured to give such a general sketch of Roman law and its history as will prepare readers for the details of the work itself. The translation aims at rendering the text in language intelligible to those who have not, as well as to those who have, a long acquaintance with Latin. The notes are intended to embody such information as is necessary to elucidate the text, or to give the results of successive legal changes. In the Summary at the end of the volume I have attempted to arrange in a methodical form the principal contents of the text and the notes.

The value of the 'Institutes' is that of an elementary work, and the value of an elementary work is destroyed if it is made too long and difficult. I have, therefore,

PREFACE

TO

THE SEVENTH EDITION.

THIS EDITION of the 'Institutes' has been carefully revised and corrected, but scarcely any additions have been made beyond that of giving at the end of the Introduction a chronological list of the chief laws and legal changes noticed in the 'Institutes.'

The object of the work is to aid those who desire to use the 'Institutes' as an introduction to the study of Roman law, or who wish to find in one volume the means of gaining a general acquaintance with the history, principles, and contents of Roman law.

In the Introduction I have endeavoured to give such a general sketch of Roman law and its history as will prepare readers for the details of the work itself. The translation aims at rendering the text in language intelligible to those who have not, as well as to those who have, a long acquaintance with Latin. The notes are intended to embody such information as is necessary to elucidate the text, or to give the results of successive legal changes. In the Summary at the end of the volume I have attempted to arrange in a methodical form the principal contents of the text and the notes.

The value of the 'Institutes' is that of an elementary work, and the value of an elementary work is destroyed if it is made too long and difficult. I have, therefore, avoided controverted points of law and history as much as possible, and where it was not possible to avoid them, I have stated what seemed to me the soundest conclusion, without attempting to defend it.

The original edition was in the main founded on the works of Ortolan, Ducaurroy, and Puchta. In subsequent editions I was greatly aided by the elaborate commentaries of Demangeat, to which those who wish to find in the 'Institutes' something more than an elementary work may be confidently referred. Lastly, I have derived assistance, which it is impossible to acknowledge too freely, from Mr. Poste's learned edition of 'Gaius,' and from Mr. Hunter's admirable and exhaustive work on 'Roman Law;' while in revising the translation, I have had the great advantage of consulting the careful and accurate translation of Messrs. Abdy and Walker.

The text adopted is, with few variations, that of Huschke (Leipzig, 1868).

XXX
LXIV

avoided controverted points of law and history as much as possible, and where it was not possible to avoid them, I have stated what seemed to me the soundest conclusion, without attempting to defend it.

The original edition was in the main founded on the works of Ortolan, Ducaurroy, and Puchta. In subsequent editions I was greatly aided by the elaborate commentaries of Demangeat, to which those who wish to find in the 'Institutes' something more than an elementary work may be confidently referred. Lastly, I have derived assistance, which it is impossible to acknowledge too freely, from Mr. Poste's learned edition of 'Gaius,' and from Mr. Hunter's admirable and exhaustive work on 'Roman Law;' while in revising the translation, I have had the great advantage of consulting the careful and accurate translation of Messrs. Abdy and Walker.

The text adopted is, with few variations, that of Huschke (Leipzig, 1868).

XXX
LXIV

INTRODUCTION.

1. THE legislation of Justinian belongs to the latest period of the history of Roman law. During the long space of preceding centuries the law had undergone as many changes as the State itself. The Institutes of Justinian embody principles and ideas of law which had been the slow growth of ages, and which, dating their origin back to the first beginning of the Roman people, had been only gradually unfolded, modified, and matured. It is as impossible to understand the Institutes, without having a slight knowledge of the position the work occupies in the history of Roman law, as it is to understand the history of the Eastern Empire without having studied that of the Western Empire and of the Republic. Many, also, of the leading principles of Roman law contained in the Institutes are unfamiliar to the English reader, and though they may be learned by a perusal of the work itself, the reader, to whom the subject is new, may be glad to anticipate the study of details by having placed before him a general sketch of the part of law on which he is about to enter. It is proposed, therefore, in this Introduction, to give first an outline of the history of Roman law, and then an outline of Roman private law. Each, however, will only be given with the very moderate degree of fulness proper to a sketch intended to be merely a preliminary to the study of the Institutes.

HISTORY OF ROMAN LAW.

2. However obscure may be the history of early Rome, we cannot doubt that Roman citizens were, from a very early period, composed of two distinct bodies, the populus and the plebs, of which the first alone originally possessed all political power, and the members of which

*History of early Rome.
The Populus.*

INTRODUCTION.

1. THE legislation of Justinian belongs to the latest period of the history of Roman law. During the long space of preceding centuries the law had undergone as many changes as the State itself. The Institutes of Justinian embody principles and ideas of law which had been the slow growth of ages, and which, dating their origin back to the first beginning of the Roman people, had been only gradually unfolded, modified, and matured. It is as impossible to understand the Institutes, without having a slight knowledge of the position the work occupies in the history of Roman law, as it is to understand the history of the Eastern Empire without having studied that of the Western Empire and of the Republic. Many, also, of the leading principles of Roman law contained in the Institutes are unfamiliar to the English reader, and though they may be learned by a perusal of the work itself, the reader, to whom the subject is new, may be glad to anticipate the study of details by having placed before him a general sketch of the part of law on which he is about to enter. It is proposed, therefore, in this Introduction, to give first an outline of the history of Roman law, and then an outline of Roman private law. Each, however, will only be given with the very moderate degree of fulness proper to a sketch intended to be merely a preliminary to the study of the Institutes.

HISTORY OF ROMAN LAW.

2. However obscure may be the history of early Rome, we cannot doubt that Roman citizens were, from a very early period, composed of two distinct bodies, the populus and the plebs, of which the first alone originally possessed all political power, and the members of which were bound together by peculiar religious ties. Nor can we have any reasonable doubt about the general features of the constitution of the populus. Whatever may have been their origin, it consisted of three tribes. Each tribe was divided into ten curiæ, and each curia into ten decuriæ; another name for a decuria was a gens, and it included a great number of distinct families, united by having common sacred rites, and bearing a common name. In theory, at least, the members of the same gens were descended from a common ancestor, and the families of the gens were subdivisions of the same ancestral stock, but both individuals and groups were occasionally admitted from outside. A pure unspotted pedigree was claimed by every member of a gens,* and there was a theoretical equality among all the members of the whole tribe. The heads of the different families in these gentes met together in a great council, called the council of the curies (comitia curiata). A smaller body of three hundred, answering in number to the gentes in each of the three tribes, and called the Senate, was charged with the office of initiating the more important questions submitted to the great council; and a king, nominated by the senate, but chosen by the curies,† presided over the whole body, and was charged with the functions of executive government.

*History of early Rome.
The Populus.*

3. The populus was also bound together by strong religious ties. The religion of Rome was intimately connected with the civil polity. The heads of religion were not a priestly caste, but were citizens, in all other respects like their fellows, except that they were invested with peculiar sacred offices. The king was at the head of the religious body; and beneath him were augurs and other functionaries of the ceremonies of religion. The whole body of the populus had a place in the religious system of the State. The mere fact of birth in one of the familiæ forming part of a gens gave admittance to a sacred circle which was closed to all besides. Those in this circle were surrounded by religious ceremonies from their cradle to their grave. Every important act of their life was sanctioned by solemn rites. Every division and subdivision of the State to which they belonged had were bound together by peculiar religious ties. Nor can we have any reasonable doubt about the general features of the constitution of the populus. Whatever may have been their origin, it consisted of three tribes. Each tribe was divided into ten curiæ, and each curia into ten decuriæ; another name for a decuria was a gens, and it included a great number of distinct families, united by having common sacred rites, and bearing a common name. In theory, at least, the members of the same gens were descended from a common ancestor, and the families of the gens were subdivisions of the same ancestral stock, but both individuals and groups were occasionally admitted from outside. A pure unspotted pedigree was claimed by every member of a gens,* and there was a theoretical equality among all the members of the whole tribe. The heads of the different families in these gentes met together in a great council, called the council of the curies (comitia curiata). A smaller body of three hundred, answering in number to the gentes in each of the three tribes, and called the Senate, was charged with the office of initiating the more important questions submitted to the great council; and a king, nominated by the senate, but chosen by the curies,† presided over the whole body, and was charged with the functions of executive government.

* Gentiles sunt, qui inter se eodem nomine sunt; non est satis: qui ab ingenuis oriundi sunt; ne id quidem satis est: quorum majorum nemo servitutem servivit: abest etiam nunc: qui capite non sunt dentunt.—CICERO, Topic. 6.

† Quirites, regem create; ita Patribus visum est.—LIV. i. 17. Mommsen argues from the analogy of the mode in which the magistrates who replaced the king were appointed, that the king must have been nominated by his predecessor (Hist. Rome, Dickson's Trans., i. 65).

3. The populus was also bound together by strong religious ties. The religion of Rome was intimately connected with the civil polity. The heads of religion were not a priestly caste, but were citizens, in all other respects like their fellows, except that they were invested with peculiar sacred offices. The king was at the head of the religious body; and beneath him were augurs and other functionaries of the ceremonies of religion. The whole body of the populus had a place in the religious system of the State. The mere fact of birth in one of the familie forming part of a gens gave admittance to a sacred circle which was closed to all besides. Those in this circle were surrounded by religious ceremonies from their cradle to their grave. Every important act of their life was sanctioned by solemn rites. Every division and subdivision of the State to which they belonged had its own peculiar sacred ceremonies. The individual, the family, the gens, were all under the guardianship of their respective tutelary deities. Every locality with which they were familiar was sacred to some patron god. The calendar was marked out by the services of religion; the pleasure of the gods arranged the times of business and leisure; and a constantly superintending Providence watched over the councils of the State, and showed, by signs which the wise could understand, approval of, or displeasure at, all that was undertaken.

* Gentiles sunt, qui inter se eodem nomine sunt; non est satis: qui ab ingenuis oriundi sunt; ne id quidem satis est: quorum majorum nemo servitutem servivit: abest etiam nunc: qui capite non sunt detinuti.—CICERO, Topic. 6.

† Quirites, regem create; ita Patribus visum est.—LIV. i. 17. Mommsen argues from the analogy of the mode in which the magistrates who replaced the king were appointed, that the king must have been nominated by his predecessor (Hist. Rome, Dickson's Trans., i. 65).

4. By the side of this associated body there was another element of the State, occupying a position very different from that which was occupied by this privileged community. The Plebs. The plebs was probably formed by the inhabitants of conquered towns being brought to Rome, by the influx of voluntary settlers, and by freedom being accorded to slaves.* The plebeians were in a position of dependence on the king or on members of the populus, and were, as strangers, outside the political circle of members of the gentes. They belonged to no gens, had no place in the comitia, no share in the legislative or executive government; as little had they any share in the jus sacrum. They were as much excluded from the pale of the peculiar divine law as from that of the peculiar public law of the ruling body. Even the Servian constitution, and the formation of the thirty local tribes, laid the foundation of future change, rather than altered in early times the basis on which existing institutions were founded. The centuries opened to the plebs a door to political power by making the two orders meet on the common ground of a graduated scale of property; and the constitution of the thirty tribes marked off the inhabitants of the town and country into small local divisions, in the comitia of which the plebs had of course the preponderance, if it is to be supposed that the tribes had any recognised comitia before the institution of tribunes at the beginning of the Republican period. But though the comitia centuriata took away ultimately almost all political power from the comitia curiata, still the old relations of the different members of the body politic remained, in theory at least, long unimpaired. The curies alone could give the religious sanction which was indispensable to the validity of the resolutions of the centuries, and the plebs was as much as ever excluded from admission into the body of the popu- its own peculiar sacred ceremonies. The individual, the family, the gens, were all under the guardianship of their respective tutelary deities. Every locality with which they were familiar was sacred to some patron god. The calendar was marked out by the services of religion; the pleasure of the gods arranged the times of business and leisure; and a constantly superintending Providence watched over the councils of the State, and showed, by signs which the wise could understand, approval of, or displeasure at, all that was undertaken.

* Mommsen considers that the plebeians were simply the clientes, looked at as deprived of political rights. (Hist. Rome, Dickson's Trans., i. 90.)

4. By the side of this associated body there was another element of the State, occupying a position very different from that which was occupied by this privileged community. The Plebs. The plebs was probably formed by the inhabitants of conquered towns being brought to Rome, by the influx of voluntary settlers, and by freedom being accorded to slaves.* The plebeians were in a position of dependence on the king or on members of the populus, and were, as strangers, outside the political circle of members of the gentes. They belonged to no gens, had no place in the comitia, no share in the legislative or executive government; as little had they any share in the jus sacrum. They were as much excluded from the pale of the peculiar divine law as from that of the peculiar public law of the ruling body. Even the Servian constitution, and the formation of the thirty local tribes, laid the foundation of future change, rather than altered in early times the basis on which existing institutions were founded. The centuries opened to the plebs a door to political power by making the two orders meet on the common ground of a graduated scale of property; and the constitution of the thirty tribes marked off the inhabitants of the town and country into small local divisions, in the comitia of which the plebs had of course the preponderance, if it is to be supposed that the tribes had any recognised comitia before the institution of tribunes at the beginning of the Republican period. But though the comitia centuriata took away ultimately almost all political power from the comitia curiata, still the old relations of the different members of the body politic remained, in theory at least, long unimpaired. The curies alone could give the religious sanction which was indispensable to the validity of the resolutions of the centuries, and the plebs was as much as ever excluded from admission into the body of the popu- lus, fenced round with its impassable wall of religious privileges, although the plebs and the populus were governed for the most part by the same rules of private law.

* Mommsen considers that the plebeians were simply the clientes, looked at as deprived of political rights. (Hist. Rome, Dickson's Trans., i. 90.)

5. There could be very little direct law-making, except to meet Legislation in temporary emergencies, in such a community as early Rome. Rome. What laws were made, were first proposed, arranged, and determined on by the Senate, under the guidance of its chief magistrate, the king, and then submitted to the highest source of power, the comitia curiata. After the institution of the centuries, the comitia centuriata gradually succeeded to the political power of the curiata, and the curies only met to give a formal religious sanction to the resolutions of the centuries. The king published regulations on matters that fell exclusively within his province as pontifex maximus, and a collection of these leges regie, which were probably nothing more than by-laws for the conduct of religious ceremonies, was made, or said to be made, by Papirius, who lived in the time of Tarquinius Superbus.*

6. The king was the supreme judge in all cases. But if, in Judges. a criminal trial, the accused was a member of the populus, he could appeal from the king to the comitia curiata. If the accused was a plebeian, he had no tribunal to which he could appeal, until, shortly after the expulsion of the kings, the Valerian laws transferred appeals to the comitia centuriata, of which the plebs formed a part. Civil causes were decided by the king in his quality of pontifex maximus or by the subordinate pontifices acting under him, as all the private law of the populus was so mixed up with the sacred law, that it was part of the duty of a pontifex to know and guard its provisions.†

7. After the expulsion of the kings the plebeians were admitted to the comitia curiata and the Senate, and were Position of the Plebs after the expulsion of the Kings. allowed, within limits which practically were very narrow, to form gentes of their own.‡ But the old antagonism remained, and the struggle between the plebs and the populus became gradually more and more serious. Besides the right of appeal to the centuries secured by the lex

* There is no reason to doubt that Papirius was a real person (DIONYS. ii. 36). But when Pomponius speaks of his collection as the jus civile Papirianum (D. i. 2. 2. 2), he probably uses the term not with reference to the real work of Papirius, but to a work composed towards the end of the republic by Granius Flaccus, De Jure Papiriano (D. l. 16. 144).

† D. i. 2. 2. 6.

‡ Mommsen, Hist. Rome (Dickson's Trans.), i. 267.

lus, fenced round with its impassable wall of religious privileges, although the plebs and the populus were governed for the most part by the same rules of private law.

5. There could be very little direct law-making, except to meet Legislation in temporary emergencies, in such a community as early Rome. Rome. What laws were made, were first proposed, arranged, and determined on by the Senate, under the guidance of its chief magistrate, the king, and then submitted to the highest source of power, the comitia curiata. After the institution of the centuries, the comitia centuriata gradually succeeded to the political power of the curiata, and the curies only met to give a formal religious sanction to the resolutions of the centuries. The king published regulations on matters that fell exclusively within his province as pontifex maximus, and a collection of these leges regie, which were probably nothing more than by-laws for the conduct of religious ceremonies, was made, or said to be made, by Papirius, who lived in the time of Tarquinius Superbus.*

6. The king was the supreme judge in all cases. But if, in a criminal trial, the accused was a member of the Judges. populus, he could appeal from the king to the comitia curiata. If the accused was a plebeian, he had no tribunal to which he could appeal, until, shortly after the expulsion of the kings, the Valerian laws transferred appeals to the comitia centuriata, of which the plebs formed a part. Civil causes were decided by the king in his quality of pontifex maximus or by the subordinate pontifices acting under him, as all the private law of the populus was so mixed up with the sacred law, that it was part of the duty of a pontifex to know and guard its provisions.†

7. After the expulsion of the kings the plebeians were admitted to the comitia curiata and the Senate, and were allowed, within limits which practically were very narrow, to form gentes of their own.‡ But the old antagonism remained, and the struggle between the plebs and the populus became gradually more and more serious. Besides the right of appeal to the centuries secured by the lex

* There is no reason to doubt that Papirius was a real person (DIONYS. ii. 36). But when Pomponius speaks of his collection as the jus civile Papirianum (D. i. 2. 2. 2), he probably uses the term not with reference to the real work of Papirius, but to a work composed towards the end of the republic by Granius Flaccus, De Jure Papiriano (D. i. 16. 144).

† D. i. 2. 2. 6.

‡ Mommsen, Hist. Rome (Dickson's Trans.), i. 267.

Valeria in every case when a citizen was condemned to death, the secession to the Aventine in 260 A.U.C. wrung from the patres the extinction of existing debts, and the creation of tribunes, at first two in number, then five, and afterwards ten, to defend the plebs. These champions of the lower order of the State gave great additional importance and a new character, or perhaps a beginning, to the comitia tributa, which now had to elect magistrates, who were protected themselves by a sacred character, and were specially commissioned to maintain the interest of their fellow-tribesmen. But the plebs had to struggle with an evil which no partial remedies could meet. There was no body of laws to which they could appeal in case they were wronged. The whole administration of the laws was in the hands of the patricians, and there was no appeal from the decision of the magistrate except in cases where life was at stake, or unless the injury, inflicted by wilful perversion of the law, was great enough, as in the memorable instance of Virginia, to rouse the wronged to the redress of physical force. Many of the rights which theoretically belonged to the plebeians as having the same private law with the populus, were practically denied them. At last, a successful revolution enabled the plebs to insist on a changed form of political government, which might open the door of power and office to the members of their own body, and supply a machinery for the preparation of a fixed and permanent body of law. The Decemvirate, superseding and incorporating into itself every other magistracy, and composed of an equal number of patricians and plebeians, was formed 303 A.U.C. for the purpose of collecting and embodying in the shape of written law all those portions of the customary law which it was most essential for the due administration of justice to place on an indisputable footing, and publish for the benefit of the whole body of citizens.

8. The lavish praises bestowed on the laws of the Twelve Tables by the later writers of Rome, and the story of The Twelve Tables, the deputation sent to learn the laws of Greece, would give us an idea of a very different body of laws from that which these Tables actually presented. We should expect to find a systematic exposition of Roman public and private law as it existed in the times previous to the Gallic invasion; and to find, also, that the whole body of law was at least coloured by the infusion of a foreign element. We should naturally think that there was something new and original in a legislation which

Valeria in every case when a citizen was condemned to death, the secession to the Aventine in 260 A.U.C. wrung from the patres the extinction of existing debts, and the creation of tribunes, at first two in number, then five, and afterwards ten, to defend the plebs. These champions of the lower order of the State gave great additional importance and a new character, or perhaps a beginning, to the comitia tributa, which now had to elect magistrates, who were protected themselves by a sacred character, and were specially commissioned to maintain the interest of their fellow-tribesmen. But the plebs had to struggle with an evil which no partial remedies could meet. There was no body of laws to which they could appeal in case they were wronged. The whole administration of the laws was in the hands of the patricians, and there was no appeal from the decision of the magistrate except in cases where life was at stake, or unless the injury, inflicted by wilful perversion of the law, was great enough, as in the memorable instance of Virginia, to rouse the wronged to the redress of physical force. Many of the rights which theoretically belonged to the plebeians as having the same private law with the populus, were practically denied them. At last, a successful revolution enabled the plebs to insist on a changed form of political government, which might open the door of power and office to the members of their own body, and supply a machinery for the preparation of a fixed and permanent body of law. The Decemvirate, superseding and incorporating into itself every other magistracy, and composed of an equal number of patricians and plebeians, was formed 303 A.U.C. for the purpose of collecting and embodying in the shape of written law all those portions of the customary law which it was most essential for the due administration of justice to place on an indisputable footing, and publish for the benefit of the whole body of citizens.

8. The lavish praises bestowed on the laws of the Twelve Tables by the later writers of Rome, and the story of The Twelve Tables, the deputation sent to learn the laws of Greece, would give us an idea of a very different body of laws from that which these Tables actually presented. We should expect to find a systematic exposition of Roman public and private law as it existed in the times previous to the Gallic invasion; and to find, also, that the whole body of law was at least coloured by the infusion of a foreign element. We should naturally think that there was something new and original in a legislation which Cicero considers as almost the perfection of human wisdom.* The fragments of the Twelve Tables which remain to us show how erroneous are these conceptions of their contents. There is nothing whatsoever which we can decidedly pronounce to be borrowed from a foreign origin, except possibly some provisions respecting the law of funerals, taken from the laws of Solon. These Tables contained, for the most part, short enunciations of those points of law which the conduct of the affairs of daily life required to be settled and publicly announced. The law had existed before, but in a floating, vague, traditionary shape, only some very few laws having been engraved on tablets and publicly displayed. The Twelve Tables left to the decision of the magistrate, and the interpretation of those skilled in law, the application and exposition of these principles; they also left many parts of the customary law wholly untouched on. But what the exigencies of the time required deciding, they decided; and they laid a firm foundation on which the structure of private law would rest for the future. It is not difficult to understand how this was esteemed so great a gain to the large body of the citizens, that these laws were spoken of by the ancients as the creations of a new legislation.

The following are the chief provisions of the Twelve Tables, so far as they are known.†—1. The First Table related to the proceedings in a civil suit. If the person summoned before the magistrate would not come, he was to be forced to go, but for an old or sick man a beast of burden was to be provided. If the adversaries could agree on the way, they were to be allowed to do so. If not, the statements of both were to be heard before midday in the Comitium or the Forum, and then, after midday, the magistrate was to adjudge the thing, but every process was to be stopped at sunset. 2. The Second Table fixed the amount to be deposited in the action by ^{an oath to make good} wager, and provided that the affair might be put off if necessary, as if, among other things, the judge or arbiter appointed by the magistrate was ill; and pointed out how witnesses might be summoned. 3. The Third Table was apparently made in favour of debtors, for though it left them ultimately at the mercy of the creditor, it gave them new means of averting their

* See especially De Orat. i. 43, 44.

† This summary is taken from the arrangement of the supposed contents of the Twelve Tables adopted by Ortolan; but in many points, and especially in the assignment to a particular Table of a fragment, this arrangement is necessarily conjectural.

Cicero considers as almost the perfection of human wisdom.* The fragments of the Twelve Tables which remain to us show how erroneous are these conceptions of their contents. There is nothing whatsoever which we can decidedly pronounce to be borrowed from a foreign origin, except possibly some provisions respecting the law of funerals, taken from the laws of Solon. These Tables contained, for the most part, short enunciations of those points of law which the conduct of the affairs of daily life required to be settled and publicly announced. The law had existed before, but in a floating, vague, traditionary shape, only some very few laws having been engraved on tablets and publicly displayed. The Twelve Tables left to the decision of the magistrate, and the interpretation of those skilled in law, the application and exposition of these principles; they also left many parts of the customary law wholly untouched on. But what the exigencies of the time required deciding, they decided; and they laid a firm foundation on which the structure of private law would rest for the future. It is not difficult to understand how this was esteemed so great a gain to the large body of the citizens, that these laws were spoken of by the ancients as the creations of a new legislation.

The following are the chief provisions of the Twelve Tables, so far as they are known.†—1. The First Table related to the proceedings in a civil suit. If the person summoned before the magistrate would not come, he was to be forced to go, but for an old or sick man a beast of burden was to be provided. If the adversaries could agree on the way, they were to be allowed to do so. If not, the statements of both were to be heard before midday in the Comitium or the Forum, and then, after midday, the magistrate was to adjudge the thing, but every process was to be stopped at sunset. 2. The Second Table fixed the amount to be deposited in the action by ^{an oath to be sworn} wager, and provided that the affair might be put off if necessary, as if, among other things, the judge or arbiter appointed by the magistrate was ill; and pointed out how witnesses might be summoned. 3. The Third Table was apparently made in favour of debtors, for though it left them ultimately at the mercy of the creditor, it gave them new means of averting their fate. They were to have thirty days before any steps could be taken against them on a debt confessed or decided to be due. They might then be brought before a magistrate, and unless payment was made or a surety (vindeæ) found, the creditor might put them in irons, but not of more than fifteen pounds weight, and must give them a pound of flour a day. This could last for sixty days only, and the debtor had meanwhile to be produced before the magistrate to show he was alive; and notice of the amount of the debt must be given on three market-days by the creditor, so that an opportunity of ransoming the debtor might be given. Then, but not till then, the debtor was at the mercy of the creditor, who could sell him as a slave beyond the Tiber or kill him, and if there were several creditors, they might hew him in pieces, and although any of them took a part of his body larger in proportion than his claim, he was not to be punished. 4. The Fourth Table referred to the father of the family, who was bidden to destroy deformed children, and whose absolute power over the life and liberty of his children was established, while it was provided that if he sold his son three times, the son should be freed from his power. 5. The Fifth Table related to inheritances and tutorships. Women were to be in perpetual tutorship, except the vestal virgins. As a man disposed by testament, so was the law to be; but if he died intestate, and without a surviving heres, his nearest agnati, or, in default of agnati, the gentiles, were to take. In default of appointment by testament, the agnati were to be tutors, and have the custody of madmen who had no curators. 6. The Sixth Table referred to ownership, and provided that the words spoken in the solemn form of transfer, a nexum or mancipium, should be held binding; that he who denied them should pay double; that two years' possession for immoveables, and one for moveables, should be the time necessary for usucapion, and that a year should suffice for the usucapion of a wife by her husband, unless she absented herself for three consecutive nights in the time; that no one not a Roman citizen should acquire by usucapion; and that materials built into a house should not be reclaimed by their owner, at least until the building was taken or fell down. The property in a thing sold was not to pass to the purchaser until the vendor was satisfied. The fictitious suit for the transfer of property called in jure cessio, and mancipation, were confirmed. 7. The Seventh Table contained provisions as to buildings and plots of land, as to the width of way to be left,

* See especially De Orat. i. 43, 44.

† This summary is taken from the arrangement of the supposed contents of the Twelve Tables adopted by Ortolan; but in many points, and especially in the assignment to a particular Table of a fragment, this arrangement is necessarily conjectural.

fate. They were to have thirty days before any steps could be taken against them on a debt confessed or decided to be due. They might then be brought before a magistrate, and unless payment was made or a surety (vindeæ) found, the creditor might put them in irons, but not of more than fifteen pounds weight, and must give them a pound of flour a day. This could last for sixty days only, and the debtor had meanwhile to be produced before the magistrate to show he was alive; and notice of the amount of the debt must be given on three market-days by the creditor, so that an opportunity of ransoming the debtor might be given. Then, but not till then, the debtor was at the mercy of the creditor, who could sell him as a slave beyond the Tiber or kill him, and if there were several creditors, they might hew him in pieces, and although any of them took a part of his body larger in proportion than his claim, he was not to be punished. 4. The Fourth Table referred to the father of the family, who was bidden to destroy deformed children, and whose absolute power over the life and liberty of his children was established, while it was provided that if he sold his son three times, the son should be freed from his power. 5. The Fifth Table related to inheritances and tutorships. Women were to be in perpetual tutorship, except the vestal virgins. As a man disposed by testament, so was the law to be; but if he died intestate, and without a surviving heres, his nearest agnati, or, in default of agnati, the gentiles, were to take. In default of appointment by testament, the agnati were to be tutors, and have the custody of madmen who had no curators. 6. The Sixth Table referred to ownership, and provided that the words spoken in the solemn form of transfer, a nexum or mancipium, should be held binding; that he who denied them should pay double; that two years' possession for immoveables, and one for moveables, should be the time necessary for usucapion, and that a year should suffice for the usucapion of a wife by her husband, unless she absented herself for three consecutive nights in the time; that no one not a Roman citizen should acquire by usucapion; and that materials built into a house should not be reclaimed by their owner, at least until the building was taken or fell down. The property in a thing sold was not to pass to the purchaser until the vendor was satisfied. The fictitious suit for the transfer of property called in jure cessio, and mancipation, were confirmed. 7. The Seventh Table contained provisions as to buildings and plots of land, as to the width of way to be left, as to overhanging trees, and so forth; and in case of disputes as to boundaries, the magistrate was to appoint arbitrators. 8. The Eighth Table dealt with delicts. It prescribed capital punishment for libellous songs and outrages. A limb was to be given for a limb, three hundred asses for the breaking of a bone of a free man, and one hundred and fifty for the breaking of a bone of a slave; for an injury or minor outrage, twenty-five asses; a four-footed beast doing injury might be given up to whomsoever it injured, in lieu of compensation. The nocturnal devastation of crops or the incendiarism of a building was punished with death. Theft, if the thief was caught red-handed, was to be punished by the thief, if a freeman, being beaten and given over to the person robbed, and, if a slave, by his being beaten and thrown from the Tarpeian Rock; while various other provisions were made as to theft, fixing minor penalties, where the circumstances were not so grave. The rate of interest was fixed at one per cent. per month (centesimæ usuræ), and the usurer who exceeded this was to be fined quadruple. The false witness was to be thrown from the Rock, and the witness in a solemn form who refused his testimony was to be infamous; and the enchanter and poisoner were to be punished capitally. 9. The Ninth Table related to public law, and provided that there were to be no privilegia, or laws affecting individuals only; that the centuries alone could pronounce capital sentence; that the judge or arbiter taking a bribe should be punishable capitally; that there should be an appeal to the people from every penal sentence; and that death should be the punishment of leaguings with, or handing over a citizen to, the enemy. 10. The Tenth Table related to funerals, limiting the ceremonies and display attending them. 11. The Eleventh Table prohibited the marriage of patricians and plebeians; and 12. The Twelfth Table had reference to some miscellaneous matters; as, that a slave who had done an injury might be abandoned to the person injured, in lieu of compensation. The seizure of anything belonging to the debtor (pignoris capio) was permitted when the debt had been contracted, or the sum due was to be expended, for sacrificial purposes.

It will be observed that the Twelve Tables recognise four of the actions of law, the nature of which will be noticed in a later part of the Introduction, viz., sacramentum, judicis postulatio (in the shape of the arbitration to be given to settle boundaries), manus injectio, and pignoris capio. They further recognise the

as to overhanging trees, and so forth; and in case of disputes as to boundaries, the magistrate was to appoint arbitrators. 8. The Eighth Table dealt with delicts. It prescribed capital punishment for libellous songs and outrages. A limb was to be given for a limb, three hundred asses for the breaking of a bone of a free man, and one hundred and fifty for the breaking of a bone of a slave; for an injury or minor outrage, twenty-five asses; a four-footed beast doing injury might be given up to whomsoever it injured, in lieu of compensation. The nocturnal devastation of crops or the incendiarism of a building was punished with death. Theft, if the thief was caught red-handed, was to be punished by the thief, if a freeman, being beaten and given over to the person robbed, and, if a slave, by his being beaten and thrown from the Tarpeian Rock; while various other provisions were made as to theft, fixing minor penalties, where the circumstances were not so grave. The rate of interest was fixed at one per cent. per month (centesimæ usuræ), and the usurer who exceeded this was to be fined quadruple. The false witness was to be thrown from the Rock, and the witness in a solemn form who refused his testimony was to be infamous; and the enchanter and poisoner were to be punished capitally. 9. The Ninth Table related to public law, and provided that there were to be no privilegia, or laws affecting individuals only; that the centuries alone could pronounce capital sentence; that the judge or arbiter taking a bribe should be punishable capitally; that there should be an appeal to the people from every penal sentence; and that death should be the punishment of leaguings with, or handing over a citizen to, the enemy. 10. The Tenth Table related to funerals, limiting the ceremonies and display attending them. 11. The Eleventh Table prohibited the marriage of patricians and plebeians; and 12. The Twelfth Table had reference to some miscellaneous matters; as, that a slave who had done an injury might be abandoned to the person injured, in lieu of compensation. The seizure of anything belonging to the debtor (pignoris capio) was permitted when the debt had been contracted, or the sum due was to be expended, for sacrificial purposes.

It will be observed that the Twelve Tables recognise four of the actions of law, the nature of which will be noticed in a later part of the Introduction, viz., sacramentum, judicis postulatio (in the shape of the arbitration to be given to settle boundaries), manus injectio, and pignoris capio. They further recognise the distinction between the magistrate and the judex, which was the characteristic feature of Roman procedure; and probably these actions of law and this distinction between the judge and the magistrate date from a time much earlier than the Twelve Tables. Most, too, of the characteristic points of Roman civil law are to be found in the Twelve Tables. The patria potestas, usucapion, tutelage, testamentary and intestate succession, the neuvum, mancipatio, all are enforced, and evidently formed part of the ancient customary law of Rome.

9. The Decemvirate was nominally intended to be a means of removing, as far as was then thought possible, the political distinction between the orders. How little the object was really accomplished is notorious. The attainment of political equality by the Plebs. Although half the decemvirs were plebeians, the suppression of the meetings of the comitia tributa, and the loss of tribunes, were poorly compensated by the presence of magistrates who acted in conjunction with patricians, and readily yielded deference to their colleagues. Besides, the Two Tables added in the year of the second Decemvirate contained provisions which later writers considered manifestly unjust;* and we have seen that, among other things, they expressly refused the connubium to the plebs. The Twelve Tables, as fixing and proclaiming the law, were undoubtedly a source of great strength to the plebeians, and enabled them to maintain a much more secure position in their future struggles; but the Decemvirate, regarded as a crisis in their political history, was certainly unfavourable to them. Nothing shows more completely that this was so than the progress they made immediately after the downfall of Appius Claudius and his colleagues. The laws of Horatius and Valerius not only forbade the constitution of any magistracy from which there should be no appeal, but provided that the ordinances of the comitia tributa should, if sanctioned by the senate and the curies, be binding on all Roman citizens; and in 309 A.U.C., only four years after the abolition of the Decemvirate, the Canuleian law gave the connubium to the plebs, and the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian was no longer forbidden by law. This change was important, not only as removing a distinction mortifying to many individuals and embarrassing many of the relations of private life, but as breaking through one of the barriers which the jus sacrum had hitherto distinction between the magistrate and the judex, which was the characteristic feature of Roman procedure; and probably these actions of law and this distinction between the judge and the magistrate date from a time much earlier than the Twelve Tables. Most, too, of the characteristic points of Roman civil law are to be found in the Twelve Tables. The patria potestas, usucapion, tutelage, testamentary and intestate succession, the neerum, mancipatio, all are enforced, and evidently formed part of the ancient customary law of Rome.

* Cic. De Rep. ii. 37.

9. The Decemvirate was nominally intended to be a means of removing, as far as was then thought possible, the political distinction between the orders. How little the object was really accomplished is notorious. Although half the decemvirs were plebeians, the suppression of the meetings of the comitia tributa, and the loss of tribunes, were poorly compensated by the presence of magistrates who acted in conjunction with patricians, and readily yielded deference to their colleagues. Besides, the Two Tables added in the year of the second Decemvirate contained provisions which later writers considered manifestly unjust;* and we have seen that, among other things, they expressly refused the connubium to the plebs. The Twelve Tables, as fixing and proclaiming the law, were undoubtedly a source of great strength to the plebeians, and enabled them to maintain a much more secure position in their future struggles; but the Decemvirate, regarded as a crisis in their political history, was certainly unfavourable to them. Nothing shows more completely that this was so than the progress they made immediately after the downfall of Appius Claudius and his colleagues. The laws of Horatius and Valerius not only forbade the constitution of any magistracy from which there should be no appeal, but provided that the ordinances of the comitia tributa should, if sanctioned by the senate and the curies, be binding on all Roman citizens; and in 309 A.U.C., only four years after the abolition of the Decemvirate, the Canuleian law gave the connubium to the plebs, and the marriage of a patrician with a plebeian was no longer forbidden by law. This change was important, not only as removing a distinction mortifying to many individuals and embarrassing many of the relations of private life, but as breaking through one of the barriers which the jus sacrum had hitherto interposed in the way of the plebs.* The obstacle of a religious disqualification was the reason generally assigned by the populus for the exclusion of plebeians from public offices;† and it was a great step towards political equality that the objection urged to marriages between the two orders—that it would disturb the sacra of the gentes—should be overcome. The advance of the plebs to political equality was, however, very slow; and it was not until a century and a half had elapsed from the passing of the Canuleian law that the two orders were placed on an equal footing. We may take the year 467 A.U.C., the date of the lex Hortensia, as the period when we can first pronounce that the distinction of the two orders was really done away. When that law had been passed, the plebeian had a full share in the jus publicum and the jus sacrum. The ordinances of the comitia tributa required no confirmation of the curies, no sanction of the senate; they were binding on the whole Roman people directly they were passed. The equality between the two orders was so complete that the plebeian could become consul, censor, prætor, curule ædile; he could enter the senate, he could administer justice; he was excluded from none of the privileges of the jus sacrum; he could become pontifex and augur; and though he could not of course take part in any of the sacra belonging to particular gentes, go through certain religious ceremonies, or be engaged in the service of particular gods, these exceptions did not lower his political position. As far as the history of law is concerned, we may henceforward lose sight of the distinction between plebeian and patrician.

The attainment of political equality by the Plebs.

* Cic. De Rep. ii. 37.

10. From the writings of the later jurists, and especially from those of Gaius and Cicero, and from the fragments of The jus civile. the Twelve Tables that have come down to us, we can collect the essential features of the private law of Rome in its earliest period, before a general advance in civilisation had modified it. This early law, which rested on custom as its foundation, and the elements of which, except so far as appeared in the laws of the Twelve Tables, were only known by tradition, was called in subsequent times the jus civile, the peculiar law of the Roman State. The history of Roman law is the history of the changes introduced interposed in the way of the plebs.* The obstacle of a religious disqualification was the reason generally assigned by the populus for the exclusion of plebeians from public offices;† and it was a great step towards political equality that the objection urged to marriages between the two orders—that it would disturb the sacra of the gentes—should be overcome. The advance of the plebs to political equality was, however, very slow; and it was not until a century and a half had elapsed from the passing of the Canuleian law that the two orders were placed on an equal footing. We may take the year 467 A.U.C., the date of the lex Hortensia, as the period when we can first pronounce that the distinction of the two orders was really done away. When that law had been passed, the plebeian had a full share in the jus publicum and the jus sacrum. The ordinances of the comitia tributa required no confirmation of the curies, no sanction of the senate; they were binding on the whole Roman people directly they were passed. The equality between the two orders was so complete that the plebeian could become consul, censor, prætor, curule ædile; he could enter the senate, he could administer justice; he was excluded from none of the privileges of the jus sacrum; he could become pontifex and augur; and though he could not of course take part in any of the sacra belonging to particular gentes, go through certain religious ceremonies, or be engaged in the service of particular gods, these exceptions did not lower his political position. As far as the history of law is concerned, we may henceforward lose sight of the distinction between plebeian and patrician.

* Ideoque decemviros connubium diremissee, ne incerta prole auspicia turbarentur.—LIV. iv. 6.

† Interroganti tribuno, cur plebeium consulem fieri non oporteret? . . . respondit, quod nemo plebeius auspicia haberet.—LIV. iv. 6.

10. From the writings of the later jurists, and especially from those of Gaius and Cicero, and from the fragments of The jus civile. the Twelve Tables that have come down to us, we can collect the essential features of the private law of Rome in its earliest period, before a general advance in civilisation had modified it. This early law, which rested on custom as its foundation, and the elements of which, except so far as appeared in the laws of the Twelve Tables, were only known by tradition, was called in subsequent times the jus civile, the peculiar law of the Roman State. The history of Roman law is the history of the changes introduced into this law, of the additions made to it, and of the method adopted in the process. The notion of a body of customary law, in part unwritten, which was not abrogated, but was evaded or amplified by persons acting under the ideas of later times, is the notion which, above all others, must be embraced clearly by any one who wishes to understand Roman law. The jus civile must always be taken as the starting point, and in tracing the history of the later law we have always to trace how, while the jus civile still remained in force, the law was made to suit the requirements of different periods by evading or adding to the jus civile. It was only in the later days of the Empire that the jus civile began to be swept away. When we come to speak of the contents of Roman private law, we shall have occasion to notice what were the leading features of the jus civile. We need not at present do more than say that, when a student of Roman law has made himself acquainted with its elementary doctrines, he will find that the chief of these peculiar principles, dating from an unknown antiquity, and affecting the whole body of later jurisprudence, are those which determine the position of a father of a family, the succession to his estate, and the contracts and actions relating to the chief possessions of an agricultural proprietor.

* Ideoque decemviros connubium diremisse, ne incerta prole auspicia turbarentur.—LIV. iv. 6.

† Interroganti tribuno, cur plebeium consulem fieri non oporteret? . . . respondit, quod nemo plebeius auspicia haberet.—LIV. iv. 6.

11. The conquest of Italy and the gradual spread of Roman conquest materially altered the character of the legal system. A branch of law almost entirely new sprang up, which determined the different relations in which the conquered cities and nations were to stand with reference to Rome itself. As a general rule, and as compared with other nations of antiquity, Rome governed those whom she had vanquished with wisdom and moderation. Particular governors, indeed, abused their power; but the policy of the State was not a severe one, and Rome connected herself with her subject allies by conceding them privileges proportionate to their importance or their services. The jus Latinum and the jus Italicum are terms familiar to all readers of Roman history. The first expressed that, with various degrees of completeness, the rights of Roman citizenship were accorded to the inhabitants of different towns, some having the commercium only, some also the connubium; but after the Social War (A.U.C. 663), the lex Julia (A.U.C. 664) and the lex Plautia (A.U.C. 665) gave the full rights of citizenship to Italy below the Po, and the Italians were distributed among the thirty-five tribes. The jus Italicum expressed a certain amount of

into this law, of the additions made to it, and of the method adopted in the process. The notion of a body of customary law, in part unwritten, which was not abrogated, but was evaded or amplified by persons acting under the ideas of later times, is the notion which, above all others, must be embraced clearly by any one who wishes to understand Roman law. The jus civile must always be taken as the starting point, and in tracing the history of the later law we have always to trace how, while the jus civile still remained in force, the law was made to suit the requirements of different periods by evading or adding to the jus civile. It was only in the later days of the Empire that the jus civile began to be swept away. When we come to speak of the contents of Roman private law, we shall have occasion to notice what were the leading features of the jus civile. We need not at present do more than say that, when a student of Roman law has made himself acquainted with its elementary doctrines, he will find that the chief of these peculiar principles, dating from an unknown antiquity, and affecting the whole body of later jurisprudence, are those which determine the position of a father of a family, the succession to his estate, and the contracts and actions relating to the chief possessions of an agricultural proprietor.

11. The conquest of Italy and the gradual spread of Roman conquest materially altered the character of the legal system. A branch of law almost entirely new sprang up, which determined the different relations in which the conquered cities and nations were to stand with reference to Rome itself. As a general rule, and as compared with other nations of antiquity, Rome governed those whom she had vanquished with wisdom and moderation. Particular governors, indeed, abused their power; but the policy of the State was not a severe one, and Rome connected herself with her subject allies by conceding them privileges proportionate to their importance or their services. The jus Latinum and the jus Italicum are terms familiar to all readers of Roman history. The first expressed that, with various degrees of completeness, the rights of Roman citizenship were accorded to the inhabitants of different towns, some having the commercium only, some also the connubium; but after the Social War (A.U.C. 663), the lex Julia (A.U.C. 664) and the lex Plantia (A.U.C. 665) gave the full rights of citizenship to Italy below the Po, and the Italians were distributed among the thirty-five tribes. The jus Italicum expressed a certain amount of municipal independence and exemption from taxation, attached to the different places on which the right was bestowed. The citizens of some particular places in Italy above the Po and in the provinces possessed what was termed Latinitas, i.e. the status of being a Latin, and those possessing Latinitas were termed Latini coloniacarii. They had the commercium, but not the connubium, and therefore their children were not in their power, and they could not vote for or fill public offices; and the jus Italicum was attached to certain privileged cities; but the provinces generally had no participation in either right. They were subject to a proconsul or proprætor, paid taxes to the treasury of Rome, and had as much of the law of Rome imposed upon them, and were made to conform as nearly to Roman political notions, as their conquerors considered expedient.*

12. But the contact of Rome with foreign nations produced a *Change in Roman Law

under the Prætors.*

much more remarkable effect on Roman law than the introduction of a new branch of law regulating the position of subject nations. It wrought, or at least contributed largely to work, a revolution in the legal notions of the Roman people. It forced them to compare other systems with their own. In the language of the jurists, it brought the jus gentium, that is, the law ascertained to obtain generally in other nations, side by side with the jus civile, the old law of Rome. The prætor peregrinus, who was appointed (A.U.C. 507) to adjudge suits in which persons who were not citizens were parties, could not bind strangers within the narrow and technical limits in which Romans were accustomed to move. Many of the most important parts of Roman law were such that their provisions could not be extended to any but citizens. No one, for instance, except a citizen, could have the peculiar ownership termed dominium ex jure Quiritium. But when justice and reason pronounced a stranger to be an owner, it was impossible for a prætor not to recognise an ownership different from that which a citizen would claim; and what magistrates were obliged to do in the case of strangers, the requirements of advancing civilisation soon induced them to do in the case of citizens. They recognised and gave effect to principles different from those of the municipal law of Rome. This municipal law remained in force wherever its provisions could give all that was required to do substantial justice; but when they could not, the prætor appealed to a wider law, and municipal independence and exemption from taxation, attached to the different places on which the right was bestowed. The citizens of some particular places in Italy above the Po and in the provinces possessed what was termed Latinitas, i.e. the status of being a Latin, and those possessing Latinitas were termed Latini coloniarii. They had the commercium, but not the connubium, and therefore their children were not in their power, and they could not vote for or fill public offices; and the jus Italicum was attached to certain privileged cities; but the provinces generally had no participation in either right. They were subject to a proconsul or proprætor, paid taxes to the treasury of Rome, and had as much of the law of Rome imposed upon them, and were made to conform as nearly to Roman political notions, as their conquerors considered expedient.*

* See WARNKÖNIG, Hist. du droit romain externe, p. 70. SAVIGNY, Geschichte d. röm. Rechts, vol. i. ch. 2.

12. But the contact of Rome with foreign nations produced a much more remarkable effect on Roman law than the introduction of a new branch of law regulating the position of subject nations. It wrought, or at least contributed largely to work, a revolution in the legal notions of the Roman people. It forced them to compare other systems with their own. In the language of the jurists, it brought the jus gentium, that is, the law ascertained to obtain generally in other nations, side by side with the jus civile, the old law of Rome. The prætor peregrinus, who was appointed (A.U.C. 507) to adjudge suits in which persons who were not citizens were parties, could not bind strangers within the narrow and technical limits in which Romans were accustomed to move. Many of the most important parts of Roman law were such that their provisions could not be extended to any but citizens. No one, for instance, except a citizen, could have the peculiar ownership termed dominium ex jure Quiritium. But when justice and reason pronounced a stranger to be an owner, it was impossible for a prætor not to recognise an ownership different from that which a citizen would claim; and what magistrates were obliged to do in the case of strangers, the requirements of advancing civilisation soon induced them to do in the case of citizens. They recognised and gave effect to principles different from those of the municipal law of Rome. This municipal law remained in force wherever its provisions could give all that was required to do substantial justice; but when they could not, the prætor appealed to a wider law, and sought in the principles of equity a remedy for the deficiencies of the jus civile. He pronounced decrees (edicta), laying down the law as he conceived it ought to be, if it was to regulate aright the case before him. In process of time it became the custom for the prætor to collect into one edictum the rules on which he intended to act during his tenure of office, and to publish them on a tablet (in albo) at the commencement of his official year. The edict, put forward at the beginning of the year of office, and running on from one prætor to another, was termed the edictum perpetuum. How much the prætor was aided in the formation of a broader and more comprehensive system of law by a change in the form of actions, will appear when we come to speak of the system of civil process. By degrees such a system was introduced and fully established, and the jus honorarium, the law of the prætors* (qui honores gerebant), was spoken of as having a distinct place by the side, and as the complement, of the jus civile.

* See WARCKENIG, Hist. du droit romain externe, p. 70. SAVIGNY, Geschichte d. röm. Rechts, vol. i. ch. 2.

The prætors gave the formula of an action to the judge. For many centuries senators alone were judges until the lex Sempronia (A.U.C. 632) took away the right of The judges. being judges from the senators, and gave it to the knights. After a series of contests the right was shared by the two orders, and extended even to persons of inferior rank, so that the 300 of the senatorial times had become 4,000 by the time of Augustus. Besides the judges placed on the annual list (in albo relati) there were the recuperatores, who at first were appointed to determine causes to which peregrini were parties, but at a later period had jurisdiction in the causes of citizens. They were taken from every rank for the special occasion, sat three or more together, and were used in cases requiring despatch. And there were also the centumviri, taken so many from each tribe, and who judged of cases of status, Quiritary property, and testamentary and intestate succession.

13. The progress of law was also much facilitated by the growth of a body of men termed juris consulti or The juris prudentes. juris prudentes, men who studied the forms and, in time, the principles of law, and expounded them for the benefit of their friends and dependents. They were generally among the first men of the State, and the employment was considered a natural part of a life of public service and magisterial honours.

* The term also included the edicts of the ædiles, who issued decrees in matters that came specially within their province.

sought in the principles of equity a remedy for the deficiencies of the jus civile. He pronounced decrees (edicta), laying down the law as he conceived it ought to be, if it was to regulate aright the case before him. In process of time it became the custom for the prætor to collect into one edictum the rules on which he intended to act during his tenure of office, and to publish them on a tablet (in albo) at the commencement of his official year. The edict, put forward at the beginning of the year of office, and running on from one prætor to another, was termed the edictum perpetuum. How much the prætor was aided in the formation of a broader and more comprehensive system of law by a change in the form of actions, will appear when we come to speak of the system of civil process. By degrees such a system was introduced and fully established, and the jus honorarium, the law of the prætors* (qui honores gerebant), was spoken of as having a distinct place by the side, and as the complement, of the jus civile.

The prætors gave the formula of an action to the judge. For many centuries senators alone were judges until the lex Sempronia (A.U.C. 632) took away the right of The judges. being judges from the senators, and gave it to the knights. After a series of contests the right was shared by the two orders, and extended even to persons of inferior rank, so that the 300 of the senatorial times had become 4,000 by the time of Augustus. Besides the judges placed on the annual list (in albo relati) there were the recuperatores, who at first were appointed to determine causes to which peregrini were parties, but at a later period had jurisdiction in the causes of citizens. They were taken from every rank for the special occasion, sat three or more together, and were used in cases requiring despatch. And there were also the centumviri, taken so many from each tribe, and who judged of cases of status, Quiritary property, and testamentary and intestate succession.

13. The progress of law was also much facilitated by the growth of a body of men termed juris consulti or The juris prudentes. juris prudentes, men who studied the forms and, in time, the principles of law, and expounded them for the benefit of their friends and dependents. They were generally among the first men of the State, and the employment was considered a natural part of a life of public service and magisterial honours.

* The term also included the edicts of the ædiles, who issued decrees in matters that came specially within their province.

In the earlier times of the republic the patricians alone knew the days on which it was or was not lawful to transact legal business, and the forms in which actions were to be brought. The story of the publishing of a collection of these forms, and of a list of the days on which business could be transacted, by Cneius Flavius, is familiar to all readers of Livy.* But although to a certain extent the study of the law became open to all, whether patricians or plebeians, yet it does not seem to have been ever undertaken except by men of eminence. Such men used to instruct and protect the persons who sought their advice, explain the steps necessary for the successful conduct of an action, and write out the necessary forms.† They gave answers when asked as to the law on a particular point; and though they professed only to interpret the Twelve Tables, not to make laws, their notion of interpretation was so wide that it included whatever could be brought within the spirit of anything which the Twelve Tables enacted. Such answers (responsa) were of course of no legal authority; but as the sage would frequently accompany his client‡ (as the questioner was called) before the magistrate, and announce his opinion, it had frequently all the effect upon the magistrate which a positive enactment would have had, and thus the responsa prudentum came to be enumerated among the direct sources of law. The names of some of these sages have been handed down to us. Cato the censor, and Severus Sulpicius, the contemporary of Cicero, are those otherwise best known to us.§ In the latter days of the republic the juris prudentes were men acquainted with some portion at least of Greek philosophy, men of learning and general cultivation; and it is not difficult to understand how powerfully their authority, acting almost directly on judicial decisions, must have contributed to the change which the law underwent towards the end of the republic.

14. By far the most important addition to the system of Roman law which the jurists introduced from Greek philosophy, was the conception of the lex naturæ. We learn from the writings of Cicero whence this conception

* Liv. ix. 46.

† The duty of a jurisprudent was respondere, agere, cavere.—Cic. de Orat. i. 48.

‡ Clienti promere jura.—Hor. Epist. Bk. ii. Ep. 1. 104. Clientis means literally 'a listener.'

§ GIBBON, viii. 31.

In the earlier times of the republic the patricians alone knew the days on which it was or was not lawful to transact legal business, and the forms in which actions were to be brought. The story of the publishing of a collection of these forms, and of a list of the days on which business could be transacted, by Cneius Flavius, is familiar to all readers of Livy.* But although to a certain extent the study of the law became open to all, whether patricians or plebeians, yet it does not seem to have been ever undertaken except by men of eminence. Such men used to instruct and protect the persons who sought their advice, explain the steps necessary for the successful conduct of an action, and write out the necessary forms.† They gave answers when asked as to the law on a particular point; and though they professed only to interpret the Twelve Tables, not to make laws, their notion of interpretation was so wide that it included whatever could be brought within the spirit of anything which the Twelve Tables enacted. Such answers (responsa) were of course of no legal authority; but as the sage would frequently accompany his client‡ (as the questioner was called) before the magistrate, and announce his opinion, it had frequently all the effect upon the magistrate which a positive enactment would have had, and thus the responsa prudentum came to be enumerated among the direct sources of law. The names of some of these sages have been handed down to us. Cato the censor, and Severus Sulpicius, the contemporary of Cicero, are those otherwise best known to us.§ In the latter days of the republic the juris prudentes were men acquainted with some portion at least of Greek philosophy, men of learning and general cultivation; and it is not difficult to understand how powerfully their authority, acting almost directly on judicial decisions, must have contributed to the change which the law underwent towards the end of the republic.

14. By far the most important addition to the system of Roman law which the jurists introduced from Greek philosophy, was the conception of the lex naturæ. We learn from the writings of Cicero whence this conception

* LIV. ix. 46.

† The duty of a jurispudent was respondere, agere, cavere.—CIC. de Orat. i. 48.

‡ Clienti promere jura.—HOR. Epist. Bk. ii. Ep. 1. 104. Clientis means literally 'a listener.'

§ GIBBON, viii. 31.

came, and what was understood by it.* It came from the Stoics, and especially from Chrysippus. By natura, for which Cicero sometimes substitutes mundus, was meant the universe of things, and this universe the Stoics declared to be guided by reason. But as reason is thus a directive power, forbidding and enjoining, it is called law (lex est ratio summa insita in natura, quæ jubet ea quæ facienda sunt, prohibetque contraria). But nature is with the Stoics both an active and a passive principle, and there is no force of the law of nature beyond nature itself. By lex naturæ, therefore, was meant primarily the determining force of the universe, a force inherent in the universe by its constitution (lex est naturæ vis). But man has reason, and as reason cannot be two-fold, the ratio of the universe must be the same as the ratio of man, and the lex naturæ will be the law by which the actions of man are to be guided, as well as the law directing the universe. Virtue, or moral excellence, may be described as living in accordance with reason, or with the law of the universe. These notions worked themselves into Roman law, and the practical shape they took was that morality, so far as it could come within the scope of judges, was regarded as enjoined by law. The jurists did not draw any sharp line between law and morality. As the lex naturæ was a lex, it must have a place in the law of Rome. The prætor considered himself bound to arrange his decisions so that no strong moral claims should be disregarded. He had to give effect to the lex naturæ, not only because it was morally right to do so, but also because the lex naturæ was a lex. When a rigid adherence to the doctrines of the jus civile threatened to do a moral wrong, and produce a result that was not equitable, there the lex naturæ was supposed to operate, and the prætor, in accordance with its dictates, provided a remedy by means of the pliant forms of the prætorian actions. Gradually the cases, as well as the modes in which he would thus interfere, grew more and more certain and recognised, and thus a body of equitable principles was introduced into Roman law. The two great agents in modifying and extending the old, rigid, narrow system of the jus civile were thus the jus gentium and the lex naturæ; that is, generalisations from the legal systems of other nations, and morality looked on according to the philosophy of the Stoics as sanctioned by a law.

* The most important passages in Cicero with reference to the lex naturæ are De Leg. i. 6-12; De Nat. Deor. i. 14, ii. 14. 31; De Fin. iv. 7. The expressions used in the text are from De Leg. i. 6.

came, and what was understood by it.* It came from the Stoics, and especially from Chrysippus. By natura, for which Cicero sometimes substitutes mundus, was meant the universe of things, and this universe the Stoics declared to be guided by reason. But as reason is thus a directive power, forbidding and enjoining, it is called law (lex est ratio summa insita in natura, quæ jubet ea quæ facienda sunt, prohibetque contraria). But nature is with the Stoics both an active and a passive principle, and there is no force of the law of nature beyond nature itself. By lex naturæ, therefore, was meant primarily the determining force of the universe, a force inherent in the universe by its constitution (lex est naturæ vis). But man has reason, and as reason cannot be twofold, the ratio of the universe must be the same as the ratio of man, and the lex naturæ will be the law by which the actions of man are to be guided, as well as the law directing the universe. Virtue, or moral excellence, may be described as living in accordance with reason, or with the law of the universe. These notions worked themselves into Roman law, and the practical shape they took was that morality, so far as it could come within the scope of judges, was regarded as enjoined by law. The jurists did not draw any sharp line between law and morality. As the lex naturæ was a lex, it must have a place in the law of Rome. The prætor considered himself bound to arrange his decisions so that no strong moral claims should be disregarded. He had to give effect to the lex naturæ, not only because it was morally right to do so, but also because the lex naturæ was a lex. When a rigid adherence to the doctrines of the jus civile threatened to do a moral wrong, and produce a result that was not equitable, there the lex naturæ was supposed to operate, and the prætor, in accordance with its dictates, provided a remedy by means of the pliant forms of the prætorian actions. Gradually the cases, as well as the modes in which he would thus interfere, grew more and more certain and recognised, and thus a body of equitable principles was introduced into Roman law. The two great agents in modifying and extending the old, rigid, narrow system of the jus civile were thus the jus gentium and the lex naturæ; that is, generalisations from the legal systems of other nations, and morality looked on according to the philosophy of the Stoics as sanctioned by a law.

* The most important passages in Cicero with reference to the lex naturæ are De Leg. i. 6-12; De Nat. Deor. i. 14, ii. 14. 31; De Fin. iv. 7. The expressions used in the text are from De Leg. i. 6.

But as, on the one hand, the generalisations from experience had in themselves no binding force, and as, on the other, the best index to ascertain what morality commanded was to examine the contents of other legal systems, the jus gentium and the lex nature were each the complement of the other, and were often looked on by the jurists as making one whole, to which the term jus gentium was generally applied.*

15. The centuries met to decide questions of war and peace, and to choose the higher magistrates; but the th Sources of legislation. which, after the lex Hortensia, were passed to any real change in the body of Roman law, were almost plebiscita. The comitia tributa were recognised as almost the exclusive centre of legislative power; but in the later Plebiscita. times of the republic a continually increasing importance was attached to the ordinances of the senate. Gains says that it had been questioned whether the senatusconsulta had the force of law.† Perhaps they had not exactly the force of law at any time under the republic, excepting when they related to matters which it was the peculiar province of the senate to regulate; but they were probably of little less weight than enactments recognised as constitutionally binding. The Senate. The senate successfully maintained a claim ‡ to exercise a dispensing power, and to release individuals from obedience to particular laws. It was generally able to reject a law, either wholly or partly, by calling in the aid of religious scruples; and if it added a clause to a law, the new portion of the law was as binding as the old.§ In the shape of directions to particular magistrates, it issued injunctions, of which the force was felt by all those who were subject to the magistrate's power; and it made, we have reason to think, independent enactments in matters belonging to religion, police, and civil administration, and perhaps even in matters of private law.|| The senate comprised the richest and most influential men in the State; the disruption of society attending the civil wars strengthened their influence; and the Romans of the days of Cicero were quite prepared for the place which the senate held, as a legislative body, under the early Cæsars.

* See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence, Lect. xxx. and xxxi.

† Cicero mentions them among the sources of law.—Topic. 5.

‡ ASCON. Argum. in Cornel. (Orell. p. 57).

§ ASCON. Enarratio Cornel. (Orell. p. 67).

|| PUCHTA, Instit. sec. 75.

But as, on the one hand, the generalisations from experience had in themselves no binding force, and as, on the other, the best index to ascertain what morality commanded was to examine the contents of other legal systems, the jus gentium and the lex nature were each the complement of the other, and were often looked on by the jurists as making one whole, to which the term jus gentium was generally applied.*

15. The centuries met to decide questions of war and peace, and to choose the higher magistrates; but the th Sources of legislation. which, after the lex Hortensia, were passed to any real change in the body of Roman law, were almost plebiscita. The comitia tributa were recognised as almost the exclusive centre of legislative power; but in the later Plebiscita. times of the republic a continually increasing importance was attached to the ordinances of the senate. Gains says that it had been questioned whether the senatusconsulta had the force of law.† Perhaps they had not exactly the force of law at any time under the republic, excepting when they related to matters which it was the peculiar province of the senate to regulate; but they were probably of little less weight than enactments recognised as constitutionally binding. The Senate. The senate successfully maintained a claim ‡ to exercise a dispensing power, and to release individuals from obedience to particular laws. It was generally able to reject a law, either wholly or partly, by calling in the aid of religious scruples; and if it added a clause to a law, the new portion of the law was as binding as the old.§ In the shape of directions to particular magistrates, it issued injunctions, of which the force was felt by all those who were subject to the magistrate's power; and it made, we have reason to think, independent enactments in matters belonging to religion, police, and civil administration, and perhaps even in matters of private law.|| The senate comprised the richest and most influential men in the State; the disruption of society attending the civil wars strengthened their influence; and the Romans of the days of Cicero were quite prepared for the place which the senate held, as a legislative body, under the early Cæsars.

* See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence, Lect. xxx. and xxxi.

† Cicero mentions them among the sources of law.—Topic. 5.

‡ ASCON. Argum. in Cornel. (Orell. p. 57).

§ ASCON. Enarratio Cornel. (Orell. p. 67).

|| PUCHTA, Instit. sec. 75.

The growth of law during the time that elapsed between the promulgation of the Twelve Tables and the commencement of the empire is marked not only by the abolition of the actions of law and the institution of prætorian actions, but by the development of the law of obligations, the old conveyance of nexum having expanded into, or been replaced by, verbal and literal contracts, and real contracts being recognised where no form but the delivery of the thing was required; and four forms of purely consensual contracts being admitted as part of the civil law; to all which the prætor constantly added cases in which he announced that he would recognise and enforce an obligation. The prætor, too, protected and regulated possession as apart from ownership; and his attention was bestowed on the ties of blood, the father being to some extent restrained from disinheriting his children, and cognati taking the place of gentiles in intestate succession.

16. The first emperors were only the chief magistrates of the republic. Augustus and his immediate successors united in their own persons all the highest offices of the State. The imperium, or supreme command, was conferred on them by the lex regia passed as a matter of form at the beginning of their reign, and by which the later jurists supposed that the people devolved on the emperor all their own right to govern and to legislate.* The assumption of despotism was veiled under an adherence to republican forms; and, at any rate during the first century of our era, the emperor always affected to consider himself as nothing more than the princeps reipublice. Although we have instances, even in the time of Augustus, of edicts intended to be binding by the mere authority of the emperor, yet the people at first, and the senate afterwards, was recognised as the primary source of law. By degrees the emperor usurped the sole legislative authority, either dictating to the senate what it was to enact, or, in later times, enacting it himself. The will of the prince came to have the force of law.† Sometimes this will decided what the law should be by the publication of edicta pronounced by the emperor in his magisterial capacity, or mandata, orders directed to particular officers, or epistolæ, addressed to individuals, or public bodies; sometimes by decreta, or judicial sentences given by the emperor, which served as precedents; at other times by rescripta, that is, answers given

* D. i. 4. 1.

† Inst. i. 2. 6: Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem.

The growth of law during the time that elapsed between the promulgation of the Twelve Tables and the commencement of the empire is marked not only by the abolition of the actions of law and the institution of prætorian actions, but by the development of the law of obligations, the old conveyance of nexum having expanded into, or been replaced by, verbal and literal contracts, and real contracts being recognised where no form but the delivery of the thing was required; and four forms of purely consensual contracts being admitted as part of the civil law; to all which the prætor constantly added cases in which he announced that he would recognise and enforce an obligation. The prætor, too, protected and regulated possession as apart from ownership; and his attention was bestowed on the ties of blood, the father being to some extent restrained from disinheriting his children, and cognati taking the place of gentiles in intestate succession.

16. The first emperors were only the chief magistrates of the republic. Augustus and his immediate successors united in their own persons all the highest offices of the State. The imperium, or supreme command, was conferred on them by the lex regia passed as a matter of form at the beginning of their reign, and by which the later jurists supposed that the people devolved on the emperor all their own right to govern and to legislate.* The assumption of despotism was veiled under an adherence to republican forms; and, at any rate during the first century of our era, the emperor always affected to consider himself as nothing more than the princeps reipublicæ. Although we have instances, even in the time of Augustus, of edicts intended to be binding by the mere authority of the emperor, yet the people at first, and the senate afterwards, was recognised as the primary source of law. By degrees the emperor usurped the sole legislative authority, either dictating to the senate what it was to enact, or, in later times, enacting it himself. The will of the prince came to have the force of law.† Sometimes this will decided what the law should be by the publication of edicta pronounced by the emperor in his magisterial capacity, or mandata, orders directed to particular officers, or epistolæ, addressed to individuals, or public bodies; sometimes by decreta, or judicial sentences given by the emperor, which served as precedents; at other times by rescripta, that is, answers given by the emperor to magistrates who requested his assistance in the decision of doubtful points.

* D. i. 4. 1.

† Inst. i. 2. 6: Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem.

17. The people did not cease to make laws for a considerable time after the commencement of the empire.* These laws were, of course, really the creations of the emperor's will. Augustus, for instance, procured the sanction of legislation to a series of measures which made a considerable innovation in private law. These measures were designed to repress and discourage the excesses and corruption of a demoralised society. The lex Julia et Papia Poppæa, and others of a similar character, attempted to restore virtue to private life by a system of rewards and penalties, attached to the fulfilment or neglect of family duties, and consisting chiefly in the taking away of testamentary benefits from the unmarried and childless, and giving them to those married with children, and, in default, to the treasury. They failed in their object; but the portion of law to which they belonged, and especially that of testaments and legacies, was considerably modified by their provisions. To the time of Augustus also belongs the introduction of fideicommissa and codicils.

18. After the middle of the first century of our era, all legislative enactments of which we know are senatusconsulta. The election of magistrates was transferred to the senate from the comitia,† and the senate was entrusted with the cognisance of offences against the emperor and the State,‡ and the decision of appeals from inferior tribunals.§ The later jurists said that the senate was made to represent the whole people, because the number of the citizens became too great to permit of their acting as a political body.¶ However historically false this may be, it yet is so far true that the senate was, in the earlier times of the empire, a body distinct from, and, in a certain very limited degree, opposed to, the emperor. We have some few memorable instances in Tacitus of senators who dared to speak what they thought,|| and who showed that the senate was, in more than name, a remnant of the republic. Gradually the very notion of independent action died away, and the senate met merely to adopt the will of its master.

* GAIUS mentions a lex Claudia.—GAIUS, i. 157.

† TACIT. Annal. i. 15.

‡ SUET. Calig. 2. NERO, 17. TACIT. Annal. xiii. 44.

§ Inst. i. 2. 5. POMPONIUS in Dig. i. 2. 2. 9. PUCHTA, Inst. sec. 106.

|| TACIT. Hist. iv. 8.

by the emperor to magistrates who requested his assistance in the decision of doubtful points.

17. The people did not cease to make laws for a considerable time after the commencement of the empire.* These laws were, of course, really the creations of the emperor's will. Augustus, for instance, procured the sanction of legislation to a series of measures which made a considerable innovation in private law. These measures were designed to repress and discourage the excesses and corruption of a demoralised society. The lex Julia et Papia Poppæa, and others of a similar character, attempted to restore virtue to private life by a system of rewards and penalties, attached to the fulfilment or neglect of family duties, and consisting chiefly in the taking away of testamentary benefits from the unmarried and childless, and giving them to those married with children, and, in default, to the treasury. They failed in their object; but the portion of law to which they belonged, and especially that of testaments and legacies, was considerably modified by their provisions. To the time of Augustus also belongs the introduction of fideicommissa and codicils.

18. After the middle of the first century of our era, all legislative enactments of which we know are senatusconsulto. The election of magistrates was transferred to the senate from the comitia,† and the senate was entrusted with the cognisance of offences against the emperor and the State,‡ and the decision of appeals from inferior tribunals.§ The later jurists said that the senate was made to represent the whole people, because the number of the citizens became too great to permit of their acting as a political body.¶ However historically false this may be, it yet is so far true that the senate was, in the earlier times of the empire, a body distinct from, and, in a certain very limited degree, opposed to, the emperor. We have some few memorable instances in Tacitus of senators who dared to speak what they thought,|| and who showed that the senate was, in more than name, a remnant of the republic. Gradually the very notion of independent action died away, and the senate met merely to adopt the will of its master.

* GAIUS mentions a lex Claudia.—GAIUS, i. 157.

† TACIT. Annal. i. 15.

‡ SUET. Calig. 2. Nero, 17. TACIT. Annal. xiii. 44.

§ Inst. i. 2. 5. POMONIUS in Dig. i. 2. 2. 9. PUCHTA, Inst. sec. 106.

|| TACIT. Hist. iv. 8.

19. The edictum perpetuum, the annual edict of the prætor, as being the written exposition of the ius honorarium, was the subject of many of the treatises of the The Prætor's edict. Roman jurists. In the time of Hadrian, a jurist of great eminence, Salvius Julianus, was appointed by the emperor to draw up an edict, partly from existing edicts, partly according to his own opinion of what was necessary, which should serve as the guide and rule of all succeeding prætors. The edict which he drew up, and to which the sanction of Hadrian gave the force of law, was itself termed the edictum perpetuum, the word perpetuum, instead of meaning, as before, that the edict ran on from year to year, being used to express that the edict was permanent and unchangeable. The different magistrates, who had to apply the edict, would thenceforward use their own discretion only when the edict drawn up by Julianus did not serve as an express authority.

20. The writings of the jurists, the authority attached to their decisions, and the admirable manner in which they developed and arranged the law, formed the The jurists. most marked feature of the legal history of this period. Augustus found the position which the great sages of the law held in public opinion too important a one to be overlooked in his scheme of government. He formally gave to their decisions the weight which usage had in many instances given them already; and it was enacted that their answers should be solicited and announced in a formal manner, and given under the sanction of the emperor. Hadrian decided that they should have the force of law, provided the respondents all agreed in their answer; but, if they differed, the judge was at liberty to adhere to whichever opinion he preferred.* Among the eminent jurists of the days of Augustus was Trebatius, whose opinion, as the Institutes tell us, was specially asked by Augustus as to the propriety of admitting codicils. Two others, of even higher authority, Schools of Labeo and Capito. Antistius Labeo and Ateius Capito, represented in the same period two opposite modes of regarding law, and were the founders of schools which maintained and handed down their respective opinions. Labeo, in whom a wider culture had instilled a love of general principles, did not hesitate to make such innovations as he conceived reason and philosophy to require: Capito was distinguished by the fidelity with which

* GAIUS, i. 7.

19. The edictum perpetuum, the annual edict of the prætor, as being the written exposition of the jus honorarium, was the subject of many of the treatises of the The Prætor's edict. Roman jurists. In the time of Hadrian, a jurist of great eminence, Salvius Julianus, was appointed by the emperor to draw up an edict, partly from existing edicts, partly according to his own opinion of what was necessary, which should serve as the guide and rule of all succeeding prætors. The edict which he drew up, and to which the sanction of Hadrian gave the force of law, was itself termed the edictum perpetuum, the word perpetuum, instead of meaning, as before, that the edict ran on from year to year, being used to express that the edict was permanent and unchangeable. The different magistrates, who had to apply the edict, would thenceforward use their own discretion only when the edict drawn up by Julianus did not serve as an express authority.

20. The writings of the jurists, the authority attached to their decisions, and the admirable manner in which they developed and arranged the law, formed the The jurists. most marked feature of the legal history of this period. Augustus found the position which the great sages of the law held in public opinion too important a one to be overlooked in his scheme of government. He formally gave to their decisions the weight which usage had in many instances given them already; and it was enacted that their answers should be solicited and announced in a formal manner, and given under the sanction of the emperor. Hadrian decided that they should have the force of law, provided the respondents all agreed in their answer; but, if they differed, the judge was at liberty to adhere to whichever opinion he preferred.* Among the eminent jurists of the days of Augustus was Trebatius, whose opinion, as the Institutes tell us, was specially asked by Augustus as to the propriety of admitting codicils. Two others, of even higher authority, Schools of Labeo and Capito. Antistius Labeo and Ateius Capito, represented in the same period two opposite modes of regarding law, and were the founders of schools which maintained and handed down their respective opinions. Labeo, in whom a wider culture had instilled a love of general principles, did not hesitate to make such innovations as he conceived reason and philosophy to require: Capito was distinguished by the fidelity with which he adhered to the law as he had himself received it*. A succession of jurists of greater or less renown divided themselves under the banners of these rival authorities. But the schools of which Labeo and Capito were the first authors did not derive their names from their founders. The one school was termed Proculians, after Proculus, a distinguished follower of Labeo; the other Sabinians, after Sabinus, a follower of Capito. Gaius, who informs us that he was a Sabinian, gives the differing opinions of the two schools on many subtle questions of law. So the labours of this succession of jurists, the law was moulded and prepared until it came into the hands of the five great luminaries of Roman jurisprudence—Gaius, Papinian, Paul, Ulpian, and Modestinus, whose writings, as we shall see, were subsequently made a distinct and special source of law.

* GAIUS, i. 7.

21. Gaius, or Caius, as the name is sometimes written, was probably born in the time of Hadrian, and wrote Gaius under the Antonines. Of his personal history nothing is known. He himself tells us that he was an adherent of the school of Sabinus. Besides other works which he is known or supposed to have written, he composed a treatise on the edictum provinciale (the edict of the proconsul in the provinces) and a commentary on the Twelve Tables. But the work by which he is best known to us is his Institutes. The discovery of the manuscript of this work by Niebuhr in 1816 contributed greatly to the modern knowledge of Roman law. The manuscript had been written over with the letters of St. Jerome, and its existence was almost entirely unknown until Niebuhr brought it to light while examining the contents of the library of the Chapter at Verona. The Institutes of Gaius formed the basis of those of Justinian, who has followed the order in which Gaius treats his subject, and adopted his exposition of law, so far as it was applicable to the times in which the Institutes of Justinian were composed. The work of Gaius, therefore, showing us what was common to the two periods, and also where the law had changed, enables us to understand what the change was, and what the law had really been at the time when its system was most perfect.

22. Æmilianus Papinianus was the intimate friend of the

* Ateius Capito in his, quæ ei tradita fuerant, perseverabat. Labeo ingenii qualitate et fiducia doctrinæ, qui et cæteris operis sapientiæ operam dederat, plurima innovare instituit.—Dig. i. 2. 2. 47.

he adhered to the law as he had himself received it*. A¹⁰ succession of jurists of greater or less renown divided themselves under the banners of these rival authorities. But the schools of which Labeo and Capito were the first authors did not derive their names from their founders. The one school was termed Proculians, after Proculus, a distinguished follower of Labeo; the other Sabinians, after Sabinus, a follower of Capito. Gaius, who informs us that he was a Sabinian, gives the differing opinions of the two schools on many subtle questions of law. In the labours of this succession of jurists, the law was moulded and prepared until it came into the hands of the five great luminaries of Roman jurisprudence—Gaius, Papinian, Paul, Ulpian, and Modestinus, whose writings, as we shall see, were subsequently made a distinct and special source of law.

21. Gaius, or Caius, as the name is sometimes written, was probably born in the time of Hadrian, and wrote Gaius. under the Antonines. Of his personal history nothing is known. He himself tells us that he was an adherent of the school of Sabinus. Besides other works which he is known or supposed to have written, he composed a treatise on the edictum provinciale (the edict of the proconsul in the provinces) and a commentary on the Twelve Tables. But the work by which he is best known to us is his Institutes. The discovery of the manuscript of this work by Niebuhr in 1816 contributed greatly to the modern knowledge of Roman law. The manuscript had been written over with the letters of St. Jerome, and its existence was almost entirely unknown until Niebuhr brought it to light while examining the contents of the library of the Chapter at Verona. The Institutes of Gaius formed the basis of those of Justinian, who has followed the order in which Gaius treats his subject, and adopted his exposition of law, so far as it was applicable to the times in which the Institutes of Justinian were composed. The work of Gaius, therefore, showing us what was common to the two periods, and also where the law had changed, enables us to understand what the change was, and what the law had really been at the time when its system was most perfect.

22. Æmilianus Papinianus was the intimate friend of the

* Ateius Capito in his, quæ ei tradita fuerant, perseverabat. Labeo ingenii qualitate et fiducia doctrinæ, qui et cæteris operis sapientiæ operam dederat, plurima innovare instituit.—Dig. i. 2. 2. 47.

Emperor Septimius Severus, and held under him the office of prætorian præfect, which had now become equivalent to that of supreme judge. He probably accompanied Papinian. Severus into Britain, and was present at the emperor's death at York in A.D. 211. Severus commended his two sons, Geta and Caracalla, to his care. Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office; and, after his murder of Geta, is said to have required Papinian to compose his vindication. Papinian refused, and was executed by the orders of Caracalla. He was considered the first and greatest of jurists, and every epithet which succeeding writers devised to express wisdom, learning, and eloquence, was heaped on him in profusion. We know, from the Digest, of his Books of Questions, Books of Answers, and Books of Definitions. The fragments of his works which we possess amply justify his eminent reputation.

23. Paul, Ulpian, and Modestinus are all said to have been pupils of Papinian. Julius Paulus was a member of the imperial council and prætorian prefect under Paul. Alexander Severus (A.D. 222). Besides numerous fragments in the Digest, we possess his Receptæ Sententiæ, which was long the chief source of law among the Visigoths in Spain. The most celebrated of his works, which were very numerous,* was that Ad Edictum in eighty books.

24. Domitius Ulpianus derived his origin, as he himself tells us, from Tyre in Phœnicia.† He wrote several works during the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla, Ulpian. and perished (A.D. 228) by the hands of the soldiers, who killed him in the presence of the emperor, Alexander Severus. He was prætorian prefect at the time of his death, but the exact time when he was first appointed to the office is unknown. The Digest contains a greater number of extracts from his writings than from those of any jurist. Besides these extracts, we also possess fragments of his composition in twenty-nine titles, known by the name of the Fragmenta Ulpiani.

25. Herennius Modestinus was the pupil of Ulpian as well as of Papinian. He was a member of the imperial council in the time of Alexander Severus, but hardly Modestinus. anything is known of his history. One of the best known of his writings is the Excusationum Libri. We have nothing remaining

* We know the names of more than seventy, embracing an extraordinary variety of subjects.

† D. l. 15. 1. pr.

Emperor Septimius Severus, and held under him the office of prætorian præfect, which had now become equivalent to that of supreme judge. He probably accompanied Papinian. Severus into Britain, and was present at the emperor's death at York in A.D. 211. Severus commended his two sons, Geta and Caracalla, to his care. Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office; and, after his murder of Geta, is said to have required Papinian to compose his vindication. Papinian refused, and was put to death by the orders of Caracalla. He was considered the first and greatest of jurists, and every epithet which succeeding writers devised to express wisdom, learning, and eloquence, was heaped on him in profusion. We know, from the Digest, of his Books of Questions, Books of Answers, and Books of Definitions. The fragments of his works which we possess amply justify his eminent reputation.

23. Paul, Ulpian, and Modestinus are all said to have been pupils of Papinian. Julius Paulus was a member of the imperial council and prætorian prefect under Paul. Alexander Severus (A.D. 222). Besides numerous fragments in the Digest, we possess his Receptæ Sententiæ, which was long the chief source of law among the Visigoths in Spain. The most celebrated of his works, which were very numerous,* was that Ad Edictum in eighty books.

24. Domitius Ulpianus derived his origin, as he himself tells us, from Tyre in Phœnicia.† He wrote several works during the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla, Ulpian. and perished (A.D. 228) by the hands of the soldiers, who killed him in the presence of the emperor, Alexander Severus. He was prætorian prefect at the time of his death, but the exact time when he was first appointed to the office is unknown. The Digest contains a greater number of extracts from his writings than from those of any jurist. Besides these extracts, we also possess fragments of his composition in twenty-nine titles, known by the name of the Fragmenta Ulpiani.

25. Herennius Modestinus was the pupil of Ulpian as well as of Papinian. He was a member of the imperial council in the time of Alexander Severus, but hardly Modestinus. anything is known of his history. One of the best known of his writings is the Excusationum Libri. We have nothing remaining of his composition except the extracts from his works given in the Digest.

* We know the names of more than seventy, embracing an extraordinary variety of subjects.

† D. l. 15. 1. pr.

26. The influence of Christianity on Roman law was partly B Influence of direct, partly indirect. The establishment of a hier-Christianity. archical rank, the power granted to religious corporations to hold property, the distinction between Christians and heretics, affecting the civil position of the latter, the creation of episcopal courts, and many other similar innovations, gave rise to direct specific changes in the law. But its influence is even remarkable in the changes which were suggested by its spirit rather than introduced as a necessary part of its system. The community which citizenship had bound together * succeeded another bound by the ties of a common religion. The tendency of the change was to remove the barriers which had formed a part of the older condition of society. If we compare the Institutes of Justinian with those of Gaius, we find changes in the law of marriage, in that of succession, and in many other branches of law, in which it is not difficult to recognise the spirit of humanity and reverence for natural ties, which Christianity had inspired.

 The disposition to get rid of many of the more peculiar features of the old Roman law, observable in the later legislation, was partly indeed the fruit of secular causes; but it was also in a great measure due to the alteration of thought and feeling to which the new religion had given birth. But it was not only the substance of the law that was changed under the emperor.
 The forms of procedure became different. Even under the formulary system the magistrate had occasionally, instead of sending the trial of an action to the judex, disposed of it himself (cognitio extraordinaria). The practice grew more frequent as the empire went on, and in A.D. 294 Diocletian ordered the presidents of the provinces themselves to try all cases. The formulary system and the exposition of the law by the prætors became a thing of the past, and the law was altered by the enactments of the emperor, and administered directly by the magistrates.

27. Before we pass to the legislation of Justinian, we must Theodosius II. bestow a cursory notice on the efforts made by Theodosius II. to determine and arrange the law, and to

* The value of citizenship was greatly lessened by the recklessness with which it was extended. Caracalla (A.D. 212) gave the citizenship to all persons not slaves, who were then subjects of the empire, leaving it, however, possible, that slaves imperfectly manumitted after this date should hold the place of Latini, not of cives.

of his composition except the extracts from his works given in the Digest.

26. The influence of Christianity on Roman law was partly Influence of Christianity. direct, partly indirect. The establishment of a hierarchical rank, the power granted to religious corporations to hold property, the distinction between Christians and heretics, affecting the civil position of the latter, the creation of episcopal courts, and many other similar innovations, gave rise to direct specific changes in the law. But its influence is even remarkable in the changes which were suggested by its spirit rather than introduced as a necessary part of its system. the community which citizenship had bound together * succeeded another bound by the ties of a common religion. The tendency of the change was to remove the barriers which had formed a part of the older condition of society. If we compare the Institutes of Justinian with those of Gaius, we find changes in the law of marriage, in that of succession, and in many other branches of law, in which it is not difficult to recognise the spirit of humanity and reverence for natural ties, which Christianity had inspired. The disposition to get rid of many of the more peculiar features of the old Roman law, observable in the later legislation, was partly indeed the fruit of secular causes; but it was also in a great measure due to the alteration of thought and feeling to which the new religion had given birth. But it was not only the substance of the law that was changed under the emperor. The forms of procedure became different. Even under the formulary system the magistrate had occasionally, instead of sending the trial of an action to the judex, disposed of it himself (cognitio extraordinaria). The practice grew more frequent as the empire went on, and in A.D. 294 Diocletian ordered the presidents of the provinces themselves to try all cases. The formulary system and the exposition of the law by the prætors became a thing of the past, and the law was altered by the enactments of the emperor, and administered directly by the magistrates.

27. Before we pass to the legislation of Justinian, we must Theodosius II. bestow a cursory notice on the efforts made by Theodosius II. to determine and arrange the law, and to promote its study. With a view to keep alive and increase the knowledge of law, he founded (in A.D. 425) a school of jurisprudence at Constantinople. He and Valentinian also constituted the works of the five great writers, Gaius, Papinian, Ulpian, Paul, and Modestinus, into a source of law of the highest authority, enacting by a constitution ('the Law of Citations'), published A.D. 426, that the judge should always be bound by the opinion expressed by the majority of these writers; if those among them who expressed an opinion on the point were equally divided, the opinion of Papinian was to prevail: if he was silent, the judge could use his own discretion. In A.D. 438, Theodosius published his Code, containing a collection of the constitutions of the emperors from the time of Constantine. It was made on the model of two earlier collections compiled by the jurists Gregorianus (A.D. 306) and Hermogenianus (A.D. 365).

* The value of citizenship was greatly lessened by the recklessness with which it was extended. Caracalla (A.D. 212) gave the citizenship to all persons not slaves, who were then subjects of the empire, leaving it, however, possible, that slaves imperfectly manumitted after this date should hold the place of Latini, not of cives.

28. The Emperor Justinian was of Gothic origin. His native name was Uprauda, a word said to mean upright, and thus to have found an equivalent in the Latin Justinian. He was born at Taurisium in Bulgaria, about the year A.D. 482, and having been adopted by his uncle, the Emperor Justin, succeeded him as sole emperor in the year A.D. 527. He died in A.D. 565, after an eventful reign of thirty-eight years. Procopius, the secretary of his general Belisarius, has left us a secret memoir of the times, which, if we may rely upon his accuracy, would make us believe Justinian to have been a weak, avaricious, rapacious tyrant. His court, wholly under the influence of his wife Theodora, a degraded woman, whom he had raised from the theatre to share his throne, was as corrupt as was customary in the empire of the East. Justinian would never have been distinguished from among the long list of eastern emperors had it not been for the victories of his generals and the legislation to which he gave his name. The successes of Belisarius and Narses have shed the splendour of military glory over his reign. But his principal claim to be remembered by posterity is his having directed the execution of an undertaking which gave to Roman law a form that fitted it to descend to the modern world.

29. In the year A.D. 528, Justinian issued instructions for the compilation of a new code, which, founded on that of Theodosius, and on the earlier codes on which that code was based,* should embrace the imperial constitutions down promote its study. With a view to keep alive and increase the knowledge of law, he founded (in A.D. 425) a school of jurisprudence at Constantinople. He and Valentinian also constituted the works of the five great writers, Gaius, Papinian, Ulpian, Paul, and Modestinus, into a source of law of the highest authority, enacting by a constitution ('the Law of Citations'), published A.D. 426, that the judge should always be bound by the opinion expressed by the majority of these writers; if those among them who expressed an opinion on the point were equally divided, the opinion of Papinian was to prevail: if he was silent, the judge could use his own discretion. In A.D. 438, Theodosius published his Code, containing a collection of the constitutions of the emperors from the time of Constantine. It was made on the model of two earlier collections compiled by the jurists Gregorianus (A.D. 306) and Hermogenianus (A.D. 365).

* Shortly before the time of Justinian, three attempts had been made to

28. The Emperor Justinian was of Gothic origin. His native name was Uprauda, a word said to mean upright, and thus to have found an equivalent in the Latin Justinian. He was born at Taurisium in Bulgaria, about the year A.D. 482, and having been adopted by his uncle, the Emperor Justin, succeeded him as sole emperor in the year A.D. 527. He died in A.D. 565, after an eventful reign of thirty-eight years. Procopius, the secretary of his general Belisarius, has left us a secret memoir of the times, which, if we may rely upon his accuracy, would make us believe Justinian to have been a weak, avaricious, rapacious tyrant. His court, wholly under the influence of his wife Theodora, a degraded woman, whom he had raised from the theatre to share his throne, was as corrupt as was customary in the empire of the East. Justinian would never have been distinguished from among the long list of eastern emperors had it not been for the victories of his generals and the legislation to which he gave his name. The successes of Belisarius and Narses have shed the splendour of military glory over his reign. But his principal claim to be remembered by posterity is his having directed the execution of an undertaking which gave to Roman law a form that fitted it to descend to the modern world.

29. In the year A.D. 528, Justinian issued instructions for the compilation of a new code, which, founded on that of Theodosius, and on the earlier codes on which that code was based,* should embrace the imperial constitutions down to the date of its promulgation. The task was entrusted to a body of ten commissioners, who completed their labours in the following year, and in the month of April, A.D. 529, the emperor gave it his sanction, and abolished all preceding collections.

* Shortly before the time of Justinian, three attempts had been made to

30. In the December of the following year, Tribonian, who had been one of the commission appointed to draw up the code, and who had recommended himself to the emperor by the energy and ability he had shown, was instructed, in conjunction with a body of coadjutors whom he selected to the number of sixteen, to make a selection from the writings of elder jurists, which should comprehend all that was most valuable in them, and should form a compendious exposition of the law. In spite of the foundation of schools of jurisprudence, of which those of Rome, Constantinople, and Berytus were the most famous, the knowledge which the lawyers of the time had of the writings of the old jurists was exceedingly limited. Justinian wished not only to promulgate a body of law which should not be too bulky and voluminous for general use, but also to provide a work, the study of which should form a necessary part of legal education. The commissioners performed their task in the short space of three years, and on the 30th of December, A.D. 533, the emperor gave to the result of their labours the force of law. The compilation, termed Digesta, or Pandectæ, from its comprehensive character, was divided into fifty books, and was arranged on the model of the perpetual edict. Ulpian's work on the edict had been a text-book in the schools of jurisprudence, and probably it was this that determined the commissioners to adopt a model* which has prevented their work having anything like a scientific arrangement. There are thirty-nine jurists from whose writings the Digest contains literal extracts, those from Ulpian and Paul constituting about one-half of the whole work.

31. The Digest was too vast a work, and also required for its comprehension too great a previous knowledge of law, to admit of its being made the opening of a course of draw up a body of law for the use of the western barbarians and their Roman subjects. These were—the edict of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths (A.D. 500); the Lex Romana Burgundiorum (A.D. 500); and the Lex Romana Visigothorum (A.D. 506). These names are so well known that it is perhaps hardly proper to pass them over altogether; but, as their assistance was not employed in the construction of Justinian's legislation, a detailed account of them is unnecessary here.

* WARNKÖNIG, Hist. du droit romain, p. 182.

to the date of its promulgation. The task was entrusted to a body of ten commissioners, who completed their labours in the following year, and in the month of April, A.D. 529, the emperor gave it his sanction, and abolished all preceding collections.

30. In the December of the following year, Tribonian, who had been one of the commission appointed to draw up the code, and who had recommended himself to the emperor by the energy and ability he had shown, was instructed, in conjunction with a body of coadjutors whom he selected to the number of sixteen, to make a selection from the writings of elder jurists, which should comprehend all that was most valuable in them, and should form a compendious exposition of the law. In spite of the foundation of schools of jurisprudence, of which those of Rome, Constantinople, and Berytus were the most famous, the knowledge which the lawyers of the time had of the writings of the old jurists was exceedingly limited. Justinian wished not only to promulgate a body of law which should not be too bulky and voluminous for general use, but also to provide a work, the study of which should form a necessary part of legal education. The commissioners performed their task in the short space of three years, and on the 30th of December, A.D. 533, the emperor gave to the result of their labours the force of law. The compilation, termed Digesta, or Pandectæ, from its comprehensive character, was divided into fifty books, and was arranged on the model of the perpetual edict. Ulpian's work on the edict had been a text-book in the schools of jurisprudence, and probably it was this that determined the commissioners to adopt a model* which has prevented their work having anything like a scientific arrangement. There are thirty-nine jurists from whose writings the Digest contains literal extracts, those from Ulpian and Paul constituting about one-half of the whole work.

31. The Digest was too vast a work, and also required for its comprehension too great a previous knowledge of law, to admit of its being made the opening of a course of draw up a body of law for the use of the western barbarians and their Roman subjects. These were—the edict of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths (A.D. 500); the Lex Romana Burgundiorum (A.D. 500); and the Lex Romana Visigothorum (A.D. 506). These names are so well known that it is perhaps hardly proper to pass them over altogether; but, as their assistance was not employed in the construction of Justinian's legislation, a detailed account of them is unnecessary here.

* WARNKENIG, Hist. du droit romain, p. 182.

legal study. Justinian, therefore, determined to have an elementary work composed. He had declared his intention in the constitution of December A.D. 530, in which he directed the compilation of the Digest; and Tribonian, in conjunction with Theophilus and Dorotheus, respectively professors in the schools of Constantinople and Berytus, were appointed to draw it up, and like the Digest it became law on the 30th of December, A.D. 533. This elementary work is the Institutes. It was formed on the basis of the Institutes of Gaius, alterations being made to bring it into harmony with the Digest and Code.* Theophilus, shortly after the promulgation of the Institutes, published a Greek paraphrase of the work, which throws much light on many passages in the Latin, and which became the sole form in which the Institutes were known to the Greeks of the East.

In the Eastern Empire the works compiled by order of Justinian were only known by Greek paraphrases and abridgments. From these there were made from time to time compilations in which the constitutions of successive emperors were inserted. Otherwise the knowledge of Roman law may be said to have died out of the East altogether. In the West its fate was different. Justinian in 554 ordered that his different works should be observed as the law of Italy. The inroads of the Lombards, however, soon confined the sphere in which the provisions of an emperor of the East could take effect to Rome, Ravenna, and some districts of the south and centre. Here the knowledge of the legislation of Justinian never died out, until in the twelfth century there was established at Bologna a school of commentators (glossatores), who brought much learning, ingenuity, and industry to the study of the old law, and whose labours formed the beginning of modern researches into the subject.*

32. There were still some points which had been debated by the old jurists, and to which the legislation of Justinian did not as yet furnish any answer. To determine these, Justinian published a book of Fifty Decisions; and as the Code of the year A.D. 529 was a very imperfect work, it was determined to revise that Code, and to incorporate the Fifty Decisions in the revised edition. Tribonian was appointed to superintend legal study. Justinian, therefore, determined to have an elementary work composed. He had declared his intention in the constitution of December A.D. 530, in which he directed the compilation of the Digest; and Tribonian, in conjunction with Theophilus and Dorotheus, respectively professors in the schools of Constantinople and Berytus, were appointed to draw it up, and like the Digest it became law on the 30th of December, A.D. 533. This elementary work is the Institutes. It was formed on the basis of the Institutes of Gaius, alterations being made to bring it into harmony with the Digest and Code.* Theophilus, shortly after the promulgation of the Institutes, published a Greek paraphrase of the work, which throws much light on many passages in the Latin, and which became the sole form in which the Institutes were known to the Greeks of the East.

* Of the Digest there is one manuscript of unknown antiquity, but certainly prior to the glossatores, which was found at Pisa, and was brought thence to Florence, where it now is. Of the Institutes there is no manuscript of an earlier date than one of the 10th century, known as the codex Bambergensis.

In the Eastern Empire the works compiled by order of Justinian were only known by Greek paraphrases and abridgments. From these there were made from time to time compilations in which the constitutions of successive emperors were inserted. Otherwise the knowledge of Roman law may be said to have died out of the East altogether. In the West its fate was different. Justinian in 554 ordered that his different works should be observed as the law of Italy. The inroads of the Lombards, however, soon confined the sphere in which the provisions of an emperor of the East could take effect to Rome, Ravenna, and some districts of the south and centre. Here the knowledge of the legislation of Justinian never died out, until in the twelfth century there was established at Bologna a school of commentators (glossatores), who brought much learning, ingenuity, and industry to the study of the old law, and whose labours formed the beginning of modern researches into the subject.*

32. There were still some points which had been debated by the old jurists, and to which the legislation of Justinian did not as yet furnish any answer. To determine these, Justinian published a book of Fifty Decisions; and as the Code of the year A.D. 529 was a very imperfect work, it was determined to revise that Code, and to incorporate the Fifty Decisions in the revised edition. Tribonian was appointed to superintend the undertaking, and in December, A.D. 534, the new code, called The second Code, the code repetitæ prælectionis, received the force of law. This is the code we now have; the former code, that of A.D. 529, was carefully suppressed, and no trace of it remains. The Code, which is divided into twelve books, is arranged nearly in the same manner as the Digest.

* Of the Digest there is one manuscript of unknown antiquity, but certainly prior to the glossatores, which was found at Pisa, and was brought thence to Florence, where it now is. Of the Institutes there is no manuscript of an earlier date than one of the 10th century, known as the codex Bambergensis.

33. But Justinian could not endure that his having systematised the law should exclude him from law-making. The Novels. He announced in the Code* that any legislative reforms he might at any future time see fit to make should be published in the form of Novellæ Constitutiones. Many such Novellæ were afterwards published; the first in January, A.D. 535, the last in November, A.D. 564. Altogether they amount to 165; but no collection of them seems to have been made in the lifetime of Justinian. Few of them bear a later date than A.D. 545, the year of Tribonian's death.

34. The Institutes of Justinian, after a few general observations on the nature, the divisions, and the sources of law, proceed to treat, first of persons, then of things, then of successions to deceased persons, then of obligations, and lastly of actions. Arrangement of the Institutes. An arrangement as nearly similar as possible will be observed in the following outline of Roman private law.

" ROMAN PRIVATE LAW.

The reader of Mr. Austin's Treatise on the Province of Jurisprudence will remember that he proposes, in the outline given in the Appendix, to treat the subject of Law, by examining, first, the science of General Jurisprudence, that is, of the legal notions and principles which enter into every system of law; and secondly, the science of Particular Law, that is, as he explains it, 'The science of any such system of Positive Law as now actually obtains, or once actually obtained in a specifically determined nation;' and he carefully distinguishes between the sciences of general and particular jurisprudence and the science or sciences which would tell us, not what law is, but what law ought to be.

The Roman jurists made no approach to a division of the subject so accurate and so exhaustive. It is their great merit, the real source of their value to modern Europe, that they apprehended and elucidated the great leading principles and notions of general the undertaking, and in December, A.D. 534, the new code, called The second Code, the code repetitæ prælectionis, received the force of law. This is the code we now have; the former code, that of A.D. 529, was carefully suppressed, and no trace of it remains. The Code, which is divided into twelve books, is arranged nearly in the same manner as the Digest.

* Const. de Emend. Cod. 4.

33. But Justinian could not endure that his having systematised the law should exclude him from law-making. The Novels. He announced in the Code* that any legislative reforms he might at any future time see fit to make should be published in the form of Novellæ Constitutiones. Many such Novellæ were afterwards published; the first in January, A.D. 535, the last in November, A.D. 564. Altogether they amount to 165; but no collection of them seems to have been made in the lifetime of Justinian. Few of them bear a later date than A.D. 545, the year of Tribonian's death.

34. The Institutes of Justinian, after a few general observations on the nature, the divisions, and the sources of law, proceed to treat, first of persons, then of things, then of successions to deceased persons, then of obligations, and lastly of actions. Arrangement of the Institutes. An arrangement as nearly similar as possible will be observed in the following outline of Roman private law.

" ROMAN PRIVATE LAW.

The reader of Mr. Austin's Treatise on the Province of Jurisprudence will remember that he proposes, in the outline given in the Appendix, to treat the subject of Law, by examining, first, the science of General Jurisprudence, that is, of the legal notions and principles which enter into every system of law; and secondly, the science of Particular Law, that is, as he explains it, 'The science of any such system of Positive Law as now actually obtains, or once actually obtained in a specifically determined nation;' and he carefully distinguishes between the sciences of general and particular jurisprudence and the science or sciences which would tell us, not what law is, but what law ought to be.

The Roman jurists made no approach to a division of the subject so accurate and so exhaustive. It is their great merit, the real source of their value to modern Europe, that they apprehended and elucidated the great leading principles and notions of general jurisprudence; but they did not clearly distinguish between general jurisprudence and the municipal law of Rome, or between law and morality. As we have said before, they assumed, on the authority of Greek philosophy, that there was a lex naturæ binding on them because it was a lex, and they endeavoured to work up the dictates of this law and of the jus gentium together with the provisions of the old jus civile into a whole. The Institutes of Gaius open with a declaration that every system of law must contain the two elements of general and municipal law; but in the Institutes of Justinian there are prefixed two definitions taken from the writings of Ulpian; and, while the definitions themselves illustrate the inexactness with which the jurists determined the province of jurisprudence, the place assigned to them in this compilation shows the utter want of anything like philosophy in the age when the Institutes were written. The first definition defines the moral virtue of justice by reference to a legal term (jus), which it leaves unexplained: the second pronounces jurisprudence to be the 'knowledge of things human and divine,' a phrase which, originally referring, perhaps, to the distinction between pontifical and secular law, has no general meaning, except as a summary of the philosophy which thought that law was the expression of a reason common to the universe and to man. We can only treat the Roman notions of law and jurisprudence historically, and ascertain what they were and whence they came; we cannot make them fit into the more accurate shapes assigned to these general terms by the modern philosophy of law.

* Const. de Emend. Cod. 4.

35. The preceding historical sketch will have sufficed to show what were the sources of Roman law: (1) There was the old jus civile, which mainly depended on custom as its basis. (2) There were the judicial decisions of the prætors, and the opinions of the juris prudentes, supplementing the jus civile from the dictates of the lex naturæ and the jus gentium; and (3) There were positive enactments, which may be divided into leges, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, and announcements of the will of the emperor. Sources of law.

36. The main legal term with which we have to start in approaching Roman law is jus. The word is used to signify both the sum of rights and their corresponding duties, sanctioned by law, and also any group, or any single one of these rights. The law prescribes different relations in which the members of a State are to stand to things and to each other. Jus, jura.

jurisprudence; but they did not clearly distinguish between general jurisprudence and the municipal law of Rome, or between law and morality. As we have said before, they assumed, on the authority of Greek philosophy, that there was a lex naturæ binding on them because it was a lex, and they endeavoured to work up the dictates of this law and of the jus gentium together with the provisions of the old jus civile into a whole. The Institutes of Gaius open with a declaration that every system of law must contain the two elements of general and municipal law; but in the Institutes of Justinian there are prefixed two definitions taken from the writings of Ulpian; and, while the definitions themselves illustrate the inexactness with which the jurists determined the province of jurisprudence, the place assigned to them in this compilation shows the utter want of anything like philosophy in the age when the Institutes were written. The first definition defines the moral virtue of justice by reference to a legal term (jus), which it leaves unexplained: the second pronounces jurisprudence to be the 'knowledge of things human and divine,' a phrase which, originally referring, perhaps, to the distinction between pontifical and secular law, has no general meaning, except as a summary of the philosophy which thought that law was the expression of a reason common to the universe and to man. We can only treat the Roman notions of law and jurisprudence historically, and ascertain what they were and whence they came; we cannot make them fit into the more accurate shapes assigned to these general terms by the modern philosophy of law.

35. The preceding historical sketch will have sufficed to show what were the sources of Roman law: (1) There was the old jus civile, which mainly depended on custom as its basis. (2) There were the judicial decisions of the prætors, and the opinions of the juris prudentes, supplementing the jus civile from the dictates of the lex naturæ and the jus gentium; and (3) There were positive enactments, which may be divided into leges, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, and announcements of the will of the emperor.

36. The main legal term with which we have to start in approaching Roman law is jus. The word is used to signify both the sum of rights and their corresponding duties, sanctioned by law, and also any group, or any single one of these rights. The law prescribes different relations in which the members of a State are to stand to things and to each other.

The claim, protected by legal remedies, which each man has to have any of these relations observed in his own case Rights. is a right; and as the right must be conceived to belong to or reside in a person, we speak of a right being the right of a person, e.g. my right to have that book, your right to have that house (jus meum, jus tuum). When we examine the different rights established by law in a State, we find some of a public character, affecting individuals as members of a body politic; others of a private character, affecting individuals only. It is only of the private rights established by Roman law that we now propose to speak; and as rights are either rights which persons have over things, or rights which persons have against some other person or persons, we shall treat, first, Division of the subject. of the mode in which the Roman law regarded persons; then of the mode in which it regarded things; then of the rights it gave to persons against persons; and, lastly, of the method by which the State enforced private rights when disputed or disregarded, that is, the system of civil process.

I. PERSONS.

37. The word persona had, in the usage of Roman law, a different meaning from that which we ordinarily attach to the word person. Whoever or whatever was capable of having, and being subject to, rights was a persona. Slaves were personae in the sense that they were not merely things, and they could go through some legal forms and were entitled in later times to a certain amount of legal protection; but although they are thus treated of under the law of persons, it is chiefly their want of legal capacities that attracts attention. Many personae, however, had no physical existence. The law clothed certain abstract conceptions with an existence, and attached to them the capability of having, and being subject to, rights. The law, for instance, treated the State as a persona, capable, for example, of owning land or slaves (ager publicus, servi publici). So, a corporation, or an ecclesiastical institution, was a persona, quite apart from the individual personae who formed the one and administered the other. Even the fiscus, or imperial treasury, as being the symbol of the abstract conception of the emperor's claims, was spoken of as a persona.

38. The technical term for the position of an individual re-

The claim, protected by legal remedies, which each man has to have any of these relations observed in his own case Rights. is a right; and as the right must be conceived to belong to or reside in a person, we speak of a right being the right of a person, e.g. my right to have that book, your right to have that house (jus meum, jus tuum). When we examine the different rights established by law in a State, we find some of a public character, affecting individuals as members of a body politic; others of a private character, affecting individuals Division of the subject. It is only of the private rights established by Roman law we now propose to speak; and as rights are either rights which persons have over things, or rights which persons have against some other person or persons, we shall treat, first, of the mode in which the Roman law regarded persons; then of the mode in which it regarded things; then of the rights it gave to persons against persons; and, lastly, of the method by which the State enforced private rights when disputed or disregarded, that is, the system of civil process.

I. PERSONS.

37. The word persona had, in the usage of Roman law, a different meaning from that which we ordinarily attach to the word person. Meaning of the word persona. Whoever or whatever was capable of having, and being subject to, rights was a persona. Slaves were personæ in the sense that they were not merely things, and they could go through some legal forms and were entitled in later times to a certain amount of legal protection; but although they are thus treated of under the law of persons, it is chiefly their want of legal capacities that attracts attention. Many personæ, however, had no physical existence. The law clothed certain abstract conceptions with an existence, and attached to them the capability of having, and being subject to, rights. The law, for instance, treated the State as a persona, capable, for example, of owning land or slaves (ager publicus, servi publici). So, a corporation, or an ecclesiastical institution, was a persona, quite apart from the individual personæ who formed the one and administered the other. Even the fiscus, or imperial treasury, as being the symbol of the abstract conception of the emperor's claims, was spoken of as a persona.

38. The technical term for the position of an individual regarded as a legal person was status, and the constitutive elements of his status were liberty, citizenship, and membership in a family. First, he must be free. A slave had no rights. In the earlier days of Roman law, no one would have conceived this to be unnatural. But philosophy, and the study of morality, taught the later jurists that the condition of a slave was a violation of natural law. It was not, however, necessary that the person should have been born free (ingenus); for the process of manumission placed the slave in the same degree on a level with the ingenus by making him a freedman (libertinus, or, if spoken of with reference to his patron, *libertus). It depended on the mode and circumstance of his manumission whether he became at once a Roman citizen; but in whatever way he was enfranchised he still owed certain duties to his patron, and in certain cases his patron was his heir.

39. The second element of the status was citizenship. The Roman notion of the State was that of a compact privileged body separated off from the rest of the world by the exclusive possession of certain public and private rights. In the early times of Rome the cives, or members of the State, were divided into two bodies of patres and plebeians, the former of whom had a public and sacred law peculiar to themselves, while they shared with the latter the system of private law. Beyond the State all were hostes and barbari. But as civilisation advanced, the number of foreigners who resorted to Rome for trade, or were otherwise brought into friendly relations with citizens, was so great that they were looked upon as a distinct class, that of peregrini. To be a citizen was thenceforward not to be a peregrinus, the force of the one idea being brought out by the prominence of its opposite. A peregrinus was subject to the jus gentium; citizens alone could claim the privileges of the jus Quiritium. But when her conquests placed Rome in new and varying relations with the nations of Italy, an intermediate position between the citizen and the peregrinus was accorded to the more privileged of the vanquished. Some of the rights of the citizen were given to them, and some were withheld. These peculiar rights of the citizen were summed up in the familiar term suffragium et honores, the right of voting and the capacity of holding magisterial offices, and in the terms connubium and commercium.

* The Latin for a freedman was libertinus; but libertus Titii is the Latin for the freedman of Titius.

garded as a legal person was status, and the constitutive elements of his status were liberty, citizenship, and membership in a family. First, he must be free. A slave had no rights. In the earlier days of Roman law, no one would have conceived this to be unnatural. But philosophy, and the study of morality, taught the later jurists that the condition of a slave was a violation of natural law. It was not, however, necessary that the person should have been born free (ingenius); for the process of manumission placed the slave in the degree on a level with the ingenius by making him a freedman (libertinus, or, if spoken of with reference to his patron, *libertus). It depended on the mode and circumstance of his manumission whether he became at once a Roman citizen; but in whatever way he was enfranchised he still owed certain duties to his patron, and in certain cases his patron was his heir.

39. The second element of the status was citizenship. The Roman notion of the State was that of a compact privileged body separated off from the rest of the world by the exclusive possession of certain public and private rights. In the early times of Rome the cives, or members of the State, were divided into two bodies of patres and plebeians, the former of whom had a public and sacred law peculiar to themselves, while they shared with the latter the system of private law. Beyond the State all were hostes and barbari. But as civilisation advanced, the number of foreigners who resorted to Rome for trade, or were otherwise brought into friendly relations with citizens, was so great that they were looked upon as a distinct class, that of peregrini. To be a citizen was thenceforward not to be a peregrinus, the force of the one idea being brought out by the prominence of its opposite. A peregrinus was subject to the jus gentium; citizens alone could claim the privileges of the jus Quiritium. But when her conquests placed Rome in new and varying relations with the nations of Italy, an intermediate position between the citizen and the peregrinus was accorded to the more privileged of the vanquished. Some of the rights of the citizen were given to them, and some were withheld. These peculiar rights of the citizen were summed up in the familiar term suffragium et honores, the right of voting and the capacity of holding magisterial offices, and in the terms connubium and commercium.

* The Latin for a freedman was libertinus; but libertus Titii is the Latin for the freedman of Titius.

Connubium is a term which explains itself. The foundation of the Roman family was a marriage according to the jus Quiritium, and not to have the connubium was to be incapable of entering into the Roman family system. In the word commercium were included the power of holding property and making contracts according to the Roman law, and also the testamenti factio, or power to make a will, and to accept property under one. By the jus Latinum and the jus Italicum various modifications of the different rights implied in the civitas were granted. The jus Latinum gave private rights to individuals, the jus Italicum gave public rights to towns. In some cases the jus Latinum gave the connubium and commercium; in some only the latter, in many only a portion of the latter, the testamenti factio, the power of making, or taking under, a testament, being withheld. The jus Italicum gave certain favoured towns a free municipal constitution, an immunity from direct taxation, and made the soil subject to Quiritarian ownership (see sec. 58). In the course of time other shades between the civis and the peregrinus were introduced, but all distinction between them was gradually swept away by the increasing recklessness with which the rights of citizenship were bestowed. At last Caracalla made all the free subjects of the empire citizens; and thenceforward the class of peregrini, properly speaking, ceased to exist. All the free inhabitants of the civilised world were cives, and beyond were nothing but barbari and hostes.

40. The Roman family, in the peculiar shape it assumed under the jus Quiritium, was modelled on a civil rather than on a natural basis. The tie which bound members of the same family was not that of blood; it was their common position in the midst of a peculiar system. For the formation of such a family, a legal marriage was an indispensable preliminary; but it was only a preliminary, and the peculiar character of the family did not in any way flow from the tie. The head of the family was all in all. He did not so much represent as absorb in himself the subordinate members. He alone was sui juris, i.e. had an independent will; all the other members were alieni juris, their wills were not independent, but were only expressed through their chief. The paterfamilias, the head of the family, was said to have all the other members of his family in his power; and this power (patria potestas) was the foundation of all that peculiarly characterised the Roman family. At the head of the family stood Connubium is a term which explains itself. The foundation of the Roman family was a marriage according to the jus Quiritium, and not to have the connubium was to be incapable of entering into the Roman family system. In the word commercium were included the power of holding property and making contracts according to the Roman law, and also the testamenti factio, or power to make a will, and to accept property under one. By the jus Latinum and the jus Italicum various modifications of the different rights implied in the civitas were granted. The jus Latinum gave private rights to individuals, the jus Italicum gave public rights to towns. In some cases the jus Latinum gave the connubium and commercium; in some only the latter, in many only a portion of the latter, the testamenti factio, the power of making, or taking under, a testament, being withheld. The jus Italicum gave certain favoured towns a free municipal constitution, an immunity from direct taxation, and made the soil subject to Quiritarian ownership (see sec. 58). In the course of time other shades between the civis and the peregrinus were introduced, but all distinction between them was gradually swept away by the increasing recklessness with which the rights of citizenship were bestowed. At last Caracalla made all the free subjects of the empire citizens; and thenceforward the class of peregrini, properly speaking, ceased to exist. All the free inhabitants of the civilised world were cives, and beyond were nothing but barbari and hostes.

40. The Roman family, in the peculiar shape it assumed under the jus Quiritium, was modelled on a civil rather than on a natural basis. The tie which bound members of the same family was not that of blood; it was their common position in the midst of a peculiar system. For the formation of such a family, a legal marriage was an indispensable preliminary; but it was only a preliminary, and the peculiar character of the family did not in any way flow from the tie. The head of the family was all in all. He did not so much represent as absorb in himself the subordinate members. He alone was sui juris, i.e. had an independent will; all the other members were alieni juris, their wills were not independent, but were only expressed through their chief. The paterfamilias, the head of the family, was said to have all the other members of his family in his power; and this power (patria potestas) was the foundation of all that peculiarly characterised the Roman family. At the head of the family stood the paterfamilias alone. Beneath him came his children, sons and daughters, and his wife, who, in order to preserve the symmetry of the system, was treated by law as a daughter.* If a daughter married, she left this family, and passed into the family of her husband, but if a son married, all his children were as much in the power of the paterfamilias as the son himself. Thus all the descendants through the male line were in the power of the same person. And it was this that constituted the link of family relationship between them, not the natural tie of blood. When the paterfamilias died, each of the sons became in his turn a paterfamilias; he was now sui juris, and all his own descendants through the male line were in his power. Each of the daughters, as long as she remained unmarried, was also sui juris; but directly she formed a legal marriage, and thereby entered into her husband's family, she passed into the power of another. Hence it was said that a woman was at once the beginning and end of her family, caput et finis familie sue, for directly she attempted to continue it, she passed into another family.

41. Persons who were under the power of another could not hold or acquire any property of their own. All belonged to the paterfamilias; and whatever the son acquired was acquired for the father. In matters of public law the filiusfamilias laboured under no incapacities; he could vote or hold a magistracy, but in all the relations of private law he was absolutely in his father's power. He could not make a will, for he had no property to dispose of; nor bring an action, for nothing was owing to him. But in all public relations, whenever this incapability of possessing property was not in question, the filiusfamilias had all the privileges of a citizen; he had, for instance, the connubium, and could contract a legal marriage; and the commercium, and could, therefore, be a witness in sale by mancipation, to which none except citizens could be witnesses. The indulgence of later times permitted the filiusfamilias to hold certain property apart from the paterfamilias, an indulgence first accorded as an encouragement to military service. But this was always treated as a notable departure from the strict theory of law.

42. The distinction between the legal and the natural family

* She was technically said to be in the manus of her husband; and perhaps manus is the old word signifying the power of the paterfamilias, and potestas is only an expression of later Latin.

the paterfamilias alone. Beneath him came his children, sons and daughters, and his wife, who, in order to preserve the symmetry of the system, was treated by law as a daughter.* If a daughter married, she left this family, and passed into the family of her husband, but if a son married, all his children were as much in the power of the paterfamilias as the son himself. Thus all the descendants through the male line were in the power of the same person. And it was this that constituted the link of family relationship between them, not the natural tie of blood. When the paterfamilias died, each of the sons became in his turn a paterfamilias; he was now sui juris, and all his own descendants through the male line were in his power. Each of the daughters, as long as she remained unmarried, was also sui juris; but directly she formed a legal marriage, and thereby entered into her husband's family, she passed into the power of another. Hence it was said that a woman was at once the beginning and end of her family, caput et finis familie sue, for directly she attempted to continue it, she passed into another family.

41. Persons who were under the power of another could not hold or acquire any property of their own. All belonged to the paterfamilias; and whatever the son acquired was acquired for the father. In matters of public law the filiusfamilias laboured under no incapacities; he ^{Position of persons in potestate.} could vote or hold a magistracy, but in all the relations of private law he was absolutely in his father's power. He could not make a will, for he had no property to dispose of; nor bring an action, for nothing was owing to him. But in all public relations, whenever this incapability of possessing property was not in question, the filiusfamilias had all the privileges of a citizen; he had, for instance, the connubium, and could contract a legal marriage; and the commercium, and could, therefore, be a witness in sale by mancipation, to which none except citizens could be witnesses. The indulgence of later times permitted the filiusfamilias to hold certain property apart from the paterfamilias, an indulgence first accorded as an encouragement to military service. But this was always treated as a notable departure from the strict theory of law.

42. The distinction between the legal and the natural family

* She was technically said to be in the manus of her husband; and perhaps manus is the old word signifying the power of the paterfamilias, and potestas is only an expression of later Latin.

is illustrated by its being possible for a member of the legal family to quit it and become an entire stranger to it, and for an entire stranger to be admitted to it, and be as completely a member as if he were a son of the paterfamilias. The mode by which the change in either case was accomplished was by a fictitious sale. Every Roman citizen could sell himself to another by the peculiar form of sale called mancipatio; and as the father possessed over the son the rights which a person sui juris possessed over himself, he sold the filiusfamilias to a natural purchaser, who was supposed to buy the son. It was decreed by the law of the Twelve Tables, that a son thrice sold by his father should be free from his power, and the ceremony was therefore repeated three times, and the son was then emancipatus, or sold out of the family. When a stranger, being himself alieni juris, wished or was compelled to enter a family, the process was effected by adoption. Here, again, then, was another sale, the paterfamilias of the family he quitted being the seller, and the paterfamilias of that he entered being the purchaser. If the stranger was sui juris, he entered his new family by arrogation, which in ancient times could only be effected by a vote in the comitia curiata, it being considered a matter of public policy to keep a watch over such a proceeding, lest the last of his gens should arrogate himself, and its sacra be lost. Much simpler modes for effecting arrogation, as well as for effecting emancipation and adoption, were employed in later times; and one of the most important changes in law introduced by Justinian was that by which he altered the character of adoption, and decreed that, unless the adopter was an ascendant, the person adopted should not pass out of his natural family.

43. A person might be sui juris, and be in possession of every right, and yet be unable, through some imperfection, to exercise the rights he possessed. A child, for instance, was not only not able to conduct his affairs with discretion, but he was unable to understand, perhaps to speak, the forms necessary to be expressly pronounced in almost every legal transaction. A tutor was therefore appointed, who, until the child attained the age of puberty, supplied this defect of his ward, or, as he was called, his pupil. And this is the Roman notion of a tutor: he was a person who supplied something that was wanting, who filled up the measure of his pupil's persona.* He of course is illustrated by its being possible for a member of the legal family to quit it and become an entire stranger to it, and for an entire stranger to be admitted to it, and be as completely a member as if he were a son of the paterfamilias. The mode by which the change in either case was accomplished was by a fictitious sale. Every Roman citizen could sell himself to another by the peculiar form of sale called mancipatio; and as the father possessed over the son the rights which a person sui juris possessed over himself, he sold the filiusfamilias to a natural purchaser, who was supposed to buy the son. It was decreed by the law of the Twelve Tables, that a son thrice sold by his father should be free from his power, and the ceremony was therefore repeated three times, and the son was then emancipatus, or sold out of the family. When a stranger, being himself alieni juris, wished or was compelled to enter a family, the process was effected by adoption. Here, again, then, was another sale, the paterfamilias of the family he quitted being the seller, and the paterfamilias of that he entered being the purchaser. If the stranger was sui juris, he entered his new family by arrogation, which in ancient times could only be effected by a vote in the comitia curiata, it being considered a matter of public policy to keep a watch over such a proceeding, lest the last of his gens should arrogate himself, and its sacra be lost. Much simpler modes for effecting arrogation, as well as for effecting emancipation and adoption, were employed in later times; and one of the most important changes in law introduced by Justinian was that by which he altered the character of adoption, and decreed that, unless the adopter was an ascendant, the person adopted should not pass out of his natural family.

* Persona had in Roman law a double signification. It meant a person

43. A person might be sui juris, and be in possession of every right, and yet be unable, through some imperfection, to exercise the rights he possessed. A child, for instance, was not only not able to conduct his affairs with discretion, but he was unable to understand, perhaps to speak, the forms necessary to be expressly pronounced in almost every legal transaction. A tutor was therefore appointed, who, until the child attained the age of puberty, supplied this defect of his ward, or, as he was called, his pupil. And this is the Roman notion of a tutor: he was a person who supplied something that was wanting, who filled up the measure of his pupil's persona.* He of course took care of the person and property of the child; but this was only an accessory of his position; his primary office was to supply by his auctoritas * what the pupil fell short of. So, too, in the old law, unmarried women, of whatever age, remained in the tutelage of their relations. Further, a person might be sui juris, and be of an age to exercise his rights, and yet it might be necessary to insure that he did not hurt himself and his family by the mode in which he exercised them. In such cases, a curator was appointed, whose duty it was to look after his property. This curator had a perfectly different office from a tutor; in technical language, the tutor was said to be appointed to the person, the curator to the property. The curator was only appointed as a check to prevent pecuniary loss. Curators were also appointed to watch over the interests of insane persons, and of persons notoriously prodigal, as well as of those who had attained the age of puberty, but were under the age of twenty-five.

* Persona had in Roman law a double signification. It meant a person

44. While the head of a family lived, all those who were in his power were connected together by the tie of Agnati. subjection to the power of the same person. The tie was called agnatio, and the persons so mutually connected were agnati to each other. When the paterfamilias died, the tie of agnatio still subsisted. Each of those who, by his death, became sui juris, became the head of a new family; but still they and their descendants were agnati to each other so long as they did not by emancipation or by adoption, or, in the case of women, by marriage, leave their original family. All those, in short, who would have been agnati to each other if the life of the original paterfamilias had been prolonged, were agnati at any distance of time, however great, after his death. A number of distinct families might thus, when looked on as connected by agnatio, be spoken of as one family; for they were all portions of the family of a deceased paterfamilias.

45. Beyond the circle of the agnati, the ancient patrician had that of the gens. They were nearer to him than those who were only related to him by blood. If a patrician died intestate, in in the sense used above in sec. 37. It also meant all or some of the capacities attaching to a person. The persona (taken generally) of a person was thus the sum total of all his legal capacities, and the same person as a husband or father had the persona mariti or patris.

* The derivation of auctoritas should never be lost sight of. When one person increased, augebat, what another had, so as to fill up a deficiency, this increasing or filling up was called auctoritas.

took care of the person and property of the child; but this was only an accessory of his position; his primary office was to supply by his auctoritas * what the pupil fell short of. So, too, in the old law, unmarried women, of whatever age, remained in the tutelage of their relations. Further, a person might be sui juris, and be of an age to exercise his rights, and yet it might be necessary to insure that he did not hurt himself and his family by the mode in which he exercised them. In such cases, a curator was appointed, whose duty it was to look after his property. This curator had a perfectly different office from a tutor; in technical language, the tutor was said to be appointed to the person, the curator to the property. The curator was only appointed as a check to prevent pecuniary loss. Curators were also appointed to watch over the interests of insane persons, and of persons notoriously prodigal, as well as of those who had attained the age of puberty, but were under the age of twenty-five.

44. While the head of a family lived, all those who were in his power were connected together by the tie of Agnati. subjection to the power of the same person. The tie was called agnatio, and the persons so mutually connected were agnati to each other. When the paterfamilias died, the tie of agnatio still subsisted. Each of those who, by his death, became sui juris, became the head of a new family; but still they and their descendants were agnati to each other so long as they did not by emancipation or by adoption, or, in the case of women, by marriage, leave their original family. All those, in short, who would have been agnati to each other if the life of the original paterfamilias had been prolonged, were agnati at any distance of time, however great, after his death. A number of distinct families might thus, when looked on as connected by agnatio, be spoken of as one family; for they were all portions of the family of a deceased paterfamilias.

45. Beyond the circle of the agnati, the ancient patrician had that of the gens. They were nearer to him than those who were only related to him by blood. If a patrician died intestate, in in the sense used above in sec. 37. It also meant all or some of the capacities attaching to a person. The persona (taken generally) of a person was thus the sum total of all his legal capacities, and the same person as a husband or father had the persona mariti or patris.

* The derivation of auctoritas should never be lost sight of. When one person increased, augebat, what another had, so as to fill up a deficiency, this increasing or filling up was called auctoritas.

default of agnati, his gentiles, the men of his gens, were his heirs.

Gentiles. He was placed in the midst of two artificial circles, shutting out the natural circle of blood relations ; while the plebeian, unless he happened to belong to one of the few plebeian gentes, and, when the system of gentes had faded away, the patrician also, acknowledged the ties of blood as next to that of Cognati. agnatio. All those who were connected together by the ties of blood were cognati. It was the tendency of the later Roman legislation to give greater and greater weight to the ties of blood, and to substitute a natural, for an artificial

Affines. system of family relationship. Lastly, the cognati of each of the parties to a marriage were said to be affines to the other party.

46. We have spoken as if the wife had been always in the Position of the wife. manus, or power, of her husband. And this was so, probably, in the strict theory of the Roman family, and in the practice of early times. The tie of marriage was formed among the patricians by the ceremony of confarreatio, in which none could partake except those who had the privileges of the jus sacrum ; and apparently the mere fact of going through the ceremony placed a wife in the manus of her husband. The plebeians had no corresponding ceremony ; and in order that, when two persons came together in marriage, the wife should be in the power of the husband, she was sold to the husband by the father, a process which was termed coemptio, or if she remained with her husband a year, then the power over her was acquired by usus, that is, by the uninterrupted lapse of time. If, however, she absented herself for three consecutive nights in the year, this prevented her falling into the husband's power. Perhaps, at all times, at least in plebeian families, a woman could so marry as not to fall into the manus of her husband ; and in later times such marriages formed the rule. It made no difference in other relations of the family whether the wife was in the power of the husband or not. Supposing she and her husband had the conubium, that is, were capable of intermarrying, all the usual incidents of a marriage, such as the patria potestas, attached to the connection. If a man and a woman entered into a permanent connection without marriage (concubinatus), their Concubinage. children were naturales liberi, and were so far favoured by the later law as to be capable of being placed in the position of children sprung from a legal marriage, by the process default of agnati, his gentiles, the men of his gens, were his heirs.

Gentiles. He was placed in the midst of two artificial circles, shutting out the natural circle of blood relations ; while the plebeian, unless he happened to belong to one of the few plebeian gentes, and, when the system of gentes had faded away, the patrician also, acknowledged the ties of blood as next to that of

Cognati. agnatio. All those who were connected together by the ties of blood were cognati. It was the tendency of the later Roman legislation to give greater and greater weight to the ties of blood, and to substitute a natural, for an artificial Affines. system of family relationship. Lastly, the cognati of each of the parties to a marriage were said to be affines to the other party.

46. We have spoken as if the wife had been always in the Position of the wife. manus, or power, of her husband. And this was so, probably, in the strict theory of the Roman family, and in the practice of early times. The tie of marriage was formed among the patricians by the ceremony of confarreatio, in which none could partake except those who had the privileges of the jus sacrum ; and apparently the mere fact of going through the ceremony placed a wife in the manus of her husband. The plebeians had no corresponding ceremony ; and in order that, when two persons came together in marriage, the wife should be in the power of the husband, she was sold to the husband by the father, a process which was termed coemptio, or if she remained with her husband a year, then the power over her was acquired by usus, that is, by the uninterrupted lapse of time. If, however, she absented herself for three consecutive nights in the year, this prevented her falling into the husband's power. Perhaps, at all times, at least in plebeian families, a woman could so marry as not to fall into the manus of her husband ; and in later times such marriages formed the rule. It made no difference in other relations of the family whether the wife was in the power of the husband or not. Supposing she and her husband had the conubium, that is, were capable of intermarrying, all the usual incidents of a marriage, such as the patria potestas, attached to the connection. If a man and a woman entered into a permanent

Concubinage. connection without marriage (concubinatus), their children were naturales liberi, and were so far favoured by the later law as to be capable of being placed in the position of children sprung from a legal marriage, by the process of legitimatio. After the time of Constantine they might be made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents. In all unions of the sexes, other than a legal marriage, the children followed the condition of their mother: being free, that is, if she was free, and slaves if she was a slave. The union of slaves was called contubernium; but however solemnly entered into, and however faithfully its natural tie acknowledged, it was never in the eye of the law regarded as anything better than promiscuous intercourse.

47. It was possible that any one who possessed a complete status should undergo a change of status, and this Deminutio capitis change might happen in any one of the three component parts of the status. The capability of exercising all those rights implied in a perfect status was frequently spoken of as a man's caput, and the change in each of these component parts was said to be a deminutio capitis, a lessening or impairing of the caput. First, a man might lose his freedom; he might be taken prisoner by an enemy, or undergo a very severe criminal sentence. The loss of this element of the status, called capitis deminutio maxima, involved the loss of the remaining two, the person who ceased to be free ceasing also to have the rights of citizenship or family rights. Secondly, he might lose his rights of citizenship, and this loss, called capitis deminutio media, involved the loss of family rights, but still left him free. Thirdly, by what was called capitis deminutio minima, he might lose his position in his family by emancipation or arrogation. In early times there were rights, principally those forming part of the jus sacrum, which a person who passed out of his family really lost; but in later times, as in every case the person who underwent this capitis deminutio either entered another family, or became the head of his own family, his status was really not made at all less perfect by the change. Of course this capitis deminutio involved the loss of neither of the two other component parts of the status.

48. When a person was possessed of a perfect status, he was considered to enjoy a high dignity and reputation in the eyes of others. This reputation (existimatio) the Romans considered as one of the chief possessions of a person. It was even to a certain extent regulated by law. If a person ceased to be free, his existimatio was gone. Certain offences were treated by law as impairing it. If the offence was so grave as to of legitimatio. After the time of Constantine they might be made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents. In all unions of the sexes, other than a legal marriage, the children followed the condition of their mother: being free, that is, if she was free, and slaves if she was a slave. The union of slaves was called contubernium; but however solemnly entered into, and however faithfully its natural tie acknowledged, it was never in the eye of the law regarded as anything better than promiscuous intercourse.

47. It was possible that any one who possessed a complete status should undergo a change of status, and this Deminutio capitis change might happen in any one of the three component parts of the status. The capability of exercising all those rights implied in a perfect status was frequently spoken of as a man's caput, and the change in each of these component parts was said to be a deminutio capitis, a lessening or impairing of the caput. First, a man might lose his freedom; he might be taken prisoner by an enemy, or undergo a very severe criminal sentence. The loss of this element of the status, called capitis deminutio maxima, involved the loss of the remaining two, the person who ceased to be free ceasing also to have the rights of citizenship or family rights. Secondly, he might lose his rights of citizenship, and this loss, called capitis deminutio media, involved the loss of family rights, but still left him free. Thirdly, by what was called capitis deminutio minima, he might lose his position in his family by emancipation or arrogation. In early times there were rights, principally those forming part of the jus sacrum, which a person who passed out of his family really lost; but in later times, as in every case the person who underwent this capitis deminutio either entered another family, or became the head of his own family, his status was really not made at all less perfect by the change. Of course this capitis deminutio involved the loss of neither of the two other component parts of the status.

48. When a person was possessed of a perfect status, he was considered to enjoy a high dignity and reputation in the eyes of others. This reputation (existimatio) the Romans considered as one of the chief possessions of a person. It was even to a certain extent regulated by law. If a person ceased to be free, his existimatio was gone. Certain offences were treated by law as impairing it. If the offence was so grave as to impair the existimatio very seriously, its diminution was said to amount to infamia. For example, a partner, or a mandatary, condemned in an action pro socio or mandato, was stamped with infamy. The consequences of infamy were, that the guilty person could not vote, could not receive public honours, and could not bring a public prosecution. If the offence was rather less grave, the consequence was turpitude; and if the person was in some inferior position, as, for instance, an actor, he was said to be marked with a levis nota, a slight brand of disgrace.

49. It only remains to be observed that, although persons

End of the existence of persons.

that were the mere creations of law, as corporations, ceased to exist when the law in any way put an end to their existence, as by the dissolution of the corporation, yet the person of individuals, that is, their legal, as opposed to their natural being, did not become extinct by their death. At the moment of death it was shifted to those who represented them. The son was clothed with the person of the father, the heir with that of the testator. What we mean by saying that the deceased is represented, that is, again made present and brought before us, the Roman jurists expressed by saying that his person had been shifted to those who succeeded in his place.

II. THINGS.

50. The word thing (res) has, in Roman law, a sense as artificial and as wide as the word person. As person comprehends every legal being that has rights and is subject to them, so thing comprehends all that can be considered as the object of a right. The object of a right may be incorporeal, or the pure creation of law, and need not be limited to things corporeal and visible. The law can separate the right to possess a field and the right to walk in it, and the object of each right is called indifferently a thing. When we attempt to classify these objects of rights, we are unable to select any one principle of division according to which we may distribute them. The aspects in which we may view them are too various to admit of a simple arrangement; we may, however, make a division approximately accurate by considering, first, those heads of things which we arrive at by examining the nature of the things themselves; and secondly, those which we arrive at by inquiring into the interest which persons have in them.

impair the existimatio very seriously, its diminution was said to amount to infamia. For example, a partner, or a mandatary, condemned in an action pro socio or mandato, was stamped with infamy. The consequences of infamy were, that the guilty person could not vote, could not receive public honours, and could not bring a public prosecution. If the offence was rather less grave, the consequence was turpitude; and if the person was in some inferior position, as, for instance, an actor, he was said to be marked with a levis nota, a slight brand of disgrace.

49. It only remains to be observed that, although persons

*End of the existence of
persons.*

that were the mere creations of law, as corporations, ceased to exist when the law in any way put an end to their existence, as by the dissolution of the corporation, yet the person of individuals, that is, their legal, as opposed to their natural being, did not become extinct by their death. At the moment of death it was shifted to those who represented them. The son was clothed with the person of the father, the heir with that of the testator. What we mean by saying that the deceased is represented, that is, again made present and brought before us, the Roman jurists expressed by saying that his person had been shifted to those who succeeded in his place.

II. THINGS.

50. The word thing (res) has, in Roman law, a sense as artificial and as wide as the word person. As person comprehends every legal being that has rights and is subject to them, so thing comprehends all that can be considered as the object of a right. The object of a right may be incorporeal, or the pure creation of law, and need not be limited to things corporeal and visible. The law can separate the right to possess a field and the right to walk in it, and the object of each right is called indifferently a thing. When we attempt to classify these objects of rights, we are unable to select any one principle of division according to which we may distribute them. The aspects in which we may view them are too various to admit of a simple arrangement; we may, however, make a division approximately accurate by considering, first, those heads of things which we arrive at by examining the nature of the things themselves; and secondly, those which we arrive at by inquiring into the interest which persons have in them.

51. First, then, things may be corporeal or incorporeal; or, as the jurists expressed it, tangi possunt or tangi non possunt. We see a house or a field; we do not see a right to inhabit the one or reap the fruits of the other. The physical tangible object of sense is a corporeal thing; the intangible abstraction of the mind is an incorporeal thing. Incorporeal things always consist in a right; if we see a stream flowing, or a path winding through a field, the mind sees, as something distinct from the object of sense, the power of using the water or of following the path. This power is, in the language of the law, an incorporeal thing; and a person may have a right to possess it just as he may have a right to possess a house or field. Strictly speaking, the right to own a field, and not the field itself, is what the law takes cognisance of, and this is as much incorporeal as the right to walk over it. But Roman law has adopted or introduced the popular way of speaking, according to which we say, 'I have a field;' 'I have a right of way over a field.'

*Division of things.
Corporeal and incorporeal.*

52. We may again speak of corporeal things as moveable and immoveable (res mobiles, se moventes, and res soli, res immobiles), a distinction so obvious that it needs no other remark than that some moveable things are so incorporated with immoveables, or so constantly associated with their use, that the law treats them as immoveables; as for instance a house, each brick of which is a moveable, is itself an immoveable, because attached to the soil.

Things moveable and immoveable.

53. Things are also either divisible or indivisible. We cannot divide a slave or a horse so that the several parts have the same value which they had when they were parts of a whole; but if we divide a field into four, we have four small fields.

Things divisible and indivisible.

54. They are also principal or accessory; that is, they are the direct object of rights, or are only so as forming a portion of, or being intimately connected with, something that is; thus a tree is a principal thing, its fruit an accessory.

Things principal and accessory.

55. Another distinction relating to things familiar to the Roman jurists was that between the genus and the species. By the genus was meant a whole class of objects, such as horses, or the general name for an object, such as wine, oil, wheat. Species was the particular member of the Genus and species.

51. First, then, things may be corporeal or incorporeal; or, as the jurists expressed it, tangi possunt or tangi non possunt. We see a house or a field; we do not see a right to inhabit the one or reap the fruits of the other. The physical tangible object of sense is a corporeal thing; the intangible abstraction of the mind is an incorporeal thing. Incorporeal things always consist in a right; if we see a stream flowing, or a path winding through a field, the mind sees, as something distinct from the object of sense, the power of using the water or of following the path. This power is, in the language of the law, an incorporeal thing; and a person may have a right to possess it just as he may have a right to possess a house or field. Strictly speaking, the right to own a field, and not the field itself, is what the law takes cognisance of, and this is as much incorporeal as the right to walk over it. But Roman law has adopted or introduced the popular way of speaking, according to which we say, 'I have a field;' 'I have a right of way over a field.'

*Division of things.
Corporeal and incorporeal.*

52. We may again speak of corporeal things as moveable and immoveable (res mobiles, se moventes, and res soli, res immobiles), a distinction so obvious that it needs no other remark than that some moveable things are so incorporated with immoveables, or so constantly associated with their use, that the law treats them as immoveables; as for instance a house, each brick of which is a moveable, is itself an immoveable, because attached to the soil.

Things moveable and immoveable.

53. Things are also either divisible or indivisible. We cannot divide a slave or a horse so that the several parts have the same value which they had when they were parts of a whole; but if we divide a field into four, we have four small fields.

Things divisible and indivisible.

54. They are also principal or accessory; that is, they are the direct object of rights, or are only so as forming a portion of, or being intimately connected with, something that is; thus a tree is a principal thing, its fruit an accessory.

Things principal and accessory.

55. Another distinction relating to things familiar to the Roman jurists was that between the genus and the species. By the genus was meant a whole class of objects, such as horses, or the general name for an object, such as wine, oil, wheat. Species was the particular member of the class, or particular portion of the object comprehended under the genus, as this horse, or the wine in this bottle. If a purchaser bought a horse, or a certain quantity of oil, the thing bought was said to be determined genere; if he bought a particular horse or the oil in a certain vase, the thing bought was said to be determined specie. All things which are included under a general name, such as oil or wheat, are commonly divided by being weighed, numbered, or measured, and were therefore spoken of by the jurists as being those things quæ pondere, numero, mensurae constant.

Genus and species.

56. We may, lastly, regard things as particular, or as collected under some head, when the whole collection is a thing in law. Thus a sheep is a particular thing (res singularis); a flock, composed ex distantibus unum nomini subjectis, is a collection of things, or, as the jurists expressed it, is a rerum universitas (or simply universitas). As also, of course, are such comprehensive things as an inheritance, a marriage portion, the peculium of a slave.

57. In proceeding to the second division of things according to the persons who have rights over them, and to the extent of those rights, we must first notice the distinction in things caused by certain things having a sacred character (res divini juris). These were res sacrae, consecrated to the superior gods; or res religiosae, such as tombs or burial-grounds, consecrated to the infernal gods; or, lastly, res sanctae (hallowed), things human, but having a sort of sacredness attaching to them, such as the walls and gates of cities.

58. The State, again, impressed on some things a peculiar character. All things which were held by peregrini and not by citizens were peregrina. The soil which was included in the territories of the early State, the ager Romanus, was distinguished from all other land by being alone capable of being the subject of sale by mancipation, and being alone held by the special tenure of the jus Quiritium.* In later times a greater portion of the soil of Italy was placed on the same footing with the soil of the ager Romanus, and solum Italicum came to be the name of all soil wherever situated to which the privileges of the old ager Romanus were accorded, as opposed to solum provinciale, which always remained, at least in theory, the class, or particular portion of the object comprehended under the genus, as this horse, or the wine in this bottle. If a purchaser bought a horse, or a certain quantity of oil, the thing bought was said to be determined genere; if he bought a particular horse or the oil in a certain vase, the thing bought was said to be determined specie. All things which are included under a general name, such as oil or wheat, are commonly divided by being weighed, numbered, or measured, and were therefore spoken of by the jurists as being those things quæ pondere, numero, mensurae constant.

* DION. HALICARN. iv. 13.

56. We may, lastly, regard things as particular, or as collected under some head, when the whole collection is a thing in law. Thus a sheep is a particular thing (res singularis); a flock, composed ex distantibus unum nomini subjectis, is a collection of things, or, as the jurists expressed it, is a rerum universitas (or simply universitas). As also, of course, are such comprehensive things as an inheritance, a marriage portion, the peculium of a slave.

57. In proceeding to the second division of things according to the persons who have rights over them, and to the extent of those rights, we must first notice the distinction in things caused by certain things having a sacred character (res divini juris). These were res sacrae, consecrated to the superior gods; or res religiosae, such as tombs or burial-grounds, consecrated to the infernal gods; or, lastly, res sanctae (hallowed), things human, but having a sort of sacredness attaching to them, such as the walls and gates of cities.

58. The State, again, impressed on some things a peculiar character. All things which were held by peregrini and not by citizens were peregrina. The soil which was included in the territories of the early State, the ager Romanus, was distinguished from all other land by being alone capable of being the subject of sale by mancipation, and being alone held by the special tenure of the jus Quiritium.* In later times a greater portion of the soil of Italy was placed on the same footing with the soil of the ager Romanus, and solum Italicum came to be the name of all soil wherever situated to which the privileges of the old ager Romanus were accorded, as opposed to solum provinciale, which always remained, at least in theory, the property of the State, and of which a perfect ownership could not be acquired.* This difference in the tenure of the soil, which had in reality disappeared by the time of Diocletian, was formally abolished by Justinian.

* DION. HALICARN. iv. 13.

59. In the older law there also prevailed a distinction, abolished by Justinian, between res Mancipi and res nec Mancipi. We know from a fragment of Ulpian,† Res Mancipi. what things were res Mancipi. They were prædia in Italico solo, whether in the country or the city, servitudes (a term to be explained presently) over these prædia, when in the country, slaves and four-footed animals, as oxen and horses, tamed for the service of man. All other things were nec Mancipi. We also know that property in res Mancipi could only be transferred by in jure cessio (see sec. 73), and by mancipatio, that is, by a form of sale, in which the purchaser took hold with his hand of the thing purchased, and, claiming it to be his, struck the scales with a piece of copper, which he then tendered to the seller.‡ The list of res Mancipi is evidently a list of the possessions of an early agricultural community, and there can be scarcely any doubt that the form of sale required to transfer the property in them was the ordinary form of sale in such a community. At some period, and in some manner of which we have no knowledge, these possessions of an early agricultural community were contrasted with other forms of wealth, and the mode of transfer customary in the one case was found not to be customary in the other. The law, sanctioning and embodying the custom, made the form of mancipatio necessary to pass res Mancipi, and declared it not to be necessary to pass other things. Manus, as signifying power,§ is, probably, the root of the phrases Mancipi and mancipatio. Thus res Mancipi meant originally things in the hand, or taken by the hand, of the owner, and the taking by the hand in the form of transfer was symbolic of the purchaser holding or acquiring the thing in the way in which the seller had held or acquired it.

60. If we look at things according to the persons by whom they are owned, we have a division into res communes, as the sea

* ULP. Reg. xix. 1; CICERO, Pro Flacco, 32; GAIUS, ii. 27.

† ULP. Reg. xix. 1.

‡ The form of mancipatio will be more fully noticed in sec. 81.

§ How manus signifies power is a further question; it may be that the hand is merely a metaphor, as we say 'in the hands' for 'in the power' of a person; or it may mean the hand of a conqueror or plunderer, and thus originally things manu capta would be the booty of plunderers.

property of the State, and of which a perfect ownership could not be acquired.* This difference in the tenure of the soil, which had in reality disappeared by the time of Diocletian, was formally abolished by Justinian.

59. In the older law there also prevailed a distinction, abolished by Justinian, between res Mancipi and res nec Mancipi. We know from a fragment of Ulpian,† Res Mancipi. what things were res Mancipi. They were prædia in Italico solo, whether in the country or the city, servitudes (a term to be explained presently) over these prædia, when in the country, slaves and four-footed animals, as oxen and horses, tamed for the service of man. All other things were nec Mancipi. We also know that property in res Mancipi could only be transferred by in jure cessio (see sec. 73), and by mancipatio, that is, by a form of sale, in which the purchaser took hold with his hand of the thing purchased, and, claiming it to be his, struck the scales with a piece of copper, which he then tendered to the seller.‡ The list of res Mancipi is evidently a list of the possessions of an early agricultural community, and there can be scarcely any doubt that the form of sale required to transfer the property in them was the ordinary form of sale in such a community. At some period, and in some manner of which we have no knowledge, these possessions of an early agricultural community were contrasted with other forms of wealth, and the mode of transfer customary in the one case was found not to be customary in the other. The law, sanctioning and embodying the custom, made the form of mancipatio necessary to pass res Mancipi, and declared it not to be necessary to pass other things. Manus, as signifying power,§ is, probably, the root of the phrases Mancipi and mancipatio. Thus res Mancipi meant originally things in the hand, or taken by the hand, of the owner, and the taking by the hand in the form of transfer was symbolic of the purchaser holding or acquiring the thing in the way in which the seller had held or acquired it.

60. If we look at things according to the persons by whom they are owned, we have a division into res communes, as the sea

* ULP. Reg. xix. 1; CICERO, Pro Flacco, 32; GAIUS, ii. 27.

† ULP. Reg. xix. 1.

‡ The form of mancipatio will be more fully noticed in sec. 81.

§ How manus signifies power is a further question; it may be that the hand is merely a metaphor, as we say 'in the hands' for 'in the power' of a person; or it may mean the hand of a conqueror or plunderer, and thus originally things manu capta would be the booty of plunderers.

and the air, which cannot be appropriated by any particular individuals; res communes, things which belong to the State, as the State land (ager publicus), navigable rivers, roads, &c.; res universitatis, things which belong to aggregate bodies, as to corporations; and res private, things which belong to individuals; and these were said to be in nostro patrimonio, i.e. we could, in one way or another, have a property in them: whereas things common, or public, or dedicated to the gods, were extra patrimonium, i.e. could not become the subject of private property. Lastly, there were res nullius, things of which no one has acquired the ownership, as wild animals, or unoccupied islands in the sea.

61. Having thus given a sketch of the position of persons in Roman law, as also of the divisions of things, we now proceed to speak of that connection between persons and things which what are termed rights express. The necessities of his physical position oblige man to exert his power over the world of things. At first property is held by the tribe or community, then by the family, and lastly by the individual; and when society has reached this last stage, which it had reached in the earliest known times of Roman law,* his special interests prompt each man to claim, as against his fellows, an exclusive interest in particular things. Sometimes such a claim sanctioned by law is urged directly: the owner, as he is said to be, of the thing publishes this claim against all other men, and asserts an indisputable title himself to enjoy all the advantages which the possession of the thing can confer. Sometimes the claim is more indirect; the claimant insists that there are one or more particular individuals who ought to put him in possession of something he wishes to obtain, or do something for him, or fulfil some promise, or repair some damage they have made or caused. Such a claim is primarily urged against particular persons, and not against the world at large. On this distinction between claims to things advanced against all men, and those advanced primarily against particular men, is based the division of rights into real and personal expressed by writers of the middle ages,† on the

* We have, however, such expressions as sui heredes applied to children who, after the death of the paterfamilias, took the inheritance as something belonging to themselves, and this is obviously a survival from the times when the family rather than the individual was regarded as the owner of property.

† The term jus in re appears in the summary of law bearing the name of

and the air, which cannot be appropriated by any particular individuals; res communes, things which belong to the State, as the State land (ager publicus), navigable rivers, roads, &c.; res universitatis, things which belong to aggregate bodies, as to corporations; and res private, things which belong to individuals; and these were said to be in nostro patrimonio, i.e. we could, in one way or another, have a property in them: whereas things common, or public, or dedicated to the gods, were extra patrimonium, i.e. could not become the subject of private property. Lastly, there were res nullius, things of which no one has acquired the ownership, as wild animals, or unoccupied islands in the sea.

61. Having thus given a sketch of the position of persons in Roman law, as also of the divisions of things, we now proceed to speak of that connection between persons and things which what are termed rights express. The necessities of his physical position oblige man to exert his power over the world of things. At first property is held by the tribe or community, then by the family, and lastly by the individual; and when society has reached this last stage, which it had reached in the earliest known times of Roman law,* his special interests prompt each man to claim, as against his fellows, an exclusive interest in particular things. Sometimes such a claim sanctioned by law is urged directly: the owner, as he is said to be, of the thing publishes this claim against all other men, and asserts an indisputable title himself to enjoy all the advantages which the possession of the thing can confer. Sometimes the claim is more indirect; the claimant insists that there are one or more particular individuals who ought to put him in possession of something he wishes to obtain, or do something for him, or fulfil some promise, or repair some damage they have made or caused. Such a claim is primarily urged against particular persons, and not against the world at large. On this distinction between claims to things advanced against all men, and those advanced primarily against particular men, is based the division of rights into real and personal expressed by writers of the middle ages,† on the analogy of terms found in the writings of the Roman jurists, by the phrases jura in re and jura ad rem. A real right, a jus in re, or, to use the equivalent phrase preferred by some later commentators, jus in rem,* is a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men. A personal right, jus ad rem, or, to use a much more correct expression, jus in personam, is a right in which there is a person who is the subject of the right, as well as a thing as its object, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give or procure, or do or not do something. It is true that in a real right the notion of persons is involved, for no one could claim a thing if there were no other persons against whom to claim it; and that in a personal right is involved the notion of a thing, for the object of the right is a thing which the possessor wishes to have given, procured, done, or not done. But the leading principle of the distinction is simple and intelligible; and though it has not been formally adopted in the system of the Institutes or of the leading jurists, yet the classifications of the different relations of persons and things which they actually employed, are so capable of being assimilated to that which this distinction suggests that we need not hesitate to adopt it.

* We have, however, such expressions as sui heredes applied to children who, after the death of the paterfamilias, took the inheritance as something belonging to themselves, and this is obviously a survival from the times when the family rather than the individual was regarded as the owner of property.

† The term jus in re appears in the summary of law bearing the name of

III. RIGHTS OVER THINGS.

62. The most complete right over a thing is of course that possessed by the absolute owner of the thing, the Dominium. person who has power to dispose of it as he likes, and who holds it by a title recognised as valid by law. This ownership was in Roman law expressed by the word dominium, sometimes by proprietas. The dominus was entitled to use the thing (usus), to enjoy all its products (fructus), and to consume the thing entirely if it was capable of consumption (abusus). He could also dispose of or alienate it at will. In the ancient system of private law, the owner was said to be owner ex jure Quiritium.

the Brachylogus, which belongs to the twelfth century; both phrases occur in the pontifical constitutions of the thirteenth century. (See Lib. Sextus Decret. iii. 7, 8, in quibus jus non esset quæsitum in re, licet ad rem.)

* The objection to using the term jus in re is that the expression occurs in the classical jurists as meaning an interest in a thing short of ownership, as the interest of a mortgagee in the thing pledged, and on this ground the term jus in rem, which in this sense is not found in the classical jurists, but is supported by the analogy of the familiar term actio in rem, seems preferable.

analogy of terms found in the writings of the Roman jurists, by the phrases jura in re and jura ad rem. A real right, a jus in re, or, to use the equivalent phrase preferred by some later commentators, jus in rem,* is a right to have a thing to the exclusion of all other men. A personal right, jus ad rem, or, to use a much more correct expression, jus in personam, is a right in which there is a person who is the subject of the right, as well as a thing as its object, a right which gives its possessor a power to oblige another person to give or procure, or do or not do something. It is true that in a real right the notion of persons is involved, for no one could claim a thing if there were no other persons against whom to claim it; and that in a personal right is involved the notion of a thing, for the object of the right is a thing which the possessor wishes to have given, procured, done, or not done. But the leading principle of the distinction is simple and intelligible; and though it has not been formally adopted in the system of the Institutes or of the leading jurists, yet the classifications of the different relations of persons and things which they actually employed, are so capable of being assimilated to that which this distinction suggests that we need not hesitate to adopt it.

III. RIGHTS OVER THINGS.

62. The most complete right over a thing is of course that possessed by the absolute owner of the thing, the Dominium. person who has power to dispose of it as he likes, and who holds it by a title recognised as valid by law. This ownership was in Roman law expressed by the word dominium, sometimes by proprietas. The dominus was entitled to use the thing (usus), to enjoy all its products (fructus), and to consume the thing entirely if it was capable of consumption (abusus). He could also dispose of or alienate it at will. In the ancient system of private law, the owner was said to be owner ex jure Quiritium.

the Brachylogus, which belongs to the twelfth century; both phrases occur in the pontifical constitutions of the thirteenth century. (See Lib. Sextus Decret. iii. 7, 8, in quibus jus non esset quæsitum in re, licet ad rem.)

* The objection to using the term jus in re is that the expression occurs in the classical jurists as meaning an interest in a thing short of ownership, as the interest of a mortgagee in the thing pledged, and on this ground the term jus in rem, which in this sense is not found in the classical jurists, but is supported by the analogy of the familiar term actio in rem, seems preferable.

Nor did the old law recognise any dominium other than that which was enjoyed ex jure Quiritium. But the prætors found occasions when they wished to give all the advantages of ownership but were prevented by the civil law from giving the legal dominium. Another kind of dominium came therefore to be spoken of; and the term in bonis habere was used to express an ownership which was practically absolute because it was protected by the prætor's authority, but which was not technically the same as ownership ex jure Quiritium. Commentators have called this ownership the dominium bonitarium, a term not, however, used by the jurists. The distinction between the dominium bonitarium and that ex jure Quiritium entirely disappeared under Justinian.

63. To the notion of dominium was opposed that of possessio.

Possessio.

A person might be owner of a thing and yet not possess it, or possess it without being the owner. Possession implied actual physical occupation, or detention, to use the technical term, of the thing; but it also implied something more in the sense in which it was used by the Roman lawyers. It implied not only a fact, but an intention; not only the fact of the thing being under the control of the possessor, but also the intention on the part of the possessor to hold it so as to reap exactly the same benefit from it as the real owner would, and to exercise the same rights over it, even though he might be well aware that he was not the real owner, and had no claim to be so. The possessor was entitled to have his possession protected against every one but the true owner, and length of possession would, under certain conditions fixed by law, make the possessor really become the owner of the thing possessed.

64. As the rights over a thing may be very numerous, it is perfectly possible to separate them, and to give some to one person and some to another. We can, for instance, separate the right of walking in a field from the right of digging under the surface, and give the right of doing the one to this person and of doing the other to that. In this way each right that is separated off may be considered as a fragment of the whole dominium capable of being given away from the proprietor. These fragmentary rights, these portions of the whole right comprised in the absolute ownership, were termed servitutes, because the thing was under a kind of slavery for the benefit of the person entitled to exercise over it this separate right. In

Servitutes.

Nor did the old law recognise any dominium other than that which was enjoyed ex jure Quiritium. But the prætors found occasions when they wished to give all the advantages of ownership but were prevented by the civil law from giving the legal dominium. Another kind of dominium came therefore to be spoken of; and the term in bonis habere was used to express an ownership which was practically absolute because it was protected by the prætor's authority, but which was not technically the same as ownership ex jure Quiritium. Commentators have called this ownership the dominium bonitarium, a term not, however, used by the jurists. The distinction between the dominium bonitarium and that ex jure Quiritium entirely disappeared under Justinian.

63. To the notion of dominium was opposed that of possessio.

Possessio.

A person might be owner of a thing and yet not possess it, or possess it without being the owner. Possession implied actual physical occupation, or detention, to use the technical term, of the thing; but it also implied something more in the sense in which it was used by the Roman lawyers. It implied not only a fact, but an intention; not only the fact of the thing being under the control of the possessor, but also the intention on the part of the possessor to hold it so as to reap exactly the same benefit from it as the real owner would, and to exercise the same rights over it, even though he might be well aware that he was not the real owner, and had no claim to be so. The possessor was entitled to have his possession protected against every one but the true owner, and length of possession would, under certain conditions fixed by law, make the possessor really become the owner of the thing possessed.

64. As the rights over a thing may be very numerous, it is perfectly possible to separate them, and to give some to one person and some to another. We can, for instance, separate the right of walking in a field from the right of digging under the surface, and give the right of doing the one to this person and of doing the other to that. In this way each right that is separated off may be considered as a fragment of the whole dominium capable of being given away from the proprietor. These fragmentary rights, these portions of the whole right comprised in the absolute ownership, were termed servitutes, because the thing was under a kind of slavery for the benefit of the person entitled to exercise over it this separate right. In some servitudes, the right over the thing subject to the servitude, res serviens, was attached to the ownership of another thing (res dominans): the servitudes were then spoken of as servitutes rerum or prædiorum, and a distinction was made in these servitudes according as the right given by them referred to the soil itself, as the right to go or to drive over it, when the servitudes were said to be rusticorum prædiorum, or to the soil as supporting some superstructure, as a house, when the servitudes were said to be urbanorum prædiorum. In other servitudes, the right was given to particular persons; and the servitudes were then termed servitutes personarum. The most important of these latter servitudes were ususfructus and usus. Ususfructus was the right to enjoy a thing belonging to another person so as to reap all the produce derivable from it, as, for instance, all the fruits of the soil; usus was the right to use and enjoy a thing belonging to another person, only without reaping any, or only a small portion, of its produce. Only immoveable property was subject to the servitutes prædiorum; both moveable and immoveable to the servitutes personarum.

Servitutes.

65. There were two other rights over things which had something of the nature of servitudes, but which received a particular name. These were emphyteusis and superficies. The former was an alienation of all rights except that of the bare ownership for a long term, in consideration of the proprietor receiving a yearly rent (pensio); the latter was the alienation by the owner of the surface of the soil of all rights necessary for building on the surface, a yearly rent being generally reserved.

66. Lastly, there was the right given over a thing by pledge or mortgage, pignus, hypotheca; the former term being used to express the case of the thing, over which the right was given, being placed in the possession of the creditor, the latter to express the case of it being left in the possession of the debtor. The right was given to secure a creditor the payment of his debt; and he ultimately had power to sell the thing, and to satisfy his claim out of the proceeds, or, if he could find no purchaser, to have himself made owner of the thing.

67. We may now proceed to speak of the mode in which rights over things are acquired. We find at the outset an obvious difference between acquiring rights over a particular thing and some servitudes, the right over the thing subject to the servitude, res serviens, was attached to the ownership of another thing (res dominans): the servitudes were then spoken of as servitutes rerum or prædiorum, and a distinction was made in these servitudes according as the right given by them referred to the soil itself, as the right to go or to drive over it, when the servitudes were said to be rusticorum prædiorum, or to the soil as supporting some superstructure, as a house, when the servitudes were said to be urbanorum prædiorum. In other servitudes, the right was given to particular persons; and the servitudes were then termed servitutes personarum. The most important of these latter servitudes were ususfructus and usus. Ususfructus was the right to enjoy a thing belonging to another person so as to reap all the produce derivable from it, as, for instance, all the fruits of the soil; usus was the right to use and enjoy a thing belonging to another person, only without reaping any, or only a small portion, of its produce. Only immoveable property was subject to the servitutes prædiorum; both moveable and immoveable to the servitutes personarum.

65. There were two other rights over things which had something of the nature of servitudes, but which received a particular name. These were emphyteusis and superficies. The former was an alienation of all rights except that of the bare ownership for a long term, in consideration of the proprietor receiving a yearly rent (pensio); the latter was the alienation by the owner of the surface of the soil of all rights necessary for building on the surface, a yearly rent being generally reserved.

66. Lastly, there was the right given over a thing by pledge or mortgage, pignus, hypotheca; the former term being used to express the case of the thing, over which the right was given, being placed in the possession of the creditor, the latter to express the case of it being left in the possession of the debtor. The right was given to secure a creditor the payment of his debt; and he ultimately had power to sell the thing, and to satisfy his claim out of the proceeds, or, if he could find no purchaser, to have himself made owner of the thing.

67. We may now proceed to speak of the mode in which rights over things are acquired. We find at the outset an obvious difference between acquiring rights over a particular thing and acquiring rights over the entirety of a number of things comprised in such a term as an inheritance, which includes the entirety of the rights belonging to a deceased person, both over things and against persons. We may thus divide the subject of the acquisition of rights into two parts: the first comprising the modes in which rights are acquired over particular things; the second comprising the modes in which an entirety (universitas) of rights, both over things and against persons, passed from one person to another.

68. We may mention, as the first of the modes of acquiring particular things, occupation, i.e. the seizing on a thing which is a res nullius, i.e. without an owner: land in an unoccupied country is a res nullius, so is a wild animal; if we seize on, or, as we should say, occupy the land, or catch the wild animal, we gain our right over the soil or the animal by having been the first to seize it.

69. Accession is the general term for the acquisition of rights either over things which are added by the forces of nature to, and become an inseparable part of, another thing regarded as the principal thing, or over things which by the operation of man are united with other things so as to form an indivisible product. The owner of the principal thing, by virtue of his being owner, is the owner also of the accessory thing.

70. A contract or gift, by which one person promised to give a thing to another, did not make that other the owner of the thing. A further step was necessary. The thing must be handed over to the person who was, under the terms of the contract, to become the owner of it. This handing over was called traditio: and a perfect traditio implied, first, that it was a real absolute owner, capable of alienating the thing, and having the intention of passing the property in it, who transferred it; secondly, that he placed the transferee in actual possession of the thing; and thirdly, that the transferee received it with the intention of holding it as owner.

71. The above are termed natural modes of acquisition; but there are some which are said to derive their force only from the civil law. One is acquisition by gift. Strictly speaking, gift is not a peculiar mode of acquisition, but an acquisition by delivery with a particular motive for the transfer. Probably it was on account of the solemnities with acquiring rights over the entirety of a number of things comprised in such a term as an inheritance, which includes the entirety of the rights belonging to a deceased person, both over things and against persons. We may thus divide the subject of the acquisition of rights into two parts: the first comprising the modes in which rights are acquired over particular things; the second comprising the modes in which an entirety (universitas) of rights, both over things and against persons, passed from one person to another.

68. We may mention, as the first of the modes of acquiring particular things, occupation, i.e. the seizing on a thing which is a res nullius, i.e. without an owner: land in an unoccupied country is a res nullius, so is a wild animal; if we seize on, or, as we should say, occupy the land, or catch the wild animal, we gain our right over the soil or the animal by having been the first to seize it.

69. Accession is the general term for the acquisition of rights either over things which are added by the forces of nature to, and become an inseparable part of, another thing regarded as the principal thing, or over things which by the operation of man are united with other things so as to form an indivisible product. The owner of the principal thing, by virtue of his being owner, is the owner also of the accessory thing.

70. A contract or gift, by which one person promised to give a thing to another, did not make that other the owner of the thing. A further step was necessary. The thing must be handed over to the person who was, under the terms of the contract, to become the owner of it. This handing over was called traditio: and a perfect traditio implied, first, that it was a real absolute owner, capable of alienating the thing, and having the intention of passing the property in it, who transferred it; secondly, that he placed the transferee in actual possession of the thing; and thirdly, that the transferee received it with the intention of holding it as owner.

71. The above are termed natural modes of acquisition; but there are some which are said to derive their force only from the civil law. One is acquisition by gift. Strictly speaking, gift is not a peculiar mode of acquisition, but an acquisition by delivery with a particular motive for the transfer. Probably it was on account of the solemnities with which under Justinian gifts had to be made that gifts are treated in the Institutes as a special mode of acquisition. One special kind of gift was a donatio mortis causa, a gift made in contemplation of death, and to take effect in case of the death of the donor in the lifetime of the recipient.

72. The law also gave the ownership of a thing by usucapio, that is, by quiet possession, bona fide, and founded on some mode of acquisition, recognised by law, which Usucapio sufficed, under the civil law, to transfer the dominium, or legal ownership, if maintained during one year over moveable things, or during two years over immoveable. The operation of usucapio was of great importance in Roman law; for by it the interest of a person to whom a res mancipi was transferred otherwise than by mancipation and the interests of all persons who held things in bonis (see sec. 62) were, after a short lapse of time, converted into full Quiritarian ownership. Prescription, before the time of Justinian, was not a means of acquiring rights: it merely gave a means of repelling actions brought to regain rights which had long been held by another than the absolute owner. It was applicable to immoveables in the provinces, they being not affected by usucapio, which regarded all moveables, but only such immoveables as were in Italy. Justinian made considerable alterations in the law with respect to acquisition of ownership by length of possession. The same law was made to prevail throughout the empire, and possession during three years gave the ownership of moveables, and possession during ten years, if the parties had inhabited the same province during the time, or possession during twenty years if they had not, gave the ownership of immoveables. Prescription.

73. The ownership was also transferred when things were surrendered by the fictitious process of in jure cessio, that is, a suit in which the defendant gave up to the plaintiff all he claimed, or when things were adjudged (adjudicatio) in certain actions, such as those for assigning boundaries, and dividing a family estate, when the judge had a power to assign the respective portions to the different parties. In jure cessio.

74. The entirety of rights was acquired when one person succeeded to the persona, or legal existence, of another, and thereby succeeded to all his rights, whether over things or against persons. The cases in which this most naturally occurred were that of arrogation Acquisition of an entirety of rights.

which under Justinian gifts had to be made that gifts are treated in the Institutes as a special mode of acquisition. One special kind of gift was a donatio mortis causa, a gift made in contemplation of death, and to take effect in case of the death of the donor in the lifetime of the recipient.

72. The law also gave the ownership of a thing by usucapio, that is, by quiet possession, bona fide, and founded on some mode of acquisition, recognised by law, which Usucapio sufficed, under the civil law, to transfer the dominium, or legal ownership, if maintained during one year over moveable things, or during two years over immoveable. The operation of usucapio was of great importance in Roman law; for by it the interest of a person to whom a res mancipi was transferred otherwise than by mancipation and the interests of all persons who held things in bonis (see sec. 62) were, after a short lapse of time, converted into full Quiritarian ownership. Prescription, before the time of Justinian, was not a means of acquiring rights: it merely gave a means of repelling actions brought to regain rights which had long been held by another than the absolute owner. It was applicable to immoveables in the provinces, they being not affected by usucapio, which regarded all moveables, but only such immoveables as were in Italy. Justinian made considerable alterations in the law with respect to acquisition of ownership by length of possession. The same law was made to prevail throughout the empire, and possession during three years gave the ownership of moveables, and possession during ten years, if the parties had inhabited the same province during the time, or possession during twenty years if they had not, gave the ownership of immoveables. Prescription.

73. The ownership was also transferred when things were surrendered by the fictitious process of in jure cessio, that is, a suit in which the defendant gave up to the plaintiff all he claimed, or when things were adjudged (adjudicatio) in certain actions, such as those for assigning boundaries, and dividing a family estate, when the judge had a power to assign the respective portions to the different parties. In jure cessio.

74. The entirety of rights was acquired when one person succeeded to the persona, or legal existence, of another, and thereby succeeded to all his rights, whether over things or against persons. The cases in which this most naturally occurred were that of arrogation Acquisition of an entirety of rights.

(for when a person was arrogated, he, of course, transferred all that he had to the person whose family he entered),
Arrogation. and that of succession to the inheritance of testators and intestates.

75. Testaments were originally made by being proclaimed in the comitia curiata, or by a fictitious sale, in which Testaments. testators transferred their property to a purchaser (familiae emptor) who was himself heir, or who was, after their death, to distribute it according to their wishes. In later times a testament was made in the presence of seven witnesses, who affixed their seals to it, and the witnesses and the testator subscribed the testament. In order to make a testament, it was necessary to have the testamenti factio, a term implying such a participation in the law of private Roman citizens as to make a person be considered capable of making, taking under, or being witness to, a testament.

76. The testator was obliged to disinherit by name every Disinheriting. one who, being among those in his own power, had a natural claim on his property; and if he failed to do so, the whole testament was set aside. The great peculiarity of a Roman testament was the institution of the heir, that is, of Institution of the heir. the person who was to succeed to the persona of the testator. Unless there was such a person, no other disposition of the testament could take effect, for there was no continuation of the testator's legal existence. The heir was, therefore, properly appointed at the beginning of the testament; in case of the heir accepting, he placed himself exactly in the position of the testator, received all his property, and was answerable for all his debts; in receiving his property he was, however, bound to give effect to the subsequent dispositions of the testament. Various provisions were made at different times to protect the heir, and especially he was secured by the Lex Falcidia in a clear fourth of the inheritance; and under Justinian his position was altogether altered, and he could take the property of the testator apart from his own. In order that the testament might not fail because the heir was not willing to enter on the inheritance, it was customary to name one or more persons to whom in succession it might be open to take upon them the office of heir (substitutio). And a testator could always secure an heir by naming, as the last of the list, one of his own slaves, whom the law did not permit to refuse the office (heres necessarius). When some of the conditions

(for when a person was arrogated, he, of course, transferred all that he had to the person whose family he entered),
Arrogation. and that of succession to the inheritance of testators and intestates.

75. Testaments were originally made by being proclaimed in the comitia curiata, or by a fictitious sale, in which Testaments. testators transferred their property to a purchaser (familiae emptor) who was himself heir, or who was, after their death, to distribute it according to their wishes. In later times a testament was made in the presence of seven witnesses, who affixed their seals to it, and the witnesses and the testator subscribed the testament. In order to make a testament, it was necessary to have the testamenti factio, a term implying such a participation in the law of private Roman citizens as to make a person be considered capable of making, taking under, or being witness to, a testament.

76. The testator was obliged to disinherit by name every one who, being among those in his own power, had Disinheriting. a natural claim on his property; and if he failed to do so, the whole testament was set aside. The great peculiarity of a Roman testament was the institution of the heir, that is, of Institution of the heir. the person who was to succeed to the persona of the testator. Unless there was such a person, no other disposition of the testament could take effect, for there was no continuation of the testator's legal existence. The heir was, therefore, properly appointed at the beginning of the testament; in case of the heir accepting, he placed himself exactly in the position of the testator, received all his property, and was answerable for all his debts; in receiving his property he was, however, bound to give effect to the subsequent dispositions of the testament. Various provisions were made at different times to protect the heir, and especially he was secured by the Lex Falcidia in a clear fourth of the inheritance; and under Justinian his position was altogether altered, and he could take the property of the testator apart from his own. In order that the testament might not fail because the heir was not willing to enter on the inheritance, it was customary to name one or more persons to whom in succession it might be open to take upon them the office of heir (substitutio). And a testator could always secure an heir by naming, as the last of the list, one of his own slaves, whom the law did not permit to refuse the office (heres necessarius). When some of the conditions necessary to create an heir, or give a legacy, were wanting in a will, still the expressions of the testator's wishes were binding as trusts upon the heir under the will, or heir ab in- Fideicom- testato. Such trusts (fideicommissa) were first made missa.

 obligatory by Augustus, who also first gave effect to Codicils, that is, writings purporting to deal with property in the manner of a testamentary disposition, but not executed with the solemnities which were required to make a testament valid.

77. If there was no testament to determine the succession to the particular property, the law prescribed the order Succession to in which it was to devolve. The first claimants were intestates.
 the sui heredes, that is, all persons in the power of the deceased, and who, on his death, became themselves sui juris. Thus, a son in potestate was a sui heres of the deceased, but not a grandson until the son was dead. These persons were termed sui heredes as having an interest of their own in the family property. If there were no sui heredes, the next heirs were the agnati, i.e. all members of the same civil family; and then, in default of agnati, the law of the Twelve Tables gave the inheritance to the members of the same gens, an enactment which could of course only take effect when the deceased was a member of a gens. What was the course of devolution beyond the agnati under the old civil law, when the deceased was not a member of a gens, we do not know; but probably the blood-relations succeeded. In default of agnati, under the prætorian legislation, the claims of the natural family were attended to, and the cognati, or blood-relations, succeeded to the inheritance. In the later times of the Roman law the claims of blood-relations were more and more favoured, and in many important points were gradually preferred to those of merely civil kinship.

The Institutes also notice three other modes of minor importance by which universitates rerum were acquired. Other modes of acquiring universitates rerum.
 (1) Bonorum addictio, the giving over of the property of a deceased person to a slave to whom the deceased had given his freedom. (2) Bonorum venditio, the compulsory sale of the whole property of an insolvent to a person who would undertake to pay most to the creditors. (3) Ex senatusconsulto Claudiano, which gave over a woman with all her property, who had cohabited with a slave, to the slave's master.

necessary to create an heir, or give a legacy, were wanting in a will, still the expressions of the testator's wishes were binding as trusts upon the heir under the will, or heir ab in- Fideicom- testato. Such trusts (fideicommissa) were first made missa.
 obligatory by Augustus, who also first gave effect to codicils, that is, writings purporting to deal with property in the manner of a testamentary disposition, but not executed with the solemnities which were required to make a testament valid.

77. If there was no testament to determine the succession to the particular property, the law prescribed the order Succession to in which it was to devolve. The first claimants were intestates.
 the sui heredes, that is, all persons in the power of the deceased, and who, on his death, became themselves sui juris. Thus, a son in potestate was a suius heres of the deceased, but not a grandson until the son was dead. These persons were termed sui heredes as having an interest of their own in the family property. If there were no sui heredes, the next heirs were the agnati, i.e. all members of the same civil family; and then, in default of agnati, the law of the Twelve Tables gave the inheritance to the members of the same gens, an enactment which could of course only take effect when the deceased was a member of a gens. What was the course of devolution beyond the agnati under the old civil law, when the deceased was not a member of a gens, we do not know; but probably the blood-relations succeeded. In default of agnati, under the prætorian legislation, the claims of the natural family were attended to, and the cognati, or blood-relations, succeeded to the inheritance. In the later times of the Roman law the claims of blood-relations were more and more favoured, and in many important points were gradually preferred to those of merely civil kinship.

The Institutes also notice three other modes of minor importance by which universitates rerum were acquired. Other modes
 (1) Bonorum addictio, the giving over of the property of acquiring of a deceased person to a slave to whom the deceased universitates had given his freedom. (2) Bonorum venditio, the compulsory rerum.
 sale of the whole property of an insolvent to a person who would undertake to pay most to the creditors. (3) Ex senatusconsulto Claudiano, which gave over a woman with all her property, who had cohabited with a slave, to the slave's master.

IV. RIGHTS AGAINST PERSONS.

78. Rights against persons. A personal right is, as we have said before, a right which one person has against another; a right to constrain that other to give something to, or do something for, or make something good to, the possessor of the right. The person to whom the right belonged, and the person against whom it existed, were said in Roman law to be bound by an obligation, the notion of an obligation being that of a tie between two parties of such a nature as to confer on the one a power of compelling by action the other to give, do, or make good something. The obligation did not give any interest in a thing, to get which might be the ultimate object of the proceeding, but only gave a means of acquiring it, or, under the prætorian system, its value.

79. Dare, facere, præstare. The three words, dare, facere, præstare, were used to embrace all the possible duties an obligation could create. Either the person bound by the obligation was obliged dare, i.e. to give the absolute ownership or the possession of a thing; or facere, that is, to do or not to do some act; or præstare, that is, to make good something, as to make good a loss, or to furnish any advantage or thing, the yielding of which could not be included in the limited sense of the word 'dare.' Every person who possessed a personal right against another was termed a creditor, and every one who owed the satisfaction of a claim, or was the subject of a personal right, was a debitor. The word creditor, of course, points to those transactions in which the possessor of the right trusted the person who was the subject of it; but the application of the terms was perfectly general, and must not be confounded with the English usage of the words creditor and debtor.

80. Division of obligations. According to the theory of Roman law, all obligations owed their origin either to the consent of the parties (contractus), or to injuries (delicta) done by one person to another, which gave the injured party a right to recompense. Contracts did not, however, include all cases, when an obligation arose from the mutual consent of the parties. The general name for such an obligation was conventio, pactum, conventum. A contract was properly an obligation arising by

IV. RIGHTS AGAINST PERSONS.

78. Rights against persons. A personal right is, as we have said before, a right which one person has against another; a right to constrain that other to give something to, or do something for, or make something good to, the possessor of the right. The person to whom the right belonged, and the person against whom it existed, were said in Roman law to be bound by an obligation, the notion of an obligation being that of a tie between two parties of such a nature as to confer on the one a power of compelling by action the other to give, do, or make good something. The obligation did not give any interest in a thing, to get which might be the ultimate object of the proceeding, but only gave a means of acquiring it, or, under the prætorian system, its value.

79. The three words, dare, facere, præstare, were used to embrace all the possible duties an obligation could create. Dare, facere, præstare. Either the person bound by the obligation was obliged dare, i.e. to give the absolute ownership or the possession of a thing; or facere, that is, to do or not to do some act; or præstare, that is, to make good something, as to make good a loss, or to furnish any advantage or thing, the yielding of which could not be included in the limited sense of the word 'dare.' Every person who possessed a personal right against another was termed a creditor, and every one who owed the satisfaction of a claim, or was the subject of a personal right, was a debitor. The word creditor, of course, points to those transactions in which the possessor of the right trusted the person who was the subject of it; but the application of the terms was perfectly general, and must not be confounded with the English usage of the words creditor and debtor.

80. According to the theory of Roman law, all obligations owed their origin either to the consent of the parties Division of obligations. (contractus), or to injuries (delicta) done by one person to another, which gave the injured party a right to recompense. Contracts did not, however, include all cases, when an obligation arose from the mutual consent of the parties. The general name for such an obligation was conventio, pactum, conventum. A contract was properly an obligation arising by mutual consent, and made in one of the forms recognised by the civil law; but all obligations arising from mutual consent are spoken of as arising from contracts, because in the old law no other mode of expressing mutual consent was recognised, and mere agreements were not binding.

81. The mode of transferring res mancipi was, as we have said in sec. 59, called mancipatio. Gaius (i. 119) ^{Nexum.} thus describes the form of transfer of a slave: 'Mancipation is effected in the presence of not less than five witnesses, who must be Roman citizens of the age of puberty, and also in the presence of another person of the same condition, who holds a pair of scales, and hence is called libripens. The purchaser, holding in his hand a piece of copper, says: "This slave is mine ex jure Quiritium, and he is purchased by me with this piece of copper and these scales." He then strikes the scales with the piece of money, and gives it to the seller as a symbol of the price.' But the generic term for this mode of sale was not mancipatio, but nexum,* for this form was used not only when a sale was its real object, but when under the form of a sale the parties intended to effect a contract of deposit or pledge. The purchaser took the thing handed over to him upon the condition of restoring it under certain specified circumstances, and thus a form of transfer came to be a form of contract where part of the contract was still to be executed.

82. In the time when the civil law had assumed its full shape, and apart from the alterations it received from ^{Contracts} the prætorian system, the nexum was used chiefly as ^{made re.} the mode of transferring res mancipi, as contracts of deposit and pledge were ordinarily made, as it was termed re. That is, by the mere delivery of the thing, the person to whom it was delivered, and who accepted it, was bound by an obligation to hold it for the purposes for which it had been delivered. There were four heads of contracts recognised by the civil law, and this of contracts made re is the first noticed in the Institutes, although historically the recognition of such contracts was probably posterior to that of the more formal contracts, verbis and litteris. Under contracts re were classed four kinds of contract, namely, the contracts of mutuum when the receiver had to return as much of the same kind of the thing he received, commodatum when he mutual consent, and made in one of the forms recognised by the civil law; but all obligations arising from mutual consent are spoken of as arising from contracts, because in the old law no other mode of expressing mutual consent was recognised, and mere agreements were not binding.

* Nexum est, quodcumque per æs et libram geritur, idque necti dicitur.—FESTUS.

81. The mode of transferring res mancipi was, as we have said in sec. 59, called mancipatio. Gaius (i. 119) ^{Nexum.} thus describes the form of transfer of a slave: 'Mancipation is effected in the presence of not less than five witnesses, who must be Roman citizens of the age of puberty, and also in the presence of another person of the same condition, who holds a pair of scales, and hence is called libripens. The purchaser, holding in his hand a piece of copper, says: "This slave is mine ex jure Quiritium, and he is purchased by me with this piece of copper and these scales." He then strikes the scales with the piece of money, and gives it to the seller as a symbol of the price.' But the generic term for this mode of sale was not mancipatio, but nexum,* for this form was used not only when a sale was its real object, but when under the form of a sale the parties intended to effect a contract of deposit or pledge. The purchaser took the thing handed over to him upon the condition of restoring it under certain specified circumstances, and thus a form of transfer came to be a form of contract where part of the contract was still to be executed.

82. In the time when the civil law had assumed its full shape, and apart from the alterations it received from ^{Contracts} the prætorian system, the nexum was used chiefly as ^{made re.} the mode of transferring res mancipi, as contracts of deposit and pledge were ordinarily made, as it was termed re. That is, by the mere delivery of the thing, the person to whom it was delivered, and who accepted it, was bound by an obligation to hold it for the purposes for which it had been delivered. There were four heads of contracts recognised by the civil law, and this of contracts made re is the first noticed in the Institutes, although historically the recognition of such contracts was probably posterior to that of the more formal contracts, verbis and litteris. Under contracts re were classed four kinds of contract, namely, the contracts of mutuum when the receiver had to return as much of the same kind of the thing he received, commodatum when he had to return the specific thing itself, depositum when the receiver was bound to keep safe a thing committed to his charge, and pignus when the receiver took a thing in pledge.

* Nexum est, quodcumque per æs et libram geritur, idque necti dicitur.—FESTUS.

83. The second head of contract under the civil law was that Contracts made verbis. of contracts made verbis, of executory contracts, that is, made in a prescribed form of solemn words. One of the parties put to the other a formal question (stipulatio), to which the other gave a formal answer (responsio, promissio). To the validity of the contract it was necessary that the question should be couched in the form 'spondes?' and the answer in that of 'spondeo.' Do you engage? I do engage. It was long before equivalent words, such as promitto or dabo, were admitted as substitutes. A contract made by the pronunciation of these solemn words was said to be made verbis.

84. A third head of contract under the civil law was that of Contracts made litteris. contracts made litteris. An engagement having been made to give a definite amount, the parties agreed to make a memorandum of the terms of the contract. The creditor placed in his book of domestic accounts (tabulæ or codex) the name of the debtor, and the sum as pecunia expensa lata, weighed out and given to the debtor; and the debtor entered in his tabulæ the same sum as pecunia accepta relata. Either party could call on the other to produce his tabulæ, which it was considered so incumbent on a Roman citizen to keep carefully and accurately, that any wilful error was discoverable without much difficulty. The debtor, in fact, furnished the creditor with a means of proving that the debtor had on a certain day received the money, and even if the debtor had not set the sum down in his tabulæ, the creditor could show his own tabulæ as a proof of the contract. These contracts were peculiar to Roman citizens: Peregrini had as a substitute syngraphæ, signed by both parties, or chirographa, signed only by the debtor; and on these documents an action could be brought.

85. There were, also, four particular contracts, for the formation of which the civil law required no formalities whatever, but which were made merely consensu, by the consent of the parties. These four contracts were—sale (emptio-venditio), hiring (locatio-conductio), partnership (societas) and bailment (mandatum). The four modes, then, in which contracts might be entered into under the civil law, were—re, verbis, litteris, and consensu.

had to return the specific thing itself, depositum when the receiver was bound to keep safe a thing committed to his charge, and pignus when the receiver took a thing in pledge.

83. The second head of contract under the civil law was that Contracts made verbis. of contracts made verbis, of executory contracts, that is, made in a prescribed form of solemn words. One of the parties put to the other a formal question (stipulatio), to which the other gave a formal answer (responsio, promissio). To the validity of the contract it was necessary that the question should be couched in the form 'spondes?' and the answer in that of 'spondeo.' Do you engage? I do engage. It was long before equivalent words, such as promitto or dabo, were admitted as substitutes. A contract made by the pronouncement of these solemn words was said to be made verbis.

84. A third head of contract under the civil law was that of Contracts made litteris. contracts made litteris. An engagement having been made to give a definite amount, the parties agreed to make a memorandum of the terms of the contract. The creditor placed in his book of domestic accounts (tabulæ or codex) the name of the debtor, and the sum as pecunia expensa lata, weighed out and given to the debtor; and the debtor entered in his tabulæ the same sum as pecunia accepta relata. Either party could call on the other to produce his tabulæ, which it was considered so incumbent on a Roman citizen to keep carefully and accurately, that any wilful error was discoverable without much difficulty. The debtor, in fact, furnished the creditor with a means of proving that the debtor had on a certain day received the money, and even if the debtor had not set the sum down in his tabulæ, the creditor could show his own tabulæ as a proof of the contract. These contracts were peculiar to Roman citizens: Peregrini had as a substitute syngraphæ, signed by both parties, or chirographa, signed only by the debtor; and on these documents an action could be brought.

85. There were, also, four particular contracts, for the formation of which the civil law required no formalities whatever, but which were made merely consensu, by the consent of the parties. These four contracts were—sale (emptio-venditio), hiring (locatio-conductio), partnership (societas) and bailment (mandatum). The four modes, then, in which contracts might be entered into under the civil law, were—re, verbis, litteris, and consensu.

86. When, however, the old law of contracts fell under the manipulation of the prætors, many changes were introduced. The ten forms of contract recognised by the civil law, that is, the four heads of contract made re, the four heads of contract made consensu, and contracts made verbis and litteris, still remained the basis of the whole law of contracts; but the prætors, while nominally adhering to the civil law, introduced changes that had a great practical effect. The nature of this change can only be understood by studying the details of the Roman law of contracts, and it would be out of place in a general introduction to attempt to notice them. But there are three ways in which the prætors wrought a change, which were so important that they may be briefly stated here. By an extension of the theory of the civil law contract re, the prætors permitted an action to be brought to enforce every contract that was in part executed; secondly, agreements (pacta) that would not furnish a cause of action were permitted to be set up by way of defence to an action with which they were inconsistent; and thirdly, there were a few specified particular cases in which the prætor permitted pacts to be enforced by action.

87. Obligations might, however, very well arise, without any fault on the part of any one, and yet without having their origin in mutual consent. The mere fact of occupying a certain position will sometimes involve duties, the performance of which may be enforced by an action, and which give rise to a personal right which the person interested in their performance has against the person bound to perform them. An heir, for instance, was, by the mere fact of accepting the inheritance, bound to pay the legacies given by the testament. Such obligations were said to be quasi ex contractu, not that they really rested on any contract, but there was an analogy between the obligation thus arising and that arising from the formation of a contract.*

88. It was not every wrong deed for which compensation could be obtained that gave rise to an obligation ex delicto; there were certain particular wrong deeds, such as theft and robbery with violence, which the law expressly characterised as delicta, and to procure reparation for which the law provided a special action. It was only when a person suffered by one of these wrong deeds that an obligation ex delicto arose.

* See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence (ed. 1869), p. 944.

86. When, however, the old law of contracts fell under the manipulation of the prætors, many changes were introduced. The ten forms of contract recognised by the civil law, that is, the four heads of contract made re, the four heads of contract made consensu, and contracts made verbis and litteris, still remained the basis of the whole law of contracts; but the prætors, while nominally adhering to the civil law, introduced changes that had a great practical effect. The nature of this change can only be understood by studying the details of the Roman law of contracts, and it would be out of place in a general introduction to attempt to notice them. But there are three ways in which the prætors wrought a change, which were so important that they may be briefly stated here. By an extension of the theory of the civil law contract re, the prætors permitted an action to be brought to enforce every contract that was in part executed; secondly, agreements (pacta) that would not furnish a cause of action were permitted to be set up by way of defence to an action with which they were inconsistent; and thirdly, there were a few specified particular cases in which the prætor permitted pacts to be enforced by action.

87. Obligations might, however, very well arise, without any fault on the part of any one, and yet without having their origin in mutual consent. The mere fact of occupying a certain position will sometimes involve duties, the performance of which may be enforced by an action, and which give rise to a personal right which the person interested in their performance has against the person bound to perform them. An heir, for instance, was, by the mere fact of accepting the inheritance, bound to pay the legacies given by the testament. Such obligations were said to be quasi ex contractu, not that they really rested on any contract, but there was an analogy between the obligation thus arising and that arising from the formation of a contract.*

88. It was not every wrong deed for which compensation could be obtained that gave rise to an obligation ex delicto; there were certain particular wrong deeds, such as theft and robbery with violence, which the law expressly characterised as delicta, and to procure reparation for which the law provided a special action. It was only when a person suffered by one of these wrong deeds that an obligation ex delicto arose.

* See AUSTIN, Jurisprudence (ed. 1869), p. 944.

When any wrong deed was done not thus expressly designated by law as a delictum, and when no particular and appropriate form of action was provided, the obligation was said to arise quasi ex delicto. Among the instances given in the Institutes is that of dangerous things being placed so as to fall into a public way. If any one was hurt by the fall, the author of the injury would be bound to make reparation by an obligation quasi ex delicto, there being this point of analogy between this obligation and that in the case of a delict, that the person liable to be sued had done harm to the person or property of another. The division of obligations adopted in the Institutes is therefore into those ex contractu, those quasi ex contractu, those ex delicto, and those quasi ex delicto.

*Obligations
quasi ex de-
lictis.*

89. The ancient law considered an obligation as existing until the tie of law, the vinculum juris, was loosed by the thing being given, furnished, or done, or by a new tie being formed in place of the old; this loosening of the tie was termed solutio. If payment was made, i.e. if the contract was carried out, this at once put an end to the contract. But it might happen that the parties wished to put an end to the contract before it was carried out. Each mode of forming a contract by the civil law was accompanied by a corresponding mode of dissolving it. When the contract had been formed re, it was enough that the thing should be restored; when it had been formed verbis, a question and answer again furnished the means of accomplishing the desired object. Habesne acceptum? Habeo, sufficed to put an end to the contract. The parties made an entry of payment in their codices, if the contract had been litteris; and mutual consent dissolved those contracts which it had sufficed to form. The solutio verbis was most frequently employed, and it was easy to employ it on every occasion: for in whatever way the contract might originally have been entered into, its terms could be repeated in the form of a stipulation, and then this stipulation could be dissolved by a solutio verbis. The stipulation extinguished the original contract. For contracts were extinguished not only by payment, but by what was called novatio: that is, by making a new contract, and substituting it in the place of the original one. The law required that the new contract should be always made verbis or litteris. When strict adherence to the rule of law, requiring a particular mode of payment, would work injustice, the prætor would always provide a remedy by means of his equitable jurisdiction.

Novatio.

When any wrong deed was done not thus expressly designated by law as a delictum, and when no particular and appropriate form of action was provided, the obligation was said to arise quasi ex delicto. Among the instances given in the Institutes is that of dangerous things being placed so as to fall into a public way. If any one was hurt by the fall, the author of the injury would be bound to make reparation by an obligation quasi ex delicto, there being this point of analogy between this obligation and that in the case of a delict, that the person liable to be sued had done harm to the person or property of another. The division of obligations adopted in the Institutes is therefore into those ex contractu, those quasi ex contractu, those ex delicto, and those quasi ex delicto.

*Obligations
quasi ex de-
licto.*

89. The ancient law considered an obligation as existing until the tie of law, the vinculum juris, was loosed by the thing being given, furnished, or done, or by a new tie being formed in place of the old; this loosening of the tie was termed solutio. If payment was made, i.e. if the contract was carried out, this at once put an end to the contract. But it might happen that the parties wished to put an end to the contract before it was carried out. Each mode of forming a contract by the civil law was accompanied by a corresponding mode of dissolving it. When the contract had been formed re, it was enough that the thing should be restored; when it had been formed verbis, a question and answer again furnished the means of accomplishing the desired object. Habesne acceptum? Habeo, sufficed to put an end to the contract. The parties made an entry of payment in their codices, if the contract had been litteris; and mutual consent dissolved those contracts which it had sufficed to form. The solutio verbis was most frequently employed, and it was easy to employ it on every occasion: for in whatever way the contract might originally have been entered into, its terms could be repeated in the form of a stipulation, and then this stipulation could be dissolved by a solutio verbis. The stipulation extinguished the original contract. For contracts were extinguished not only by payment, but by what was called novatio: that is, by making a new contract, and substituting it in the place of the original one. The law required that the new contract should be always made verbis or litteris. When strict adherence to the rule of law, requiring a particular mode of payment, would work injustice, the prætor would always provide a remedy by means of his equitable jurisdiction.

Novatio.

V. SYSTEM OF CIVIL PROCESS.

90. An action is the process by which a right is enforced.

Unless a means of enforcing it was provided, the right would be a mere inoperative abstraction. Directly it was disputed, it would cease to have any real existence; but in order that it may have a real existence, the State

Meaning of the word action.

uses its powers to insure a free exercise of it, as soon as it is made certain to the magistrate, who is entrusted with the authority of the State, that the right claimed does really belong to the claimant. The proceeding by which this is made evident to the magistrate, and the machinery, set in motion by which the State exerts its power of compulsion, is called an action. The word 'action' is not, however, always used exactly in this sense; for it is also employed to mean sometimes the right to institute such a proceeding, and sometimes the form which the proceeding takes.

91. There are three great epochs in the history of the Roman system of civil process. First, that of the system of

1 the legis actiones, certain hard, sharply defined forms which a rude civilisation prescribed for all proceedings.

Epochs in the history of Roman system of civil process.

2 Secondly, that of the system of formulae, by which the prætor, adopting a most flexible form of organising the proceedings, was enabled to give a means of enforcing every right which the more enlarged views of an advancing civilisation pronounced to be founded on equity; and thirdly, that of the extraordinaria judicia, 3 by which, under the later emperors, the supreme authority took the whole conduct of the proceeding into its own hands, and arrived at what seemed to it to be just in as direct and speedy a manner as it found possible.

92. In enforcing rights two very different functions have to be exercised by those to whom the powers of the State are delegated. First, there must be some one invested with magisterial authority, giving the sanction and solemnity of his position to the whole proceeding, who shall represent the law and say what the law is, and who shall have power to employ the force which the State places at the disposal of those it selects to administer justice. Secondly, an inquiry has

The magistrate and the judge.

V. SYSTEM OF CIVIL PROCESS.

90. An action is the process by which a right is enforced. Unless a means of enforcing it was provided, the right would be a mere inoperative abstraction. Directly it was disputed, it would cease to have any real existence; but in order that it may have a real existence, the State uses its powers to insure a free exercise of it, as soon as it is made certain to the magistrate, who is entrusted with the authority of the State, that the right claimed does really belong to the claimant. The proceeding by which this is made evident to the magistrate, and the machinery, set in motion by which the State exerts its power of compulsion, is called an action. The word 'action' is not, however, always used exactly in this sense; for it is also employed to mean sometimes the right to institute such a proceeding, and sometimes the form which the proceeding takes.

*Meaning of
the word action.*

91. There are three great epochs in the history of the Roman system of civil process. First, that of the system of the legis actiones, certain hard, sharply defined forms which a rude civilisation prescribed for all proceedings. Secondly, that of the system of formulae, by which the prætor, adopting a most flexible form of organising the proceedings, was enabled to give a means of enforcing every right which the more enlarged views of an advancing civilisation pronounced to be founded on equity; and thirdly, that of the extraordinaria judicia, by which, under the later emperors, the supreme authority took the whole conduct of the proceeding into its own hands, and arrived at what seemed to it to be just in as direct and speedy a manner as it found possible.

*Epochs in the
history of Roman system of
civil process.*

92. In enforcing rights two very different functions have to be exercised by those to whom the powers of the State are delegated. First, there must be some one invested with magisterial authority, giving the sanction and solemnity of his position to the whole proceeding, who shall represent the law and say what the law is, and who shall have power to employ the force which the State places at the disposal of those it selects to administer justice. Secondly, an inquiry has to be made into particular facts, evidence has to be received and weighed, and an opinion formed and pronounced as to the real merits of the case. The person who exercised the one function was spoken of by the Romans as magistratus; the person who exercised the other as judex. To the law, represented, pronounced, vindicated, by the magistrate, they applied the term jus; to the examination of contested facts by the judge, the term judicium. It is perfectly possible that the same person should act as magistrate and judge; but it is also possible that the two provinces should be separated and placed in the hands of different persons. Among the Romans the magistratus was a different person from the judex, until the introduction of the system of extraordinaria judicia. The two functions were kept almost entirely apart under the system of formulae, and, from a comparatively early period of Roman history, the notion of a judge distinct from the magistrate was familiar to the national mind. After the expulsion of the kings, and during the time of the first period of the system of civil process, first the consuls, then the prætor urbanus, and in some cases the ædiles, acted as the magistrate, and the magistrate was said to have two functions, (1) Jurisdictio, the elements of which were summed up in the three solemn words by which the prætor announced that he was exercising his authority on one of the dies fasti, when alone legal business could be done (Ov. Fast. i. 47): do, I give an action or possession of goods; dico, I express the law, issue edicts or interdicts; addico, I give ownership; and (2) Imperium, the power of using the public forces to insure obedience to his orders. As judex, any member of the senatorial body, so long as senators alone were qualified to act as judges, could act who was chosen by the mutual consent of the parties: if they could not agree, the choice was determined by lot. There was also a standing body of plebeian judges dating from a remote antiquity, the centumvirs, elected annually by the comitia, three from each local tribe, and constituting a collegium divided into sections. They had special jurisdiction over questions of status, of dominium ex jure Quiritium, and of successions, and a spear (hasta), the special symbol of Quiritian ownership, was set up in front of the place where they met. In cases involving any question into which the centumvirs were the proper persons to inquire, it was not open to the parties to ask for a judge, and the whole proceedings were carried on before the centumvirs. Lastly, in cases where the interests of peregrini, and afterwards even where the interests of

*The magistrate and the
judge.*

to be made into particular facts, evidence has to be received and weighed, and an opinion formed and pronounced as to the real merits of the case. The person who exercised the one function was spoken of by the Romans as magistratus; the person who exercised the other as judex. To the law, represented, pronounced, vindicated, by the magistrate, they applied the term jus; to the examination of contested facts by the judge, the term judicium. It is perfectly possible that the same person should act as magistrate and judge; but it is also possible that the two provinces should be separated and placed in the hands of different persons. Among the Romans the magistratus was a different person from the judex, until the introduction of the system of extraordinaria judicia. The two functions were kept almost entirely apart under the system of formulae, and, from a comparatively early period of Roman history, the notion of a judge distinct from the magistrate was familiar to the national mind. After the expulsion of the kings, and during the time of the first period of the system of civil process, first the consuls, then the prætor urbanus, and in some cases the ædiles, acted as the magistrate, and the magistrate was said to have two functions, (1) Jurisdictio, the elements of which were summed up in the three solemn words by which the prætor announced that he was exercising his authority on one of the dies fasti, when alone legal business could be done (Ov. Fast. i. 47): do, I give an action or possession of goods; dico, I express the law, issue edicts or interdicts; addico, I give ownership; and (2) Imperium, the power of using the public forces to insure obedience to his orders. As judex, any member of the senatorial body, so long as senators alone were qualified to act as judges, could act who was chosen by the mutual consent of the parties: if they could not agree, the choice was determined by lot. There was also a standing body of plebeian judges dating from a remote antiquity, the centumvirs, elected annually by the comitia, three from each local tribe, and constituting a collegium divided into sections. They had special jurisdiction over questions of status, of dominium ex jure Quiritium, and of successions, and a spear (hasta), the special symbol of Quiritian ownership, was set up in front of the place where they met. In cases involving any question into which the centumvirs were the proper persons to inquire, it was not open to the parties to ask for a judge, and the whole proceedings were carried on before the centumvirs. Lastly, in cases where the interests of peregrini, and afterwards even where the interests of citizens, were involved, recuperatores, i.e. persons not on any list, were invited to act, and, so acting, furnished the body who were to act the part of the judex. It may be added that where the circumstances of the case demanded that the judge, in pronouncing his opinion on the facts, should exercise a wider discretion than was ordinarily open to him, or decide from special knowledge, he was spoken of as an arbiter; and although there could never be more than one judex, there were sometimes several arbitri, but the arbiter was chosen from the same class as the judex. Arbiters.

93. All judicial proceedings, whether before a magistrate or a judge, were conducted publicly at Rome. The proceedings began with the in jus vocatio, or summons to come before the magistrate. If the adversary would not come, the summoner called, by touching them on the ear, bystanders to witness that he had made the summons; but ascendants and patrons could not be summoned except by previous authorisation of the magistrate. When before the magistrate the parties had to give security for their further appearance (vadimonium), and called witnesses to testify that the litigation had duly begun (litis contestatio). In early times, the magistrate sat in the forum, and openly dispensed justice to all comers. Nothing, perhaps, conveys a more correct picture of the ideas and feelings that lay at the bottom of the public life of a Roman citizen, while Rome was still the rival of the Volscians or the Æquians, than the mode in which the actions of law were conducted. The magistrate and the judge of the patrician order, the distinction of days fasti and nefasti, the key to which only those who knew the jus sacrum possessed, the solemn and indispensable form of words by which every stage of the proceeding must be accompanied, would throw over the conduct of the action much of the same character which the existence of a privileged and partly sacerdotal order impressed on the whole body politic. Character of judicial proceedings at Rome in early times.

94. The most ancient and most important of the actions of law, the actio sacramenti,* brings before us, in the most marked manner, the delight in appeals to the external senses, and the use of symbolical acts, sanctioned by long usage and expressive in themselves, which belongs to the early times of so many nations. It was originally the First epoch. Actions of law — actio sacramenti.

* GAIUS, iv. 13-17.

citizens, were involved, recuperatores, i.e. persons not on any list, were invited to act, and, so acting, furnished the body who were to act the part of the judex. It may be added that where the circumstances of the case demanded that the judge, in pronouncing his opinion on the facts, should exercise a wider discretion than was ordinarily open to him, or decide from special knowledge, he was spoken of as an arbiter; and although there could never be more than one judex, there were sometimes several arbitri, but the arbiter was chosen from the same class as the judex.

93. All judicial proceedings, whether before a magistrate or a judge, were conducted publicly at Rome. The proceedings began with the in jus vocatio, or summons to come before the magistrate. If the adversary would not come, the summoner called, by touching them on the ear, bystanders to witness that he had made the summons; but ascendants and patrons could not be summoned except by previous authorisation of the magistrate. When before the magistrate the parties had to give security for their further appearance (vadimonium), and called witnesses to testify that the litigation had duly begun (litis contestatio). In early times, the magistrate sat in the forum, and openly dispensed justice to all comers. Nothing, perhaps, conveys a more correct picture of the ideas and feelings that lay at the bottom of the public life of a Roman citizen, while Rome was still the rival of the Volscians or the Æquians, than the mode in which the actions of law were conducted. The magistrate and the judge of the patrician order, the distinction of days fasti and nefasti, the key to which only those who knew the jus sacrum possessed, the solemn and indispensable form of words by which every stage of the proceeding must be accompanied, would throw over the conduct of the action much of the same character which the existence of a privileged and partly sacerdotal order impressed on the whole body politic.

94. The most ancient and most important of the actions of law, the actio sacramenti,* brings before us, in the most marked manner, the delight in appeals to the external senses, and the use of symbolical acts, sanctioned by long usage and expressive in themselves, which belongs to the early times of so many nations. It was originally the

Character of judicial proceedings at Rome in early times.

*First epoch.
Actions of law
—actio sacramenti.*

* GARUS, iv. 13-17.

only form of action; and every species of right could be enforced by it. When it was employed to enforce a right over things, the proceedings opened by the thing being brought before the magistrate (in jure); the claimants appeared, each touched it with a rod (vindicta or festuca), and said, 'Hunc ego hominem (the instance given in Gaius is that of a claim to a slave) ex jure Quiritium meum esse aio secundum suam causam, sicut dixi. Ecce tibi vindictam imposui.' His adversary repeated the same words. At the same time that the words were spoken each party seized hold of the thing claimed; this was termed the manuum consertio, representing a combat which was supposed to take place in the presence of the magistrate before he would interpose, and the imposing the rod was termed vindicatio. If the thing was one that could not be brought into court, a portion of it was brought to represent the whole. A piece of turf, a twig, a brick, or one sheep, stood in place of a field, a house, or a flock.* When the vindicatio and manuum consertio were over, the magistrate said to the parties, mittite ambo hominem; both were to place their claims in his hands. Then came the wager, the sacramentum, each party challenging his adversary to deposit a certain sum, which the loser of the cause was to forfeit to the treasury of the people (ærarium), to be applied to the expenses of sacrifices. The law of the Twelve Tables fixed the amount of the wager at 500 or 50 asses, according as the value of the thing contested fell above or below 1,000 asses. The formal words by which this was done are thus given by Gaius. He who had first gone through the vindicatio asked his adversary why he claimed it. Postulo anne dicas, qua ex causa vindicaveris. The other replied that it was in conformity with right and law that he had made his claim. Jus peregi sicut vindictam imposui: the first answered, Quando tu injuria vindicasti, D. ceris sacramento te provocho, 'I challenge you to a deposit of 500 asses;' and the other accepted the challenge by saying, Similiter ego te. The magistrate then awarded the possession of the thing contested, until a decision was pronounced, to the party that appeared to have the best right to it, requiring him to furnish security that it would be forthcoming at the proper time. These sureties were only form of action; and every species of right could be enforced by it. When it was employed to enforce a right over things, the proceedings opened by the thing being brought before the magistrate (in jure); the claimants appeared, each touched it with a rod (vindicta or festuca), and said, 'Hunc ego hominem (the instance given in Gaius is that of a claim to a slave) ex jure Quiritium meum esse aio secundum suam causam, sicut dixi. Ecce tibi vindictam imposui.' His adversary repeated the same words. At the same time that the words were spoken each party seized hold of the thing claimed; this was termed the manuum consertio, representing a combat which was supposed to take place in the presence of the magistrate before he would interpose, and the imposing the rod was termed vindicatio. If the thing was one that could not be brought into court, a portion of it was brought to represent the whole. A piece of turf, a twig, a brick, or one sheep, stood in place of a field, a house, or a flock.* When the vindicatio and manuum consertio were over, the magistrate said to the parties, mittite ambo hominem; both were to place their claims in his hands. Then came the wager, the sacramentum, each party challenging his adversary to deposit a certain sum, which the loser of the cause was to forfeit to the treasury of the people (ærarium), to be applied to the expenses of sacrifices. The law of the Twelve Tables fixed the amount of the wager at 500 or 50 asses, according as the value of the thing contested fell above or below 1,000 asses. The formal words by which this was done are thus given by Gaius. He who had first gone through the vindicatio asked his adversary why he claimed it. Postulo anne dicas, qua ex causa vindicaveris. The other replied that it was in conformity with right and law that he had made his claim. Jus peregi sicut vindictam imposui: the first answered, Quando tu injuria vindicasti, D. ceris sacramento te provocho, 'I challenge you to a deposit of 500 asses;' and the other accepted the challenge by saying, Similiter ego te. The magistrate then awarded the possession of the thing contested, until a decision was pronounced, to the party that appeared to have the best right to it, requiring him to furnish security that it would be forthcoming at the proper time. These sureties were called prædes litis et vindiciarum—lis signifying the thing contested itself, and vindicæ the fruits or profits which might arise from it before the final sentence was given. After a certain delay, a judge was appointed to examine the facts; he informed the magistrate what his decision was, and the magistrate gave effect to this decision by using the force placed at his disposal. When the right to be tried was a personal one, there was of course nothing that could be claimed by vindicatio, and the action began at once with the wager.

* If the thing was an immoveable, there appears to have been an old ceremony of the parties going to the land or other immoveable thing, and one expelling the other from it, and leading him before a magistrate (deductio). See AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Att. xx. 10; CICERO, Pro Murena, c. 12.

* If the thing was an immoveable, there appears to have been an old ceremony of the parties going to the land or other immoveable thing, and one expelling the other from it, and leading him before a magistrate (deductio). See AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Att. xx. 10; CICERO, Pro Murena, c. 12.

95. The details of the actio sacramenti furnish so lively a picture of the actual working of early Roman law, Actio per judicis postulationem. that it is worth while to set them fully before us; but the other actions of law may be passed over with a much more cursory notice; * indeed, our knowledge of them is very deficient, as the portion of the manuscript of Gaius which contained a sketch of the proceedings is imperfect. Perhaps the action called judicis postulatio was employed in complicated cases, e.g. where the rights of several persons to a common object had to be settled, as in the settlement of boundaries (see sec. 103); the machinery of the actio sacramenti being obviously but very ill adapted for enforcing rights of this kind. We know little more than that the magistrate was asked to allow the appointment of a judge, or arbiter, to decide the matter in question; and that the form of action was probably adopted, not where some certain thing was asked for as the fulfilment of the engagement, but where a greater uncertainty in the circumstances of the case allowed a greater latitude of opinion, and where an appearance of good or bad faith would naturally colour the whole cause.† In the year A.U.C. 510 (as it is conjectured) the lex Silia instituted a new form of action where the obligation was for the giving a definite sum of money, and a lex Calpurnia Condictio. (A.U.C. 520) extended the scope of the action to all obligations for any certain definite thing.‡ This action was called condictio, because the plaintiff gave notice (condicere) to the defendant that he must appear before the magistrate, at an interval of thirty days, to receive a judge. Probably its institution completed the withdrawal of the enforcement of obligations from the scope of the called prædes litis et vindiciarum—lis signifying the thing contested itself, and vindiciæ the fruits or profits which might arise from it before the final sentence was given. After a certain delay, a judge was appointed to examine the facts; he informed the magistrate what his decision was, and the magistrate gave effect to this decision by using the force placed at his disposal. When the right to be tried was a personal one, there was of course nothing that could be claimed by vindicatio, and the action began at once with the wager.

* GAIUS, iv. 12.

† Præclarum a majoribus accepimus morem rogandi judicis, si eum teneremus, quæ salva fide facere posset.—CICERO, De Off. iii. 10.

‡ GAIUS, iv. 19.

95. The details of the actio sacramenti furnish so lively a picture of the actual working of early Roman law, Actio per judicis postulationem. that it is worth while to set them fully before us; but the other actions of law may be passed over with a much more cursory notice; * indeed, our knowledge of them is very deficient, as the portion of the manuscript of Gaius which contained a sketch of the proceedings is imperfect. Perhaps the action called judicis postulatio was employed in complicated cases, e.g. where the rights of several persons to a common object had to be settled, as in the settlement of boundaries (see sec. 103); the machinery of the actio sacramenti being obviously but very ill adapted for enforcing rights of this kind. We know little more than that the magistrate was asked to allow the appointment of a judge, or arbiter, to decide the matter in question; and that the form of action was probably adopted, not where some certain thing was asked for as the fulfilment of the engagement, but where a greater uncertainty in the circumstances of the case allowed a greater latitude of opinion, and where an appearance of good or bad faith would naturally colour the whole cause.† In the year A.U.C. 510 (as it is conjectured) the lex Silia instituted a new form of action where the obligation was for the giving a definite sum of money, and a lex Calpurnia Condictio. (A.U.C. 520) extended the scope of the action to all obligations for any certain definite thing.‡ This action was called condictio, because the plaintiff gave notice (condicere) to the defendant that he must appear before the magistrate, at an interval of thirty days, to receive a judge. Probably its institution completed the withdrawal of the enforcement of obligations from the scope of the actio sacramenti. The judicis postulatio may have left to the sphere of the actio sacramenti the demand for things certi, and then the condictio took that also away.

* GAIUS, iv. 12.

† Præclarum a majoribus accepimus morem rogandi judicis, si eum teneremus, quæ salva fide facere posset.—CICERO, De Off. iii. 10.

‡ GAIUS, iv. 19.

96. There were two other actions of law, that per manus injectionem, and that per pignoris capionem.* These were, however, not really actions so much as methods of obtaining execution. If it was a right over a thing that was claimed, then, if the sentence was in favour of the claimant, the magistrate at once put the claimant in possession of the thing, having recourse to force, manus militaris, if necessary. But when a right against a person had to be enforced, there was nothing which could be thus handed over; the remedy was against the person, the liberty of the defeated adversary, and the action per manus injectionem was the means by which the successful litigant exerted his power. He laid hands on him, manus infecit, and brought him before a magistrate, stating that he had been cast in the previous suit; if this was denied, a judex was appointed, and inquiry made whether judgment had really been given against him as alleged. If this was found to be the case, he was adjudicatus to the claimant, who kept him prisoner, and then being brought, after sixty days, before the magistrate, was addictus, or assigned over, and became the slave of his creditor.

To the principle that the person, and not the property, of the debtor was bound, an exception was made when the debt was due to a soldier for military service, to the fund for sacrifices, or the public treasury.† The creditor, in such cases, might seize on anything belonging to the debtor, and take it as a pledge for the payment of a debt. This pignoris capio was only spoken of as an actio because it was conducted with certain solemnities, and accompanied by the repetition of a peculiar form of words.

The following are some of the marked features of actions of law, in respect of which great differences were gradually introduced under the later systems. (1) The procedure in the actions of law was one open only to Roman citizens. (2) The parties were almost always obliged to appear personally, but an assertor libertatis could appear to claim the freedom of a person wrongly treated as a slave. (3) So rigid was the necessity of adherence to the prescribed forms, as Gaius informs us (iv. 11), that if, in an action actio sacramenti. The judicis postulatio may have left to the sphere of the actio sacramenti the demand for things certi, and then the condictio took that also away.

* GAIUS, iv. 21-25.

† GAIUS, iv. 26-29. (See also ante, sec. 8.)

96. There were two other actions of law, that per manus injectionem, and that per pignoris capionem.* These were, however, not really actions so much as methods of obtaining execution. If it was a right over a thing that was claimed, then, if the sentence was in favour of the claimant, the magistrate at once put the claimant in possession of the thing, having recourse to force, manus militaris, if necessary. But when a right against a person had to be enforced, there was nothing which could be thus handed over; the remedy was against the person, the liberty of the defeated adversary, and the action per manus injectionem was the means by which the successful litigant exerted his power. He laid hands on him, manus injecit, and brought him before a magistrate, stating that he had been cast in the previous suit; if this was denied, a judex was appointed, and inquiry made whether judgment had really been given against him as alleged. If this was found to be the case, he was adjudicatus to the claimant, who kept him prisoner, and then being brought, after sixty days, before the magistrate, was addictus, or assigned over, and became the slave of his creditor.

To the principle that the person, and not the property, of the debtor was bound, an exception was made when the debt was due to a soldier for military service, to the fund for sacrifices, or the public treasury.† The creditor, in such cases, might seize on anything belonging to the debtor, and take it as a pledge for the payment of a debt. This pignoris capio was only spoken of as an actio because it was conducted with certain solemnities, and accompanied by the repetition of a peculiar form of words.

The following are some of the marked features of actions of law, in respect of which great differences were gradually introduced under the later systems. (1) The procedure in the actions of law was one open only to Roman citizens. (2) The parties were almost always obliged to appear personally, but an assertor libertatis could appear to claim the freedom of a person wrongly treated as a slave. (3) So rigid was the necessity of adherence to the prescribed forms, as Gaius informs us (iv. 11), that if, in an action for damage to a vineyard, the plaintiff used the word vites instead of the general word arbores, employed in the law of the Twelve Tables, he lost his action. (4) If the action was once brought, it was exhausted, or if it failed, even on the most technical ground, the plaintiff had no further remedy. (5) The sentence was ordinarily to give the thing demanded, not a pecuniary equivalent.

* GAIUS, iv. 21-25.

† GAIUS, iv. 26-29. (See also ante, sec. 8.)

97. The legis actiones were necessarily replaced by other forms of actions more convenient as Rome advanced in civilisation. They were in a great measure suppressed by the lex Æbutia (about A.U.C. 573), and afterwards, in the time of Augustus, by the leges Julice. They were, however, ^{Suppression of the actions of law.} long retained in cases where the centumviri were the proper judices, that is, in questions of status, Quiritian ownership, and disputed succession, the prætor presiding personally over the deliberations of the centumviri, and not instructing them by a formula; and a fictitious process, termed in jure cessio, which was nothing else than an undefended action at law, in which a disputant gave up (cessit) before the magistrate (in jure) the thing in dispute, was retained as a ready means of many legal changes, such as manumission or adoption, long after the actions of law had fallen into disuse. Before the actions of law were suppressed, the prætor peregrinus had for years been administering justice through forms of action devised by him where peregrini were concerned.

98. The changes wrought by intercourse with foreign nations, the new duties of extended dominion, and the stimulus ^{Second epoch; the system of formula.} given to the national mind by the long internal struggles which had now subsided, produced by degrees a general change in the mode in which justice was administered. A new system succeeded the old legis actiones; the ^{Judges in the second period.} magistrate was more strongly marked off from the judez, and it was the directions which the former gave the latter that constituted the important feature of the new system of procedure. At home the prætors, of whom there were eighteen in the days of Pomponius,* and one or two other magistrates; and in the provinces the præsides or præfects, who held conventus or assizes in the principal towns at stated intervals, sat as magistrates. At Rome the long struggle between the senate and the equites for the exclusive right to furnish the judges ended, as has been already for damage to a vineyard, the plaintiff used the word vites instead of the general word arbores, employed in the law of the Twelve Tables, he lost his action. (4) If the action was once brought, it was exhausted, or if it failed, even on the most technical ground, the plaintiff had no further remedy. (5) The sentence was ordinarily to give the thing demanded, not a pecuniary equivalent.

* D. i. 2. 2. 34.

97. The legis actiones were necessarily replaced by other forms of actions more convenient as Rome advanced in civilisation. They were in a great measure suppressed by the lex Æbutia (about A.U.C. 573), and afterwards, in the time of Augustus, by the leges Julice. They were, however, ^{Suppression of the actions of law.} long retained in cases where the centumviri were the proper judices, that is, in questions of status, Quiritian ownership, and disputed succession, the prætor presiding personally over the deliberations of the centumviri, and not instructing them by a formula; and a fictitious process, termed in jure cessio, which was nothing else than an undefended action at law, in which a disputant gave up (cessit) before the magistrate (in jure) the thing in dispute, was retained as a ready means of many legal changes, such as manumission or adoption, long after the actions of law had fallen into disuse. Before the actions of law were suppressed, the prætor peregrinus had for years been administering justice through forms of action devised by him where peregrini were concerned.

98. The changes wrought by intercourse with foreign nations, the new duties of extended dominion, and the stimulus ^{Second epoch; the system of formulae.} given to the national mind by the long internal struggles which had now subsided, produced by degrees a general change in the mode in which justice was administered. A new system succeeded the old legis actiones; the ^{Judges in the second period.} magistrate was more strongly marked off from the judez, and it was the directions which the former gave the latter that constituted the important feature of the new system of procedure. At home the prætors, of whom there were eighteen in the days of Pomponius,* and one or two other magistrates; and in the provinces the præsides or præfects, who held conventus or assizes in the principal towns at stated intervals, sat as magistrates. At Rome the long struggle between the senate and the equites for the exclusive right to furnish the judges ended, as has been already said (sec. 12), in the judges ceasing to be taken entirely either from the senate or the equites; and two, at least, out of the five decuries of judges appearing in the album were taken from a comparatively humble class. The recuperatores and centumviri still continued to act in the cases which properly fell within their province.

* D. i. 2. 2. 34.

99. The directions which the magistrate sent to the judge were always conveyed in a formal shape, and the word Formula. formulae was used to express the different forms in which directions were given. These formulae were preserved and collected, and it became the great object of the contending parties that the right formula should be used in their case, the judge not being allowed to depart from the instructions he received. As there was no legal form to bind the magistrate, he could easily vary the formula so as to render substantial justice, and had thus a ready means of availing himself of any equitable doctrine, which a more refined jurisprudence or his own sense of what was right suggested to him. These formule, so flexible in their general character, yet couched in terms always precise and simple, furnish one of the many admirable instances of the power of the Romans to express correctly the subtlest legal ideas; and it was by this machinery that the prætors principally introduced their great legal changes. But it may be observed that, although the old actions of law became obsolete, traces of them are to be found in the prætorian system. Thus, in certain actions the parties entered into a wager, sponsio pœnalis, evidently a relic of the old actio sacramenti, by which each stipulated with the other for a sum of money to be paid as a penalty by the loser in the action to the successful party.

100. To show what these formulae were, it will perhaps be best to give at length one of those we find in Gaius, and then to explain its different parts. One which we may collect from different sections of the Fourth Book runs thus:—

*Judex esto: Quod Aulus Agerius Numerio Negidium hominem vendidit; si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X. millia dare oportere, judex Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X. millia condemna; si non paret, absolve.

Judex esto is merely the order for the appointment of the said (sec. 12), in the judges ceasing to be taken entirely either from the senate or the equites; and two, at least, out of the five decuries of judges appearing in the album were taken from a comparatively humble class. The recuperatores and centumviri still continued to act in the cases which properly fell within their province.

* GAIUS, iv. 40-43.

99. The directions which the magistrate sent to the judge were always conveyed in a formal shape, and the word Formula. formulae was used to express the different forms in which directions were given. These formulae were preserved and collected, and it became the great object of the contending parties that the right formula should be used in their case, the judge not being allowed to depart from the instructions he received. As there was no legal form to bind the magistrate, he could easily vary the formula so as to render substantial justice, and had thus a ready means of availing himself of any equitable doctrine, which a more refined jurisprudence or his own sense of what was right suggested to him. These formule, so flexible in their general character, yet couched in terms always precise and simple, furnish one of the many admirable instances of the power of the Romans to express correctly the subtlest legal ideas; and it was by this machinery that the prætors principally introduced their great legal changes. But it may be observed that, although the old actions of law became obsolete, traces of them are to be found in the prætorian system. Thus, in certain actions the parties entered into a wager, sponsio pœnalis, evidently a relic of the old actio sacramenti, by which each stipulated with the other for a sum of money to be paid as a penalty by the loser in the action to the successful party.

100. To show what these formulae were, it will perhaps be best to give at length one of those we find in Gaius, and then to explain its different parts. One which we may collect from different sections of the Fourth Book runs thus:—

*Judex esto: Quod Aulus Agerius Numerio Negidio hominem vendidit; si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X. millia dare oportere, judex Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio sestertium X. millia condemna; si non paret, absolve.

Judex esto is merely the order for the appointment of the

* GAIUS, iv. 40-43.

judge, and is not, strictly speaking, a part of the formula. From 'quod' to 'vendidit' is what is called the demonstratio; from 'si paret' to 'dare oportere' is the intentio; and from 'judex' to the end is the condemnatio. The formula ordinarily consisted of these three parts—the demonstratio, the intentio, and the condemnatio.

101. The demonstratio is the statement of the fact or facts which the plaintiff alleges as the ground of his case.* Demonstratio. Aulus Agerius, the plaintiff, says that he has sold a slave to Numerius Negidius. The demonstratio varied, of course, with each particular case.

102. The intentio was the really important part of the formula.† It was a precise statement of the demand which the plaintiff made against (tendebat in) his adversary.‡ Intentio. It was necessary that it should exactly meet the law which would govern the facts alleged by the plaintiff, if true. Whether Aulus Agerius has sold this slave to Numerius Negidius at the price he alleges, and whether the debt is still owing, this is what the judex has to determine; if the judge thinks he has (si paret), then the judge is instructed to pronounce his judgment against him; if he thinks he has not (si non paret), he is to be absolved.

103. The condemnatio is the direction to condemn or absolve according to the true circumstances of the case.‡ The judex was only a private citizen, and, unless specially authorised by a magistrate, could have no power to pronounce a judicial sentence. It is to be observed that the condemnatio was, under the formulary system, always pecuniary; the judge was always directed to condemn to a payment of money, never to do or give a particular thing. In three particular actions, however, and perhaps in more, the judge was directed to 'adjudicate' a thing, in the sense of dividing it out among several litigants. These three actions were those brought to divide a family inheritance, to divide property held in common, and to settle boundaries. In these actions there was a part of the formula running thus: quantum adjudicari oportet, judex Titio adjudicato. This was called the adjudicatio; so that in these actions the parts of the formulae might be four—demonstratio, intentio, adjudicatio, and condemnatio.§ Of course when a thing, and not a sum of money,

* GAIUS, iv. 40.

† GAIUS, iv. 41.

‡ GAIUS, iv. 43.

§ The judge might think it right, in order to equalise the division, to judge, and is not, strictly speaking, a part of the formula. From 'quod' to 'vendidit' is what is called the demonstratio; from 'si paret' to 'dare oportere' is the intentio; and from 'judex' to the end is the condemnatio. The formula ordinarily consisted of these three parts—the demonstratio, the intentio, and the condemnatio.

101. The demonstratio is the statement of the fact or facts which the plaintiff alleges as the ground of his case.* Demonstratio. Aulus Agerius, the plaintiff, says that he has sold a slave to Numerius Negidius. The demonstratio varied, of course, with each particular case.

102. The intentio was the really important part of the formula.† It was a precise statement of the demand which the plaintiff made against (tendebat in) his adversary.‡ Intentio. It was necessary that it should exactly meet the law which would govern the facts alleged by the plaintiff, if true. Whether Aulus Agerius has sold this slave to Numerius Negidius at the price he alleges, and whether the debt is still owing, this is what the judex has to determine; if the judge thinks he has (si paret), then the judge is instructed to pronounce his judgment against him; if he thinks he has not (si non paret), he is to be absolved.

103. The condemnatio is the direction to condemn or absolve according to the true circumstances of the case.‡ The judex was only a private citizen, and, unless specially authorised by a magistrate, could have no power to pronounce a judicial sentence. It is to be observed that the condemnatio was, under the formulary system, always pecuniary; the judge was always directed to condemn to a payment of money, never to do or give a particular thing. In three particular actions, however, and perhaps in more, the judge was directed to 'adjudicate' a thing, in the sense of dividing it out among several litigants. These three actions were those brought to divide a family inheritance, to divide property held in common, and to settle boundaries. In these actions there was a part of the formula running thus: quantum adjudicari oportet, judex Titio adjudicato. This was called the adjudicatio; so that in these actions the parts of the formulae might be four—demonstratio, intentio, adjudicatio, and condemnatio.§ Of course when a thing, and not a sum of money,

* GAIUS, iv. 40.

† GAIUS, iv. 41.

‡ GAIUS, iv. 43.

§ The judge might think it right, in order to equalise the division, to

was claimed, it was not possible for the magistrate always to fix a precise sum in which the defendant was to be condemned. Sometimes, therefore, the condemnatio merely fixed a maximum sum, and ran duntaxat X. millia condemna. Sometimes the direction was still more indefinite, and the sum was left to the discretion of the judge. Quanti ea res erit, tantam pecuniam, &c., condemna. Sometimes, too, as when the action was real, i.e. brought to claim a thing, the actio was arbitraria, and the words nisi restituat were inserted in the condemnatio. The defendant was ordered to give up the thing, and then was condemned to pay the money if he did not restore the thing, in accordance with the order (arbitrium) of the judge, or if the thing was in his possession, he was forced to give it up.

104. The intentio sometimes stood quite alone, as in what was Præjudicialis called a præjudicialis formula ; * when the object of formula. the action was merely to establish a point which it was necessary to have settled with a view to a future action. The decision of such a preliminary point was called a præjudicium. Of course the intentio took any form that best suited the case ; and accordingly it was the intentiones that were so carefully preserved as precedents, and so keenly debated by the contending parties. Sometimes the grounds of the defence made part of the intentio. The defendant might admit the plaintiff's statement, but say that there were special circumstances to take this particular case out of the general rule of law under which it would naturally fall. He might own, for instance, that he had bought a slave at the price alleged, but say that he had been induced to do Exceptio. so by fraud. This plea was called an exceptio (i.e. a taking out), and was made to form part of the intentio, some such words as these being added : si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli

Replicatio. Agerii factum sit neque fiat. The plaintiff, again, might have something to urge as an exception in reply to this plea: his answer was called replicatio ; if the defendant had a further answer, it was called a duplicatio, the plaintiff's further reply a triplicatio, and so on. There was also sometimes an accessory part of the formula called the præscriptio, placed, as its name denotes, at the beginning of the whole formula for the purpose of limiting the inquiry. As employed by the defendant, it answered the purpose of the exceptio, and belongs, probably, to order that some of the parties should, in receiving their share, make a money payment to others, and for this there would be a condemnatio.

* GARUS, iv. 44, 133.

was claimed, it was not possible for the magistrate always to fix a precise sum in which the defendant was to be condemned. Sometimes, therefore, the condemnatio merely fixed a maximum sum, and ran duntaxat X. millia condemnna. Sometimes the direction was still more indefinite, and the sum was left to the discretion of the judge. Quanti ea res erit, tantam pecuniam, &c., condemnna. Sometimes, too, as when the action was real, i.e. brought to claim a thing, the actio was arbitraria, and the words nisi restituat were inserted in the condemnatio. The defendant was ordered to give up the thing, and then was condemned to pay the money if he did not restore the thing, in accordance with the order (arbitrium) of the judge, or if the thing was in his possession, he was forced to give it up.

104. The intentio sometimes stood quite alone, as in what was Præjudicialis called a præjudicialis formula ; * when the object of formula. the action was merely to establish a point which it was necessary to have settled with a view to a future action. The decision of such a preliminary point was called a præjudicium. Of course the intentio took any form that best suited the case ; and accordingly it was the intentiones that were so carefully preserved as precedents, and so keenly debated by the contending parties. Sometimes the grounds of the defence made part of the intentio. The defendant might admit the plaintiff's statement, but say that there were special circumstances to take this particular case out of the general rule of law under which it would naturally fall. He might own, for instance, that he had bought a slave at the price alleged, but say that he had been induced to do Exceptio. so by fraud. This plea was called an exceptio (i.e. a taking out), and was made to form part of the intentio, some such words as these being added : si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli might have something to urge as an exception in reply to this plea: his answer was called replicatio ; if the defendant had a further answer, it was called a duplicatio, the plaintiff's further reply a triplicatio, and so on. There was also sometimes an accessory part of the formula called the præscriptio, placed, as its name denotes, at the beginning of the whole formula for the purpose of limiting the inquiry. As employed by the defendant, it answered the purpose of the exceptio, and belongs, probably, to order that some of the parties should, in receiving their share, make a money payment to others, and for this there would be a condemnatio.

Agerii factum sit neque fiat. The plaintiff, again, Replicatio.

* GARUS, iv. 44, 133.

a time before the exceptio had its regular place in the formula. A well-known example of its use is that by which the defendant stopped an action for the possession of provincial lands, by raising the question whether he had not been in possession for a particular period, which is the origin of the familiar term 'prescription.' (See sec. 72.) But the plaintiff also might, in the early days of the formulary system, have occasion to resort to a praescriptio. He might, for instance, wish that, in enforcing a security on which payments were due from time to time, the action brought to try whether this security was valid should only affect his claim to payments already due, so that if he failed he might have a further action for future payments. In such a case some such words as ea res agatur cujus rei dies fuit (let the inquiry only be made as to the sum for the payment of which the time has arrived) were prefixed to the formula. Gradually, however, the praescriptio fell into disuse, and the intentio and exceptio were so constructed as to serve every purpose for which it had been employed.

105. In the Roman system of civil process the time when a contested right was to be considered as really made Litis contestatio the subject of litigation, was very carefully marked. tatio. It was very necessary that this should be clearly ascertained. The claimant in whose favour the ultimate decision was given was entitled to all that accrued to the thing claimed from this moment; and when once a point had been submitted to litigation, it could not be again litigated, both parties surrendering all their interest into the hands of the court, which assigned to the successful claimant such a fresh interest in the thing claimed as might appear to be due to him. This time was marked by each party, at the end of the proceedings before the magistrate, calling bystanders to witness that they submitted the matter to the decision of the judge.* This was called the litis contestatio, as has been said (see sec. 93). In process of time the ceremony might be omitted, or at any rate become a mere form, but the conclusion of the proceedings before the magistrate (in jure), i.e., in the formulary system, the time when the praetor delivered the formula, still formed the crisis at which the claims of the different parties were considered to be finally submitted to the decision of the law. Up to the litis contestatio, the proceedings in an action under the formulary system were as follows. The plaintiff applied to the praetor for a summons to make the

* FESTUS, sub voce Contestari.

a time before the exceptio had its regular place in the formula. A well-known example of its use is that by which the defendant stopped an action for the possession of provincial lands, by raising the question whether he had not been in possession for a particular period, which is the origin of the familiar term 'prescription.' (See sec. 72.) But the plaintiff also might, in the early days of the formulary system, have occasion to resort to a praescriptio. He might, for instance, wish that, in enforcing a security on which payments were due from time to time, the action brought to try whether this security was valid should only affect his claim to payments already due, so that if he failed he might have a further action for future payments. In such a case some such words as ea res agatur cujus rei dies fuit (let the inquiry only be made as to the sum for the payment of which the time has arrived) were prefixed to the formula. Gradually, however, the praescriptio fell into disuse, and the intentio and exceptio were so constructed as to serve every purpose for which it had been employed.

105. In the Roman system of civil process the time when a contested right was to be considered as really made litis contestatio the subject of litigation, was very carefully marked. tatio. It was very necessary that this should be clearly ascertained. The claimant in whose favour the ultimate decision was given was entitled to all that accrued to the thing claimed from this moment; and when once a point had been submitted to litigation, it could not be again litigated, both parties surrendering all their interest into the hands of the court, which assigned to the successful claimant such a fresh interest in the thing claimed as might appear to be due to him. This time was marked by each party, at the end of the proceedings before the magistrate, calling bystanders to witness that they submitted the matter to the decision of the judge.* This was called the litis contestatio, as has been said (see sec. 93). In process of time the ceremony might be omitted, or at any rate become a mere form, but the conclusion of the proceedings before the magistrate (in jure), i.e., in the formulary system, the time when the praetor delivered the formula, still formed the crisis at which the claims of the different parties were considered to be finally submitted to the decision of the law. Up to the litis contestatio, the proceedings in an action under the formulary system were as follows. The plaintiff applied to the praetor for a summons to make the defendant appear (in jus vocatio). If the defendant on appearing would not come to any compromise (transactio), the plaintiff announced that he would go on with legal proceedings. This was termed edere actionem. He had to announce the kind of action to which he proposed to resort. He then called on the defendant to give bail (vadari) that he would appear in court. The plaintiff on the day fixed submitted the formula as he thought it ought to be drawn up; the defendant proposed the exceptions on which he relied, and the prætor settled it. The plaintiff then asked for a judge (postulatio judicis), and when the prætor gave the judge the litis contestatio took place, and the proceedings in jure were finished.*

* FESTUS, sub voce Contestari.

106. Actio meant, under the system of the actions of law, a particular form of procedure; under that of the Meaning of the word action under the system of formulae. formulae, it meant the right granted to a plaintiff by the magistrate to seek what was due to him before a judge. Sometimes, however, the formula by which the judge was to determine the right, and sometimes the judicium, the proceedings by which the judge determined the right, were spoken of as if formula, judicium, and actio were synonymous terms. Of the divisions under which the formulary actions may be grouped, the following were the most important. 1. The Divisions of actions. first division turns on the difference in the nature of the thing claimed, and, according to this division, actions were in rem and in personam. If the object of the proceedings was to enforce a right to a thing, then the formula ran si paret hominem Auli Agerii esse; if to enforce an obligation, then the formula ran si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio dare, facere, prestare oportere; and it was according to this difference in the intentio that actions were said to be in rem or in personam. Vindicatio came to be used as a generic term for actions in rem, and condictio for actions in personam. 2. Another division of actions refers to the modes in which the prætor extended or modified the law by the shape he gave to the formula. In shaping actions, the prætor introduced changes of two kinds: First, he gave actions for the enforcement of actions outside the old civil law, and this he principally effected by giving an actio in factum concepta, in which the demonstratio and intentio were blended, and the prætor directed that, if a given state of facts was found to be true, the defendant was to be con-defendant appear (in jus vocatio). If the defendant on appearing would not come to any compromise (transactio), the plaintiff announced that he would go on with legal proceedings. This was termed edere actionem. He had to announce the kind of action to which he proposed to resort. He then called on the defendant to give bail (vadari) that he would appear in court. The plaintiff on the day fixed submitted the formula as he thought it ought to be drawn up; the defendant proposed the exceptions on which he relied, and the prætor settled it. The plaintiff then asked for a judge (postulatio judicis), and when the prætor gave the judge the litis contestatio took place, and the proceedings in jure were finished.*

* See note in Appendix (page 453) to Abdy and Walker's Gaius.

106. Actio meant, under the system of the actions of law, a particular form of procedure; under that of the formulae, it meant the right granted to a plaintiff by the magistrate to seek what was due to him before a judge. Sometimes, however, the formula by which the judge was to determine the right, and sometimes the judicium, the proceedings by which the judge determined the right, were spoken of as if formula, judicium, and actio were synonymous terms. Of the divisions under which the formulary actions may be grouped, the following were the most important. 1. The first division turns on the difference in the nature of the thing claimed, and, according to this division, actions were in rem and in personam. If the object of the proceedings was to enforce a right to a thing, then the formula ran si paret hominem Auli Agerii esse; if to enforce an obligation, then the formula ran si paret Numerium Negidium Aulo Agerio dare, facere, prestare oportere; and it was according to this difference in the intentio that actions were said to be in rem or in personam. Vindicatio came to be used as a generic term for actions in rem, and condictio for actions in personam. 2. Another division of actions refers to the modes in which the prætor extended or modified the law by the shape he gave to the formula. In shaping actions, the prætor introduced changes of two kinds: First, he gave actions for the enforcement of actions outside the old civil law, and this he principally effected by giving an actio in factum concepta, in which the demonstratio and intentio were blended, and the prætor directed that, if a given state of facts was found to be true, the defendant was to be condemned, the action being thus contrasted with one in jus concepta, i.e. given to try an issue by the rules of law. Secondly, the prætor extended existing actions (actiones directæ) by giving actions (actiones utiles) to suit cases and persons outside the limits of the direct actions; and this he did either by means of actions in factum, which could be used for these purposes equally well as to give new remedies, or by giving a fictitious action, i.e. an action in which the plaintiff was allowed to feign that he was within the scope of the unextended action. When there was a contract not falling under the old heads, but executed on one side, the prætor enforced it by an action in factum præscriptis verbis, an action to meet the case with the circumstances set forth at the beginning; but such an action, as it was to try an issue according to known rules of law, was in jus concepta.

* See note in Appendix (page 453) to Abdy and Walker's Gaius.

3. A further division depended on the varying amount of latitude given to the judge. The actions depending on the old civil law were stricti juris, and the judge had merely to decide the question submitted to him, without taking into account considerations of equity. Other actions were bonæ fidei, i.e. the judges were allowed to take such considerations into account. In real actions, and in some few special actions, the judge had always a particular kind of latitude given him, as the action was arbitraria (see sec. 103), i.e. he could order the thing claimed to be given up, and, if it was not, could condemn the defendant in as much as he thought equitable; and if the thing was in the possession of the defendant he was made to give it up. Among personal actions which were arbitrariæ was one termed ad exhibendum, which was used in order to make a person in possession of a thing produce it, so that its existence in his hands and the state in which it was might be ascertained, or pay damages for not so producing it.

107. In connection with actions under the system of formula, we have to notice the interdicts of the prætor.* An Interdicts. interdict was an order issued by the prætor, and was in fact an edict addressed to some person or persons with reference to a particular thing. Vim fieri veto, exhibeas, restituias, 'I forbid you to have recourse to violence; you are to produce, you are to restore;' such were the forms in which these commands were couched. Interdicts were granted where some danger was apprehended, or some injury was being done to something to which a public character attached, as, for instance, if a road was stopped

* GAIUS, iv. 138-170.

demned, the action being thus contrasted with one in jus concepta, i.e. given to try an issue by the rules of law. Secondly, the prætor extended existing actions (actiones directæ) by giving actions (actiones utiles) to suit cases and persons outside the limits of the direct actions; and this he did either by means of actions in factum, which could be used for these purposes equally well as to give new remedies, or by giving a fictitious action, i.e. an action in which the plaintiff was allowed to feign that he was within the scope of the unextended action. When there was a contract not falling under the old heads, but executed on one side, the prætor enforced it by an action in factum præscriptis verbis, an action to meet the case with the circumstances set forth at the beginning; but such an action, as it was to try an issue according to known rules of law, was in jus concepta.

3. A further division depended on the varying amount of latitude given to the judge. The actions depending on the old civil law were stricti juris, and the judge had merely to decide the question submitted to him, without taking into account considerations of equity. Other actions were bonæ fidei, i.e. the judges were allowed to take such considerations into account. In real actions, and in some few special actions, the judge had always a particular kind of latitude given him, as the action was arbitraria (see sec. 103), i.e. he could order the thing claimed to be given up, and, if it was not, could condemn the defendant in as much as he thought equitable; and if the thing was in the possession of the defendant he was made to give it up. Among personal actions which were arbitrariæ was one termed ad exhibendum, which was used in order to make a person in possession of a thing produce it, so that its existence in his hands and the state in which it was might be ascertained, or pay damages for not so producing it.

107. In connection with actions under the system of formula, we have to notice the interdicts of the prætor.* An Interdicts. interdict was an order issued by the prætor, and was in fact an edict addressed to some person or persons with reference to a particular thing. Vim fieri veto, exhibeas, restituas, 'I forbid you to have recourse to violence; you are to produce, you are to restore;' such were the forms in which these commands were couched. Interdicts were granted where some danger was apprehended, or some injury was being done to something to which a public character attached, as, for instance, if a road was stopped up; but they were also granted to protect private interests, and especially to protect or regulate possession. If the person to whom the interdict was addressed acquiesced and obeyed the prætor's injunction, nothing remained to be done; but if he refused to obey, the magistrate then referred to the decision of a judge, whether the terms of the interdict ought to be complied with. For instance, an interdict ordering a thing to be restored might have been issued; but the person to whom it was directed might deny that by law he was bound to restore the thing. On his stating this to the magistrate, the magistrate would give an action to try the question, shaping the terms of the interdict into the intentio of the formula, si paret A. A. rem restituere oportere, &c. And it is thus that interdicts are connected with actions, as their validity depended on no action being brought to contest them, or the result of an action being to support them. Gradually the action superseded the interdict which was no longer used as a preliminary step, and, by the time of Justinian, the interdict had become obsolete.

* GAIUS, iv. 138-170.

108. There were under the system of formulae certain cases which the magistrate decided without sending to a judge. In these cases the magistrate was said extra ordinem cognoscere, and the proceedings were termed extra ordinem cognitiones, judicia, or actiones. Among the cases in which the magistrate proceeded in a summary way, were restitutiones in integrum (that is, certain cases in which he restored a person suffering from something from which he ought not by law to suffer, to the same position as he had occupied before the injury was sustained), and cases relating to fideicommissa. But he was called upon most frequently to proceed in this way in order to give execution to the sentence of a judge. The proper remedy of the creditors was still against the person of the debtor until a lex Julia, probably of the time of Augustus,* permitted a debtor to avoid arrest by giving up all his goods (cessio bonorum). If, however, the debtor could not be found, then the prætor protected the creditors by what was termed a venditio bonorum or compulsory sale. The creditors were placed in full possession of all that the debtor had belonging to him; his persona was, in fact, transferred to them. This was termed the missio in bonorum possessionem. After a certain delay, the creditors sold their interest in the debtor's property to the person up; but they were also granted to protect private interests, and especially to protect or regulate possession. If the person to whom the interdict was addressed acquiesced and obeyed the prætor's injunction, nothing remained to be done; but if he refused to obey, the magistrate then referred to the decision of a judge, whether the terms of the interdict ought to be complied with. For instance, an interdict ordering a thing to be restored might have been issued; but the person to whom it was directed might deny that by law he was bound to restore the thing. On his stating this to the magistrate, the magistrate would give an action to try the question, shaping the terms of the interdict into the intentio of the formula, si paret A. A. rem restituere oportere, &c. And it is thus that interdicts are connected with actions, as their validity depended on no action being brought to contest them, or the result of an action being to support them. Gradually the action superseded the interdict which was no longer used as a preliminary step, and, by the time of Justinian, the interdict had become obsolete.

* GAIUS, iii. 78.

108. There were under the system of formulae certain cases which the magistrate decided without sending to a judge. In these cases the magistrate was said extra ordinem cognoscere, and the proceedings were termed extra ordinem cognitiones, judicia, or actiones. Among the cases in which the magistrate proceeded in a summary way, were restitutiones in integrum (that is, certain cases in which he restored a person suffering from something from which he ought not by law to suffer, to the same position as he had occupied before the injury was sustained), and cases relating to fideicommissa. But he was called upon most frequently to proceed in this way in order to give execution to the sentence of a judge. The proper remedy of the creditors was still against the person of the debtor until a lex Julia, probably of the time of Augustus,* permitted a debtor to avoid arrest by giving up all his goods (cessio bonorum). If, however, the debtor could not be found, then the prætor protected the creditors by what was termed a venditio bonorum or compulsory sale. The creditors were placed in full possession of all that the debtor had belonging to him; his persona was, in fact, transferred to them. This was termed the missio in bonorum possessionem. After a certain delay, the creditors sold their interest in the debtor's property to the person who would offer to pay the largest proportion of the sums they claimed. He became the purchaser, and this emptio bonorum transferred to him the persona, or legal existence, of the debtor, who thereby suffered a capitis deminutio, and became, in the language of the law, 'infamous.' It was in the exercise of his 'extraordinary' jurisdiction that the magistrate gave this mode of execution.

* GAIUS, iii. 78.

In the times of the Republic there was no fixed tribunal of appeal, but the authority of one magistrate might be suspended by the veto of another magistrate. Under Appeals. the Empire the emperor acted as a supreme judge whenever he chose to interfere; but Hadrian ordered that appeals might be brought to the Senate, and that the decision of the Senate should be final.

109. In the third period of the Roman system of civil process, the period of extraordinaria judicia, his summary Third period of the Roman system of civil process. jurisdiction was the only jurisdiction the magistrate exercised. There was no longer any distinction between jus and judicium; the magistrate and the judge The extraordinaria judicium. were the same person, so that in the language of the Institutes judex means a magistrate deciding a cause. By a constitution published A.D. 294, Diocletian directed all magistrates in the provinces to decide causes themselves. The practice was, in course of time, extended throughout the whole of the empire; and in the days of Justinian it was possible to speak of the ordinaria judicia as quite obsolete.*

110. In the days of the later emperors, the provinces were classed together into præfectures. Over each province Judges. was a præses, who had a vicarius, or vice-president, under him, and who, either himself or by his vicarius, tried all cases above a certain amount, fixed by Justinian at 300 solidi; cases below that amount were tried by inferior judges, called judices pedanei, or by the defensores of provincial towns. The great cities, such as Constantinople and Alexandria, were under a separate jurisdiction. The prætorian præfect was the head judge of appeal.

111. Under the system of extraordinaria judicia, an action was begun by the plaintiff announcing to a magistrate Mode of procedure. that he wished to bring an action, and furnishing a short statement of his case. No written statement was necessary,

* Inst. iv. 15. 8.

who would offer to pay the largest proportion of the sums they claimed. He became the purchaser, and this emptio bonorum transferred to him the persona, or legal existence, of the debtor, who thereby suffered a capitis deminutio, and became, in the language of the law, 'infamous.' It was in the exercise of his 'extraordinary' jurisdiction that the magistrate gave this mode of execution.

In the times of the Republic there was no fixed tribunal of appeal, but the authority of one magistrate might be suspended by the veto of another magistrate. Under Appeals. the Empire the emperor acted as a supreme judge whenever he chose to interfere; but Hadrian ordered that appeals might be brought to the Senate, and that the decision of the Senate should be final.

109. In the third period of the Roman system of civil process, the period of extraordinaria judicia, his summary Third period of the Roman system of civil process. jurisdiction was the only jurisdiction the magistrate exercised. There was no longer any distinction between jus and judicium; the magistrate and the judge The extraordinaria judicium. were the same person, so that in the language of the Institutes judex means a magistrate deciding a cause. By a constitution published A.D. 294, Diocletian directed all magistrates in the provinces to decide causes themselves. The practice was, in course of time, extended throughout the whole of the empire; and in the days of Justinian it was possible to speak of the ordinaria judicia as quite obsolete.*

110. In the days of the later emperors, the provinces were classed together into præfectures. Over each province Judges. was a præses, who had a vicarius, or vice-president, under him, and who, either himself or by his vicarius, tried all cases above a certain amount, fixed by Justinian at 300 solidi; cases below that amount were tried by inferior judges, called judices pedanei, or by the defensores of provincial towns. The great cities, such as Constantinople and Alexandria, were under a separate jurisdiction. The prætorian præfect was the head judge of appeal.

111. Under the system of extraordinaria judicia, an action was begun by the plaintiff announcing to a magistrate Mode of procedure. that he wished to bring an action, and furnishing a short statement of his case. No written statement was necessary, but one was often made, and then this statement, called the libellus conventionis, was sent by a bailiff of the court (viator, executor) to the defendant. The parties or their procurators appeared before the magistrate, and the magistrate decided the case. Exceptio was still used as the term to express the plea of the defendant, which he often, but not necessarily, reduced to writing. There was no marked stage in the proceedings, like the conclusion of the proceedings in jure under the formulary system, to show when the action had really begun. But the beginning of the action, to describe which the term litis contestatio was still used, was said to take place when the magistrate had heard the plaintiff open his case, at the time when, all preliminaries having been gone through, the real hearing began. The condemnation was no longer merely a pecuniary one, and the judge gave sentence for the thing asked for, and not for its equivalent. Constantine had abolished imprisonment for debt unless the debtor could pay, but would not. But already, before the system of extraordinaria judicia began, in the time of Antoninus Pius, the simple process of levying executions on so much of the debtor's property as was requisite had been introduced.

* Inst. iv. 15. 8.

So many of the rules of Roman law relating to evidence which are known to us, date from the period in which the extraordinaria judicia prevailed, that it may be convenient to give here a brief statement of what the chief of these rules were. Written evidence was not, as a rule, necessary, but when existing was alone admissible, unless the writing was lost. Two witnesses were necessary to prove a fact, and among those who could be witnesses great consideration was paid to the relative character and position of witnesses. But many persons could not be witnesses, such as persons below the age of puberty, criminals, women guilty of adultery, and, under Justinian, Pagans, and some heretics. Slaves could only be admitted to complete other testimony. The parties to the suit and their near relations were excluded. The burden of proof rested, as a rule, on him who would fail if no evidence was given, and therefore on him who affirms, not on him who denies. Legal presumptions (presumptiones juris) were recognised, such as that a formal transaction like emancipation has been properly carried through. Witnesses were made to appear by summons from the judge, and were put on their oath. The torture of slaves, even in civil cases, if they were supposed to be keeping back material evidence, was a very ancient practice, and appears to have but one was often made, and then this statement, called the libellus conventionis, was sent by a bailiff of the court (viator, executor) to the defendant. The parties or their procurators appeared before the magistrate, and the magistrate decided the case. Exceptio was still used as the term to express the plea of the defendant, which he often, but not necessarily, reduced to writing. There was no marked stage in the proceedings, like the conclusion of the proceedings in jure under the formulary system, to show when the action had really begun. But the beginning of the action, to describe which the term litis contestatio was still used, was said to take place when the magistrate had heard the plaintiff open his case, at the time when, all preliminaries having been gone through, the real hearing began. The condemnation was no longer merely a pecuniary one, and the judge gave sentence for the thing asked for, and not for its equivalent. Constantine had abolished imprisonment for debt unless the debtor could pay, but would not. But already, before the system of extraordinaria judicia began, in the time of Antoninus Pius, the simple process of levying executions on so much of the debtor's property as was requisite had been introduced.

So many of the rules of Roman law relating to evidence which are known to us, date from the period in which Evidence. the extraordinaria judicia prevailed, that it may be convenient to give here a brief statement of what the chief of these rules were. Written evidence was not, as a rule, necessary, but when existing was alone admissible, unless the writing was lost. Two witnesses were necessary to prove a fact, and among those who could be witnesses great consideration was paid to the relative character and position of witnesses. But many persons could not be witnesses, such as persons below the age of puberty, criminals, women guilty of adultery, and, under Justinian, Pagans, and some heretics. Slaves could only be admitted to complete other testimony. The parties to the suit and their near relations were excluded. The burden of proof rested, as a rule, on him who would fail if no evidence was given, and therefore on him who affirms, not on him who denies. Legal presumptions (presumptiones juris) were recognised, such as that a formal transaction like emancipation has been properly carried through. Witnesses were made to appear by summons from the judge, and were put on their oath. The torture of slaves, even in civil cases, if they were supposed to be keeping back material evidence, was a very ancient practice, and appears to have been recognised in the time of Justinian. Each of the parties was put on his oath that he was not bringing or defending the action except on grounds that he believed to be good, and in the last resort either party could, as it were, compromise the action by challenging the other to swear to the true state of the facts, and was then bound by what was so deposed. Justinian also enacted that the costs, according to a fixed scale, should be determined by the oath of the successful litigant; and the advocates of the parties had to take a preliminary oath that they would not pervert justice.*

112. Although the subject of crimes and criminal procedure does not fall properly within the scope of the Institutes, which is a treatise on Private Law, yet as the subject is slightly noticed at the end of the Institutes, and is connected with the general history of Roman law, it may be convenient to give some slight account of it here. Criminal jurisdiction was under the kings an attribute of the king himself, but there was an appeal in capital cases to the comitia curiata. After the establishment of the republic the comitia centuriata alone could judge capital cases. The comitia tributa exercised a criminal jurisdiction (but without the power of inflicting death) for political offences, such as those committed by a magistrate during his year of office. Before both these comitia the accusation had to be made by the presiding magistrate. The senate also exercised a special power of judging offenders in times of public danger, and sometimes under such circumstances inflicted death as punishment, but it did not properly belong to the senate to deal with capital cases, and the senate also exercised an ordinary jurisdiction and dealt with such crimes as it thought proper to notice. But all these authorities, the king, the comitia, and the senate, while they sometimes discharged themselves the functions of the judge, were in the habit of delegating their powers to others charged to make an investigation (questio) of the crime. At first each delegatio was made to try one particular offence, and when the case had been tried the questio was at an end. These questiones, the term being transferred from the inquiry to the persons making it, were subsequently appointed to try all offences of a particular kind that it might be necessary to inquire into, while the delegated persons held their authority. Lastly, the questiones began to be made perpetue, the first of these being probably the questio pecunie repetundarum.

been recognised in the time of Justinian. Each of the parties was put on his oath that he was not bringing or defending the action except on grounds that he believed to be good, and in the last resort either party could, as it were, compromise the action by challenging the other to swear to the true state of the facts, and was then bound by what was so deposed. Justinian also enacted that the costs, according to a fixed scale, should be determined by the oath of the successful litigant; and the advocates of the parties had to take a preliminary oath that they would not pervert justice.*

112. Although the subject of crimes and criminal procedure does not fall properly within the scope of the Institutes, which is a treatise on Private Law, yet as the subject is slightly noticed at the end of the Institutes, and is connected with the general history of Roman law, it may be convenient to give some slight account of it here. Criminal jurisdiction was under the kings an attribute of the king himself, but there was an appeal in capital cases to the comitia curiata. After the establishment of the republic the comitia centuriata alone could judge capital cases. The comitia tributa exercised a criminal jurisdiction (but without the power of inflicting death) for political offences, such as those committed by a magistrate during his year of office. Before both these comitia the accusation had to be made by the presiding magistrate. The senate also exercised a special power of judging offenders in times of public danger, and sometimes under such circumstances inflicted death as punishment, but it did not properly belong to the senate to deal with capital cases, and the senate also exercised an ordinary jurisdiction and dealt with such crimes as it thought proper to notice. But all these authorities, the king, the comitia, and the senate, while they sometimes discharged themselves the functions of the judge, were in the habit of delegating their powers to others charged to make an investigation (questio) of the crime. At first each delegatio was made to try one particular offence, and when the case had been tried the questio was at an end. These questiones, the term being transferred from the inquiry to the persons making it, were subsequently appointed to try all offences of a particular kind that it might be necessary to inquire into, while the delegated persons held their authority. Lastly, the questiones began to be made perpetue, the first of these being probably the questio pecunie repetundarum.

established by the lex Calpurnia (A.U.C. 605), and this change was accompanied by the introduction of something like a body of criminal law. When a questio was made perpetua, the crimes it was to try were in some degree defined, and the punishment prescribed; whereas previously, the body exercising criminal jurisdiction or its delegates had been bound by no rules of law as to the nature of the crime or its punishment, except that the comitia centuriata could alone inflict death. Each questio consisted of a number of judges varying according to the regulations laid down in the law creating it; sometimes of thirty-two, or of fifty, or of a hundred—the judges being appointed for a year and taken from the same list as that from which judges in civil suits were selected, so that the history of the contests between the senatorial and equestrian orders for the right of being judges already referred to (see sec. 12) applies to criminal and civil judges equally. Before the questiones perpetue any citizen might be an accuser. He had to swear that his charge was not false, and he had to prove the guilt of the accused—so that the system under which a criminal trial is regarded as a suit between parties was thus introduced into Roman law. Private persons had from an early time of Roman law recovered penalties in a civil action for delicts committed to their injury, and so, too, the criminal proceeding took the form of an action between the private person accusing and the accused. The judges were under the guidance of a president (preses), and each judge pronounced that he condemned, absolved, or that there was not proof either way, by dropping into an urn one of three tablets, bearing respectively the words condemno, absolvo, non liquet. If the accused was condemned, he received the precise punishment provided by the law creating the questio perpetua. During the last century of the republic, and in the early days of the empire, a great number of laws, each handing over a special head of offence to a questio perpetua, were passed, and thus something like a system of criminal law and criminal procedure was established. Under the empire, as time went on, exactly what happened in civil suits happened in criminal proceedings. The magistrates had exercised a power of dealing with some offences in a summary manner (extra ordinem), and the sphere of their authority was gradually enlarged until it superseded the questiones perpetue altogether, as the formulary system of actions was superseded by the extraordinary jurisdiction of the magistrate in civil suits.

established by the lex Calpurnia (A.U.C. 605), and this change was accompanied by the introduction of something like a body of criminal law. When a questio was made perpetua, the crimes it was to try were in some degree defined, and the punishment prescribed; whereas previously, the body exercising criminal jurisdiction or its delegates had been bound by no rules of law as to the nature of the crime or its punishment, except that the comitia centuriata could alone inflict death. Each questio consisted of a number of judges varying according to the regulations laid down in the law creating it; sometimes of thirty-two, or of fifty, or of a hundred—the judges being appointed for a year and taken from the same list as that from which judges in civil suits were selected, so that the history of the contests between the senatorial and equestrian orders for the right of being judges already referred to (see sec. 12) applies to criminal and civil judges equally. Before the questiones perpetue any citizen might be an accuser. He had to swear that his charge was not false, and he had to prove the guilt of the accused—so that the system under which a criminal trial is regarded as a suit between parties was thus introduced into Roman law. Private persons had from an early time of Roman law recovered penalties in a civil action for delicts committed to their injury, and so, too, the criminal proceeding took the form of an action between the private person accusing and the accused. The judges were under the guidance of a president (preses), and each judge pronounced that he condemned, absolved, or that there was not proof either way, by dropping into an urn one of three tablets, bearing respectively the words condemno, absolvo, non liquet. If the accused was condemned, he received the precise punishment provided by the law creating the questio perpetua. During the last century of the republic, and in the early days of the empire, a great number of laws, each handing over a special head of offence to a questio perpetua, were passed, and thus something like a system of criminal law and criminal procedure was established. Under the empire, as time went on, exactly what happened in civil suits happened in criminal proceedings. The magistrates had exercised a power of dealing with some offences in a summary manner (extra ordinem), and the sphere of their authority was gradually enlarged until it superseded the questiones perpetue altogether, as the formulary system of actions was superseded by the extraordinary jurisdiction of the magistrate in civil suits.

LIST OF THE CHIEF LAWS, EVENTS, ETC.,

REFERRED TO IN THIS WORK.

NOTE.—Most of the dates are merely approximate.

B.C.

Leges regia.

508 Lex Valeria.

493 Leges sacrae.

471 Lex Valeria Horatia.

450 The Twelve Tables.

444 Lex Canuleia.

341 Lex Genucia.

339 Lex Publilia.

326 Lex Postelia Papiria.

284 Lex Hortensia.

Lex Aquilia.

243 Lex Silia.

233 Lex Calpurnia.

196 Lex Atilia.

195 Lex Atinia.

193 Lex Cincia.

183 Lex Plautia.

182 Lex Furia (testamentaria).

180 Lex Aebutia.

168 Lex Voconia.

123 Lex Sempronia.

102 Lex Apuleia.

95 Lex Furia (de sponsu).

88 Lex Plantia.

81 Leges Corneliae.

66 Lex Pompeia (de edictis).

39 Lex Falcidia.

Lex Hostilia.

Lex Publilia (de sponsu).

B.C.

753-509 THE REGAL PERIOD.

Comitia curiata and the Senate the earliest legislative bodies.

Division of the people into clases and centuries; comitia centuriata.

Jus Papirianum.

509-30 THE REPUBLIC.

493 Recognition of tribunes of the plebs.

488 First meeting of comitia tributa.

Legis actiones.

366 A plebeian appointed consul.

303 Jus Flavianum.

284 Distinction between populus and plebs disappears.

246 Prætor peregrinus.

Jus Aelianum or tripertitum.

The formulary system.

Influence of Greek philosophy.

148 Questiones perpetuæ.

Quintus Mucius Scaevola.

Caius Aquilius Galla.

Servius Sulpicius.

LIST OF THE CHIEF LAWS, EVENTS, ETC.,

REFERRED TO IN THIS WORK.

NOTE.—Most of the dates are merely approximate.

B.C.

Leges regiae.

508 Lex Valeria.

493 Leges sacrae.

471 Lex Valeria Horatia.

450 The Twelve Tables.

444 Lex Canuleia.

341 Lex Genucia.

339 Lex Publilia.

326 Lex Postelia Papiria.

284 Lex Hortensia.

Lex Aquilia.

243 Lex Silia.

233 Lex Calpurnia.

196 Lex Atilia.

195 Lex Atinia.

193 Lex Cincia.

183 Lex Plautia.

182 Lex Furia (testamentaria).

180 Lex Aebutia.

168 Lex Voconia.

123 Lex Sempronia.

102 Lex Apuleia.

95 Lex Furia (de sponsu).

88 Lex Plautia.

81 Leges Corneliae.

66 Lex Pompeia (de edictis).

39 Lex Falcidia.

Lex Hostilia.

Lex Publilia (de sponsu).

B.C.

753-509 THE REGAL PERIOD.

Comitia curiata and the Senate the earliest legislative bodies.

Division of the people into clases and centuries; comitia centuriata.

Jus Papirianum.

509-30 THE REPUBLIC.

493 Recognition of tribunes of the plebs.

488 First meeting of comitia tributa.

Legis actiones.

366 A plebeian appointed consul.

303 Jus Flavianum.

284 Distinction between populus and plebs disappears.

246 Prætor peregrinus.

Jus Aelianum or tripertitum.

The formulary system.

Influence of Greek philosophy.

148 Questiones perpetuæ.

Quintus Mucius Scaevola.

Caius Aquilius Galla.

Servius Sulpicius.

B.C.

33 *Lex Scribonia.Leges Juliae.*Legal effect given to fideicommissa and codicils.

A.D.

4 *Lex Ælia Sentia.*8 *Lex Furia Caninia.*11 *Lex Junia Velleia.*16 *Sc. Libonianum.*19 *Lex Junia Norbana.*42 *Sc. Largianum.*45 *Lex Claudia.*46 *Sc. Macedonianum.Sc. Velleianum.*52 *Sc. Claudianum.*60 *Sc. Neronianum.*61 *Lex Petronia.*62 *Sc. Trebellianum.*73 Sc. Pegasianum.Beneficium divisionis (Rescript of Hadrian).158 Sc. Tertullianum.Addictio bonorum libertatis causa (Rescript of Marcus Aurelius).178 Sc. Orphitianum.

291 Women allowed to adopt.

339 Formal words no longer necessary for appointment of heirs.

470 Formal words no longer necessary in stipulations.

Lex Zenoniana (emphyteusis).

JUSTINIAN :—

✓ Change in law of adoption.

Changes in laws of succession.

Beneficium inventarii.✓ Abolition of Latini Juniani and de ditiis.✓ Beneficium ordinis.✓ Changes in law of peculium.✓ Donatio propter nuptias.✓ Repeal of lex Ælia Sentia, lex Furia Caninia, and sc. Claudianum.

B.C.

30 THE EMPIRE.

The jus respondendi conferred by Augustus (ut ex auctoritate ejus responderent).

Trebatius.

Antistius Labeo.

Ateius Capito.

Proculus.

Masurius Sabinus.

A.D.

117 *Edictum perpetuum.*Hadrian's rescript : quibus permisum est jura condere (GAI. i. 7).

Celsus.

Salvius Julianus.

Gaius.

Pomponius.

Papinian.

Paul.

Ulpian.

Modestinus.

212 Roman citizenship conferred upon the whole Empire.

296 Extraordinaria judicia become the regular mode of trial.306 Codex Gregorianus.

330 Seat of empire transferred to Constantinople.

365 *Codex Hermogenianus.*426 *Lex citationis.*438 Codex Theodosianus.

476 Fall of Western Empire.

JUSTINIAN :—

529 Codex vetus (not extant).Quinquaginta decisiones.

533 The Digest.

The Institutes.

534 Codex repetite prælectionis.

535-564 The Novels.

B.C.

33 *Lex Scribonia.Leges Juliae.*Legal effect given to fideicommissa and codicils.

A.D.

4 *Lex Ælia Sentia.*8 *Lex Furia Caninia.*11 *Lex Junia Velleia.*16 *Sc. Libonianum.*19 *Lex Junia Norbana.*42 *Sc. Largianum.*45 *Lex Claudia.*46 *Sc. Macedonianum.Sc. Velleianum.*52 *Sc. Claudianum.*60 *Sc. Neronianum.*61 *Lex Petronia.*62 *Sc. Trebellianum.*73 Sc. Pegasianum.Beneficium divisionis (Rescript of Hadrian).158 Sc. Tertullianum.Addictio bonorum libertatis causa (Rescript of Marcus Aurelius).178 Sc. Orphitianum.

291 Women allowed to adopt.

339 Formal words no longer necessary for appointment of heirs.

470 Formal words no longer necessary in stipulations.

Lex Zenoniana (emphyteusis).

JUSTINIAN :—

✓ Change in law of adoption.

Changes in laws of succession.

Beneficium inventarii.✓ Abolition of Latini Juniani and de-dictii.Beneficium ordinis.✓ Changes in law of peculium.Donatio propter nuptias.✓ Repeal of lex Ælia Sentia, lex Furia Caninia, and sc. Claudianum.

B.C.

30 THE EMPIRE.

The jus respondendi conferred by Augustus (ut ex auctoritate ejus responderent).

Trebatius.

Antistius Labeo.

Ateius Capito.

Proculus.

Masurius Sabinus.

A.D.

117 *Edictum perpetuum.*Hadrian's rescript : quibus permis-sum est jura condere (GAI. i. 7).

Celsus.

Salvius Julianus.

Gaius.

Pomponius.

Papinian.

Paul.

Ulpian.

Modestinus.

212 Roman citizenship conferred upon the whole Empire.

296 Extraordinaria judicia become the regular mode of trial.306 Codex Gregorianus.

330 Seat of empire transferred to Constantinople.

365 *Codex Hermogenianus.*426 *Lex citationis.*438 Codex Theodosianus.

476 Fall of Western Empire.

JUSTINIAN :—

529 Codex vetus (not extant).Quinquaginta decisiones.

533 The Digest.

The Institutes.

534 Codex repetita praelectionis.

535-564 The Novels.

INSTITUTIONUM JUSTINIANI

PROŒMIUM.

IN NOMINE DOMINI NOSTRI
JESU CHRISTI

IN THE NAME OF OUR LORD
JESUS CHRIST.

IMPERATOR CÆSAR FLAVIUS JUSTINIANUS ALAMANNICUS GOTHICUS FRANCIGUS GERMANICUS ANTICUS ALANICUS VANDALICUS AFRICANUS PIUS FELIX INCLYTUS VICTOR AC TRIUMPHATOR SEMPER AUGUSTUS CUPIDÆ LEGUM JUVENTUTI.

THE EMPEROR CÆSAR FLAVIUS JUSTINIANUS, VANQUISHER OF THE ALAMANI, GOTHs, FRANCs, GERMANs, ANTES, ALANI, VANDALS, AFRICANS, PIOUS, HAPPY, GLORIOUS, TRIUMPHANT CONQUEROR, EVER AUGUST, TO THE YOUTH DESIROUS OF STUDYING THE LAW, GREETING.

Imperatoriam majestatem non solum armis decoratam, sed etiam legibus oportet esse armatam, ut utrumque tempus et bellorum et pacis recte possit gubernari et princeps Romanus victor existat non solum in hostilibus prœliis, sed etiam per legitimos tramites calumniantium iniquitates expellens, et fiat tam juris religiosissimus quam victis hostibus triumphator.

The imperial majesty should be not only made glorious by arms, but also strengthened by laws, that, alike in time of peace and in time of war, the state may be well governed, and that the emperor may not only be victorious in the field of battle, but also may by every legal means repel the iniquities of men who abuse the laws, and may at once religiously uphold justice and triumph over his conquered enemies.

1. Quorum utramque viam cum summis vigiliis et summa providentia adnuente Deo perfecimus. Et bellicos quidem sudores nostros barbaricæ gentes sub iuga nostra deductæ cognoscunt et tam Africa quam aliæ innumerose provincie post tanta temporum spatia nostris victoriis a cælesti numine præstitis iterum dicioni Romanæ nostroque additæ imperio protestantur. Omnes vero populi legibus jam a nobis promulgatis vel compositis reguntur.

1. By our incessant labours and great care, with the blessing of God, we have attained this double end. The barbarian nations reduced under our yoke know our efforts in war; to which also Africa and very many other provinces bear witness, which, after so long an interval, have been restored to the dominion of Rome and our empire, by our victories gained through the favour of heaven. All nations moreover are governed by laws which we have already either promulgated or compiled.

2. Et cum sacratissimas constitutiones antea confusas in luculentam ereximus consonantiam, tunc nostram extendimus curam et ad immensa

2. When we had arranged and brought into perfect harmony the hitherto confused mass of imperial constitutions, we then extended our

INSTITUTIONUM JUSTINIANI

PROŒMIUM.

IN NOMINE DOMINI NOSTRI
JESU CHRISTI

IMPERATOR CÆSAR FLAVIUS JUSTINIANUS ALAMANNICUS GOTHICUS FRANCIGUS GERMANICUS ANTICUS ALANICUS VANDALICUS AFRICANUS PIUS FELIX INCLYTUS VICTOR AC TRIUMPHATOR SEMPER AUGUSTUS CUPIDÈ LEGUM JUVENTUTI.

IN THE NAME OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

THE EMPEROR CÆSAR FLAVIUS JUSTINIANUS, VANQUISHER OF THE ALAMANI, GOTHs, FRANCs, GERMANs, ANTES, ALANI, VANDALS, AFRICANS, PIOUS, HAPPY, GLORIOUS, TRIUMPHANT CONQUEROR, EVER AUGUST, TO THE YOUTH DESIROUS OF STUDYING THE LAW, GREETING.

Imperatoriam majestatem non solum armis decoratam, sed etiam legibus oportet esse armatam, ut utrumque tempus et bellorum et pacis recte possit gubernari et princeps Romanus victor existat non solum in hostilibus prœliis, sed etiam per legitimos tramites calumniantium iniquitates expellens, et fiat tam juris religiosissimus quam victis hostibus triumphator.

The imperial majesty should be not only made glorious by arms, but also strengthened by laws, that, alike in time of peace and in time of war, the state may be well governed, and that the emperor may not only be victorious in the field of battle, but also may by every legal means repel the iniquities of men who abuse the laws, and may at once religiously uphold justice and triumph over his conquered enemies.

1. Quorum utramque viam cum summis vigiliis et summa providentia adnuente Deo perfecimus. Et bellicos quidem sudores nostros barbaricæ gentes sub juga nostra deductæ cognoscunt et tam Africa quam aliæ innumerose provinciæ post tanta temporum spatia nostris victoriis a cælesti numine præstitis iterum dicioni Romanæ nostroque additæ imperio protestantur. Omnes vero populi legibus jam a nobis promulgatis vel compositis reguntur.

1. By our incessant labours and great care, with the blessing of God, we have attained this double end. The barbarian nations reduced under our yoke know our efforts in war; to which also Africa and very many other provinces bear witness, which, after so long an interval, have been restored to the dominion of Rome and our empire, by our victories gained through the favour of heaven. All nations moreover are governed by laws which we have already either promulgated or compiled.

2. Et cum sacratissimas constitutiones antea confusas in luculentam ereximus consonantiam, tunc nostram extendimus curam et ad immensa prudentiæ veteris volumina et opus desperatum, quasi per medium profundum euntes, cælesti favore jam adimplevimus.

2. When we had arranged and brought into perfect harmony the hitherto confused mass of imperial constitutions, we then extended our

3. Cumque hoc Deo propitio peractum est, Triboniano, viro magnifico, magistro et ex quæstore sacri palatii nostri, nec non Theophilo et Dorotheo, viris illustribus, antecessoribus, quorum omnium sollertiam et legum scientiam et circa nostras jussiones fidem jam ex multis rerum argumentis acceperimus, convocatis, specialiter mandavimus, ut nostra auctoritate nostrisque suasionibus component institutiones: ut liceat vobis prima legum cunabula non ab antiquis fabulis discere, sed ab imperiali splendore appetere, et tam aures quam animæ vestræ nihil inutile nihilque perperam positum, sed quod in ipsis rerum optinet argumentis, accipiant et quod in priore tempore vix post triennium inferioribus contingebat, ut tunc constitutiones imperatorias legerent, hoc vos a primordio ingrediamini, digni tanto honore tantaque reperti felicitate, ut et initium vobis et finis legum eruditionis a voce principali procedat.

4. Igitur post libros quinquaginta digestorum seu pandectarum, in quos omne jus antiquum collatum est (quos per eundem virum excelsum Tribonianum nec non ceteros viros illustres et facundissimos confecimus), in hos quattuor libros eadem institutiones partiiri jussimus, ut sint totius legitimæ scientiæ prima elementa.

5. Quibus breviter expositum est et quod antea optinebat, et quod postea desuetudine inumbratum ab imperiali remedio illuminatum est.

6. Quas ex omnibus antiquorum institutionibus et præcipue ex commentariis Gaii nostri tam institutionum quam rerum cottidianarum, aliisque multis commentariis compositas cum tres prædicti viri prudentes nobis optulerunt, et legimus et cognovimus et plenissimum nostrarum constitutionum robur eis accommodavimus.

care to the vast volumes of ancient law; and, sailing as it were across the mid ocean, have now completed, through the favour of heaven, a work that once seemed beyond hope.

3. When by the blessing of God this task was accomplished, we summoned the most eminent Tribonian, master and ex-quæstor of our palace, together with the illustrious Theophilus and Dorotheus, professors of law, all of whom have on many occasions proved to us their ability, legal knowledge, and obedience to our orders; and we have specially charged them to compose, under our authority and advice, Institutes, so that you may no more learn the first elements of law from old and erroneous sources, but apprehend them by the clear light of imperial wisdom; and that your minds and ears may receive nothing that is useless or misplaced, but only what obtains in actual practice. So that, whereas, formerly, the junior students could scarcely, after three years' study, read the imperial constitutions, you may now commence your studies by reading them, you who have been thought worthy of an honour and a happiness so great as that the first and last lessons in the knowledge of the law should issue for you from the mouth of the emperor.

4. When therefore, by the assistance of the same eminent person Tribonian and that of other illustrious and learned men, we had compiled the fifty books, called Digests or Pandects, in which is collected the whole ancient law, we directed that these Institutes should be divided into four books, which might serve as the first elements of the whole science of law.

5. In these books a brief exposition is given of the ancient laws, and of those also, which, overshadowed by disuse, have been again brought to light by our imperial authority.

6. These four books of Institutes thus compiled, from all the Institutes left us by the ancients, and chiefly from the commentaries of our Gaius, both in his Institutes, and in his work on daily affairs, and also from many other commentaries, were presented to us by the three learned men we have above named. We have read and examined them and have accorded to them all the force of our constitutions.

prudentiæ veteris volumina et opus desperatum, quasi per medium profundum euntes, cælesti favore jam adimplevimus.

3. Cumque hoc Deo propitio peractum est, Triboniano, viro magnifico, magistro et ex quæstore sacri palatii nostri, nec non Theophilo et Dorotheo, viris illustribus, antecessoribus, quorum omnium sollertiam et legum scientiam et circa nostras jussiones fidem jam ex multis rerum argumentis accepimus, convocatis, specialiter mandavimus, ut nostra auctoritate nostrisque suasionibus component institutiones: ut liceat vobis prima legum cunabula non ab antiquis fabulis discere, sed ab imperiali splendore appetere, et tam aures quam animæ vestræ nihil inutile nihilque perperam positum, sed quod in ipsis rerum optinet argumentis, accipiant et quod in priore tempore vix post triennium inferioribus contingebat, ut tunc constitutiones imperatorias legerent, hoc vos a primordio ingrediamini, digni tanto honore tantaque reperti felicitate, ut et initium vobis et finis legum eruditionis a voce principali procedat.

4. Igitur post libros quinquaginta digestorum seu pandectarum, in quos omne jus antiquum collatum est (quos per eundem virum excelsum Tribonianum nec non ceteros viros illustres et facundissimos confecimus), in hos quattuor libros eadem institutiones partiiri jussimus, ut sint totius legitimæ scientiæ prima elementa.

5. Quibus breviter expositum est et quod antea optinebat, et quod postea desuetudine inumbratum ab imperiali remedio illuminatum est.

6. Quas ex omnibus antiquorum institutionibus et præcipue ex commentariis Gaii nostri tam institutionum quam rerum cottidianarum, aliisque multis commentariis compositas cum tres prædicti viri prudentes nobis optulerunt, et legimus et cognovimus et plenissimum nostrarum constitutionum robur eis accommodavimus.

care to the vast volumes of ancient law; and, sailing as it were across the mid ocean, have now completed, through the favour of heaven, a work that once seemed beyond hope.

3. When by the blessing of God this task was accomplished, we summoned the most eminent Tribonian, master and ex-quæstor of our palace, together with the illustrious Theophilus and Dorotheus, professors of law, all of whom have on many occasions proved to us their ability, legal knowledge, and obedience to our orders; and we have specially charged them to compose, under our authority and advice, Institutes, so that you may no more learn the first elements of law from old and erroneous sources, but apprehend them by the clear light of imperial wisdom; and that your minds and ears may receive nothing that is useless or misplaced, but only what obtains in actual practice. So that, whereas, formerly, the junior students could scarcely, after three years' study, read the imperial constitutions, you may now commence your studies by reading them, you who have been thought worthy of an honour and a happiness so great as that the first and last lessons in the knowledge of the law should issue for you from the mouth of the emperor.

4. When therefore, by the assistance of the same eminent person Tribonian and that of other illustrious and learned men, we had compiled the fifty books, called Digests or Pandects, in which is collected the whole ancient law, we directed that these Institutes should be divided into four books, which might serve as the first elements of the whole science of law.

5. In these books a brief exposition is given of the ancient laws, and of those also, which, overshadowed by disuse, have been again brought to light by our imperial authority.

6. These four books of Institutes thus compiled, from all the Institutes left us by the ancients, and chiefly from the commentaries of our Gaius, both in his Institutes, and in his work on daily affairs, and also from many other commentaries, were presented to us by the three learned men we have above named. We have read and examined them and have accorded to them all the force of our constitutions.

7. Summa itaque ope et alacri studio has leges nostras accipite et vosmet ipsos sic eruditos ostendite, ut spes vos pulcherrima foveat, toto legitimo opere perfecto, posse etiam nostram rem publicam in partibus ejus vobis credendis gubernare.

Data undecimo kalendas Decem-bres Constantinopoli domino nostro Justiniano perpetuo Augusto tertium consule.

7. Receive, therefore, with eagerness, and study with cheerful diligence, these our laws, and show yourselves persons of such learning that you may conceive the flattering hope of yourselves being able, when your course of legal study is completed, to govern our empire in the different portions that may be entrusted to your care.

Given at Constantinople on the eleventh day of the calends of December, in the third consulate of the Emperor Justinian, ever August (533).

7. Summa itaque ope et alacri studio has leges nostras accipite et vosmet ipsos sic eruditos ostendite, ut spes vos pulcherrima foveat, toto legitimo opere perfecto, posse etiam nostram rem publicam in partibus ejus vobis credendis gubernare.

Data undecimo kalendas Decembris Constantinopoli domino nostro Justiniano perpetuo Augusto tertium consule.

7. Receive, therefore, with eagerness, and study with cheerful diligence, these our laws, and show yourselves persons of such learning that you may conceive the flattering hope of yourselves being able, when your course of legal study is completed, to govern our empire in the different portions that may be entrusted to your care.

Given at Constantinople on the eleventh day of the calends of December, in the third consulate of the Emperor Justinian, ever August (533).

LIBER PRIMUS.

TIT. I. DE JUSTITIA ET JURE.

JUSTITIA est constans et perpetua voluntas jus, suum cuique tribuens. Justice is the constant and perpetual wish to render every one his due.

D. i. 1. 10.

The term jus, in its most extended sense, was taken by the Roman jurists to include all the commands laid upon men that they are bound to fulfil, both the commands of morality and of law. The distinction between commands which are only enforced by the sanction of public or private opinion, and those enforced by positive legal sanctions, may seem clear to us; but the Roman jurists, in speaking of the elementary principles and divisions of jurisprudence, did not keep law and morality distinct. Celsus defines jus as ars boni et aequi. (D. i. 1. 1.) This extension of the term would sink positive law in morality; that only would be supposed to be commanded which ought to be commanded. The confusion arose principally from the view of the law of nature, borrowed from Greek philosophy by the jurists. (See Introd. sec. 14.)

Jus, used in its strictly legal sense, has two principal meanings. It either signifies law, that is, the whole mass of rights and duties protected and enforced by legal remedies, or it means any single right, that is, any faculty or privilege accorded by law to one man accompanied by a correlative duty imposed on another man. Jus itineris, for instance, is the right given to one man of going through the land of another who is placed under a duty to let him pass. Neither a right nor a duty, at any rate in the sphere of private law with which alone the Institutes deal, can exist without the other. (See Introd. sec. 36.)

1. Jurisprudentia est divinarum atque humanarum rerum notitia, justī atque injustī scientia.

1. Jurisprudence is the knowledge of things divine and human; the science of the just and the unjust.

D. i. 1. 10. 2.

LIBER PRIMUS.

TIT. I. DE JUSTITIA ET JURE.

JUSTITIA est constans et perpetua voluntas jus, suum cuique tribuens. Justice is the constant and perpetual wish to render every one his due.

D. i. 1. 10.

The term jus, in its most extended sense, was taken by the Roman jurists to include all the commands laid upon men that they are bound to fulfil, both the commands of morality and of law. The distinction between commands which are only enforced by the sanction of public or private opinion, and those enforced by positive legal sanctions, may seem clear to us; but the Roman jurists, in speaking of the elementary principles and divisions of jurisprudence, did not keep law and morality distinct. Celsus defines jus as ars boni et aequi. (D. i. 1. 1.) This extension of the term would sink positive law in morality; that only would be supposed to be commanded which ought to be commanded. The confusion arose principally from the view of the law of nature, borrowed from Greek philosophy by the jurists. (See Introd. sec. 14.)

Jus, used in its strictly legal sense, has two principal meanings. It either signifies law, that is, the whole mass of rights and duties protected and enforced by legal remedies, or it means any single right, that is, any faculty or privilege accorded by law to one man accompanied by a correlative duty imposed on another man. Jus itineris, for instance, is the right given to one man of going through the land of another who is placed under a duty to let him pass. Neither a right nor a duty, at any rate in the sphere of private law with which alone the Institutes deal, can exist without the other. (See Introd. sec. 36.)

1. Jurisprudentia est divinarum atque humanarum rerum notitia, justī atque injustī scientia.

1. Jurisprudence is the knowledge of things divine and human; the science of the just and the unjust.

D. i. 1. 10. 2.

Jurisprudentia is the knowledge of what is jus, and jus, according to the theory of the law of nature, laid down what is commanded by right reason, this right reason being common to the divine scheme of things and to man. On this ground, and also because public law has to deal with religious worship, the knowledge of divine things was necessary, as well as the knowledge of human things, to say what were the contents of jus. Both this and the preceding definition are taken at random out of the writings of Ulpian. (See Introd. sec. 34.)

2. His generaliter cognitis et incipientibus nobis exponere jura populi Romani ita maxime videntur posse tradi commodissime, si primo levi ac simplici, post deinde diligentissima atque exactissima interpretatione singula tradantur. Alioquin si statim ab initio rudem adhuc et infirmum animum studiosi multitudine ac varietate rerum oneraverimus, duorum alterum aut desertorem studiorum efficiemus aut cum magno labore ejus, sæpe etiam cum diffidentia, quæ plerumque juvenes avertit, serius ad id perducemus, ad quod leniore via ductus sine magno labore et sine ulla diffidentia maturius perducere potuisset.

3. Juris præcepta sunt hæc: honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere.

4. Hujus studii duæ sunt positiones, publicum et privatum. Publicum jus est, quod ad statum rei Romanæ spectat, privatum, quod ad singulorum utilitatem pertinet. Dicendum est igitur de jure privato, quod tripartitum est; collectum est enim ex naturalibus præceptis aut gentium aut civilibus.

2. Having explained these general terms, we think we shall commence our exposition of the law of the Roman people most advantageously, if our explanation is at first plain and easy, and is then carried on into details with the utmost care and exactness. For, if at the outset we overload the mind of the student, while yet new to the subject and unable to bear much, with a multitude and variety of topics, one of two things will happen—we shall either cause him wholly to abandon his studies, or, after great toil, and often after great distrust of himself (the most frequent stumbling-block in the way of youth), we shall at last conduct him to the point, to which, if he had been led by a smoother road, he might, without great labour, and without any distrust of his own powers, have been sooner conducted.

3. The maxims of law are these: to live honestly, to hurt no one, to give every one his due.

4. The study of law is divided into two branches; that of public and that of private law. Public law is that which regards the government of the Roman Empire; private law, that which concerns the interests of individuals. We are now to treat of the latter, which is composed of three elements, and consists of precepts belonging to natural law, to the law of nations, and to the civil law.

D. i. 1. 1. 2.

Both the jus publicum and the jus privatum fall under municipal law, that is, the law of a particular state. Publicum jus in sacris, in sacerdotibus, in magistratibus consistit. (D. i. 1. 1. 2.) Public law regulates religious worship and civil administration; private law determines the rights and duties of individuals. The threefold division of private law given in the text is discussed in the next section.

Jurisprudentia is the knowledge of what is jus, and jus, according to the theory of the law of nature, laid down what is commanded by right reason, this right reason being common to the divine scheme of things and to man. On this ground, and also because public law has to deal with religious worship, the knowledge of divine things was necessary, as well as the knowledge of human things, to say what were the contents of jus. Both this and the preceding definition are taken at random out of the writings of Ulpian. (See Introd. sec. 34.)

2. His generaliter cognitis et incipientibus nobis exponere jura populi Romani ita maxime videntur posse tradi commodissime, si primo levi ac simplici, post deinde diligentissima atque exactissima interpretatione singula tradantur. Alioquin si statim ab initio rudem adhuc et infirmum animum studiosi multitudine ac varietate rerum oneraverimus, duorum alterum aut desertorem studiorum efficiemus aut cum magno labore ejus, sæpe etiam cum diffidentia, quæ plerumque juvenes avertit, serius ad id perducemus, ad quod leniore via ductus sine magno labore et sine ulla diffidentia maturius perducere potuisset.

3. Juris præcepta sunt hæc: honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere.

4. Hujus studii duæ sunt positiones, publicum et privatum. Publicum jus est, quod ad statum rei Romanæ spectat, privatum, quod ad singulorum utilitatem pertinet. Dicendum est igitur de jure privato, quod tripartitum est; collectum est enim ex naturalibus præceptis aut gentium aut civilibus.

2. Having explained these general terms, we think we shall commence our exposition of the law of the Roman people most advantageously, if our explanation is at first plain and easy, and is then carried on into details with the utmost care and exactness. For, if at the outset we overload the mind of the student, while yet new to the subject and unable to bear much, with a multitude and variety of topics, one of two things will happen—we shall either cause him wholly to abandon his studies, or, after great toil, and often after great distrust of himself (the most frequent stumbling-block in the way of youth), we shall at last conduct him to the point, to which, if he had been led by a smoother road, he might, without great labour, and without any distrust of his own powers, have been sooner conducted.

3. The maxims of law are these: to live honestly, to hurt no one, to give every one his due.

4. The study of law is divided into two branches; that of public and that of private law. Public law is that which regards the government of the Roman Empire; private law, that which concerns the interests of individuals. We are now to treat of the latter, which is composed of three elements, and consists of precepts belonging to natural law, to the law of nations, and to the civil law.

D. i. 1. 1. 2.

Both the jus publicum and the jus privatum fall under municipal law, that is, the law of a particular state. Publicum jus in sacris, in sacerdotibus, in magistratibus consistit. (D. i. 1. 1. 2.) Public law regulates religious worship and civil administration; private law determines the rights and duties of individuals. The threefold division of private law given in the text is discussed in the next section.

TIT. II. DE JURE NATURALI, GENTIUM ET CIVILI.

Jus naturale est, quod natura omnia animalia docuit. Nam jus istud non humani generis proprium est, sed omnium animalium, quæ in cælo, quæ in terra, quæ in mari nascuntur. Hinc descendit maris atque feminae conjugatio, quam nos matrimonium appellamus, hinc liberorum procreatio et educatio: videmus etenim cetera quoque animalia istius juris peritia censeri.

The law of nature is that law which nature teaches to all animals. For this law does not belong exclusively to the human race, but belongs to all animals, whether of the air, the earth, or the sea. Hence comes that yoking together of male and female, which we term matrimony; hence the procreation and bringing up of children. We see, indeed, that all the other animals besides man are considered as having knowledge of this law.

D. i. 1. 1. 3.

In the Introduction (sec. 14) a sketch has been given of what the jurists meant by the lex naturæ. It was the expression of right reason inherent in nature and man, and having a binding force as a law. It was contrasted with the jus civile, the old strict law of Rome (Intro. sec. 10), and also with the jus gentium, the sum, that is, of the law found to obtain in other nations besides the Romans, as well as in Roman law. (Intro. sec. 12.) There thus arose the threefold division of law adopted in the last paragraph of the last title; but the jus gentium and the jus naturale were often placed in the same head of division, for the law common to all nations was but the embodiment and indication of what right reason was supposed to command to all men. Thus while the threefold division of law was adopted by some jurists, a twofold division was adopted by others, and is adopted in the next and the eleventh paragraphs of this title, Justinian first borrowing from Ulpian, who adopted the threefold division, and then from Gaius, who adopted the twofold.

Unfortunately, in order to give a notion of jus naturale, Justinian has borrowed a passage from Ulpian, in which that jurist runs off into a subsidiary and divergent line of thought. It is easy to see that if we begin to make inherent reason the foundation of law, we may find it necessary to take into account the community of actions which, in some of the primary features of physical life, reason or instinct suggests to man and animals. If jus is that which nature commands, nature may be said to command the propagation of the species in animals as much as in man, and thus there would be a jus common to animals and to men. A jurist, to whom the theory of the lex naturæ was familiar, might easily pursue the subject to a point in which men and animals seemed to meet. But the main theory had nothing to do with animals, as it looked only to the reason inherent in the universe and in man, and in considering what the Roman jurists meant by jus naturale this fragment of Ulpian may be dismissed almost entirely from our notice.

TIT. II. DE JURE NATURALI, GENTIUM ET CIVILI.

Jus naturale est, quod natura omnia animalia docuit. Nam jus istud non humani generis proprium est, sed omnium animalium, quæ in cælo, quæ in terra, quæ in mari nascuntur. Hinc descendit maris atque feminae conjugatio, quam nos matrimonium appellamus, hinc liberorum procreatio et educatio: videmus etenim cetera quoque animalia istius juris peritia censeri.

The law of nature is that law which nature teaches to all animals. For this law does not belong exclusively to the human race, but belongs to all animals, whether of the air, the earth, or the sea. Hence comes that yoking together of male and female, which we term matrimony; hence the procreation and bringing up of children. We see, indeed, that all the other animals besides man are considered as having knowledge of this law.

D. i. 1. 1. 3.

In the Introduction (sec. 14) a sketch has been given of what the jurists meant by the lex naturæ. It was the expression of right reason inherent in nature and man, and having a binding force as a law. It was contrasted with the jus civile, the old strict law of Rome (Introd. sec. 10), and also with the jus gentium, the sum, that is, of the law found to obtain in other nations besides the Romans, as well as in Roman law. (Introd. sec. 12.) There thus arose the threefold division of law adopted in the last paragraph of the last title; but the jus gentium and the jus naturale were often placed in the same head of division, for the law common to all nations was but the embodiment and indication of what right reason was supposed to command to all men. Thus while the threefold division of law was adopted by some jurists, a twofold division was adopted by others, and is adopted in the next and the eleventh paragraphs of this title, Justinian first borrowing from Ulpian, who adopted the threefold division, and then from Gaius, who adopted the twofold.

Unfortunately, in order to give a notion of jus naturale, Justinian has borrowed a passage from Ulpian, in which that jurist runs off into a subsidiary and divergent line of thought. It is easy to see that if we begin to make inherent reason the foundation of law, we may find it necessary to take into account the community of actions which, in some of the primary features of physical life, reason or instinct suggests to man and animals. If jus is that which nature commands, nature may be said to command the propagation of the species in animals as much as in man, and thus there would be a jus common to animals and to men. A jurist, to whom the theory of the lex naturæ was familiar, might easily pursue the subject to a point in which men and animals seemed to meet. But the main theory had nothing to do with animals, as it looked only to the reason inherent in the universe and in man, and in considering what the Roman jurists meant by jus naturale this fragment of Ulpian may be dismissed almost entirely from our notice.

1. Jus autem civile vel gentium ita dividitur: omnes populi, qui legibus et moribus reguntur, partim suo proprio, partim communi omnium hominum jure utuntur: nam quod quisque populus ipse sibi jus constituit, id ipsius proprium civitatis est vocaturque jus civile, quasi jus proprium ipsius civitatis: quod vero naturalis ratio inter omnes homines constituit, id apud omnes populos peræque custoditur vocaturque jus gentium, quasi quo jure omnes gentes utuntur. Et populus itaque Romanus partim suo proprio, partim communi omnium hominum jure utitur. Quæ singula qualia sunt, suis locis proponemus.

1. Civil law is thus distinguished from the law of nations. Every community governed by laws and customs uses partly its own law, partly laws common to all mankind. The law which a people makes for its own government belongs exclusively to that state, and is called the civil law, as being the law of the particular state. But the law which natural reason appoints for all mankind obtains equally among all nations, and is called the law of nations, because all nations make use of it. The people of Rome, then, are governed partly by their own laws, and partly by the laws which are common to all mankind. What is the nature of these two component parts of our law we will set forth in the proper place.

GAI. I. 1.

2. Sed jus quidem civile ex unaquaque civitate appellatur, veluti Atheniensium: nam si quis velit Solonis vel Draconis leges appellare jus civile Atheniensium, non erraverit. Sic enim et jus, quo populus Romanus utitur, jus civile Romanorum appellamus vel jus Quiritium, quo Quirites utuntur; Romani enim a Quirino Quirites appellantur. Sed quotiens non addimus, cujus sit civitatis, nostrum jus significamus: sicuti cum poetam dicimus nec addimus nomen, subauditur apud Græcos egregius Homerus, apud nos Vergilius. Jus autem gentium omni humano generi commune est. Nam usu exigente et humanis necessitatibus gentes humanæ quædam sibi constituerunt: bella etenim orta sunt et captivitates secutæ et servitutes, quæ sunt juri naturali contrariæ (jure enim naturali ab initio omnes homines liberi nascebantur); ex hoc jure gentium et omnes pæne contractus introducti sunt, ut emptio venditio, locatio conductio, societas, depositum, mutuum et alii innumerabiles.

2. Civil law takes its name from the state which it governs, as, for instance, from Athens; for it would be very proper to speak of the laws of Solon or Draco as the civil law of Athens. And thus the law which the Roman people make use of is called the civil law of the Romans, or that of the Quirites, as being used by the Quirites; for the Romans are called Quirites from Quirinus. But whenever we speak of civil law, without adding of what state we are speaking, we mean our own law: just as when 'the poet' is spoken of without any name being expressed, the Greeks mean the great Homer, and we Romans mean Virgil. The law of nations is common to all mankind, for nations have established certain laws, as occasion and the necessities of human life required. Wars arose, and in their train followed captivity and then slavery, which is contrary to the law of nature; for by that law all men are originally born free. Further, from this law of nations almost all contracts were at first introduced, as, for instance, buying and selling, letting and hiring, partnership, deposits, loans returnable in kind, and very many others.

D. I. 4. 5.

The term jus civile, as used here, entirely depends for its meaning on the contrast between it and the jus gentium. When the jurists came to examine different systems of laws, they found much in each that was common to all. This common part they termed the jus gentium; and the residue, the part peculiar to each state, they called jus civile. The contracts of sale, hiring, and the others mentioned in the text, were, they found, carried

1. Jus autem civile vel gentium ita dividitur: omnes populi, qui legibus et moribus reguntur, partim suo proprio, partim communi omnium hominum jure utuntur: nam quod quisque populus ipse sibi jus constituit, id ipsius proprium civitatis est vocaturque jus civile, quasi jus proprium ipsius civitatis: quod vero naturalis ratio inter omnes homines constituit, id apud omnes populos peræque custoditur vocaturque jus gentium, quasi quo jure omnes gentes utuntur. Et populus itaque Romanus partim suo proprio, partim communi omnium hominum jure utitur. Quæ singula qualia sunt, suis locis proponemus.

1. Civil law is thus distinguished from the law of nations. Every community governed by laws and customs uses partly its own law, partly laws common to all mankind. The law which a people makes for its own government belongs exclusively to that state, and is called the civil law, as being the law of the particular state. But the law which natural reason appoints for all mankind obtains equally among all nations, and is called the law of nations, because all nations make use of it. The people of Rome, then, are governed partly by their own laws, and partly by the laws which are common to all mankind. What is the nature of these two component parts of our law we will set forth in the proper place.

GAI. I. 1.

2. Sed jus quidem civile ex unaquaque civitate appellatur, veluti Atheniensium: nam si quis velit Solonis vel Draconis leges appellare jus civile Atheniensium, non erraverit. Sic enim et jus, quo populus Romanus utitur, jus civile Romanorum appellamus vel jus Quiritium, quo Quirites utuntur; Romani enim a Quirino Quirites appellantur. Sed quotiens non addimus, cujus sit civitatis, nostrum jus significamus: sicuti cum poetam dicimus nec addimus nomen, subauditur apud Græcos egregius Homerus, apud nos Vergilius. Jus autem gentium omni humano generi commune est. Nam usu exigente et humanis necessitatibus gentes humanæ quædam sibi constituerunt: bella etenim orta sunt et captivitates secutæ et servitutes, quæ sunt juri naturali contrariæ (jure enim naturali ab initio omnes homines liberi nascebantur); ex hoc jure gentium et omnes pæne contractus introducti sunt, ut emptio venditio, locatio conductio, societas, depositum, mutuum et alii innumerabiles.

2. Civil law takes its name from the state which it governs, as, for instance, from Athens; for it would be very proper to speak of the laws of Solon or Draco as the civil law of Athens. And thus the law which the Roman people make use of is called the civil law of the Romans, or that of the Quirites, as being used by the Quirites; for the Romans are called Quirites from Quirinus. But whenever we speak of civil law, without adding of what state we are speaking, we mean our own law: just as when 'the poet' is spoken of without any name being expressed, the Greeks mean the great Homer, and we Romans mean Virgil. The law of nations, is common to all mankind, for nations have established certain laws, as occasion and the necessities of human life required. Wars arose, and in their train followed captivity and then slavery, which is contrary to the law of nature; for by that law all men are originally born free. Further, from this law of nations almost all contracts were at first introduced, as, for instance, buying and selling, letting and hiring, partnership, deposits, loans returnable in kind, and very many others.

D. I. 4. 5.

The term jus civile, as used here, entirely depends for its meaning on the contrast between it and the jus gentium. When the jurists came to examine different systems of laws, they found much in each that was common to all. This common part they termed the jus gentium; and the residue, the part peculiar to each state, they called jus civile. The contracts of sale, hiring, and the others mentioned in the text, were, they found, carried on much in the same way in every country, and they therefore assigned them to the head of jus gentium, and contrasted them with forms of contract which were peculiar to the old Roman law, and were therefore considered part of the jus civile. In the usual sense of jus civile, in which it means the old law of Rome prior to the jus honorarium (see Introd. sec. 10), these contracts were part of the jus civile, that is, they were part of, and were recognised by, the old law, but they were also part of the general law of nations, and no forms peculiar to Roman law were necessary for their creation.

3. Constat autem jus nostrum aut ex scripto aut ex non scripto, ut apud Græcos: τῶν νόμων οἱ μὲν ἔγγραφοι, οἱ δὲ ἄγραφοι. Scriptum jus est lex, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, principum placita, magistratum edicta, responsa prudentium.

4. Lex est, quod populus Romanus senatorio magistratu interrogante, veluti consule, constituebat. Plebiscitum est, quod plebs plebeio magistratu interrogante, veluti tribuno, constituebat. Plebs autem a populo eo differt, quo species a genere: nam appellatione populi universi cives significantur, connumeratis etiam patriciis et senatoribus: plebis autem appellatione sine patriciis et senatoribus ceteri cives significantur. Sed et plebiscita, lege Hortensia lata, non minus valere quam leges coeperunt.

3. Our law is written and unwritten, just as among the Greeks some of their laws were written and others not written. The written part consists of laws, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, enactments of emperors, edicts of magistrates, and answers of jurists.

4. A law is that which was enacted by the Roman people on its being proposed by a senatorial magistrate, as a consul. A plebiscitum is that which was enacted by the plebs on its being proposed by a plebeian magistrate, as a tribune. The plebs differs from the people as a species from its genus; for all the citizens, including patricians and senators, are comprehended in the people; but the plebs only includes citizens, not being patricians or senators. But plebiscita, after the Hortensian law had been passed, began to have the same force as laws.

GAI. i. 3.

A lex or populi scitum, to use a word made by the commentators on the analogy of plebiscitum, was passed originally only in the comitia curiata; after the establishment of the comitia centuriata in both these comitia; but, excepting in the case of conferring the imperium, almost always in the centuriata. (See Introd. sec. 5, 15.)

The lex Hortensia, 467 A.U.C., had been preceded by the lex Valeria Horatia, 304 A.U.C., and the lex Publilia, 414 A.U.C., by both of which it was provided that plebiscita should bind the whole people. Either the effect of their provisions had been disputed, or exceptions had been made to them, or perhaps the extension of the authority of the plebiscitum which they gave was not so complete as their terms would seem to imply. (Nieb. ii. 366.) The term lex is very frequently applied to plebiscita as well as to populi scita. (See Introd. sec. 9.)

5. Senatusconsultum est, quod senatus jubet atque constituit. Nam auctus est populus Romanus in eum modum, ut difficile sit in on much in the same way in every country, and they therefore assigned them to the head of jus gentium, and contrasted them with forms of contract which were peculiar to the old Roman law, and were therefore considered part of the jus civile. In the usual sense of jus civile, in which it means the old law of Rome prior to the jus honorarium (see Introd. sec. 10), these contracts were part of the jus civile, that is, they were part of, and were recognised by, the old law, but they were also part of the general law of nations, and no forms peculiar to Roman law were necessary for their creation.

5. A senatus-consultum is that which the senate commands and appoints: for, when the Roman people was so increased that it was difficult to

3. Constat autem jus nostrum aut ex scripto aut ex non scripto, ut apud Græcos: τῶν νόμων οἱ μὲν ἔγγραφοι, οἱ δὲ ἄγραφοι. Scriptum jus est lex, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, principum placita, magistratum edicta, responsa prudentium.

4. Lex est, quod populus Romanus senatorio magistratu interrogante, veluti consule, constituebat. Plebiscitum est, quod plebs plebeio magistratu interrogante, veluti tribuno, constituebat. Plebs autem a populo eo differt, quo species a genere: nam appellatione populi universi cives significantur, connumeratis etiam patriciis et senatoribus: plebs autem appellatione sine patriciis et senatoribus ceteri cives significantur. Sed et plebiscita, lege Hortensia lata, non minus valere quam leges coeperunt.

3. Our law is written and unwritten, just as among the Greeks some of their laws were written and others not written. The written part consists of laws, plebiscita, senatusconsulta, enactments of emperors, edicts of magistrates, and answers of jurists.

4. A law is that which was enacted by the Roman people on its being proposed by a senatorial magistrate, as a consul. A plebiscitum is that which was enacted by the plebs on its being proposed by a plebeian magistrate, as a tribune. The plebs differs from the people as a species from its genus; for all the citizens, including patricians and senators, are comprehended in the people; but the plebs only includes citizens, not being patricians or senators. But plebiscita, after the Hortensian law had been passed, began to have the same force as laws.

GAL. i. 3.

A lex or populi scitum, to use a word made by the commentators on the analogy of plebiscitum, was passed originally only in the comitia curiata; after the establishment of the comitia centuriata in both these comitia; but, excepting in the case of conferring the imperium, almost always in the centuriata. (See Introd. sec. 5, 15.)

The lex Hortensia, 467 A.U.C., had been preceded by the lex Valeria Horatia, 304 A.U.C., and the lex Publilia, 414 A.U.C., by both of which it was provided that plebiscita should bind the whole people. Either the effect of their provisions had been disputed, or exceptions had been made to them, or perhaps the extension of the authority of the plebiscitum which they gave was not so complete as their terms would seem to imply. (Nieb. ii. 366.) The term lex is very frequently applied to plebiscita as well as to populi scita. (See Introd. sec. 9.)

5. Senatusconsultum est, quod senatus jubet atque constituit. Nam cum auctus est populus Romanus in eum modum, ut difficile sit in

5. A senatus-consultum is that which the senate commands and appoints: for, when the Roman people was so increased that it was difficult to assemble it together to pass laws, it seemed right that the senate should be consulted in the place of the people.

unum eum convocari legis sancierendæ causa, æquum visum est senatum vice populi consuli.

GAL. i. 4; D. i. 2. 2. 9.

Senatus-consulta had in some instances the force of a law even in the times of the republic, for we have a few preserved of a date antecedent to the Cæsars, which undoubtedly had the force of law; but they all relate to matters of social administration, such as forbidding burial within the city, or the importation of wild beasts. (See Introd. sec. 15.) But we cannot speak of senatus-consulta as a substantial part of the general legislation till the times of the emperors, when they superseded every other except the emperor's enactments. The appeal of the emperor to their authority dwindled down into a mere form. (Cod. i. 14. 12. 1, in presenti leges condere soli imperatori concessum est.)

6. Sed et quod principi placuit, legis habet vigorem, cum lege regia, quæ de imperio ejus lata est, populus ei et in eum omne suum imperium et potestatem concessit. Quodecumque igitur imperator per epistolam constituit vel cognoscens decrevit vel edicto præcepit, legem esse constat: hæ sunt, quæ constitutiones appellantur. Plane ex his quædam sunt personales, quæ nec ad exemplum trahuntur, quoniam non hoc princeps vult: nam quod alicui ob merita indulset, vel si cui pœnam irrogavit, vel si cui sine exemplo subvenit, personam non egreditur. Aliæ autem, cum generales sunt, omnes procul dubio tenent.

6. That which seems good to the emperor has also the force of law; for the people, by the lex regia, which is passed to confer on him his power, make over to him their whole power and authority. Therefore whatever the emperor ordains by rescript, or decides in adjudging a cause, or lays down by edict, is unquestionably law; and it is these enactments of the emperor that are called constitutions. Of these, some are personal, and are not to be drawn into precedent, such not being the intention of the emperor. Supposing the emperor has granted a favour to any man on account of his merits, or inflicted some punishment, or granted some extraordinary relief, the application of these acts does not extend beyond the particular individual. But the other constitutions, being general, are undoubtedly binding on all.

GAL. i. 5; D. i. 4. 1.

The imperial constitutions, though known in the time of the previous emperors, first attained, under Hadrian, the position of being in reality the only source of law. They were of three kinds: first, epistolæ, letters or answers to letters addressed by the emperor to different individuals or public bodies, or mandata, orders given to particular officers, and rescripta, answers given by the emperor to magistrates who requested his assistance in the decision of doubtful points (Bk. i. Tit. 8. 2); secondly, judicial sentences, decreta, given by the emperors (Bk. ii. Tit. 15. 4); both these kinds having force only by serving as a precedent in similar cases; and thirdly, edicta, or laws binding generally on all the subjects of the emperor. (See Introd. sec. 16.)

unum eum convocari legis sancierendæ causa, æquum visum est senatum vice populi consuli.

assemble it together to pass laws, it seemed right that the senate should be consulted in the place of the people.

GAL. i. 4; D. i. 2. 2. 9.

Senatus-consulta had in some instances the force of a law even in the times of the republic, for we have a few preserved of a date antecedent to the Cæsars, which undoubtedly had the force of law; but they all relate to matters of social administration, such as forbidding burial within the city, or the importation of wild beasts. (See Introd. sec. 15.) But we cannot speak of senatus-consulta as a substantial part of the general legislation till the times of the emperors, when they superseded every other except the emperor's enactments. The appeal of the emperor to their authority dwindled down into a mere form. (Cod. i. 14. 12. 1, in presenti leges condere soli imperatori concessum est.)

6. Sed et quod principi placuit, legis habet vigorem, cum lege regia, quæ de imperio ejus lata est, populus ei et in eum omne suum imperium et potestatem concessit. Quodecumque igitur imperator per epistolam constituit vel cognoscens decrevit vel edicto præcepit, legem esse constat: hæ sunt, quæ constitutiones appellantur. Plane ex his quædam sunt personales, quæ nec ad exemplum trahuntur, quoniam non hoc princeps vult: nam quod alicui ob merita indulset, vel si cui pœnam irrogavit, vel si cui sine exemplo subvenit, personam non egreditur. Aliæ autem, cum generales sunt, omnes procul dubio tenent.

6. That which seems good to the emperor has also the force of law; for the people, by the lex regia, which is passed to confer on him his power, make over to him their whole power and authority. Therefore whatever the emperor ordains by rescript, or decides in adjudging a cause, or lays down by edict, is unquestionably law; and it is these enactments of the emperor that are called constitutions. Of these, some are personal, and are not to be drawn into precedent, such not being the intention of the emperor. Supposing the emperor has granted a favour to any man on account of his merits, or inflicted some punishment, or granted some extraordinary relief, the application of these acts does not extend beyond the particular individual. But the other constitutions, being general, are undoubtedly binding on all.

GAL. i. 5; D. i. 4. 1.

The imperial constitutions, though known in the time of the previous emperors, first attained, under Hadrian, the position of being in reality the only source of law. They were of three kinds: first, epistolæ, letters or answers to letters addressed by the emperor to different individuals or public bodies, or mandata, orders given to particular officers, and rescripta, answers given by the emperor to magistrates who requested his assistance in the decision of doubtful points (Bk. i. Tit. 8. 2); secondly, judicial sentences, decreta, given by the emperors (Bk. ii. Tit. 15. 4); both these kinds having force only by serving as a precedent in similar cases; and thirdly, edicta, or laws binding generally on all the subjects of the emperor. (See Introd. sec. 16.)

It is here said, on the authority of Ulpian (D. i. 4. 1), that the emperor derives his authority from the lex regia. This refers to the law of the comitia curiata by which the imperium was conferred. Gaius says, l. 5, nec unquam dubitatum est quin principis constitutio legis vicem optineat, cum ipse imperator per legem imperium accipiat. This law was a relic of that by which the king had been invested with the royal authority, intrusted to him by the curia representing the populus; and it was considered that the emperor was in like manner invested with all the power of the Roman people transferred to him on his receiving the imperium. (See Introd. sec. 16.)

7. Prætorum quoque edicta non modicam juris optinent auctoritatem. Hæc etiam jus honorarium solemus appellare, quod qui honorem gerunt, id est magistratus, auctoritatem huic juri dederunt. Proponabant et ædiles curules edictum de quibusdam casibus, quod edictum juris honorarii portio est.

7. The edicts of the prætors are also of great authority. These edicts are called the jus honorarium, because those who bear honours in the state, that is, the magistrates, have given it their sanction. The curule ædiles also used to publish an edict relative to certain subjects, which edict also became part of the jus honorarium.

GAI. i. 6; D. xxi. 1. 1.

Papinian says (D. i. 1. 7), that the jus prætorum was introduced by the prætors, adjuvandi vel supplendi vel corrigendi juris civilis gratia. New circumstances, new habits of thinking, and, in the case of the prætor peregrinus, a new scope for authority, compelled the prætor to use an equitable power, and frequently equitable fictions, to extend the narrow limits of the old civil law. (See Introd. sec. 12.) The decisions by which he did this were called edicta. At the beginning of his year of office, the prætor published a list of the rules by which he intended to be bound, and this was called the edictum perpetuum, as it ran on from year to year under successive prætors, each making such additions and changes as he thought necessary. Edictum repentinum was one made to meet a particular case. The lex Cornelia (B.C. 67) forbade a prætor to depart during his term of office from the edict he had promulgated at its commencement. In the time of Hadrian, a jurist named Salvius Julianus, who filled the office of prætor, systematised and condensed the edicts of preceding prætors into a final edictum perpetuum, which, if further annual edicts were issued at all, which is doubtful, served as their basis, and is specially known as the edictum perpetuum. (See Introd. sec. 19.)

8. Responsa prudentium sunt sententiæ et opiniones eorum, quibus permissum erat jura condere. Nam antiquitus institutum erat, ut essent qui jura publice interpretarentur, quibus a Cæsare jus respondendi datum est, qui jurisconsulti appellabantur. Quorum omnium

8. The answers of the jurists are the decisions and opinions of persons who were authorised to determine the law. For anciently it was provided that there should be persons to interpret publicly the law, who were permitted by the emperor to give answers on questions of law. They

It is here said, on the authority of Ulpian (D. i. 4. 1), that the emperor derives his authority from the lex regia. This refers to the law of the comitia curiata by which the imperium was conferred. Gaius says, l. 5, nec unquam dubitatum est quin principis constitutio legis vicem optineat, cum ipse imperator per legem imperium accipiat. This law was a relic of that by which the king had been invested with the royal authority, intrusted to him by the curia representing the populus; and it was considered that the emperor was in like manner invested with all the power of the Roman people transferred to him on his receiving the imperium. (See Introd. sec. 16.)

7. Prætorum quoque edicta non modicam juris optinent auctoritatem. Hæc etiam jus honorarium solemus appellare, quod qui honorem gerunt, id est magistratus, auctoritatem huic juri dederunt. Proponabant et ædiles curules edictum de quibusdam casibus, quod edictum juris honorarii portio est.

7. The edicts of the prætors are also of great authority. These edicts are called the jus honorarium, because those who bear honours in the state, that is, the magistrates, have given it their sanction. The curule ædiles also used to publish an edict relative to certain subjects, which edict also became part of the jus honorarium.

GAI. i. 6; D. xxi. 1. 1.

Papinian says (D. i. 1. 7), that the jus prætorum was introduced by the prætors, adjuvandi vel supplendi vel corrigendi juris civilis gratia. New circumstances, new habits of thinking, and, in the case of the prætor peregrinus, a new scope for authority, compelled the prætor to use an equitable power, and frequently equitable fictions, to extend the narrow limits of the old civil law. (See Introd. sec. 12.) The decisions by which he did this were called edicta. At the beginning of his year of office, the prætor published a list of the rules by which he intended to be bound, and this was called the edictum perpetuum, as it ran on from year to year under successive prætors, each making such additions and changes as he thought necessary. Edictum repentinum was one made to meet a particular case. The lex Cornelia (B.C. 67) forbade a prætor to depart during his term of office from the edict he had promulgated at its commencement. In the time of Hadrian, a jurist named Salvius Julianus, who filled the office of prætor, systematised and condensed the edicts of preceding prætors into a final edictum perpetuum, which, if further annual edicts were issued at all, which is doubtful, served as their basis, and is specially known as the edictum perpetuum. (See Introd. sec. 19.)

8. Responsa prudentium sunt sententiæ et opiniones eorum, quibus permissum erat jura condere. Nam antiquitus institutum erat, ut essent qui jura publice interpretarentur, quibus a Cæsare jus respondendi datum est, qui jurisconsulti appellabantur. Quorum omnium

8. The answers of the jurisprudents are the decisions and opinions of persons who were authorised to determine the law. For anciently it was provided that there should be persons to interpret publicly the law, who were permitted by the emperor to give answers on questions of law. They were called jurisconsults; and the authority of their decisions and opinions, when they were all unanimous, was such, that the judge could not, according to the constitutions, refuse to be guided by their answers.

sententiæ et opiniones eam auctoritate tenebant, ut iudici recedere a responso eorum non liceret, ut est constitutum.

GAI. i. 7.

It is to the change in the position of the jurists effected by Augustus (Introd. sec. 20) that reference is made in the words quibus a Cesare jus respondendi datum est, and it is to the constitutions of Hadrian (sec. 20) and Theodosius (sec. 27) that the words iudici recedere a responso eorum non liceret, ut est constitutum, refer.

9. Ex non scripto jus venit, quod usus comprobavit. Nam diuturni mores consensu utentium comprobati legem imitantur.

9. The unwritten law is that which usage has established; for ancient customs, being sanctioned by the consent of those who adopt them, are like laws.

D. i. 3. 32.

Quid interest suffragio populus voluntatem suam declaret an rebus ipsis et factis? (D. i. 3. 32.) The Roman jurists did not trouble themselves to ascertain very accurately whence laws derive their binding force. The vague expression in the text mores legem imitantur, and the question asked in these words of the Digest, leave undecided the question of the relation of customs to laws. The Roman law held that customs could not only interpret law (optima legum interpretis consuetudo, D. i. 3. 37), but also abrogate it. In the eleventh section of this Title it is said that the enactment of a state may be changed tacito consensu populi, and in the Digest (i. 3. 32. 1) it is expressly stated that leges tacito consensu omnium per desuetudinem abrogantur. The Code, certainly, lays down (viii. 53) that the authority of a custom is not so great that it can 'conquer reason or law;' but this is said of particular not general customs. A law fallen into desuetude might be abrogated by general custom, but a particular custom, of only local force, would not be suffered to prevail against the general law.

10. Et non ineleganter in duas species jus civile distributum videtur. Nam origo ejus ab institutis duarum civitatum, Athenarum scilicet et Lacedæmonis, fluxisse videtur: in his enim civitatibus ita agi solitum erat, ut Lacedæmonii quidem magis ea, quæ pro legibus observarent, memoriæ mandarent, Athenienses vero ea, quæ in legibus scripta reprehendissent, custodirent.

10. The civil law is not improperly divided into two kinds, for the division seems to have had its origin in the customs of the two states Athens and Lacedæmon. For in these states it used to be the case, that the Lacedæmonians rather committed to memory what they were to observe as law, while the Athenians rather kept safely what they had found written in their laws.

It is hardly necessary to say, that the distinction between written and unwritten law must always exist where laws are written at all, and where no attempt has been made to express all sententiæ et opiniones eam auctoritatem tenebant, ut iudici recedere a responso eorum non liceret, ut est constitutum.

were called jurisconsults; and the authority of their decisions and opinions, when they were all unanimous, was such, that the judge could not, according to the constitutions, refuse to be guided by their answers.

GAL. i. 7.

It is to the change in the position of the jurists effected by Augustus (Introd. sec. 20) that reference is made in the words quibus a Cæsare jus respondendi datum est, and it is to the constitutions of Hadrian (sec. 20) and Theodosius (sec. 27) that the words iudici recedere a responso eorum non liceret, ut est constitutum, refer.

9. Ex non scripto jus venit, quod usus comprobavit. Nam diuturni mores consensu utentium comprobati legem imitantur.

9. The unwritten law is that which usage has established; for ancient customs, being sanctioned by the consent of those who adopt them, are like laws.

D. i. 3. 32.

Quid interest suffragio populus voluntatem suam declaret an rebus ipsis et factis? (D. i. 3. 32.) The Roman jurists did not trouble themselves to ascertain very accurately whence laws derive their binding force. The vague expression in the text mores legem imitantur, and the question asked in these words of the Digest, leave undecided the question of the relation of customs to laws. The Roman law held that customs could not only interpret law (optima legum interpretis consuetudo, D. i. 3. 37), but also abrogate it. In the eleventh section of this Title it is said that the enactment of a state may be changed tacito consensu populi, and in the Digest (i. 3. 32. 1) it is expressly stated that leges tacito consensu omnium per desuetudinem abrogantur. The Code, certainly, lays down (viii. 53) that the authority of a custom is not so great that it can 'conquer reason or law;' but this is said of particular not general customs. A law fallen into desuetude might be abrogated by general custom, but a particular custom, of only local force, would not be suffered to prevail against the general law.

10. Et non ineleganter in duas species jus civile distributum videtur. Nam origo ejus ab institutis duarum civitatum, Athenarum scilicet et Lacedæmonis, fluxisse videtur: in his enim civitatibus ita agi solitum erat, ut Lacedæmonii quidem magis ea, quæ pro legibus observarent, memoriæ mandarent, Athenienses vero ea, quæ in legibus scripta reprehendissent, custodirent.

10. The civil law is not improperly divided into two kinds, for the division seems to have had its origin in the customs of the two states Athens and Lacedæmon. For in these states it used to be the case, that the Lacedæmonians rather committed to memory what they were to observe as law, while the Athenians rather kept safely what they had found written in their laws.

It is hardly necessary to say, that the distinction between written and unwritten law must always exist where laws are written at all, and where no attempt has been made to express all law in positive terms; and that this Greek origin for the two branches of Roman law is quite imaginary.

11. Sed naturalia quidem jura, quæ apud omnes gentes peræque servantur, divina quadam providentia constituta, semper firma atque immutabilia permanent: ea verò, quæ ipsa sibi quæque civitas constituit, sæpe mutari solent vel tacito consensu populi vel alia postea lege lata.

11. The laws of nature, which all nations observe alike, being established by a divine providence, remain ever fixed and immutable. But the laws which every state has enacted, undergo frequent changes, either by the tacit consent of the people, or by a new law being subsequently passed.

D. i. 3. 32. 1.

Justinian, abandoning the threefold division of Ulpian, which he had adopted in the earlier paragraphs of this chapter, now follows the twofold division of Gaius (i. 1), into jus naturale and jus civile.

12. Omne autem jus, quo utimur, vel ad personas pertinet vel ad res vel ad actiones. Ac prius de personis videamus. Nam parum est jus nosse, si personæ, quarum causa statutum est, ignorentur.

12. All our law relates either to persons, or to things, or to actions. Let us first speak of persons; as it is of little purpose to know the law, if we do not know the persons for whom the law was made.

GAI. i. 8.

In Gaius, and in the Institutes of Justinian, obligations are treated of under the head of things. The division of law which compels them to be so treated is obviously inaccurate, for actions themselves are just as much things as obligations; and if obligations were classed under the head of things because they are a mode of obtaining things, there is the objection to the classification, that the obtaining of a thing is only an ultimate and accidental result, not a necessary part, of an obligation.

TIT. III. DE JURE PERSONARUM.

Summa itaque divisio de jure personarum hæc est, quod omnes homines aut liberi sunt aut servi.

The chief division in the rights of persons is this: men are all either free or slaves.

GAI. i. 9.

Every being capable of having, and being subject to, rights was called in Roman law a persona. (See Introd. sec. 37.) Thus not only was the individual, when looked at as having this capacity, a persona, but so also were corporations and public bodies. Slaves were personæ in the sense that they were not merely things, and they could go through some legal forms, and were entitled in later times to a certain amount of legal protection; but, although they are thus treated of under the law of persons, it is chiefly their want of legal capacities that attracts attention. The word persona has also another sense. It was used not only for the being who had the capacity of enjoying rights and fulfilling duties, but also for the different characters or parts in which this capacity showed itself; or, to borrow the metaphor suggested by the etymology of the word, for the different masks or faces which the law in positive terms; and that this Greek origin for the two branches of Roman law is quite imaginary.

11. Sed naturalia quidem jura, quæ apud omnes gentes peræque servantur, divina quadam providentia constituta, semper firma atque immutabilia permanent: ea verò, quæ ipsa sibi quæque civitas constituit, sæpe mutari solent vel tacito consensu populi vel alia postea lege lata.

11. The laws of nature, which all nations observe alike, being established by a divine providence, remain ever fixed and immutable. But the laws which every state has enacted, undergo frequent changes, either by the tacit consent of the people, or by a new law being subsequently passed.

D. i. 3. 32. 1.

Justinian, abandoning the threefold division of Ulpian, which he had adopted in the earlier paragraphs of this chapter, now follows the twofold division of Gaius (i. 1), into jus naturale and jus civile.

12. Omne autem jus, quo utimur, vel ad personas pertinet vel ad res vel ad actiones. Ac prius de personis videamus. Nam parum est jus nosse, si personæ, quarum causa statutum est, ignorentur.

12. All our law relates either to persons, or to things, or to actions. Let us first speak of persons; as it is of little purpose to know the law, if we do not know the persons for whom the law was made.

GAI. i. 8.

In Gaius, and in the Institutes of Justinian, obligations are treated of under the head of things. The division of law which compels them to be so treated is obviously inaccurate, for actions themselves are just as much things as obligations; and if obligations were classed under the head of things because they are a mode of obtaining things, there is the objection to the classification, that the obtaining of a thing is only an ultimate and accidental result, not a necessary part, of an obligation.

TIT. III. DE JURE PERSONARUM.

Summa itaque divisio de jure personarum hæc est, quod omnes homines aut liberi sunt aut servi.

The chief division in the rights of persons is this: men are all either free or slaves.

GAI. i. 9.

Every being capable of having, and being subject to, rights was called in Roman law a persona. (See Introd. sec. 37.) Thus not only was the individual, when looked at as having this capacity, a persona, but so also were corporations and public bodies. Slaves were personæ in the sense that they were not merely things, and they could go through some legal forms, and were entitled in later times to a certain amount of legal protection; but, although they are thus treated of under the law of persons, it is chiefly their want of legal capacities that attracts attention. The word persona has also another sense. It was used not only for the being who had the capacity of enjoying rights and fulfilling duties, but also for the different characters or parts in which this capacity showed itself; or, to borrow the metaphor suggested by the etymology of the word, for the different masks or faces which the actor wore in playing his part in the drama of civic and social life. Thus, for instance, the same man might have the persona patris, or tutoris, or mariti; that is, might be regarded in his character of father, tutor, or husband.

Status is the position which a persona occupies in the eye of the law (D. i. 5.) In the possible position of a persona the Roman law recognised three main heads (capita), viz.: libertas, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a freeman; civitas, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a Roman citizen; and familia, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a person belonging to a Roman family. These three 'heads' were again, by an expression borrowed from that applied to citizens when appearing as 'heads' in the censor's list, summed up in the singular 'caput;' the 'head' of a persona thus meaning the sum of the person's legal capacities. The status of a free Roman citizen was that of having this caput. The status of a slave was that of having no caput. Since freeborn members of a Roman family acquired, as such members, the position of cives, modern jurists sometimes use status in the sense of family position. (See Intro. sec. 38, 39, 40.)

The extent and meaning of each of the capacities summed up in caput may be illustrated by contrasting it with its corresponding negative, that is, with the absence of the capacity spoken of. In order to determine the capacity of freemen, we may speak of the position of (freedmen and) slaves; in order to determine the capacity of a citizen, we may speak of the position of a Latinus and a peregrinus; in order to determine the capacity of persons having the amplest family position, i.e. being sui juris, we may speak of persons having a less ample position, and being either under the power of others (alieni juris) or under the authority or guidance of others, i.e. under tutors or curators. This is the method adopted in the Institutes, and the discussion of the points thus suggested occupies the remainder of the first book.

1. Et libertas quidem est, ex qua etiam liberi vocantur, naturalis facultas ejus, quod cuique facere libet, nisi si quid aut vi aut jure prohibetur.

2. Servitus autem est constitutio juris gentium, qua quis dominio alieno contra naturam subicitur.

1. Freedom, from which is derived the term free as applied to men, is the natural power of doing each what we please, unless prevented either by force or by law.

2. Slavery is an institution of the law of nations, by which one man is made the property of another, contrary to natural right.

D. i. 5. 4. 1.

The institution of slavery was the one thing in which the jus gentium seemed to be irreconcilable with the jus naturale; and it was this, probably, more than anything else, that made some of the jurists adopt the threefold division of law.

3. Servi autem ex eo appellati sunt, quod imperatores captivos ven-

3. Slaves are denominated servi, because generals order their captives

actor wore in playing his part in the drama of civic and social life. Thus, for instance, the same man might have the persona patris, or tutoris, or mariti; that is, might be regarded in his character of father, tutor, or husband.

Status is the position which a persona occupies in the eye of the law (D. i. 5.) In the possible position of a persona the Roman law recognised three main heads (capita), viz.: libertas, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a freeman; civitas, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a Roman citizen; and familia, the capacity to have and be subject to the rights and obligations of a person belonging to a Roman family. These three 'heads' were again, by an expression borrowed from that applied to citizens when appearing as 'heads' in the censor's list, summed up in the singular 'caput;' the 'head' of a persona thus meaning the sum of the person's legal capacities. The status of a free Roman citizen was that of having this caput. The status of a slave was that of having no caput. Since freeborn members of a Roman family acquired, as such members, the position of cives, modern jurists sometimes use status in the sense of family position. (See Intro. sec. 38, 39, 40.)

The extent and meaning of each of the capacities summed up in caput may be illustrated by contrasting it with its corresponding negative, that is, with the absence of the capacity spoken of. In order to determine the capacity of freemen, we may speak of the position of (freedmen and) slaves; in order to determine the capacity of a citizen, we may speak of the position of a Latinus and a peregrinus; in order to determine the capacity of persons having the amplest family position, i.e. being sui juris, we may speak of persons having a less ample position, and being either under the power of others (alieni juris) or under the authority or guidance of others, i.e. under tutors or curators. This is the method adopted in the Institutes, and the discussion of the points thus suggested occupies the remainder of the first book.

1. Et libertas quidem est, ex qua etiam liberi vocantur, naturalis facultas ejus, quod cuique facere libet, nisi si quid aut vi aut jure prohibetur.

2. Servitus autem est constitutio juris gentium, qua quis dominio alieno contra naturam subicitur.

1. Freedom, from which is derived the term free as applied to men, is the natural power of doing each what we please, unless prevented either by force or by law.

2. Slavery is an institution of the law of nations, by which one man is made the property of another, contrary to natural right.

D. i. 5. 4. 1.

The institution of slavery was the one thing in which the jus gentium seemed to be irreconcilable with the jus naturale; and it was this, probably, more than anything else, that made some of the jurists adopt the threefold division of law.

3. Servi autem ex eo appellati sunt, quod imperatores captivos ven-

3. Slaves are denominated servi, because generals order their captives dere jubent ac per hoc servare nec occidere solent: qui etiam mancia dicti sunt, quod ab hostibus manu capiuntur.

4. Servi autem aut nascuntur aut fiunt. Nascuntur ex ancillis nostris: fiunt aut jure gentium, id est ex captivitate, aut jure civili, veluti cum homo liber major viginti annis ad pretium participandum sese vendundari passus est.

to be sold, and thus preserve them, and do not put them to death. Slaves are also called mancia, because they are taken from the enemy by the strong hand.

4. Slaves either are born or become so. They are born so when their mother is a slave; they become so either by the law of nations, that is, by captivity, or by the civil law, as when a free person, above the age of twenty, suffers himself to be sold, that he may share the price given for him.

D. i. 5. 5. 1.

Children born out of the pale of lawful marriage always followed the condition of the mother; and as slaves were incapable of contracting a lawful marriage, in the peculiar sense of 'lawful' adopted by Roman law, the children of a female slave were necessarily slaves. They were called vernæ when born and reared on the property of the owner of their mother. (See Introductio sec. 46.)

In order to prevent a fraud, by which a person, having allowed himself to be sold in order to share the price with the vendor, turned round on the purchaser and claimed his liberty as being freeborn, a law, perhaps the senatusconsultum Claudianum (D. xl. 3. 5), enacted that the perpetrator of the fraud should be bound by his statement, and be held to be a slave. In the early law of Rome, it may be observed, a citizen could really sell himself so as to lose his freedom; but he always retained a right of redemption.

There were other modes by which slavery could arise under the Roman law, as (1) when a free woman had commerce with a slave, or (2) when malefactors were condemned to the amphitheatre or the mines, the guilty parties were held in law to be slaves. These latter modes of legal slavery were abolished by Justinian. (Bk. iii. Tit. 12. 1. Nov. 22. cap. 8.) Lastly (3) an emancipated slave, if guilty of any gross act of ill behaviour towards his patron, i.e. his late owner, such as a violent attack on his reputation or person, might be reclaimed to slavery. (D. xxv. 3. 6.)

In the older law, addictio, that is, delivery of the person to a creditor by way of execution for a debt, the being detected in furtum manifestum, and the omitting to be inscribed in the tables of the census in order to defraud the revenue, were each a cause of slavery; but these causes had become obsolete long before the time of Justinian.

5. In servorum condicione nulla differentia est. In liberis multæ differentiæ sunt: aut enim ingenui sunt aut libertini.

5. In the condition of slaves there is no distinction; but there are many distinctions among free persons; for they are either born free, or have been set free.

D. i. 5. 5. 5.

dere jubent ac per hoc servare nec occidere solent: qui etiam mancia dicti sunt, quod ab hostibus manu capiuntur.

4. Servi autem aut nascuntur aut fiunt. Nascuntur ex ancillis nostris: fiunt aut jure gentium, id est ex captivitate, aut jure civili, veluti cum homo liber major viginti annis ad pretium participandum sese vendundari passus est.

to be sold, and thus preserve them, and do not put them to death. Slaves are also called mancia, because they are taken from the enemy by the strong hand.

4. Slaves either are born or become so. They are born so when their mother is a slave; they become so either by the law of nations, that is, by captivity, or by the civil law, as when a free person, above the age of twenty, suffers himself to be sold, that he may share the price given for him.

D. i. 5. 5. 1.

Children born out of the pale of lawful marriage always followed the condition of the mother; and as slaves were incapable of contracting a lawful marriage, in the peculiar sense of 'lawful' adopted by Roman law, the children of a female slave were necessarily slaves. They were called vernae when born and reared on the property of the owner of their mother. (See Intro. sec. 46.)

In order to prevent a fraud, by which a person, having allowed himself to be sold in order to share the price with the vendor, turned round on the purchaser and claimed his liberty as being freeborn, a law, perhaps the senatusconsultum Claudianum (D. xl. 3. 5), enacted that the perpetrator of the fraud should be bound by his statement, and be held to be a slave. In the early law of Rome, it may be observed, a citizen could really sell himself so as to lose his freedom; but he always retained a right of redemption.

There were other modes by which slavery could arise under the Roman law, as (1) when a free woman had commerce with a slave, or (2) when malefactors were condemned to the amphitheatre or the mines, the guilty parties were held in law to be slaves. These latter modes of legal slavery were abolished by Justinian. (Bk. iii. Tit. 12. 1. Nov. 22. cap. 8.) Lastly (3) an emancipated slave, if guilty of any gross act of ill behaviour towards his patron, i.e. his late owner, such as a violent attack on his reputation or person, might be reclaimed to slavery. (D. xxv. 3. 6.)

In the older law, addictio, that is, delivery of the person to a creditor by way of execution for a debt, the being detected in furtum manifestum, and the omitting to be inscribed in the tables of the census in order to defraud the revenue, were each a cause of slavery; but these causes had become obsolete long before the time of Justinian.

5. In servorum condicione nulla differentia est. In liberis multae differentiae sunt: aut enim ingenui sunt aut libertini.

5. In the condition of slaves there is no distinction; but there are many distinctions among free persons; for they are either born free, or have been set free.

D. i. 5. 5. 5.

Done born free
" Made free
one born other made mother free by will
" " - at Conception

— Ingenius
LIB. I. TIT. IV.

In the later empire there was introduced an important novelty in the condition of slaves by the institution of coloni, that is, serfs attached to the soil, ascripti glebæ, passing with it, and bound to remain on it, but having much of the position of freemen. They were of two kinds : if coloni inquilini or liberi, they were entitled to retain for their own use all they could gain from the soil beyond the value of a yearly payment, which they had to make to the owner of the soil ; if coloni adscriptitii or censiti, they had no rights of property as against their masters. (C. xi. 47 et seq.)

TIT. IV. DE INGENUIS.

(Freeborn)

Ingenuus is est, qui statim, ut natus est, liber est, sive ex duobus ingenuis matrimonio editus, sive ex libertinis, sive ex altero libertino, altero ingenuo. Sed et si quis ex matre libera nascatur, patre servo, ingenuus nihilo minus nascitur : quemadmodum qui ex matre libera et incerto patre natus est, quoniam vulgo conceptus est. Sufficit autem liberam fuisse matrem eo tempore, quo nascitur, licet ancilla conceperit. Et ex contrario si libera conceperit, deinde ancilla facta pariat, placuit eum, qui nascitur, liberum nasci, quia non debet calamitas matris ei nocere, qui in utero est. Ex his et illud quæsitum est, si ancilla prægnans manumissa sit, deinde ancilla postea facta peperit, liberum an servum pariat ? Et Marcellus probat, liberum nasci : sufficit enim ei, qui in ventre est, liberam matrem vel medio tempore habuisse : quod et verum est.

A person is ingenuus who is free from the moment of his birth, by being born in matrimony, of parents who have been either both born free, or both made free, or one of whom has been born and the other made free ; and when the mother is free, and the father a slave, the child nevertheless is born free ; just as he is if his mother is free, and it is uncertain who is his father ; for he has been conceived promiscuously. And it is sufficient if the mother is free at the time of the birth, although a slave when she conceived ; and on the other hand, if she be free when she conceives, and is a slave when she gives birth to her child, yet the child is held to be born free ; for the misfortune of the mother ought not to prejudice her unborn infant. The question hence arose, if a female slave with child is made free, but again becomes a slave before the child is born, whether the child is born free or a slave. Marcellus thinks it is born free, for it is sufficient for the unborn child, if the mother has been free, although only in the intermediate time ; and this also is true.

GAI. i. 11, 82, 89, 90 ; D. . 5. 5.

If a child was born in matrimonio, a tie which could only, in the eyes of the civil law, be contracted between two free persons, the child was free from the moment of conception. If it was not born in matrimonio, then it followed the condition of the mother ; and it was her condition at the time of birth, not at that of conception, which decided the status of the child. It was only by a departure from the strict theory of law that the enjoyment of liberty by the mother before the birth was allowed to make the child free. (GAI. i. 89.)

1. Cum autem ingenuus aliquis natus sit, non officit illi in servitute fuisse et postea manumissum esse :

1. When a man has been born free, he does not cease to be ingenuus because he has been in the position of

Done born free
" Made free
one born other made mother free by will
" " - at Conception

— Ingenius
LIB. I. TIT. IV.

In the later empire there was introduced an important novelty in the condition of slaves by the institution of coloni, that is, serfs attached to the soil, ascripti glebæ, passing with it, and bound to remain on it, but having much of the position of freemen. They were of two kinds : if coloni inquilini or liberi, they were entitled to retain for their own use all they could gain from the soil beyond the value of a yearly payment, which they had to make to the owner of the soil ; if coloni adscriptitii or censiti, they had no rights of property as against their masters. (C. xi. 47 et seq.)

TIT. IV. DE INGENUIS.

(Freeborn)

Ingenuus is est, qui statim, ut natus est, liber est, sive ex duobus ingenuis matrimonio editus, sive ex libertinis, sive ex altero libertino, altero ingenuo. Sed et si quis ex matre libera nascatur, patre servo, ingenuus nihilo minus nascitur : quemadmodum qui ex matre libera et incerto patre natus est, quoniam vulgo conceptus est. Sufficit autem liberam fuisse matrem eo tempore, quo nascitur, licet ancilla conceperit. Et ex contrario si libera conceperit, deinde ancilla facta pariat, placuit eum, qui nascitur, liberum nasci, quia non debet calamitas matris ei nocere, qui in utero est. Ex his et illud quæsitum est, si ancilla prægnans manumissa sit, deinde ancilla postea facta peperit, liberum an servum pariat ? Et Marcellus probat, liberum nasci : sufficit enim ei, qui in ventre est, liberam matrem vel medio tempore habuisse : quod et verum est.

A person is ingenuus who is free from the moment of his birth, by being born in matrimony, of parents who have been either both born free, or both made free, or one of whom has been born and the other made free ; and when the mother is free, and the father a slave, the child nevertheless is born free ; just as he is if his mother is free, and it is uncertain who is his father ; for he has been conceived promiscuously. And it is sufficient if the mother is free at the time of the birth, although a slave when she conceived ; and on the other hand, if she be free when she conceives, and is a slave when she gives birth to her child, yet the child is held to be born free ; for the misfortune of the mother ought not to prejudice her unborn infant. The question hence arose, if a female slave with child is made free, but again becomes a slave before the child is born, whether the child is born free or a slave. Marcellus thinks it is born free, for it is sufficient for the unborn child, if the mother has been free, although only in the intermediate time ; and this also is true.

GAI. i. 11, 82, 89, 90 ; D. . 5. 5.

If a child was born in matrimonio, a tie which could only, in the eyes of the civil law, be contracted between two free persons, the child was free from the moment of conception. If it was not born in matrimonio, then it followed the condition of the mother ; and it was her condition at the time of birth, not at that of conception, which decided the status of the child. It was only by a departure from the strict theory of law that the enjoyment of liberty by the mother before the birth was allowed to make the child free. (GAI. i. 89.)

1. Cum autem ingenuus aliquis natus sit, non officit illi in servitute fuisse et postea manumissum esse :

1. When a man has been born free, he does not cease to be ingenuus because he has been in the position of sæpiissime enim constitutum est, natalibus non officere manumissionem.

a slave, and has subsequently been enfranchised; for it has been often settled that enfranchisement does not prejudice the rights of birth.

In servitute fuisse. This does not mean to have been a slave, but to have been in the position of one. As if a freeborn child was considered erroneously to be a slave, and was manumitted, and then his free birth was discovered, his status would be that of an ingenuus, and not of a libertinus.

TIT. V. DE LIBERTINIS.

Freedmen

Libertini sunt, qui ex justa servitute manumissi sunt. Manumissio autem est datio libertatis: nam quamdiu quis in servitute est, manui et potestati suppositus est, et manumissus liberatur potestate. Quæ res a jure gentium originem sumpsit, utpote cum jure naturali omnes liberi nascerentur, nec esset nota manumissio, cum servitus esset incognita: sed posteaquam jure gentium servitus invasit, secutum est beneficium manumissionis. Et cum uno naturali nomine homines appellaremur, jure gentium tria genera hominum esse ceperunt, liberi et his contrarium servi et tertium genus libertini, qui desierant esse servi.

Freedmen are those who have been manumitted from legal servitude. Manumission is the 'giving of liberty.' For while any one is in slavery, he is under 'the hand' and power of another, but by manumission he is freed from this power. This institution took its rise from the law of nations; for by the law of nature all men were born free; and manumission was not heard of, as slavery was unknown. But when slavery came in by the law of nations, the boon of manumission followed. And whereas we all were denominated by the one natural name of 'men,' the law of nations introduced a division into three kinds of men, namely, freemen, and in opposition to them, slaves; and thirdly, freedmen who had ceased to be slaves.

GAI. i. 11; D. i. 1. 4.

In some few cases a slave could obtain liberty without manumission. Many of these cases are enumerated in the Digest (xl. 8). A slave, for instance, who was abandoned by his master on account of disease or infirmity (ob gravem infirmitatem), was pronounced free by an edict of Claudius.

1. Multis autem modis manumissio procedit: aut enim ex sacris constitutionibus in sacrosanctis ecclesiis aut vindicta aut inter amicos aut per epistolam aut per testamentum aut aliam quamlibet ultimam voluntatem. Sed et aliis multis modis libertas servo competere potest, qui tam ex veteribus quam nostris constitutionibus introducti sunt.

1. Manumission is effected in various ways; either (in the face of the Church) according to the imperial constitutions, or (by vindicta) or (in the presence of friends,) or (by letter,) or by testament, or (by any other expression of a man's last will. And a slave may also gain his freedom in many other ways, introduced by the constitutions of former emperors, and by our own.

GAI. i. 17; D. xl.; C. i. 13; vii. 6. 1. 1.

A manumissio was said to be legitima when made in one of the three ways recognised by the old law. These three modes of effecting a legitima manumissio were census, vindicta, and testa- sæpissime enim constitutum est, natalibus non officere manumissionem.

a slave, and has subsequently been enfranchised; for it has been often settled that enfranchisement does not prejudice the rights of birth.

In servitute fuisse. This does not mean to have been a slave, but to have been in the position of one. As if a freeborn child was considered erroneously to be a slave, and was manumitted, and then his free birth was discovered, his status would be that of an ingenuus, and not of a libertinus.

TIT. V. DE LIBERTINIS.

Freedmen

Libertini sunt, qui ex justa servitute manumissi sunt. Manumissio autem est datio libertatis: nam quamdiu quis in servitute est, manui et potestati suppositus est, et manumissus liberatur potestate. Quæ res a jure gentium originem sumpsit, utpote cum jure naturali omnes liberi nascerentur, nec esset nota manumissio, cum servitus esset incognita: sed posteaquam jure gentium servitus invasit, secutum est beneficium manumissionis. Et cum uno naturali nomine homines appellaremur, jure gentium tria genera hominum esse cœperunt, liberi et his contrarium servi et tertium genus libertini, qui desiderant esse servi.

Freedmen are those who have been manumitted from legal servitude. Manumission is the 'giving of liberty.' For while any one is in slavery, he is under 'the hand' and power of another, but by manumission he is freed from this power. This institution took its rise from the law of nations; for by the law of nature all men were born free; and manumission was not heard of, as slavery was unknown. But when slavery came in by the law of nations, the boon of manumission followed. And whereas we all were denominated by the one natural name of 'men,' the law of nations introduced a division into three kinds of men, namely, freemen, and in opposition to them, slaves; and thirdly, freedmen who had ceased to be slaves.

GAL. i. 11; D. i. 1. 4.

In some few cases a slave could obtain liberty without manumission. Many of these cases are enumerated in the Digest (xl. 8). A slave, for instance, who was abandoned by his master on account of disease or infirmity (ob gravem infirmitatem), was pronounced free by an edict of Claudius.

1. Multis autem modis manumissio procedit: aut enim ex sacris constitutionibus in sacrosanctis ecclesiis aut vindicta aut inter amicos aut per epistolam aut per testamentum aut aliam quamlibet ultimam voluntatem. Sed et aliis multis modis libertas servo competere potest, qui tam ex veteribus quam nostris constitutionibus introducti sunt.

1. Manumission is effected in various ways; either (in the face of the Church,) according to the imperial constitutions, or (by vindicta), or (in the presence of friends,) or (by letter,) or by testament, or (by any other expression of a man's last will. And a slave may also gain his freedom in many other ways, introduced by the constitutions of former emperors, and by our own.

GAL. i. 17; D. xl.; C. i. 13; vii. 6. 1. 1.

A manumissio was said to be legitima when made in one of the three ways recognised by the old law. These three modes of effecting a legitima manumissio were census, vindicta, and testa-

I mentum. A legitima manumissio was made: 1st, censu, i.e. by the master and the slave appearing before the censor at the time of the census being taken, and the slave's name being, at the master's desire, enrolled on the census list. This mode became obsolete in the time of the empire (ULP. Reg. i. 8; GAI. i. 140),
 II the census having been rarely taken under the early emperors, and not at all after Decius, A.D. 249. 2nd, vindicta, i.e. by means of a fictitious suit called causa liberalis (D. xl. 12), in which a person, termed the assertor libertatis, that is, a friend of the slave, or in his place a lictor, asserted before the prætor that the slave was free, by touching him on the head with a wand (which represented the hasta or symbol of proprietorship), and thus claiming him as against the master. In token of his consent, the master turned him round and then let him go, and the magistrate pronounced him free. 3rd, testamento (D. xl. 4), i.e. by testament. Freedom might be given by testament, either as a legacy to the slave himself, in which case the slave was called orecivus, because his patron, i.e. the person to whom he owed his liberty, was dead when he gained it; or the heir might be charged to grant or procure the liberty of the slave, in which case the heir would be the patron. If a slave was made by testament conditionally free, he was said to be statu liber—statu liber est, qui statutam et destinatam in tempus vel conditionem libertatem habet (D. xl. 7. 1). The solemnities attached to manumission by the vindicta ceased to be strictly observed long before the time of Justinian. Although the magistrate was at his country seat (D. xl. 2. 8), no lictors present, or the master silent, the manumission was still held good.

By manumissio legitima the slave became a Roman citizen, and the state, therefore, was represented in the proceedings by the censor and by the prætor in the two first-mentioned modes of emancipation, and in the third case by the Roman testament having always, theoretically, a public character attached to it; and it was when the state was so represented that the manumission was legitima. But manumission was not always legitima. Usage and the prætor's authority established gradually many other less formal methods of accomplishing the same object, and the imperial constitutions added others. Of those mentioned in the text, that in presence of the Church was established long before the time of Constantine, as we gather from a constitution dated A.D. 316 (C. i. 13). The ceremony was generally performed at some one of the great feasts, and it was necessary it should take place before the bishops. Freedom could also be given by a master writing to a slave (per epistolam), or declaring before his friends (inter amicos), that he gave the slave liberty, or by his making a codicil to that effect (per quamlibet aliam ultimam voluntatem), witnesses, however, being necessary in each of these cases (C. vii. 6. 1; C. vii. 6. 2; C. vi. 36. 8. 3). Other methods are noticed in the Code (vii. 6. 3–12), all based upon an implied wish of the master to free the slave. Until the time of Justinian,

I mentum. A legitima manumissio was made: 1st, censu, i.e. by the master and the slave appearing before the censor at the time of the census being taken, and the slave's name being, at the master's desire, enrolled on the census list. This mode became obsolete in the time of the empire (ULP. Reg. i. 8; GAI. i. 140),
 II the census having been rarely taken under the early emperors, and not at all after Decius, A.D. 249. 2nd, vindicta, i.e. by means of a fictitious suit called causa liberalis (D. xl. 12), in which a person, termed the assertor libertatis, that is, a friend of the slave, or in his place a lictor, asserted before the prætor that the slave was free, by touching him on the head with a wand (which represented the hasta or symbol of proprietorship), and thus claiming him as against the master. In token of his consent, the master turned him round and then let him go, and the magistrate pronounced him free. 3rd, testamento (D. xl. 4), i.e. by testament. Freedom might be given by testament, either as a legacy to the slave himself, in which case the slave was called orcivus, because his patron, i.e. the person to whom he owed his liberty, was dead when he gained it; or the heir might be charged to grant or procure the liberty of the slave, in which case the heir would be the patron. If a slave was made by testament conditionally free, he was said to be statu liber—statu liber est, qui statutam et destinatam in tempus vel conditionem libertatem habet (D. xl. 7. 1). The solemnities attached to manumission by the vindicta ceased to be strictly observed long before the time of Justinian. Although the magistrate was at his country seat (D. xl. 2. 8), no lictors present, or the master silent, the manumission was still held good.

By manumissio legitima the slave became a Roman citizen, and the state, therefore, was represented in the proceedings by the censor and by the prætor in the two first-mentioned modes of emancipation, and in the third case by the Roman testament having always, theoretically, a public character attached to it; and it was when the state was so represented that the manumission was legitima. But manumission was not always legitima. Usage and the prætor's authority established gradually many other less formal methods of accomplishing the same object, and the imperial constitutions added others. Of those mentioned in the text, that in presence of the Church was established long before the time of Constantine, as we gather from a constitution dated A.D. 316 (C. i. 13). The ceremony was generally performed at some one of the great feasts, and it was necessary it should take place before the bishops. Freedom could also be given by a master writing to a slave (per epistolam), or declaring before his friends (inter amicos), that he gave the slave liberty, or by his making a codicil to that effect (per quamlibet aliam ultimam voluntatem), witnesses, however, being necessary in each of these cases (C. vii. 6. 1; C. vii. 6. 2; C. vi. 36. 8. 3). Other methods are noticed in the Code (vii. 6. 3–12), all based upon an implied wish of the master to free the slave. Until the time of Justinian, however, the slave emancipated by any of these private modes was only thereby placed in the position of a Latinus or a dediticius, and not in that of a Roman citizen.

2. Servi vero a dominis semper manumitti solent, adeo ut vel in transitu manumittantur, veluti cum prætor aut proconsul aut præses in balneum vel in theatrum eat.

3. Libertinorum autem status tripartitus antea fuerat: nam qui manumittebantur, modo maiorem et justam libertatem consequiebantur et fiebant cives Romani, modo minorem et Latini ex lege Junia Norbana fiebant, modo inferiori et fiebant ex lege Ælia Sentia dediticiorum numero. Sed dediticiorum quidem pessima condicio jam ex multis temporibus in desuetudinem abiit, Latinorum vero nomen non frequentabatur: ideoque nostra pietas, omnia augere et in meliorem statum reducere desiderans, in duabus constitutionibus hoc emendavit et in pristinum statum reduxit, quia et a primis urbis Romæ cunabulis una atque simplex libertas competebat, id est eadem, quam habebat manumissor, nisi quod scilicet libertinus sit, qui manumittitur, licet manumissor ingenuus sit. Et dediticios quidem per constitutionem expulimus, quam promulgavimus inter nostras decisiones, per quas, suggerente nobis Triboniano, viro excelso, questore, antiqui juris alterationes placuimus: Latinos autem Junianos et omnem, quæ circa eos fuerat, observantiam alia constitutione per ejusdem questoris suggestionem correximus, quæ inter imperiales radiat sanctiones, et omnes liberos, nullo nec ætatis manumissi nec domini manumissoris nec in manumissionis modo discrimine habito, sicuti antea observabatur, civitate Romana donavimus: multis additis modis, per quos possit libertas servis cum civitate Romana, quæ sola in præsentem est, præstari.

2. Slaves may be manumitted by their masters at any time; even when the magistrate is only passing along, as when a prætor, or proconsul, or præses, is going to the baths or the theatre.

3. Freedmen were formerly divided into three classes. For those who were manumitted sometimes obtained a complete liberty, and became Roman citizens; sometimes a less complete, and became Latins under the lex Junia Norbana; and sometimes a liberty still inferior, and were ranked as dediticii, by the lex Ælia Sentia. But this lowest class, that of the dediticii, has long disappeared, and the title of Latins become rare; and so in our benevolence, which leads us to complete and improve everything, we have introduced a great reform by two constitutions, which re-established the ancient usage; for in the infancy of the state there was but one liberty, the same for the enfranchised slave as for the person who manumitted him; excepting, indeed, that the person manumitted was a freedman, while the manumitter was freeborn. We have abolished the class of dediticii by a constitution published among our decisions, by which, at the suggestion of the eminent Tribonian, questor, we have put an end to difficulties arising from the ancient law. We have also, at his suggestion, done away with the Latini Juniani, and everything relating to them, by another constitution, one of the most remarkable of our imperial ordinances. We have made all freedmen whatsoever Roman citizens, without any distinction as to the age of the slave, or the interest of the manumitter, or the mode of manumission. We have also introduced many new methods, by which liberty may be given to slaves, together with Roman citizenship, the only kind of liberty that now exists.

GAI. I. 12-17; C. vii. 5, 6.

For a complete emancipation it was originally necessary that the owner should have quiritary, i.e. complete, ownership (see Introd. sec. 62) of the slave, and that the manumissio should be legitima. If the ownership was less full, or the ceremony pri-

however, the slave emancipated by any of these private modes was only thereby placed in the position of a Latinus or a dediticius, and not in that of a Roman citizen.

2. Servi vero a dominis semper manumitti solent, adeo ut vel in transitu manumittantur, veluti cum prætor aut proconsul aut præses in balneum vel in theatrum eat.

2. Slaves may be manumitted by their masters at any time; even when the magistrate is only passing along, as when a prætor, or proconsul, or præses, is going to the baths or the theatre.

3. Libertinorum autem status tripartitus antea fuerat: nam qui manumittebantur, modo maiorem et justam libertatem consequiebantur et fiebant cives Romani, modo minorem et Latini ex lege Junia Norbana fiebant, modo inferiorem et fiebant ex lege Ælia Sentia dediticiorum numero. Sed dediticiorum quidem pessima condicio jam ex multis temporibus in desuetudinem abiit, Latinorum vero nomen non frequentabatur: ideoque nostra pietas, omnia augere et in meliorem statum reducere desiderans, in duabus constitutionibus hoc emendavit et in pristinum statum reduxit, quia et a primis urbis Romæ cunabulis una atque simplex libertas competebat, id est eadem, quam habebat manumissor, nisi quod scilicet libertinus sit, qui manumittitur, licet manumissor ingenuus sit. Et dediticios quidem per constitutionem expulimus, quam promulgavimus inter nostras decisiones, per quas, suggerente nobis Triboniano, viro excelso, quæstore, antiqui juris altercationes placavimus: Latinos autem Junianos et omnem, quæ circa eos fuerat, observantium alia constitutione per ejusdem quæstoris suggestionem correximus, quæ inter imperiales radiat sanctiones, et omnes liberos, nullo nec ætatis manumissi nec domini manumissoris nec in manumissionis modo discrimine habito, sicuti antea observabatur, civitate Romana donavimus: multis additis modis, per quos possit libertas servis cum civitate Romana, quæ sola in præsentem est, præstari.

3. Freedmen were formerly divided into three classes. For those who were manumitted sometimes obtained a complete liberty, and became Roman citizens; sometimes a less complete, and became Latins under the lex Junia Norbana; and sometimes a liberty still inferior, and were ranked as dediticii, by the lex Ælia Sentia. But this lowest class, that of the dediticii, has long disappeared, and the title of Latins become rare; and so in our benevolence, which leads us to complete and improve everything, we have introduced a great reform by two constitutions, which re-established the ancient usage; for in the infancy of the state there was but one liberty, the same for the enfranchised slave as for the person who manumitted him; excepting, indeed, that the person manumitted was a freedman, while the manumitter was freeborn. We have abolished the class of dediticii by a constitution published among our decisions, by which, at the suggestion of the eminent Tribonian, quæstor, we have put an end to difficulties arising from the ancient law. We have also, at his suggestion, done away with the Latini Juniani, and everything relating to them, by another constitution, one of the most remarkable of our imperial ordinances. We have made all freedmen whatsoever Roman citizens, without any distinction as to the age of the slave, or the interest of the manumitter, or the mode of manumission. We have also introduced many new methods, by which liberty may be given to slaves, together with Roman citizenship, the only kind of liberty that now exists.

GAI. I. 12-17; C. vii. 5, 6.

For a complete emancipation it was originally necessary that the owner should have quiritary, i.e. complete, ownership (see Introd. sec. 62) of the slave, and that the manumissio should be legitima. If the ownership was less full, or the ceremony private, the slave lived in a state of freedom, and the prætor forbade the master to exert his strictly legal power of reasserting his right to the services of the slave; but the condition of the slave as regarded the state was not that of a citizen, and at his death his master took all his property.

By the lex Ælia Sentia, A.D. 4, it was enacted that, to make the emancipation complete, that is, to make the slave a citizen, a third requisite should be added. He was to be thirty years old (GAI. i. 13); or else, if he was under that age, the ceremony was to be performed by vindicta, after the reason for the emancipation had been held good by a consilium, consisting, at Rome, of five senators and five equites; in the provinces of twenty recuperatores, i.e. judges specially appointed, and who were necessarily Roman citizens. This council sat under the presidency of the prætor at Rome, and of the proconsul in the provinces. (GAI. i. 20.)

The lex Junia Norbana was made A.D. 19; and the effect of its provisions, coupled with that of the lex Ælia Sentia, was to place those whose emancipation was defective in any one of these three requisites on the footing of Latini coloniarum. (GAI. i. 17; see Introd. sec. 38, 39.) The old relation of the Latini in the sense of dwellers in Latium to Rome, some of whom enjoyed the connubium and others did not, was terminated by the Lex Julia, B.C. 90, by which all such Latini were made Roman citizens. But the status of being a Latin (Latinitas), but without the connubium, was preserved as an artificial creation of the law, and was bestowed on towns or peoples. The Transpadani, for example, received the Latinitas in B.C. 89. Those receiving the Latinitas were Latini coloniarum, and such Latin colonies seem to have existed in the days of Gaius (GAI. i. 28). The effect of the lex Junia Norbana was to place the liberti Latini to whom it applied nearly but not quite on the footing of Latini coloniarum.

Latini (liberti) Juniani, as having this Latinitas, might trade with Romans on the footing of Roman citizens, but could not vote at elections or fill public offices, and had not the connubium, and therefore their children were not in their power. They could not make a testament, or become heirs, legatees, or guardians under a testament, although they could receive the benefit of fideicommissa (GAI. i. 24); and at their death their original owner took their property exactly as if they had never ceased to be slaves. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 7, sec. 4, ipso ultimo spiritu simul animam atque libertatem amittebant.) But there were many ways in which a libertus, in this position, could attain citizenship: as by an imperial rescript; by holding a magistracy in a Latin colony; by proving before a magistrate his marriage with a Roman or Latin wife, or a person he believed to be a Roman or Latin, and the birth of a son who was a year old; or by going through the ceremony of emancipation again and fulfilling the three conditions requisite (this was called iteratio); or by the modes noticed by Ulpian (Reg. 3. 1) in the words militia, nave, edificio, pistrino, that is vate, the slave lived in a state of freedom, and the prætor forbade the master to exert his strictly legal power of reasserting his right to the services of the slave; but the condition of the slave as regarded the state was not that of a citizen, and at his death his master took all his property.

By the lex Ælia Sentia, A.D. 4, it was enacted that, to make the emancipation complete, that is, to make the slave a citizen, a third requisite should be added. He was to be thirty years old (GAI. i. 18); or else, if he was under that age, the ceremony was to be performed by vindicta, after the reason for the emancipation had been held good by a consilium, consisting, at Rome, of five senators and five equites; in the provinces of twenty recuperatores, i.e. judges specially appointed, and who were necessarily Roman citizens. This council sat under the presidency of the prætor at Rome, and of the proconsul in the provinces. (GAI. i. 20.)

The lex Junia Norbana was made A.D. 19; and the effect of its provisions, coupled with that of the lex Ælia Sentia, was to place those whose emancipation was defective in any one of these three requisites on the footing of Latini coloniarii. (GAI. i. 17; see Introd. sec. 38, 39.) The old relation of the Latini in the sense of dwellers in Latium to Rome, some of whom enjoyed the connubium and others did not, was terminated by the Lex Julia, B.C. 90, by which all such Latini were made Roman citizens. But the status of being a Latin (Latinitas), but without the connubium, was preserved as an artificial creation of the law, and was bestowed on towns or peoples. The Transpadani, for example, received the Latinitas in B.C. 89. Those receiving the Latinitas were Latini coloniarii, and such Latin colonies seem to have existed in the days of Gaius (GAI. i. 28). The effect of the lex Junia Norbana was to place the liberti Latini to whom it applied nearly but not quite on the footing of Latini coloniarii.

Latini (liberti) Juniani, as having this Latinitas, might trade with Romans on the footing of Roman citizens, but could not vote at elections or fill public offices, and had not the connubium, and therefore their children were not in their power. They could not make a testament, or become heirs, legatees, or guardians under a testament, although they could receive the benefit of fideicommissa (GAI. i. 24); and at their death their original owner took their property exactly as if they had never ceased to be slaves. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 7, sec. 4, ipso ultimo spiritu simul animum atque libertatem amittebant.) But there were many ways in which a libertus, in this position, could attain citizenship: as by an imperial rescript; by holding a magistracy in a Latin colony; by proving before a magistrate his marriage with a Roman or Latin wife, or a person he believed to be a Roman or Latin, and the birth of a son who was a year old; or by going through the ceremony of emancipation again and fulfilling the three conditions requisite (this was called iteratio); or by the modes noticed by Ulpian (Reg. 3. 1) in the words militia, nave, edificio, pistrino, that is

by military service, building a ship and carrying wheat for six years, making a building, or establishing a bakeshop. (GAL. i. 22, 23, 24-28, 31; ii. 275; iii. 56, et seq.)

The lex Ælia Sentia provided that slaves who had been guilty of a crime for which they had been put in chains, branded, or put to the torture, should, by emancipation, be only raised to the level of dediticii, that is, of people who have surrendered themselves to their conquerors in war. They enjoyed personal liberty, but that was all. They could not trade except on the footing of strangers; could not make a testament; were forbidden to live within a hundred miles of Rome, on pain of being themselves sold, together with all their property; they could never become citizens; and at their death their master took all their property by right of succession if the emancipation had been complete; and, if not, by the right an owner always had to the slave's peculium. (GAL. i. 12-15, 25-27; iii. 74-76.) The children of the Latini Juniani were Latini, and those of the dediticii were peregrini, and the patron had no rights over them. (DEMANGEAT, i. 194.)

Where above we speak of a Latin libertus holding a magistracy in a Latin colony, or marrying a Latin, i.e. a member of a Latin colony, it must be understood that we are speaking of the law as it stood before the time of Caracalla, when all the free inhabitants of the empire received the civitas, and consequently the position of Latini, other than Latini Juniani, was swept away; and in the same way, after the legislation of Caracalla, there were no peregrini (see Introd. sec. 39), but the children of liberti in the position of dediticii were treated as peregrini.

There were thus three classes of freedmen:—1. Those who were citizens; 2. Those who were in the position of Latini; 3. Those in the position of dediticii. (GAL. i. 12.) But these distinctions were abolished by Justinian, nullo nec actus manumissionis nec dominii manumittentis nec in manumissionis modo discrimine habito (C. vii. 5 and 6); and under his legislation a slave became at once completely free by any act of the owner signifying his intention to bestow liberty. By a Novel (78. 1) Justinian abolished all distinction between libertini and ingenui, retaining, however, the jus patronatus. The libertus owed his patronus reverence (Dig. xxxvii. 15), and also in many cases had to discharge certain services (Dig. xxxvii. 14) for him; but the chief feature of the jus patronatus was the right of the patron to succeed to the inheritance of his libertus; for if the libertus died childless, the patron succeeded to his whole inheritance, supposing he left no testament; and if he left one, still the patron took a third part of the property, where it exceeded one hundred aurei. (Bk. iii. Tit. 7. 3.)

X Patron succeeded to the estate of his libertus if he died
(1) childless (2) in testate
If libertus left a child Patron took

by military service, building a ship and carrying wheat for six years, making a building, or establishing a bakeshop. (GAL. i. 22, 23, 24-28, 31; ii. 275; iii. 56, et seq.)

The lex Ælia Sentia provided that slaves who had been guilty of a crime for which they had been put in chains, branded, or put to the torture, should, by emancipation, be only raised to the level of dediticii, that is, of people who have surrendered themselves to their conquerors in war. They enjoyed personal liberty, but that was all. They could not trade except on the footing of strangers; could not make a testament; were forbidden to live within a hundred miles of Rome, on pain of being themselves sold, together with all their property; they could never become citizens; and at their death their master took all their property by right of succession if the emancipation had been complete; and, if not, by the right an owner always had to the slave's peculium. (GAL. i. 12-15, 25-27; iii. 74-76.) The children of the Latini Juniani were Latini, and those of the dediticii were peregrini, and the patron had no rights over them. (DEMANGEAT, i. 194.)

Where above we speak of a Latin libertus holding a magistracy in a Latin colony, or marrying a Latin, i.e. a member of a Latin colony, it must be understood that we are speaking of the law as it stood before the time of Caracalla, when all the free inhabitants of the empire received the civitas, and consequently the position of Latini, other than Latini Juniani, was swept away; and in the same way, after the legislation of Caracalla, there were no peregrini (see Introd. sec. 39), but the children of liberti in the position of dediticii were treated as peregrini.

There were thus three classes of freedmen:—1. Those who were citizens; 2. Those who were in the position of Latini; 3. Those in the position of dediticii. (GAL. i. 12.) But these distinctions were abolished by Justinian, nullo nec actatis manumissi nec dominii manumittentis nec in manumissionis modo discrimine habito (C. vii. 5 and 6); and under his legislation a slave became at once completely free by any act of the owner signifying his intention to bestow liberty. By a Novel (78. 1) Justinian abolished all distinction between libertini and ingenui, retaining, however, the jus patronatus. The libertus owed his patronus reverence (Dig. xxxvii. 15), and also in many cases had to discharge certain services (Dig. xxxvii. 14) for him; but the chief feature of the jus patronatus was the right of the patron to succeed to the inheritance of his libertus; for if the libertus died childless, the patron succeeded to his whole inheritance, supposing he left no testament; and if he left one, still the patron took a third part of the property, where it exceeded one hundred auri. (Bk. iii. Tit. 7. 3.)

X Patron succeeded to the estate of his libertus if he died
(1) childless (2) in testate
If libertus left 1 child Patron took

TIT. VI. QUI QUIBUS EX CAUSIS MANUMITTERE NON POSSUNT.

Non tamen cuicumque volenti manumittere licet. Nam is, qui in fraudem creditorum manumittit, nihil agit, quia lex Ælia Sentia impedit libertatem.

It is not, however, every master who wishes that may manumit, for a manumission in fraud of creditors is void, the lex Ælia Sentia restraining the power of enfranchisement.

GAL. i. 37.

A person, as the third section informs us, manumitted his slaves in fraud of creditors, who knew that he was insolvent, or that by the manumission he would make himself unable to pay his debts; and in such a case, as the Roman law held that liberty once given could not be revoked, the lex Ælia Sentia provided that the act of manumission was entirely void (nihil agit): the freedom was considered never to have been given. The slave would indeed be treated as free until the creditors attacked the manumission as fraudulent; but directly they did so successfully, he was exactly in the position in which he would have been if never enfranchised. If, however, though the master was insolvent at the time of manumission, his debts were paid before the manumission was attacked, the creditors could no longer impugn the manumission, and the slave was considered to have been free from the date of the manumission. Probably there was a time limited, beyond which creditors were not allowed to attack the manumission. We learn from the Digest that if the manumission was made in fraud of the fiscus, it must be impugned within ten years; and it is not probable that the private creditor would have had a longer time allowed him. (Dig. xl. 9. 11.)

1. Licet autem domino, qui solvendo non est, in testamento servum suum cum libertate heredem instituere, ut fiat liber heresque ei solus et necessarius, si modo nemo alius ex eo testamento heres extiterit, aut quia nemo heres scriptus sit, aut quia is, qui scriptus est, qualibet ex causa heres non extiterit. Idque eadem lege Ælia Sentia provisum est, et recte: valde enim prospiciendum erat, ut egentes homines, quibus alius heres extaturus non esset, vel servum suum necessarium heredem habeant, qui satisfactorius esset creditoribus, aut, hoc eo non faciente, creditores res hereditarias servi nomine vendant, nec injuria defunctus afficiatur.

1. A master, who is insolvent, may, however, by his testament, institute a slave to be his heir, at the same time giving him his liberty, so that the slave becoming free may be his only and necessary heir, provided that there is no other heir under the same testament, which may happen, either because no other person was instituted heir, or because the person instituted, from some reason or other, does not become heir. This was wisely established by the above-mentioned lex Ælia Sentia: for it was very necessary to provide that men in insolvent circumstances, who could get no other heir, should have a slave as necessary heir, in order that he might satisfy their creditors; or that if he failed to do so, the creditors might sell the property forming part of the inheritance in the name of the slave, so as to prevent the deceased suffering disgrace.

GAL. ii. 154.

TIT. VI. QUI QUIBUS EX CAUSIS MANUMITTERE NON POSSUNT.

Non tamen cuicumque volenti manumittere licet. Nam is, qui in fraudem creditorum manumittit, nihil agit, quia lex Ælia Sentia impedit libertatem.

It is not, however, every master who wishes that may manumit, for a manumission in fraud of creditors is void, the lex Ælia Sentia restraining the power of enfranchisement.

GAI. i. 37.

A person, as the third section informs us, manumitted his slaves in fraud of creditors, who knew that he was insolvent, or that by the manumission he would make himself unable to pay his debts; and in such a case, as the Roman law held that liberty once given could not be revoked, the lex Ælia Sentia provided that the act of manumission was entirely void (nihil agit): the freedom was considered never to have been given. The slave would indeed be treated as free until the creditors attacked the manumission as fraudulent; but directly they did so successfully, he was exactly in the position in which he would have been if never enfranchised. If, however, though the master was insolvent at the time of manumission, his debts were paid before the manumission was attacked, the creditors could no longer impugn the manumission, and the slave was considered to have been free from the date of the manumission. Probably there was a time limited, beyond which creditors were not allowed to attack the manumission. We learn from the Digest that if the manumission was made in fraud of the fiscus, it must be impugned within ten years; and it is not probable that the private creditor would have had a longer time allowed him. (Dig. xl. 9. 11.)

1. Licet autem domino, qui solvendo non est, in testamento servum suum cum libertate heredem instituere, ut fiat liber heresque ei solus et necessarius, si modo nemo alius ex eo testamento heres extiterit, aut quia nemo heres scriptus sit, aut quia is, qui scriptus est, qualibet ex causa heres non extiterit. Idque eadem lege Ælia Sentia provisum est, et recte: valde enim prospiciendum erat, ut egentes homines, quibus alius heres extaturus non esset, vel servum suum necessarium heredem habeant, qui satisfactorius esset creditoribus, aut, hoc eo non faciente, creditores res hereditarias servi nomine vendant, nec injuria defunctus afficiatur.

1. A master, who is insolvent, may, however, by his testament, institute a slave to be his heir, at the same time giving him his liberty, so that the slave becoming free may be his only and necessary heir, provided that there is no other heir under the same testament, which may happen, either because no other person was instituted heir, or because the person instituted, from some reason or other, does not become heir. This was wisely established by the above-mentioned lex Ælia Sentia: for it was very necessary to provide that men in insolvent circumstances, who could get no other heir, should have a slave as necessary heir, in order that he might satisfy their creditors; or that if he failed to do so, the creditors might sell the property forming part of the inheritance in the name of the slave, so as to prevent the deceased suffering disgrace.

GAI. ii. 154.

The heirs under a Roman testament accepted all the liabilities of the deceased. When, therefore, the debts exceeded the value of the inheritance, the heir named in the testament would probably refuse the inheritance; and if no one would accept the heirship, the creditors stepped in and had the estate sold for their benefit. As this was thought a great stigma on the memory of the deceased, a slave was frequently enfranchised by the testator and named heir; and as the slave could not refuse to take the office upon him (being thence called heres necessarius), the sale of the effects, if necessary, was made in his name, and not in that of his master. Of course this could only take place when the slave was the sole heir. If there was any other heir, the slave would not be heir by necessity; and hence, in the text, the expression solus et necessarius heres is used. A slave so emancipated became a Roman citizen. (GAI. i. 21.)

2. Idemque juris est et si sine libertate servus heres institutus est. Quod nostra constitutio non solum in domino, qui solverdo non est, sed generaliter constituit nova humanitatis ratione, ut ex ipsa scriptura institutionis etiam libertas ei competere videatur, cum non est verisimile, eum, quem heredem sibi elegit, si præterniserit libertatis dationem, servum remanere voluisse et neminem sibi heredem fore.

3. In fraudem autem creditorum manumittere videtur, qui vel jam eo tempore, quo manumittit, solvendo non est, vel qui datis libertatibus desiturus est solvendo esse. Prævaluisse tamen videtur, nisi animum quoque fraudandi manumissor habuit, non impediri libertatem, quamvis bona ejus creditoribus non sufficiant: sæpe enim de facultatibus suis amplius quam in his est sperant homines. Itaque tunc intellegimus impediri libertatem, cum utroque modo fraudantur creditores, id est et consilio manumittentis et ipsa re, eo quod bona non suffectura sunt creditoribus.

2. The law is the same also when a slave is instituted heir, although his freedom be not expressly given him; for our constitution, in a new spirit of humanity, decides not only with regard to an insolvent master, but generally, that the mere institution of a slave implies the grant of liberty. For it is highly improbable, that a testator, although he has omitted an express gift of freedom, should have wished that the person he has selected as heir should remain a slave, and that he himself should have no heir.

3. A person manumits in fraud of creditors, who is insolvent at the time that he manumits, or becomes so by the manumission itself. It has, however, been settled that unless the manumitter intended to commit a fraud, the gift of liberty is not invalidated, although his goods are insufficient for the payment of his creditors; for men often hope their circumstances are better than they really are. The gift of liberty is then invalidated only when creditors are defrauded, both by the intention of the manumitter, and in reality; that is to say, by the insufficiency of the effects to meet their claims.

D. xl. 9, 10; xlii. 8. 15.

Fraudis interpretatio semper in jure civili non ex eventu duntaxat, sed ex consilio quoque desideratur. (D. l. 17. 79.) Gaius informs us (i. 47) that peregrini were prevented from enfranchising slaves in fraud of creditors, though the other provisions of the lex Ælia Sentia did not affect them.

The heirs under a Roman testament accepted all the liabilities of the deceased. When, therefore, the debts exceeded the value of the inheritance, the heir named in the testament would probably refuse the inheritance; and if no one would accept the heirship, the creditors stepped in and had the estate sold for their benefit. As this was thought a great stigma on the memory of the deceased, a slave was frequently enfranchised by the testator and named heir; and as the slave could not refuse to take the office upon him (being thence called heres necessarius), the sale of the effects, if necessary, was made in his name, and not in that of his master. Of course this could only take place when the slave was the sole heir. If there was any other heir, the slave would not be heir by necessity; and hence, in the text, the expression solus et necessarius heres is used. A slave so emancipated became a Roman citizen. (GAI. i. 21.)

2. Idemque juris est et si sine libertate servus heres institutus est. Quod nostra constitutio non solum in domino, qui solvendo non est, sed generaliter constituit nova humanitatis ratione, ut ex ipsa scriptura institutionis etiam libertas ei competere videatur, cum non est verisimile, eum, quem heredem sibi elegit, si prætermiserit libertatis donationem, servum remanere voluisse et neminem sibi heredem fore.

3. In fraudem autem creditorum manumittere videtur, qui vel jam eo tempore, quo manumittit, solvendo non est, vel qui datis libertatibus desiturus est solvendo esse. Prævaluisse tamen videtur, nisi animum quoque fraudandi manumissor habuit, non impediri libertatem, quamvis bona ejus creditoribus non sufficiant: sæpe enim de facultatibus suis amplius quam in his est sperant homines. Itaque tunc intellegimus impediri libertatem, cum utroque modo fraudantur creditores, id est et consilio manumittentis et ipsa re, eo quod bona non suffectura sunt creditoribus.

2. The law is the same also when a slave is instituted heir, although his freedom be not expressly given him; for our constitution, in a new spirit of humanity, decides not only with regard to an insolvent master, but generally, that the mere institution of a slave implies the grant of liberty. For it is highly improbable, that a testator, although he has omitted an express gift of freedom, should have wished that the person he has selected as heir should remain a slave, and that he himself should have no heir.

3. A person manumits in fraud of creditors, who is insolvent at the time that he manumits, or becomes so by the manumission itself. It has, however, been settled that unless the manumitter intended to commit a fraud, the gift of liberty is not invalidated, although his goods are insufficient for the payment of his creditors; for men often hope their circumstances are better than they really are. The gift of liberty is then invalidated only when creditors are defrauded, both by the intention of the manumitter, and in reality; that is to say, by the insufficiency of the effects to meet their claims.

D. xl. 9, 10; xlii. 8. 15.

Fraudis interpretatio semper in jure civili non ex eventu duntaxat, sed ex consilio quoque desideratur. (D. l. 17. 79.) Gaius informs us (i. 47) that peregrini were prevented from enfranchising slaves in fraud of creditors, though the other provisions of the lex Ælia Sentia did not affect them.

4. Eadem lege Ælia Sentia domino minori annis viginti non aliter manumittere permittitur, quam si vindicta apud consilium justa causa manumissionis adprobata fuerit manumissi.

4. By the same lex Ælia Sentia, again, a master, under the age of twenty years, cannot manumit, unless by vindicta, and unless this proceeding in regard to the person manumitted has been approved of by the council on some legitimate ground

GAI. i. 38.

This consilium was held on certain days at Rome, and in the provinces sat during a session, on the last day of which cases such as those referred to in the text were determined. (GAI. i. 20.)

5. Justæ autem manumissionis causæ sunt, veluti si quis patrem aut matrem aut filium filiamve aut fratrem sororemve naturales aut pædagogum, nutricem, educatorem aut alumnum alumnamve aut collectaneum manumittat, aut servum procuratoris habendi gratia, aut ancillam matrimonii causa, dum tamen intra sex menses uxor ducatur, nisi justa causa impediatur, et qui manumittitur procuratoris habendi gratia, ne minor septem et decem annis manumittatur.

5. Legitimate grounds for manumission are such as these: that the person to be manumitted is father or mother to the manumitter, his son or daughter, his brother or sister, his preceptor, his nurse, his foster-father, his foster-child of either sex, or his foster-brother; that the person is a slave whom he wishes to make his procurator, or female slave whom he intends to marry, provided the marriage be performed within six months, unless prevented by some lawful cause; and provided that the slave who is to be made a procurator, be not manumitted under the age of seventeen years.

GAI. i. 19. 39; D. xl. 2. 11-13.

The most common case of a person emancipating his father and mother, and other near relations, would be when a slave was made heir. Theophilus (paraphr. on this paragraph) gives as an instance of a person enfranchising his brother, the case of a man having a child by a slave and then a son by a legal marriage. The former would be the slave of the latter.

If the marriage was in any way impossible, the minor would not be allowed to enfranchise his female slave; and it was requisite that it should be he himself who intended to marry her.

A procurator (i.e. agent) below the age of seventeen could not represent his principal in any action (D. iii. 1. 1. 3), and it is this probably that makes Justinian here require that the slave should be seventeen years of age in order to be emancipated by a minor.

6. Semel autem causa adprobata, sive vera sive falsa sit, non retractatur.

6. The approval of a ground of manumission once given, whether the reasons on which it is based be true or false, cannot be retracted.

7. Cum ergo certus modus manumittendi minoribus viginti annis dominis per legem Æliam Sentiam constitutus sit, eveniebat, ut, qui quattuordecim annos ætatis expleverit, licet testamentum facere possit et in eo heredem sibi instituere legatque relinquere possit, tamen, si ad huc minor sit annis viginti, liber-

7. Certain limits being thus assigned by the lex Ælia Sentia to the power of persons under the age of twenty to manumit slaves, the result was that any one, who had completed his fourteenth year, might make a testament, institute an heir, and give legacies, and yet that no person, under twenty, could give liberty to

4. Eadem lege Ælia Sentia domino minori annis viginti non aliter manumittere permittitur, quam si vindicta apud consilium justa causa manumissionis adprobata fuerit manumissi.

4. By the same lex Ælia Sentia, again, a master, under the age of twenty years, cannot manumit, unless by vindicta, and unless this proceeding in regard to the person manumitted has been approved of by the council on some legitimate ground

GAI. i. 38.

This consilium was held on certain days at Rome, and in the provinces sat during a session, on the last day of which cases such as those referred to in the text were determined. (GAI. i. 20.)

5. Justæ autem manumissionis causæ sunt, veluti si quis patrem aut matrem aut filium filiamve aut fratrem sororemve naturales aut pædagogum, nutricem, educatorem aut alumnum alumnamve aut collectaneum manumittat, aut servum procuratoris habendi gratia, aut ancillam matrimonii causa, dum tamen intra sex menses uxor ducatur, nisi justa causa impediatur, et qui manumittitur procuratoris habendi gratia, ne minor septem et decem annis manumittatur.

5. Legitimate grounds for manumission are such as these: that the person to be manumitted is father or mother to the manumitter, his son or daughter, his brother or sister, his preceptor, his nurse, his foster-father, his foster-child of either sex, or his foster-brother; that the person is a slave whom he wishes to make his procurator, or female slave whom he intends to marry, provided the marriage be performed within six months, unless prevented by some lawful cause; and provided that the slave who is to be made a procurator, be not manumitted under the age of seventeen years.

GAI. i. 19. 39; D. xl. 2. 11-18.

The most common case of a person emancipating his father and mother, and other near relations, would be when a slave was made heir. Theophilus (paraphr. on this paragraph) gives as an instance of a person enfranchising his brother, the case of a man having a child by a slave and then a son by a legal marriage. The former would be the slave of the latter.

If the marriage was in any way impossible, the minor would not be allowed to enfranchise his female slave; and it was requisite that it should be he himself who intended to marry her.

A procurator (i.e. agent) below the age of seventeen could not represent his principal in any action (D. iii. 1. 1. 3), and it is this probably that makes Justinian here require that the slave should be seventeen years of age in order to be emancipated by a minor.

6. Semel autem causa adprobata, sive vera sive falsa sit, non retractatur.

6. The approval of a ground of manumission once given, whether the reasons on which it is based be true or false, cannot be retracted.

7. Cum ergo certus modus manumittendi minoribus viginti annis dominis per legem Æliam Sentiam constitutus sit, eveniebat, ut, qui quattuordecim annos ætatis expleverit, licet testamentum facere possit et in eo heredem sibi instituere legataque relinquere possit, tamen, si ad huc minor sit annis viginti, liber-

7. Certain limits being thus assigned by the lex Ælia Sentia to the power of persons under the age of twenty to manumit slaves, the result was that any one, who had completed his fourteenth year, might make a testament, institute an heir, and give legacies, and yet that no person, under twenty, could give liberty to a slave. This seemed intolerable: that a man, permitted to dispose of all his effects by testament, could not enfranchise one single slave. We therefore give him the power of disposing, by testament, of his slaves, as of all his other property, exactly as he pleases, so as to be able also to give them liberty. But as liberty is of inestimable value, and our ancient laws, therefore, prohibited any person, under twenty years of age, to give it to a slave, we adopt a middle course, and only permit a person, under twenty years of age, to confer freedom on his slaves by testament, if he has completed his seventeenth and entered on his eighteenth year. For since the ancient law permitted persons at eighteen years of age to plead for others, why should not their judgment be considered sound enough to enable them to give liberty to their own slaves?

tatem servo dare non poterat. Quod non erat ferendum, si is, cui totorum bonorum in testamento dispositio data erat, uni servo libertatem dare non permittebatur. Quare nos similiter ei quemadmodum alias res ita et servos suos in ultima voluntate disponere, quemadmodum voluerit, permitimus, ut et libertatem eis possit prestare. Sed cum libertas inestimabilis est et propter hoc ante vicesimum ætatis annum antiquitas libertatem servo dari prohibebat: ideo nos, mediam quodammodo viam eligentes, non aliter minori viginti annis libertatem in testamento dare servo suo concedimus, nisi septimum et decimum annum impleverit et octavum decimum tetigerit. Cum enim antiquitas hujusmodi ætati et pro aliis postulare concessit, cur non etiam sui judicii stabilitas ita eos adjuvare credatur, ut et ad libertates dandas servis suis possint prove-nire?

GAI. i. 40.

The lex Ælia Sentia required the manumission given by a minor to be given by the form of vindicta. This was held to exclude the minor from giving it by testament. Manumission was something more than the disposal of a piece of property; it was the creation of a citizen, and thus might consistently be denied to minors whose power of disposing of property was unfettered. Justinian, nine years after the Institutes were published, abolished the distinction he establishes in the text, and allowed the minor to give liberty by testament at any time when he could make a testament at all, by a Novel (119. 2), containing the words sancimus ut licentia pateat minoribus in ipso tempore, in quo eis de reliqua eorum substantia disponere permittitur, etiam servos suos in ultimis voluntatibus manumittere.

TIT. VII. DE LEGE FURIA CANINIA SUBLATA.

Leges Furia Caninia certus modus constitutus erat in servis testamento manumittendis. Quam quasi libertatibus impediendam et quodammodo invidiam tollendam esse censuimus, cum satis fuerat inhumanum, vivos quidem licentiam habere totam suam familiam libertate donare, nisi alia causa impediat libertati, morientibus autem hujusmodi licentiam adimere.

The lex Furia Caninia imposed a limit on the number of slaves who could be manumitted by testament; but we have thought right to abolish this law as invidiously placing obstacles in the way of liberty. It seemed very unreasonable to allow persons, in their lifetime, to manumit all their slaves, if there is no special reason to prevent them, and yet to deprive the dying of the like power.

GAI. i. 42-46; C. vii. 3.

tatem servo dare non poterat. Quod non erat ferendum, si is, cui totorum bonorum in testamento dispositio data erat, uni servo libertatem dare non permittebatur. Quare nos similiter ei quemadmodum alias res ita et servos suos in ultima voluntate disponere, quemadmodum voluerit, permittimus, ut et libertatem eis possit prestare. Sed cum libertas inestimabilis est et propter hoc ante vicesimum ætatis annum antiquitas libertatem servo dari prohibebat: ideo nos, mediam quodammodo viam eligentes, non aliter minori viginti annis libertatem in testamento dare servo suo concedimus, nisi septimum et decimum annum impleverit et octavum decimum tetigerit. Cum enim antiquitas hujusmodi ætati et pro aliis postulare concessit, cur non etiam sui iudicii stabilitas ita eos adjuvare credatur, ut et ad libertates dandas servis suis possint prove-nire?

a slave. This seemed intolerable: that a man, permitted to dispose of all his effects by testament, could not enfranchise one single slave. We therefore give him the power of disposing, by testament, of his slaves, as of all his other property, exactly as he pleases, so as to be able also to give them liberty. But as liberty is of inestimable value, and our ancient laws, therefore, prohibited any person, under twenty years of age, to give it to a slave, we adopt a middle course, and only permit a person, under twenty years of age, to confer freedom on his slaves by testament, if he has completed his seventeenth and entered on his eighteenth year. For since the ancient law permitted persons at eighteen years of age to plead for others, why should not their judgment be considered sound enough to enable them to give liberty to their own slaves?

GAL. i. 40.

The lex Ælia Sentia required the manumission given by a minor to be given by the form of vindicta. This was held to exclude the minor from giving it by testament. Manumission was something more than the disposal of a piece of property; it was the creation of a citizen, and thus might consistently be denied to minors whose power of disposing of property was unfettered. Justinian, nine years after the Institutes were published, abolished the distinction he establishes in the text, and allowed the minor to give liberty by testament at any time when he could make a testament at all, by a Novel (119. 2), containing the words sancimus ut licentia pateat minoribus in ipso tempore, in quo eis de reliqua eorum substantia disponere permittitur, etiam servos suos in ultimis voluntatibus manumittere.

TIT. VII. DE LEGE FURIA CANINIA SUBLATA.

Lege Furia Caninia certus modus constitutus erat in servis testamento manumittendis. Quam quasi libertatibus impediendam et quodammodo invidiam tollendam esse censuimus, cum satis fuerat inhumanum, vivos quidem licentiam habere totam suam familiam libertate donare, nisi alia causa impediat libertati, morientibus autem hujusmodi licentiam adimere.

The lex Furia Caninia imposed a limit on the number of slaves who could be manumitted by testament; but we have thought right to abolish this law as invidiously placing obstacles in the way of liberty. It seemed very unreasonable to allow persons, in their lifetime, to manumit all their slaves, if there is no special reason to prevent them, and yet to deprive the dying of the like power.

GAL. i. 42-46; C. vii. 3.

The lex Furia Caninia was made in the year A.D. 8, four years after the lex Ælia Sentia. (SUET. Aug. 40.) Its object was to prevent the manumission of crowds of slaves enfranchised in order to gratify the vanity of testators, who wished their funeral train to be swollen with these witnesses to their liberality. It provided that the owner of two slaves might enfranchise both; of from two to ten, half; of from ten to thirty, one-third; of from thirty to one hundred, one-fourth; and of a larger number, one-fifth; but in no case was the number enfranchised to exceed one hundred. The slaves to be manumitted were required to be designated by name. The citizenship was so worthless in the days of Justinian, that it mattered little how many slaves were made free; but in the days of Augustus, the distinction made between the living and the dying master, which Justinian calls satis inhumanum, was far from unreasonable. A master might well be trusted not to impoverish himself by reckless manumission during his life, and yet be denied the power of gratifying his vanity at the expense of his heir.

TIT. VIII. DE HIS, QUI SUI VEL ALIENI JURIS SUNT.

Sequitur de jure personarum alia divisio. Nam quædam personæ sui juris sunt, quædam alieno juri subjectæ sunt: rursus earum, quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt, aliæ in potestate parentum, aliæ in potestate dominorum sunt. Videamus itaque de his, quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt; nam si cognoverimus, quæ istæ personæ sint, simul intellegemus, quæ sui juris sunt. Ac prius dispiciamus de his, qui in potestate dominorum sunt.

We now come to another division relative to the rights of persons; for some persons are sui juris, some are subject to the power of others. Of those, again, who are subject to others, some are in the power of ascendants, others in that of masters. Let us, then, treat of those who are subject to others; for, when we have ascertained who these are, we shall at the same time discover who are sui juris. And first let us consider those who are in the power of masters.

GAI. i. 48. 51.

Justinian now passes to the division of persons as members of a family. The head of a Roman family exercised supreme authority over his wife, his children, his children's children, and his slaves. (See Introd. sec. 40.) He was their owner as well as their master. He alone was sui juris, and all the other members of the family were alieni juris, for they belonged to him. The whole group, that is, the head and those in his power, were the familia. The head was the paterfamilias, a term not expressive of paternity (D. l. 16. 195. 2), but merely signifying a person who was not under the power of another, and who, consequently, might have others under his power. An unmarried woman whose father was dead, was said to be a materfamilias, a term which, in this sense, is only the feminine form of paterfamilias. She was sui juris, and might have slaves, though of course she could have

The lex Furia Caninia was made in the year A.D. 8, four years after the lex Ælia Sentia. (SUET. Aug. 40.) Its object was to prevent the manumission of crowds of slaves enfranchised in order to gratify the vanity of testators, who wished their funeral train to be swollen with these witnesses to their liberality. It provided that the owner of two slaves might enfranchise both; of from two to ten, half; of from ten to thirty, one-third; of from thirty to one hundred, one-fourth; and of a larger number, one-fifth; but in no case was the number enfranchised to exceed one hundred. The slaves to be manumitted were required to be designated by name. The citizenship was so worthless in the days of Justinian, that it mattered little how many slaves were made free; but in the days of Augustus, the distinction made between the living and the dying master, which Justinian calls satis inhumanum, was far from unreasonable. A master might well be trusted not to impoverish himself by reckless manumission during his life, and yet be denied the power of gratifying his vanity at the expense of his heir.

TIT. VIII. DE HIS, QUI SUI VEL ALIENI JURIS SUNT.

Sequitur de jure personarum alia divisio. Nam quædam personæ sui juris sunt, quædam alieno juri subjectæ sunt: rursus earum, quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt, aliæ in potestate parentum, aliæ in potestate dominorum sunt. Videamus itaque de his, quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt: nam si cognoverimus, quæ istæ personæ sint, simul intellegemus, quæ sui juris sunt. Ac prius dispiciamus de his, qui in potestate dominorum sunt.

We now come to another division relative to the rights of persons; for some persons are sui juris, some are subject to the power of others. Of those, again, who are subject to others, some are in the power of ascendants, A others in that of masters. Let us, then, treat of those who are subject to others; for, when we have ascertained who these are, we shall at the same time discover who are sui juris. And first let us consider those who are in the power of masters.

GAI. i. 48. 51.

Justinian now passes to the division of persons as members of a family. The head of a Roman family exercised supreme authority over his wife, his children, his children's children, and his slaves. (See Introd. sec. 40.) He was their owner as well as their master. He alone was sui juris, and all the other members of the family were alieni juris, for they belonged to him. The whole group, that is, the head and those in his power, were the familia. The head was the paterfamilias, a term not expressive of paternity (D. l. 16. 195. 2), but merely signifying a person who was not under the power of another, and who, consequently, might have others under his power. An unmarried woman whose father was dead, was said to be a materfamilias, a term which, in this sense, is only the feminine form of paterfamilias. She was sui juris, and might have slaves, though of course she could have no power over persons freeborn. For if she married, her children were in her husband's power, not in hers. (See Introd. sec. 40.)

The word familia was used in so many different senses, that it may be as well to collect them here, before entering on the subject of family relations. Familia is used to mean,—1. All persons of the blood of the same ancestor; 2. The head of the family and all those in his power whether slaves or free; 3. All connected by agnation (see Introd. sec. 44); 4. The slaves of one man; 5. The property of a paterfamilias, of whatever sort. The word is fully explained in a fragment of Ulpian. (D. 1. 16. 195.)

Gaius, from whom much of this section is borrowed, says,—Rursus earum personarum quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt, aliæ in potestate, aliæ in manu, aliæ in mancipio sunt (i. 49). The persons in manu were those wives who passed through the particular forms of marriage which placed a wife in the position of a daughter to her own husband; that is, the religious ceremony of confarreatio, the fictitious sale coemptio, and usus, or cohabitation unbroken by an absence of three nights in the year. (See Introd. sec. 46.) Persons in mancipio were those sold by the head of their family, or by themselves, with the form of mancipatio. (See GAI. i. 116–123, and Introd. sec. 42.) They were said to be servorum loco (not servi) with reference to the purchaser, but as to other persons they were free. Such sales were merely fictitious, except in the early days of Rome. The subjection in manu had ceased before the time of Justinian, and he did away with the last traces of that in mancipio. (See Tit. 12. 6.)

1. In potestate itaque dominorum sunt servi. Quæ quidem potestas juris gentium est: nam apud omnes peræque gentes animadvertere possumus, dominis in servos vitæ necisque potestatem esse, et quodcumque per servum acquiritur, id domino acquiritur.

1. Slaves are in the power of masters, a power derived from the law of nations: for among all nations it may be remarked that masters have the power of life and death over their slaves, and that everything acquired by the slave is acquired for the master.

GAI. i. 52.

The power of the master over his slaves was spoken of as the dominica potestas. The origin of this power has been already ascribed to the jus gentium. (Tit. 3. 2.)

2. Sed hoc tempore nullis hominibus, qui sub imperio nostro sunt, licet sine causa legibus cognita et supra modum in servos sævire. Nam ex constitutione divi Pii Antonini qui sine causa servum suum occiderit, non minus puniri jubetur, quam qui servum alienum occiderit. Sed et major asperitas dominorum ejusdem principis constitutione coercetur. Nam consultus a quibusdam præsidibus provinciarum de his servis, qui ad ædem sacram vel ad statuas principum

2. But at the present day no persons under our rule may use violence towards their slaves, without a reason recognised by the law, or ever to an extreme extent. For, by a constitution of the Emperor Antoninus Pius, he who without any reason kills his own slave, is to be punished equally with one who has killed the slave of another. The excessive severity of masters is also restrained by another constitution of the same emperor. For, when consulted by certain governors of provinces on the subject of slaves, who fled for

no power over persons freeborn. For if she married, her children were in her husband's power, not in hers. (See Introd. sec. 40.)

The word familia was used in so many different senses, that it may be as well to collect them here, before entering on the subject of family relations. Familia is used to mean,—1. All persons of the blood of the same ancestor; 2. The head of the family and all those in his power whether slaves or free; 3. All connected by agnation (see Introd. sec. 44); 4. The slaves of one man; 5. The property of a paterfamilias, of whatever sort. The word is fully explained in a fragment of Ulpian. (D. l. 16. 195.)

Gaius, from whom much of this section is borrowed, says,—Rursus earum personarum quæ alieno juri subjectæ sunt, aliæ in potestate, aliæ in manu, aliæ in mancipio sunt (i. 49). The persons in manu were those wives who passed through the particular forms of marriage which placed a wife in the position of a daughter to her own husband; that is, the religious ceremony of confarreatio, the fictitious sale coemptio, and usus, or cohabitation unbroken by an absence of three nights in the year. (See Introd. sec. 46.) Persons in mancipio were those sold by the head of their family, or by themselves, with the form of mancipatio. (See GAI. i. 116–123, and Introd. sec. 42.) They were said to be servorum loco (not servi) with reference to the purchaser, but as to other persons they were free. Such sales were merely fictitious, except in the early days of Rome. The subjection in manu had ceased before the time of Justinian, and he did away with the last traces of that in mancipio. (See Tit. 12. 6.)

1. In potestate itaque dominorum sunt servi. Quæ quidem potestas juris gentium est: nam apud omnes peræque gentes animadvertere possumus, dominis in servos vitæ necisque potestatem esse, et quodcumque per servum acquiritur, id domino acquiritur.

1. Slaves are in the power of masters, a power derived from the law of nations: for among all nations it may be remarked that masters have the power of life and death over their slaves, and that everything acquired by the slave is acquired for the master.

GAI. i. 52.

The power of the master over his slaves was spoken of as the dominica potestas. The origin of this power has been already ascribed to the jus gentium. (Tit. 3. 2.)

2. Sed hoc tempore nullis hominibus, qui sub imperio nostro sunt, licet sine causa legibus cognita et supra modum in servos suos sevire. Nam ex constitutione divi Pii Antonini qui sine causa servum suum occiderit, non minus puniri jubetur, quam qui servum alienum occiderit. Sed et major asperitas dominorum ejusdem principis constitutione coercetur. Nam consultus a quibusdam præsidibus provinciarum de his servis, qui ad ædem sacram vel ad statuas principum

2. But at the present day no persons under our rule may use violence towards their slaves, without a reason recognised by the law, or ever to an extreme extent. For, by a constitution of the Emperor Antoninus Pius, he who without any reason kills his own slave, is to be punished equally with one who has killed the slave of another. The excessive severity of masters is also restrained by another constitution of the same emperor. For, when consulted by certain governors of provinces on the subject of slaves, who fled for refuge either to temples, or the statues of the emperors, he decided that if the severity of masters should appear excessive, they might be compelled to make sale of their slaves upon equitable terms, so that the masters might receive the value; and this was a very wise decision, as it concerns the public good that no one should misuse his own property. The following are the terms of this rescript of Antoninus, which was sent to Ælius Marcianus. 'The power of masters over their slaves ought to be preserved unimpaired, nor ought any man to be deprived of his right. But it is for the interest of all masters themselves, that relief prayed on good grounds against cruelty, the denial of sustenance, or any other intolerable injury, should not be refused. Examine, therefore, into the complaints of the slaves who have fled from the house of Julius Sabinus, and taken refuge at the statue of the emperor; and, if you find that they have been too harshly treated, or wantonly disgraced, order them to be sold, so that they may not fall again under the power of their master; and, if Sabinus attempt to evade my constitution, I would have him know, that I shall severely punish his disobedience.'

confugiunt, præcepit, ut si intolerabilis videatur dominorum sævitia, cogantur servos bonis condicionibus vendere, ut pretium dominis daretur: et recte; expedit enim rei publicæ, ne quis re sua male utatur. Cujus rescripti ad Ælium Marcianum emissi verba hæc sunt: 'Dominorum quidem potestatem in suos servos illibatam esse oportet nec cuiquam hominum jus suum detrahi. Sed dominorum interest, ne auxilium contra sævitiam vel famem vel intolerabilem injuriam denegetur his, qui juste deprecantur. Ideoque cognosce de querellis eorum, qui ex familia Julii Sabini ad statuum confugerunt, et si vel durius habitos, quam æquum est, vel infami injuria affectos cognoveris, venire jube, ita ut in potestatem domini non revertantur. Qui Sabinus, si meæ constitutioni fraudem fecerit, sciet, me admissum severius executurum.'

GAL. i. 53; D. i. 6. 2.

The lex Cornelia de Sicariis, passed by Sylla, B.C. 81, made killing the slave of another person punishable as homicide, with death or exile (D. ix. 2. 23. 9); and the text tells us that the provisions of this law were extended by the Emperor Antoninus Pius to the case of a master killing his own slave. The lex Petronia (D. xlviii. 8. 11. 2), passed in the time of one of the early emperors, forbade masters to expose their slaves to contests with wild beasts. Hadrian required the sanction of a magistrate in all cases before death was inflicted. (SPART. in Had. cap. 18; D. i. 6. 2.) Constantine only permitted moderate corporal chastisement to be inflicted, and Justinian in the Code retains his enactment. (C. ix. 14.)

Justinian does not notice the corresponding changes which the clemency of later times worked in the control of the master over the slave's property; according to the usage of these times this property, called peculium, belonged in fact, though not in law, to the slave, and he often purchased his liberty with it. (TACIT. Ann. xiv. 42; D. xv. 1. 53.)

confugiunt, præcepit, ut si intolerabilis videatur dominorum sævitia, cogantur servos bonis condicionibus vendere, ut pretium dominis daretur: et recte; expedit enim rei publicæ, ne quis re sua male utatur. Cujus rescripti ad Ælium Marcianum emissi verba hæc sunt: 'Dominorum quidem potestatem in suos servos illibatam esse oportet nec cuiquam hominum jus suum detrahi. Sed dominorum interest, ne auxilium contra sævitiam vel famem vel intolerabilem injuriam denegetur his, qui juste deprecantur. Ideoque cognosce de querellis eorum, qui ex familia Julii Sabini ad statuum confugerunt, et si vel durius habitos, quam æquum est, vel infami injuria affectos cognoveris, venire jube, ita ut in potestatem domini non revertantur. Qui Sabinus, si meæ constitutioni fraudem fecerit, sciet, me admissum severius executurum.'

refuge either to temples, or the statues of the emperors, he decided that if the severity of masters should appear excessive, they might be compelled to make sale of their slaves upon equitable terms, so that the masters might receive the value; and this was a very wise decision, as it concerns the public good that no one should misuse his own property. The following are the terms of this rescript of Antoninus, which was sent to Ælius Marcianus. 'The power of masters over their slaves ought to be preserved unimpaired, nor ought any man to be deprived of his right. But it is for the interest of all masters themselves, that relief prayed on good grounds against cruelty, the denial of sustenance, or any other intolerable injury, should not be refused. Examine, therefore, into the complaints of the slaves who have fled from the house of Julius Sabinus, and taken refuge at the statue of the emperor; and, if you find that they have been too harshly treated, or wantonly disgraced, order them to be sold, so that they may not fall again under the power of their master; and, if Sabinus attempt to evade my constitution, I would have him know, that I shall severely punish his disobedience.'

GAL. i. 53; D. i. 6. 2.

The lex Cornelia de Sicariis, passed by Sylla, B.C. 81, made killing the slave of another person punishable as homicide, with death or exile (D. ix. 2. 23. 9); and the text tells us that the provisions of this law were extended by the Emperor Antoninus Pius to the case of a master killing his own slave. The lex Petronia (D. xlviii. 8. 11. 2), passed in the time of one of the early emperors, forbade masters to expose their slaves to contests with wild beasts. Hadrian required the sanction of a magistrate in all cases before death was inflicted. (SPART. in Had. cap. 18; D. i. 6. 2.) Constantine only permitted moderate corporal chastisement to be inflicted, and Justinian in the Code retains his enactment. (C. ix. 14.)

Justinian does not notice the corresponding changes which the clemency of later times worked in the control of the master over the slave's property; according to the usage of these times this property, called peculium, belonged in fact, though not in law, to the slave, and he often purchased his liberty with it. (TACIT. Ann. xiv. 42; D. xv. 1. 53.)

TIT. IX. DE PATRIA POTESTATE.

In potestate nostra sunt liberi Our children, begotten in lawful nostri, quos ex justis nuptiis pro- marriage, are in our power.
 creaverimus.

GAL. i. 55.

The patria potestas differed originally little, if at all, from the dominica potestas. If the sense of ownership was not so complete in the former, it was probably limited more by natural feeling than by law. The father could sell, expose, or put to death his children. (Twelve Tables, No. 4; see Introd. sec. 8.) Time, however, ameliorated the position of the child, and all that was left was a power to inflict moderate chastisement (C. viii. 47. 31), and to sell at the time of birth in cases of extreme necessity. (C. iv. 43. 1.) Constantine condemned the father who killed his child to the punishment of a parricide. (C. ix. 17. 1.) The sale of a child was in general fictitious, and only formed the mode by which the child was released from the father's power.

Like that of the slave, the child's property was only a peculium, belonging strictly to the father; and whatever the son in potestate acquired was acquired for the father, although the son could not make his father's position worse, and the father was not liable for the debts and engagements of the son. But under the early emperors a change was made, and the son had complete ownership in property acquired in war (castrense peculium); Constantine made a further exception of property acquired in employments about the court (quasi-castrense peculium) (see Bk. ii. 9, and Introd. sec. 41); and Justinian only permitted the father to have the usufruct during his life of everything coming to the son in any way except from the father himself. (Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 1.)

The meaning of justæ nuptiæ will appear in the next Title.

Neither age nor marriage terminated the power of a father over his son. As we learn from Tit. 12. 4, the filiusfamilias might rise to the highest public dignities, even that of consul, and yet he would remain in the power of his father. If a daughter married in manu, she passed from her father's power into that of her husband. The modes in which the patria potestas was ended are treated of in Tit. 12 of this Book.

1. Nuptiæ autem sive matrimonium est viri et mulieris conjunctio, individuum consuetudinem vitæ continens.

1. Marriage, or matrimony, is a joining together of a man and woman, carrying with it a mode of life in which they are inseparable.

D. xxiii. 2. 1.

Nuptiæ is properly the ceremonies attending the formation of the legal tie, and matrimonium is the tie itself; but the jurists use the two terms quite indifferently, as, for instance, Modestinus says, 'nuptiæ sunt conjunctio maris et feminae.' (D. xxiii. 2. 1.)

The individua consuetudo vitæ implied a community of rank

TIT. IX. DE PATRIA POTESTATE.

In potestate nostra sunt liberi Our children, begotten in lawful nostri, quos ex justis nuptiis pro- marriage, are in our power.
creaverimus.

GAL. i. 55.

The patria potestas differed originally little, if at all, from the dominica potestas. If the sense of ownership was not so complete in the former, it was probably limited more by natural feeling than by law. The father could sell, expose, or put to death his children. (Twelve Tables, No. 4; see Introd. sec. 8.) Time, however, ameliorated the position of the child, and all that was left was a power to inflict moderate chastisement (C. viii. 47. 31), and to sell at the time of birth in cases of extreme necessity. (C. iv. 43. 1.) Constantine condemned the father who killed his child to the punishment of a parricide. (C. ix. 17. 1.) The sale of a child was in general fictitious, and only formed the mode by which the child was released from the father's power.

Like that of the slave, the child's property was only a peculium, belonging strictly to the father; and whatever the son in potestate acquired was acquired for the father, although the son could not make his father's position worse, and the father was not liable for the debts and engagements of the son. But under the early emperors a change was made, and the son had complete ownership in property acquired in war (castrense peculium); Constantine made a further exception of property acquired in employments about the court (quasi-castrense peculium) (see Bk. ii. 9, and Introd. sec. 41); and Justinian only permitted the father to have the usufruct during his life of everything coming to the son in any way except from the father himself. (Bk. ii. Tit. 9. 1.)

The meaning of justæ nuptiæ will appear in the next Title.

Neither age nor marriage terminated the power of a father over his son. As we learn from Tit. 12. 4, the filiusfamilias might rise to the highest public dignities, even that of consul, and yet he would remain in the power of his father. If a daughter married in manu, she passed from her father's power into that of her husband. The modes in which the patria potestas was ended are treated of in Tit. 12 of this Book.

1. Nuptiæ autem sive matrimonium est viri et mulieris conjunctio, individuum consuetudinem vitæ continens.

1. Marriage, or matrimony, is a joining together of a man and woman, carrying with it a mode of life in which they are inseparable.

D. xxiii. 2. 1.

Nuptiæ is properly the ceremonies attending the formation of the legal tie, and matrimonium is the tie itself; but the jurists use the two terms quite indifferently, as, for instance, Modestinus says, 'nuptiæ sunt conjunctio maris et feminae.' (D. xxiii. 2. 1.)

The individua consuetudo vitæ implied a community of rank

and position, and of sacred and human law, divini et humani juris communicatio (D. xxiii. 2. 1), but not necessarily of property. Marriage gave neither party any right over the property of the other except when the wife passed in manum, and then all that she had belonged to the husband. For the meaning of individua comparatio Tacitus, Ann. vi. 10, 'apud Capreas individui' (never parted).

2. Jus autem potestatis, quod in liberos habemus, proprium est civium Romanorum; nulli enim alii sunt homines, qui talem in liberos habeant potestatem, qualem nos habemus.

2. The power which we have over our children is peculiar to the citizen of Rome; for no other people have power over their children, such as we have over ours.

GAL. I. 55.

Gaius mentions the Galatæ as being reported to have had similar institution. (See also Galatians iv. 1.)

3. Qui igitur ex te et uxore tua nascitur, in tua potestate est: item qui ex filio tuo et uxore ejus nascitur, id est nepos tuus et neptis, æque in tua sunt potestate, et pronepos et proneptis et deinceps ceteri. Qui tamen ex filia tua nascitur, in tua potestate non est, sed in patris ejus.

3. The child born to you and your wife is in your power. And so is the child born to your son of his wife, that is, your grandson or granddaughter; so are your great-grandchildren, and all your other descendants. But a child born of your daughter is not in your power, but in the power of its own father.

If a woman, although she was not in the power of her husband had children, they were not in her power; and hence, as she could have no descendants in her power, it was said, mulier familie sue et caput et finis est, i.e. her family ended with herself (D. l. 16. 195. 5.)

TIT. X. DE NUPTIIS.

Justas autem nuptias inter se cives Romani contrahunt, qui secundum præcepta legum coeunt, masculi quidem puberes, feminae autem viripotentes, sive patresfamilias sint sive filiifamilias, dum tamen filiifamilias et consensum habeant parentum, quorum in potestate sunt. Nam hoc fieri debere et civilis et naturalis ratio suadet in tantum, ut jussum parentis præcedere debeat. Unde quaesitum est, an furiosi filia nubere aut furiosi filius uxorem ducere possit? Cumque super filio variabatur, nostra processit decisio, qua permissum est ad exemplum filiae furiosi filium quoque posse et sine patris interventu matrimonium sibi copulare secundum datum ex constitutione modum.

Roman citizens form the tie of lawful marriage with each other when they are united according to law, the males having attained the age of puberty, and the females at marriageable age, whether they are patresfamilias or filiifamilias but, if the latter, they must first obtain the consent of their ascendants, in whose power they are. For both natural reason and the law require this consent; so much so, indeed, that it ought to precede the marriage. Hence the question has arisen, whether the daughter of a madman could be married, or his son marry. And as opinions were divided as to the son, we decided that as the daughter of a madman might, so may the son of a madman marry without the intervention of the father, according to the mode established by our constitution.

C. v. 4. 25.

In the earliest times of Roman law there were three modes of forming the tie of marriage: first, confarreatio, a religious cereand position, and of sacred and human law, divini et humani juris communicatio (D. xxiii. 2. 1), but not necessarily of property. Marriage gave neither party any right over the property of the other except when the wife passed in manum, and then all that she had belonged to the husband. For the meaning of individua comparatio Tacitus, Ann. vi. 10, 'apud Capreas individui' (never parted).

2. Jus autem potestatis, quod in liberos habemus, proprium est civium Romanorum; nulli enim alii sunt homines, qui talem in liberos habeant potestatem, qualem nos habemus.

2. The power which we have over our children is peculiar to the citizen of Rome; for no other people have power over their children, such as we have over ours.

GAL. I. 55.

Gaius mentions the Galatæ as being reported to have had similar institution. (See also Galatians iv. 1.)

3. Qui igitur ex te et uxore tua nascitur, in tua potestate est: item qui ex filio tuo et uxore ejus nascitur, id est nepos tuus et neptis, æque in tua sunt potestate, et pronepos et proneptis et deinceps ceteri. Qui tamen ex filia tua nascitur, in tua potestate non est, sed in patris ejus.

3. The child born to you and your wife is in your power. And so is the child born to your son of his wife, that is, your grandson or granddaughter; so are your great-grandchildren, and all your other descendants. But a child born of your daughter is not in your power, but in the power of its own father.

If a woman, although she was not in the power of her husband had children, they were not in her power; and hence, as she could have no descendants in her power, it was said, mulier familie sue et caput et finis est, i.e. her family ended with herself (D. l. 16. 195. 5.)

TIT. X. DE NUPTIIS.

Justas autem nuptias inter se civis Romani contrahunt, qui secundum præcepta legum coeunt, masculi quidem puberes, feminae autem viripotentes, sive patresfamilias sint sive filiifamilias, dum tamen filiifamilias et consensum habeant parentum, quorum in potestate sunt. Nam hoc fieri debere et civilis et naturalis ratio suadet in tantum, ut jussum parentis præcedere debeat. Unde quesitum est, an furiosi filia nubere aut furiosi filius uxorem ducere possit? Cumque super filio variabatur, nostra processit decisio, qua permissum est ad exemplum filiae furiosi filium quoque posse et sine patris interventu matrimonium sibi copulare secundum datum ex constitutione modum.

Roman citizens form the tie of lawful marriage with each other when they are united according to law, the males having attained the age of puberty, and the females a marriageable age, whether they are patresfamilias or filiifamilias but, if the latter, they must first obtain the consent of their ascendants, in whose power they are. For both natural reason and the law require this consent; so much so, indeed, that it ought to precede the marriage. Hence the question has arisen, whether the daughter of a madman could be married, or his son marry. And as opinions were divided as to the son, we decided that as the daughter of a madman might, so may the son of a madman marry without the intervention of the father, according to the mode established by our constitution.

C. v. 4. 25.

In the earliest times of Roman law there were three modes of forming the tie of marriage: first, confarreatio, a religious ceremony, in which none but those to whom the jus sacrum was open could take part; secondly, coemptio, a fictitious sale, in which the wife was sold to the husband; and lastly, usus, i.e. cohabitation with the intention of forming a marriage. (GAL. i. 110-114.) All three modes had the same effect on the position of the wife. She always passed in manum viri. (See Introd. sec. 46.) This incident of marriage was attached to the marriage by mere cohabitation and lapse of time, on the analogy of the ownership which was acquired in a thing by uninterrupted possession. It was, however, open to the wife to 'break the use;' to prevent, that is, her husband gaining complete power over her by lapse of time: the law of the Twelve Tables declared that, if the wife absented herself from her husband for three nights in the year, the usus should be interrupted, and she should remain in her own familia, and not pass into that of her husband. This was considered so much more advantageous to the wife, as by passing into the manus she occupied the position of a daughter in the power of her husband, and all her property belonged to him, that, even in the latter days of the republic, almost all marriages were formed without the wife passing into the manus of her husband. In the time of Justinian she never did so, and the whole distinction of the effect of different modes of marriage had been long obsolete. The nuptiae were equally justae whether the wife passed in manum or not. A wife who did not pass in manum and who was not emancipated remained in the power of her father, and so she remained, except in regard to the sacred rites of her husband's family, when the marriage was by confarreatio under a law passed in the time of Tiberius. (GAL. i. 136.) The wife who passed in manum was termed a materfamilias; the wife not in manu was distinguished as matrona until matrona came to be used for all married women. (CIC. Top. c. 3; AUL. GELL. Noct. Attic. 18. 6.)

At no time did these different modes of being married form part of the real tie of marriage; they only decided, when the tie of marriage was formed, what should be the position of the wife. Neither were the religious ceremonies nor the nuptial rites anything more than accessories of that which created the binding relation between the parties. The tie itself was constituted by the consent of the parties—by their intention to become man and wife—being expressed and manifested; and the mode in which it was necessary the manifestation should take place was that the woman should pass into her husband's possession. A man and woman were not married because they lived together, unless they had the intention to be married. Nuptias non concubitus sed consensus facit. (D. xxxv. 1. 15.) Neither was the mere expression of a consent sufficient to constitute a marriage. There must be an actual or constructive passing of the woman into the possession of the man. The ordinary sign of this was that she was received into the husband's house, in domum deduci; but this was only the usual and most patent sign, and any other clear indication was accepted. If,

mony, in which none but those to whom the jus sacrum was open could take part; secondly, coemptio, a fictitious sale, in which the wife was sold to the husband; and lastly, usus, i.e. cohabitation with the intention of forming a marriage. (GAL. i. 110-114.) All three modes had the same effect on the position of the wife. She always passed in manum viri. (See Introd. sec. 46.) This incident of marriage was attached to the marriage by mere cohabitation and lapse of time, on the analogy of the ownership which was acquired in a thing by uninterrupted possession. It was, however, open to the wife to 'break the use;' to prevent, that is, her husband gaining complete power over her by lapse of time: the law of the Twelve Tables declared that, if the wife absented herself from her husband for three nights in the year, the usus should be interrupted, and she should remain in her own familia, and not pass into that of her husband. This was considered so much more advantageous to the wife, as by passing into the manus she occupied the position of a daughter in the power of her husband, and all her property belonged to him, that, even in the latter days of the republic, almost all marriages were formed without the wife passing into the manus of her husband. In the time of Justinian she never did so, and the whole distinction of the effect of different modes of marriage had been long obsolete. The nuptiae were equally justae whether the wife passed in manum or not. A wife who did not pass in manum and who was not emancipated remained in the power of her father, and so she remained, except in regard to the sacred rites of her husband's family, when the marriage was by confarreatio under a law passed in the time of Tiberius. (GAL. i. 136.) The wife who passed in manum was termed a materfamilias; the wife not in manu was distinguished as matrona until matrona came to be used for all married women. (CIC. Top. c. 3; AUL. GELL. Noct. Attic. 18. 6.)

At no time did these different modes of being married form part of the real tie of marriage; they only decided, when the tie of marriage was formed, what should be the position of the wife. Neither were the religious ceremonies nor the nuptial rites anything more than accessories of that which created the binding relation between the parties. The tie itself was constituted by the consent of the parties—by their intention to become man and wife—being expressed and manifested; and the mode in which it was necessary the manifestation should take place was that the woman should pass into her husband's possession. A man and woman were not married because they lived together, unless they had the intention to be married. Nuptias non concubitus sed consensus facit. (D. xxxv. 1. 15.) Neither was the mere expression of a consent sufficient to constitute a marriage. There must be an actual or constructive passing of the woman into the possession of the man. The ordinary sign of this was that she was received into the husband's house, in domum deduci; but this was only the usual and most patent sign, and any other clear indication was accepted. If,

for example, the parties were both personally present and formally consented, the woman was taken to have placed herself, or been placed if she was in manu, in the possession of the man (C. v. 17. 11), and the marriage tie was formed; while, on the other hand, a marriage could not be effected by a mere written consent between persons not present together, as by letter (D. xxiii. 2. 5), without the woman passing into the man's possession by some separate distinct act, such as being received into his house.

In order that the marriage might have the effect of justæ nuptiæ, it was necessary that three conditions should be fulfilled.

1. There must be the consent of the parties duly manifested;
2. The parties must be puberes, i.e. the man must be fourteen and the woman twelve years of age; and 3. They must have the conubium, or legal power of contracting marriage, which may be regarded under three heads:—1. Under the old law both parties were required to be citizens, or to have had so much of citizenship given them as would enable them to form justæ nuptiæ. Various changes were made on this head, which will be noticed under section 11 of this Title. 2. They must not stand within the prohibited degrees of relationship; what these were is discussed in the following paragraphs of this Title. 3. If under the power of any one, they must have obtained that person's consent. The husband was obliged, even though in his grandfather's power, to obtain his father's consent also (D. xxiii. 2. 10. 1); otherwise the grandfather could have eventually increased the number of the father's family without consulting him (D. i. 7. 7), which it was against the spirit of the law to allow, as no one could have a new suius heres forced on him by agnation against his will. (See Tit. 11. 7.)

The same reason had caused the doubt adverted to in the text, whether, even if the father was incapable of giving his consent, the son could introduce new members into his father's family. This did not apply to the daughter, who could not introduce new members into her father's family. Justinian, in the Code, prescribed the mode in which marriage might be validly made either by the son or daughter of a madman. The son or daughter of the madman was to submit the proposed marriage to be approved, and the gift to the wife and the dos to be fixed, by the præfectus urbi at Constantinople, by the præses or bishop of the city in the provinces, in the presence of the curator of the madman and his principal relations. Marcus Aurelius had previously provided for the case of children of imbecile persons, dementes. (C. v. 4. 25.) Where the rights of the paterfamilias were not in question, as when the son was emancipated, it was not necessary to have the father's consent. (D. xxiii. 2. 25.)

If the persons, whose consent was necessary, did not give it, the marriage was absolutely void, and therefore no subsequent consent could ratify it. Thus Justinian says here that the consent, jussum (a word denoting the authority of the paterfamilias), must precede the marriage. It was not, however, necessary that the consent marriage of a madman or daughter

for example, the parties were both personally present and formally consented, the woman was taken to have placed herself, or been placed if she was in manu, in the possession of the man (C. v. 17. 11), and the marriage tie was formed; while, on the other hand, a marriage could not be effected by a mere written consent between persons not present together, as by letter (D. xxiii. 2. 5), without the woman passing into the man's possession by some separate distinct act, such as being received into his house.

In order that the marriage might have the effect of juste nuptie, it was necessary that three conditions should be fulfilled.

1. There must be the consent of the parties duly manifested;
2. The parties must be puberes, i.e. the man must be fourteen and the woman twelve years of age; and 3. They must have the conubium, or legal power of contracting marriage, which may be regarded under three heads:—1. Under the old law both parties were required to be citizens, or to have had so much of citizenship given them as would enable them to form juste nuptie. Various changes were made on this head, which will be noticed under section 11 of this Title. 2. They must not stand within the prohibited degrees of relationship; what these were is discussed in the following paragraphs of this Title. 3. If under the power of any one, they must have obtained that person's consent. The husband was obliged, even though in his grandfather's power, to obtain his father's consent also (D. xxiii. 2. 10. 1); otherwise the grandfather could have eventually increased the number of the father's family without consulting him (D. i. 7. 7), which it was against the spirit of the law to allow, as no one could have a new suus heres forced on him by agnation against his will. (See Tit. 11. 7.)

The same reason had caused the doubt adverted to in the text, whether, even if the father was incapable of giving his consent, the son could introduce new members into his father's family. This did not apply to the daughter, who could not introduce new members into her father's family. Justinian, in the Code, prescribed the mode in which marriage might be validly made either by the son or daughter of a madman. The son or daughter of the madman was to submit the proposed marriage to be approved, and the gift to the wife and the dos to be fixed, by the præfectus urbi at Constantinople, by the præses or bishop of the city in the provinces, in the presence of the curator of the madman and his principal relations. Marcus Aurelius had previously provided for the case of children of imbecile persons, dementes. (C. v. 4. 25.) Where the rights of the paterfamilias were not in question, as when the son was emancipated, it was not necessary to have the father's consent. (D. xxiii. 2. 25.)

If the persons, whose consent was necessary, did not give it, the marriage was absolutely void, and therefore no subsequent consent could ratify it. Thus Justinian says here that the consent, jussum (a word denoting the authority of the paterfamilias), must precede the marriage. It was not, however, necessary that the consent

consent of the son or daughter

Silence instructed as usual.
 should be expressly given. If the paterfamilias ~~consent~~ of the marriage and did not oppose it, his assent was presumed (D. xli. 4. 1); and if he was absent or a captive for three years, his children might form a marriage which he could not afterwards disapprove of. (D. xxiii. 2. 9. 10). If both or either of the parties were immobers at the time of the marriage, the marriage, though then invalid, became valid by their living together with the intention of being married after puberty was attained (D. xxiii. 2. 4.)

1. Ergo non omnes nobis uxores ducere licet: nam quarundam nuptiis abstinendum est. Inter eas enim personas, quæ parentum liberorumve locum inter se optinent, nuptiæ contrahi non possunt, veluti inter patrem et filiam vel avum et nepotem vel matrem et filiam vel aviam et nepotem et usque ad infinitum: et si tales personæ inter se coierunt, nefarias atque incestas nuptias contraxisse dicuntur. Et hæc adeo ita sunt, ut, quamvis per adoptionem parentum liberorumve loco sibi esse cœperint, non possint inter se matrimonio jungi, in tantum, ut etiam dissoluta adoptione idem juris maneat: itaque eam, quæ tibi per adoptionem filia ut neptis esse cœperit, non poteris uxorem ducere, quamvis eam emancipaveris.

Ascendants + descendants
 1. We may not marry every woman without distinction: for with some, marriage is forbidden. Marriage cannot be contracted between persons standing to each other in the relation of ascendant and descendant, as between a father and daughter, a grandfather and his granddaughter, a mother and her son, a grandmother and her grandson; and so on, ad infinitum. And, if such persons unite together, they only contract a criminal and incestuous marriage; so much so, that ascendants and descendants, who are only so by adoption, cannot intermarry; and even after the adoption is dissolved the prohibition remains. You cannot therefore, marry a woman who has been either your daughter or granddaughter by adoption, although you may have emancipated her.

GAI. i. 58, 59.

When two persons were related by being agnati to each other, they were exactly in the same relative position, so far as regarded the power of marrying, as if they had been related in the same degree by blood. If the tie of agnatio was dissolved by emancipation, the tie of blood, if any, would of course remain, and be a bar to marriage; but if there was no tie of blood, that is, if one of the parties had entered the family by adoption, then, if the emancipated person had, while the agnatio subsisted, occupied the position of ascendant or descendant to the other person, marriage was forbidden, but if that of a collateral, it was allowed.

I can see why
 2. Inter eas quoque personas, quæ ex transverso gradu cognationis junguntur, est quedam similis observatio, sed non tanta. Sane enim inter fratrem sororemque nuptiæ prohibita sunt, sive ab eodem patre eademque matre nati fuerint, sive ex alterutro eorum. Sed si qua per adoptionem soror tibi esse cœperit, quamdiu quidem constat adoptio, sane inter te et eam nuptiæ consistere non possunt: cum vero per emancipationem adoptio dissoluta sit, pote-

Brother and sister
 2. There are also restrictions, though not so extensive, on marriage between collateral relations. A brother and sister are forbidden to marry, whether they are the children of the same father and mother, or of one of the two only. And, if a woman becomes your sister by adoption, so long as the adoption subsists, you certainly cannot marry her; but if the adoption is destroyed by emancipation, you may marry her; as you may also, if you yourself are emancipated. Hence it fol-

collateral, in 3rd degree - Parents + step-children

should be expressly given. If the paterfamilias ^{consent} of the marriage and did not oppose it, his assent was presumed (D. xli. 1. 1); and if he was absent or a captive for three years, his children might form a marriage which he could not afterwards disapprove of. (D. xxiii. 2. 9. 10). If both or either of the parties were immuberes at the time of the marriage, the marriage, though then invalid, became valid by their living together with the intention of being married after puberty was attained (D. xxiii. 2. 4.)

1. Ergo non omnes nobis uxores ducere licet: nam quarundam nuptiis abstinendum est. Inter eas enim personas, quæ parentum liberorumve locum inter se optinent, nuptiæ contrahi non possunt, veluti inter patrem et filiam vel avum et neptem vel matrem et filiam vel aviam et nepotem et usque ad infinitum: et si tales personæ inter se coierunt, nefarias atque incestas nuptias contraxisse dicuntur. Et hæc adeo ita sunt, ut, quamvis per adoptionem parentum liberorumve loco sibi esse cœperint, non possint inter se matrimonio jungi, in tantum, ut etiam dissoluta adoptione idem juris maneat: itaque eam, quæ tibi per adoptionem filia aut neptis esse cœperit, non poteris uxorem ducere, quamvis eam emancipaveris.

1. We may not marry every woman without distinction: for with some, marriage is forbidden. Marriage cannot be contracted between persons standing to each other in the relation of ascendant and descendant, as between a father and daughter, a grandfather and his granddaughter, a mother and her son, a grandmother and her grandson; and so on, ad infinitum. And, if such persons unite together, they only contract a criminal and incestuous marriage; so much so, that ascendants and descendants, who are only so by adoption, cannot intermarry; and even after the adoption is dissolved the prohibition remains. You cannot therefore, marry a woman who has been either your daughter or granddaughter by adoption, although you may have emancipated her.

GAI. I. 58, 59.

When two persons were related by being agnati to each other, they were exactly in the same relative position, so far as regarded the power of marrying, as if they had been related in the same degree by blood. If the tie of agnatio was dissolved by emancipation, the tie of blood, if any, would of course remain, and be a bar to marriage; but if there was no tie of blood, that is, if one of the parties had entered the family by adoption, then, if the emancipated person had, while the agnatio subsisted, occupied the position of ascendant or descendant to the other person, marriage was forbidden, but if that of a collateral, it was allowed.

2. Inter eas quoque personas, quæ ex transverso gradu cognationis junguntur, est quedam similis observatio, sed non tanta. Sane enim inter fratrem sororemque nuptiæ prohibetæ sunt, sive ab eodem patre eademque matre nati fuerint, sive ex alterutro eorum. Sed si qua per adoptionem soror tibi esse cœperit, quamdiu quidem constat adoptio, sane inter te et eam nuptiæ consistere non possunt: cum vero per emancipationem adoptio dissoluta sit, pote-

2. There are also restrictions, though not so extensive, on marriage between collateral relations. A brother and sister are forbidden to marry, whether they are the children of the same father and mother, or of one of the two only. And, if a woman becomes your sister by adoption, so long as the adoption subsists, you certainly cannot marry her; but if the adoption is destroyed by emancipation, you may marry her; as you may also, if you yourself are emancipated. Hence it folcollateral, in 341 Reges - Parents & ship. id. & slave. cons. if re.

Ascendants + descendants

I

Brother and sister

II

ris eam uxorem ducere: sed et si tu emancipatus fueris, nihil est impedimento nuptiis. Et ideo constat, si quis generum adoptare velit, debere eum ante filiam suam emancipare: et si quis velit nurum adoptare, debere eum ante filium emancipare.

GAI. i. 60, 61; D. xxiii. 2. 17. 1.

To adopt a son-in-law would be to make him brother by agnation of his own wife. The bar did not invalidate the previous marriage, but operated to restrain the adoption, until the daughter had been emancipated.

III father's daughter sister's daughter nephew's daughter
3. Fratr^{is} vel sororis filiam uxorem ducere non licet. Sed nec neptem fratris vel sororis ducere quis potest, quamvis quarto gradu sint. Cujus enim filiam uxorem ducere non licet, ejus neque neptem permittitur. Ejus vero mulieris, quam pater tuus adoptavit, filiam non videris impediri uxorem ducere, quia neque naturali neque civili jure tibi conjungitur.

lows, that if a man would adopt his son-in-law, he ought first to emancipate his daughter; and if he would adopt his daughter-in-law, he ought previously to emancipate his son.

3. A man may not marry the daughter of a brother or a sister, nor the granddaughter, although she is in the fourth degree. For when we may not marry the daughter of any person, neither may we marry the granddaughter. But there does not appear to be any impediment to marrying the daughter of a woman whom your father has adopted; for she is not connected with you, either by natural or civil law.

D. xxiii. 2. 12. 4.

1. In the direct line every degree represents a generation. The son is in the first degree with respect to his father; the grandson in the second with respect to his grandfather. In the collateral line the generations are taken first up to, and then down from, the common ancestors. For instance, first cousins are in the fourth degree. From either cousin to his father is one degree, from the father to the grandfather is another, from the grandfather to the father of the other cousin is a third, and from that father to that cousin is a fourth.

The marriage of a man with his brother's daughter had been legalised in favour of Claudius and Agrippina (SUET. in Claud. 26; GAI. i. 62); but prohibited by Constantine (Cod. Theod. i. 2). Marriage with a sister's daughter was never allowed.

III children of brother's sister
may marry
The children of a lawful marriage never followed the family of the mother, and therefore, though she was adopted, remained as they were before. But of course a daughter could not have married an adopted son's son.

4. Duorum autem fratrum vel sororum liberi vel fratris et sororis jungi possunt.

4. The children of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and sister, may marry together.

D. xxiii. 2. 3.

The marriage of first cousins, forbidden by preceding emperors, had again been legalised by Arcadius and Honorius. (C. v. 4. 19.)

5. Item amitam, licet adoptivam, uxorem ducere non licet, item ma-

5. So, too, a man may not marry his paternal aunt, even though she is paternal, maternal or great aunt

no marriage

ris eam uxorem ducere: sed et si tu emancipatus fueris, nihil est impedimento nuptiis. Et ideo constat, si quis generum adoptare velit, debere eum ante filiam suam emancipare: et si quis velit nulum adoptare, debere eum ante filium emancipare.

lows, that if a man would adopt his son-in-law, he ought first to emancipate his daughter; and if he would adopt his daughter-in-law, he ought previously to emancipate his son.

GAI. i. 60, 61; D. xxiii. 2. 17. 1.

To adopt a son-in-law would be to make him brother by agnation of his own wife. The bar did not invalidate the previous marriage, but operated to restrain the adoption, until the daughter had been emancipated.

III mother's daughter sister's daughter
nephew's daughter
3. Fratrís vel sororis filiam uxorem ducere non licet. Sed nec neptem fratris vel sororis ducere quis potest, quamvis quarto gradu sint. Cujus enim filiam uxorem ducere non licet, ejus neque neptem permittitur. Ejus vero mulieris, quam pater tuus adoptavit, filiam non videris impediri uxorem ducere, quia neque naturali neque civili jure tibi conjungitur.

3. A man may not marry the daughter of a brother or a sister, nor the granddaughter, although she is in the fourth degree. For when we may not marry the daughter of any person, neither may we marry the granddaughter. But there does not appear to be any impediment to marrying the daughter of a woman whom your father has adopted; for she is not connected with you, either by natural or civil law.

D. xxiii. 2. 12. 4.

1 In the direct line every degree represents a generation. The son is in the first degree with respect to his father; the grandson in the second with respect to his grandfather. In the collateral line the generations are taken first up to, and then down from, the common ancestors. For instance, first cousins are in the fourth degree. From either cousin to his father is one degree, from the father to the grandfather is another, from the grandfather to the father of the other cousin is a third, and from that father to that cousin is a fourth.

The marriage of a man with his brother's daughter had been legalised in favour of Claudius and Agrippina (SUET. in Claud. 26; GAI. i. 62); but prohibited by Constantine (Cod. Theod. i. 2). Marriage with a sister's daughter was never allowed.

III
children of brother's sister
may marry
The children of a lawful marriage never followed the family of the mother, and therefore, though she was adopted, remained as they were before. But of course a daughter could not have married an adopted son's son.

4. Duorum autem fratrum vel sororum liberi vel fratris et sororis jungi possunt.

4. The children of two brothers or two sisters, or of a brother and sister, may marry together.

D. xxiii. 2. 3.

The marriage of first cousins, forbidden by preceding emperors, had again been legalised by Arcadius and Honorius. (C. v. 4. 19.)

5. Item amitam, licet adoptivam, uxorem ducere non licet, item ma-

5. So, too, a man may not marry his paternal aunt, even though she is paternal, maternal or great aunt

no marriage

terteram, quia parentum loco habentur. Qua ratione verum est, magnam quoque amitam et materteram magnam prohiberi uxorem ducere.

so only by adoption; nor his maternal aunt; because they are regarded as being in the place of ascendants. For the same reason, no person may marry his great-aunt, either paternal or maternal.

GAL. i. 62; D. xxiii. 2. 17. 2.

It was, of course, only possible to be in the same family with an adopted aunt on the father's side. A mother's sister by adoption would be in the family to which the mother belonged by birth, whereas the nephew would be in the family of the father, and therefore adoptivam is added to amitam only, not to materteram.

Every person in the first degree from a common ancestor was considered, so far as regarded marriage, in the position of that ancestor. Thus an aunt, being in the first degree from the grandfather, the common ancestor, was looked upon as standing in the place of that grandfather (parentis loco habetur), and could not therefore marry her nephew. A cousin would be in the second degree from the common ancestor, and therefore proximity would not be a bar to the union.

6. Adfinitatis quoque veneratione quarundam nuptiis abstinere necesse est. Ut ecce privignam aut nurum uxorem ducere non licet, quia utraque filiae loco sunt. Quod scilicet ita accipi debet, si fuit nurus aut privigna: nam si adhuc nurus est, id est si adhuc nupta est filio tuo, alia ratione uxorem eam ducere non poteris, quia eadem duobus nupta esse non potest: item si adhuc privigna tua est, id est si mater ejus tibi nupta est, ideo eam uxorem ducere non poteris, quia duas uxores eodem tempore habere non licet.

6. There are, too, other marriages from which we must abstain, from regard to the ties created by marriage; for example, a man may not marry his wife's daughter, or his son's wife, for they are both in the place of daughters to him; but this must be understood to mean those who have been our stepdaughters or daughters-in-law; for if a woman is still your daughter-in-law, that is, if she is still married to your son, you cannot marry her for another reason, as she cannot be the wife of two persons at once. And if your stepdaughter is still your stepdaughter, that is, if her mother is still married to you, you cannot marry her, because a person cannot have two wives at the same time.

GAL. i. 63.

Affinitas is the tie created by marriage between each person of the married pair and the kindred of the other.

7. Socrum quoque et novercam prohibitum est uxorem ducere, quia matris loco sunt. Quod et ipsum dissoluta demum affinitate procedit; alioquin si adhuc noverca est, id est si adhuc patri tuo nupta est, communi jure impeditur tibi nubere, quia eadem duobus nupta esse non potest: item si adhuc socrus est, id est si adhuc filia ejus tibi nupta est,

7. Again, a man is forbidden to marry his wife's mother, and his father's wife, because they hold the place of mothers to him; a prohibition which can only operate when the affinity is dissolved; for if your stepmother is still your stepmother, that is, if she is still married to your father, she would be prohibited from marrying you by the common rule of law, which forbids terteram, quia parentum loco habentur. Quia ratione verum est, magnam quoque amitam et materteram magnam prohiberi uxorem ducere.

so only by adoption; nor his maternal aunt; because they are regarded as being in the place of ascendants. For the same reason, no person may marry his great-aunt, either paternal or maternal.

GAL. i. 62; D. xxiii. 2. 17. 2.

It was, of course, only possible to be in the same family with an adopted aunt on the father's side. A mother's sister by adoption would be in the family to which the mother belonged by birth, whereas the nephew would be in the family of the father, and therefore adoptivam is added to amitam only, not to materteram.

Every person in the first degree from a common ancestor was considered, so far as regarded marriage, in the position of that ancestor. Thus an aunt, being in the first degree from the grandfather, the common ancestor, was looked upon as standing in the place of that grandfather (parentis loco habetur), and could not therefore marry her nephew. A cousin would be in the second degree from the common ancestor, and therefore proximity would not be a bar to the union.

6. Adfinitatis quoque veneratione quarundam nuptiis abstinere necesse est. Ut ecce privignam aut nurum uxorem ducere non licet, quia utraque filiae loco sunt. Quod scilicet ita accipi debet, si fuit nurus aut privigna: nam si adhuc nurus est, id est si adhuc nupta est filio tuo, alia ratione uxorem eam ducere non poteris, quia eadem duobus nupta esse non potest: item si adhuc privigna tua est, id est si mater ejus tibi nupta est, ideo eam uxorem ducere non poteris, quia duas uxores eodem tempore habere non licet.

6. There are, too, other marriages from which we must abstain, from regard to the ties created by marriage; for example, a man may not marry his wife's daughter, or his son's wife, for they are both in the place of daughters to him; but this must be understood to mean those who have been our stepdaughters or daughters-in-law; for if a woman is still your daughter-in-law, that is, if she is still married to your son, you cannot marry her for another reason, as she cannot be the wife of two persons at once. And if your stepdaughter is still your stepdaughter, that is, if her mother is still married to you, you cannot marry her, because a person cannot have two wives at the same time.

GAL. i. 63.

Affinitas is the tie created by marriage between each person of the married pair and the kindred of the other.

7. Soerum quoque et novercam prohibitum est uxorem ducere, quia matris loco sunt. Quod et ipsum dissoluta demum affinitate procedit; alioquin si adhuc noverca est, id est si adhuc patri tuo nupta est, communi jure impeditur tibi nubere, quia eadem duobus nupta esse non potest: item si adhuc socrus est, id est si adhuc filia ejus tibi nupta est,

7. Again, a man is forbidden to marry his wife's mother, and his father's wife, because they hold the place of mothers to him; a prohibition which can only operate when the affinity is dissolved; for if your stepmother is still your stepmother, that is, if she is still married to your father, she would be prohibited from marrying you by the common rule of law, which forbids

ideo impediuntur nuptiæ, quia duas uxores habere non potes.

a woman to have two husbands at the same time. So if your wife's mother is still your wife's mother, that is, if her daughter is still married to you, you cannot marry her, because you cannot have two wives at the same time.

GAL. i. 63.

The Institutes do not notice the marriage of a brother and sister-in-law. It was permitted up to the time of Constantine, who forbade it. (Cod. Theod. i. 2.) The prohibition was renewed by Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. (C. v. 5. 5.)

8. Mariti tamen filius ex alia uxore et uxoris filia ex alio marito, vel contra, matrimonium recte contrahunt, licet habeant fratrem sororemve ex matrimonio postea contracto natos.

8. The son of a husband by a former wife, and the daughter of a wife by a former husband, or the daughter of a husband by a former wife, and the son of a wife by a former husband, may lawfully contract marriage, even though they have a brother or sister born of the second marriage.

9. Si uxor tua post divortium ex alio filiam procreaverit, hæc non est quidem privigna tua, sed Julianus hujusmodi nuptiis abstinere debere ait: nam nec sponsam filii nurum esse nec patris sponsam novercam esse, rectius tamen et jure facturos eos, qui hujusmodi nuptiis se abstinuerint.

9. The daughter of a divorced wife by a second husband is not your step-daughter; and yet Julian says we ought to abstain from such a marriage. For the woman betrothed to your son is not your daughter-in-law; nor is the woman betrothed to you your son's stepmother; and yet it is more decent and more in accordance with law to abstain from such marriages.

D. xxiii. 2. 12. 1, et seq.

The sponsalia constituted in no way a binding tie. They were, as far as law went, mutual promises to contract a tie. Sponsalia sunt sponsio et repromissio nuptiarum futurarum. (D. xxiii. 1. 1.) All that was necessary was, that the parties, and their respective patresfamilias, should consent, and that the betrothed should have attained the age of seven years. Either party wishing to renounce the engagement, which, by law, was always permissible, could do so by announcing the wish in these words—conditione tua non utor, and forfeiting the arrha, i.e. things given as earnest or security that the promise should be kept, if any had been given. Hence it could only be custom founded on a respect for boni mores that prevented a father marrying his son's betrothed, or a son his father's.

10. Illud certum est, serviles quoque cognationes impedimento esse nuptiis, si forte pater et filia aut frater et soror manumissi fuerint.

10. It is certain that the relationships of slaves are an impediment to marriage, if the father and daughter, or brother and sister, as the case may be, have been enfranchised.

D. xxiii. 2. 14. 2.

The union of slaves, contubernium, was not recognised in law as a marriage, but still the law did not permit natural ties to be a woman to have two husbands at the same time. So if your wife's mother is still your wife's mother, that is, if her daughter is still married to you, you cannot marry her, because you cannot have two wives at the same time.

ideo impediuntur nuptiæ, quia duas uxores habere non potes.

GAI. i. 63.

The Institutes do not notice the marriage of a brother and sister-in-law. It was permitted up to the time of Constantine, who forbade it. (Cod. Theod. i. 2.) The prohibition was renewed by Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius. (C. v. 5. 5.)

8. Mariti tamen filius ex alia uxore et uxoris filia ex alio marito, vel contra, matrimonium recte contrahunt, licet habeant fratrem sororemve ex matrimonio postea contracto natos.

8. The son of a husband by a former wife, and the daughter of a wife by a former husband, or the daughter of a husband by a former wife, and the son of a wife by a former husband, may lawfully contract marriage, even though they have a brother or sister born of the second marriage.

9. Si uxor tua post divortium ex alio filiam procreaverit, hæc non est quidem privigna tua, sed Julianus hujusmodi nuptiis abstinere debere ait: nam nec sponsam filii nulum esse nec patris sponsam novercam esse, rectius tamen et jure facturos eos, qui hujusmodi nuptiis se abstinuerint.

9. The daughter of a divorced wife by a second husband is not your step-daughter; and yet Julian says we ought to abstain from such a marriage. For the woman betrothed to your son is not your daughter-in-law; nor is the woman betrothed to you your son's stepmother; and yet it is more decent and more in accordance with law to abstain from such marriages.

D. xxiii. 2. 12. 1, et seq.

The sponsalia constituted in no way a binding tie. They were, as far as law went, mutual promises to contract a tie. Sponsalia sunt sponsio et repromissio nuptiarum futurarum. (D. xxiii. 1. 1.) All that was necessary was, that the parties, and their respective patresfamilias, should consent, and that the betrothed should have attained the age of seven years. Either party wishing to renounce the engagement, which, by law, was always permissible, could do so by announcing the wish in these words—conditione tua non utor, and forfeiting the arrha, i.e. things given as earnest or security that the promise should be kept, if any had been given. Hence it could only be custom founded on a respect for boni mores that prevented a father marrying his son's betrothed, or a son his father's.

10. Illud certum est, serviles quoque cognationes impedimento esse nuptiis, si forte pater et filia aut frater et soror manumissi fuerint.

10. It is certain that the relationships of slaves are an impediment to marriage, if the father and daughter, or brother and sister, as the case may be, have been enfranchised.

D. xxiii. 2. 14. 2.

The union of slaves, contubernium, was not recognised in law as a marriage, but still the law did not permit natural ties to be violated in the case of slaves, any more than in the case of the issue of concubinage, or that of illicit commerce. (C. v. 4. 4.) Of course a manumission must have taken place, or there could be no question of nuptiæ; but if slaves were freed, then, although competent to contract a marriage, they were bound by the ties of blood, and could not marry any one connected with them by close natural relationship.

11. Sunt et aliæ personæ, quæ propter diversas rationes nuptias contrahere prohibentur, quas in libris digestorum seu pandectarum ex veteri jure collectarum enumerari permisimus.

11. There are other persons also between whom marriage is prohibited for different reasons, which we have permitted to be enumerated in the books of the Digests or Pandects, collected from the old law.

D. xxiii. 2. 44. pr. and 1.

The reasons referred to are not, like the preceding, founded on nearness of relationship or other tie, but on public or political grounds. The patres and plebs could not intermarry till the lex Canuleia. (See Introd. sec. 9.) Nor the freeborn and freedmen till the lex Julia et Papia Poppæa. (D. xxiii. 2. 23.) This law prohibited the marriage of senators with freedwomen, but allowed that of other freeborn, forbidding at the same time all freeborn to marry actresses or women of openly bad character. (D. xxiii. 2. 41.) Constantine extended the prohibition as regarded persons of high rank to marrying freewomen of the lowest class, humiles abjectæ personæ. (C. v. 27. 1.) This was repealed by Justinian. (Nov. 117. 6.) The guardian could not marry his ward before she was twenty-six years of age, unless betrothed or given to him by her father. (D. xxiii. 2. 66.) The governor of a province could not, while he held his office, marry a native of that province (D. xxiii. 2. 38. 57), lest he should abuse his authority. The ravisher could not marry the woman he violated. (C. ix. 13. 2.) Nor the adulterer his accomplice. (Nov. 134.) Nor a Jew a Christian. (C. i. 9. 6.)

While the distinction between Latini (coloniarii) and cives remained in force, a citizen had not connubium, and therefore could not contract justæ nuptiæ, with a Latina or a peregrina unless he received permission from the emperor to contract justæ nuptiæ with such a person, a permission which Gaius tells us was often accorded to veterans. (Gai. i. 57; ULP. Reg. v. 4.) But the unauthorised union of a citizen with a Latina or peregrina was recognised as matrimonium, though not as justæ nuptiæ. The wife was termed in such a case injusta uxor. None of the rules of law as to patria potestas and dos applied to such a union, but the breach of the tie would be looked on as adultery. (D. xlviii. 5. 13. pr. 1.)

12. Si adversus ea, quæ diximus, aliqui coierint, nec vir nec uxor nec nuptiæ nec matrimonium nec dos intellegitur. Itaque ii, qui ex

12. If persons unite themselves in contravention of the rules thus laid down, there is no husband or wife, no nuptials, no marriage, nor marriage

violated in the case of slaves, any more than in the case of the issue of concubinage, or that of illicit commerce. (C. v. 4. 4.) Of course a manumission must have taken place, or there could be no question of nuptie; but if slaves were freed, then, although competent to contract a marriage, they were bound by the ties of blood, and could not marry any one connected with them by close natural relationship.

11. Sunt et aliæ personæ, quæ propter diversas rationes nuptias contrahere prohibentur, quas in libris digestorum seu pandectarum ex veteri jure collectarum enumerari permisimus.

11. There are other persons also between whom marriage is prohibited for different reasons, which we have permitted to be enumerated in the books of the Digests or Pandects, collected from the old law.

D. xxiii. 2. 44. pr. and 1.

The reasons referred to are not, like the preceding, founded on nearness of relationship or other tie, but on public or political grounds. The patres and plebs could not intermarry till the lex Canuleia. (See Introd. sec. 9.) Nor the freeborn and freedmen till the lex Julia et Papia Poppæa. (D. xxiii. 2. 23.) This law prohibited the marriage of senators with freedwomen, but allowed that of other freeborn, forbidding at the same time all freeborn to marry actresses or women of openly bad character. (D. xxiii. 2. 41.) Constantine extended the prohibition as regarded persons of high rank to marrying freewomen of the lowest class, humiles abjectæ personæ. (C. v. 27. 1.) This was repealed by Justinian. (Nov. 117. 6.) The guardian could not marry his ward before she was twenty-six years of age, unless betrothed or given to him by her father. (D. xxiii. 2. 66.) The governor of a province could not, while he held his office, marry a native of that province (D. xxiii. 2. 38. 57), lest he should abuse his authority. The ravisher could not marry the woman he violated. (C. ix. 13. 2.) Nor the adulterer his accomplice. (Nov. 134.) Nor a Jew a Christian. (C. i. 9. 6.)

While the distinction between Latini (coloniarii) and cives remained in force, a citizen had not connubium, and therefore could not contract justæ nuptiæ, with a Latina or a peregrina unless he received permission from the emperor to contract justæ nuptiæ with such a person, a permission which Gaius tells us was often accorded to veterans. (Gai. i. 57; ULP. Reg. v. 4.) But the unauthorised union of a citizen with a Latina or peregrina was recognised as matrimonium, though not as justæ nuptiæ. The wife was termed in such a case injusta uxor. None of the rules of law as to patria potestas and dos applied to such a union, but the breach of the tie would be looked on as adultery. (D. xlviii. 5. 13. pr. 1.)

12. Si adversus ea, quæ diximus, aliqui coierint, nec vir nec uxor nec nuptiæ nec matrimonium nec dos intellegitur. Itaque ii, qui ex

12. If persons unite themselves in contravention of the rules thus laid down, there is no husband or wife, no nuptials, no marriage, nor marriage

eo coitu nascuntur, in potestate patris non sunt, sed tales sunt, quantum ad patriam potestatem pertinet, quales sunt ii, quos mater vulgo concepit. Nam nec hi patrem habere intelleguntur, cum his etiam incertus est: unde solent filii spurii appellari, vel a Græca voce quasi σποράδην concepti, vel quasi sine patre filii. Sequitur ergo, ut et dissoluto tali coitu nec dotis exactioni locus sit. Qui autem prohibitas nuptias coeunt, et alias poenas patiuntur, quæ sacris constitutionibus continentur.

portion, and the children born in such a connection are not in the power of the father. For, with regard to the power of a father, they are in the position of children conceived in prostitution, who are looked upon as having no father, because it is uncertain who he is; and are therefore called spurii, either from a Greek word σποράδην, meaning 'at hazard,' or as being sine patre, without a father. On the dissolution, therefore, of such a connection, there can be no claim made for the demand of a marriage portion. Persons who contract prohibited marriages are liable also to further penalties set forth in our imperial constitutions.

GAI. i. 64; D. i. 5. 28; D. xxiii. 2. 52.

Under the head of stuprum the Romans included every union of the sexes forbidden by morality. Different punishments awaited the guilty according to the degree of crime implied in the union. (Cod. v. 5. 4.) But the law recognised and regulated in concubinage (concubinatus) a permanent cohabitation, though without the sanction of marriage, between parties to whose marriage there was no legal obstacle. In every case where such an obstacle existed, unless the obstacle was one merely founded on public policy, such as that of being governor of a province, who was not permitted to marry a native of that province, the law inflicted a punishment on parties cohabiting in defiance of law. During the later Empire, the chief incident of the Roman concubinatus, which was so far restricted that a man could not have two concubines at once, or a wife and a concubine, was, that the children could be legitimatised, and so placed on a footing with the offspring of a legal marriage. (See next section.) Between the formation of such a union, and the contracting of a legal marriage, there seems to have been no difference except what rested in the intention of the parties. If two persons lived together, it was the intention with which they did so that decided whether the union was concubinage or marriage. Concubinam ex soli animi destinatione aestimari oportet. (D. xxv. 7. 4.) If there was no affectio maritalis, no intention to treat the woman as a wife, she was not a wife. Of course, practically, the question of consent was seldom, if ever, left doubtful. Generally speaking, an instrument fixing the amount settled respectively by the husband and wife, was drawn up, and the consent was publicly given in the presence of friends. And as concubinage was a dishonourable state, the presumption in favour of marriage, when the woman was of honest parentage and of good character, was very strong. To the union of concubinage none of the incidents of marriage attached. No dos could be asked for, no donatio was made by the man: the children were not in the power of the father.

eo coitu nascuntur, in potestate patris non sunt, sed tales sunt, quantum ad patriam potestatem pertinet, quales sunt ii, quos mater vulgo concepit. Nam nec hi patrem habere intelleguntur, cum his etiam incertus est: unde solent filii spurii appellari, vel a Græca voce quasi σποράδην concepti, vel quasi sine patre filii. Sequitur ergo, ut et dissoluto tali coitu nec dotis exactioni locus sit. Qui autem prohibitas nuptias coeunt, et alias pœnas patiuntur, quæ sacris constitutionibus continentur.

portion, and the children born in such a connection are not in the power of the father. For, with regard to the power of a father, they are in the position of children conceived in prostitution, who are looked upon as having no father, because it is uncertain who he is; and are therefore called spurii, either from a Greek word σποράδην, meaning 'at hazard,' or as being sine patre, without a father. On the dissolution, therefore, of such a connection, there can be no claim made for the demand of a marriage portion. Persons who contract prohibited marriages are liable also to further penalties set forth in our imperial constitutions.

GAI. i. 64; D. i. 5. 28; D. xxiii. 2. 52.

Under the head of stuprum the Romans included every union of the sexes forbidden by morality. Different punishments awaited the guilty according to the degree of crime implied in the union. (Cod. v. 5. 4.) But the law recognised and regulated in concubinage (concubinatus) a permanent cohabitation, though without the sanction of marriage, between parties to whose marriage there was no legal obstacle. In every case where such an obstacle existed, unless the obstacle was one merely founded on public policy, such as that of being governor of a province, who was not permitted to marry a native of that province, the law inflicted a punishment on parties cohabiting in defiance of law. During the later Empire, the chief incident of the Roman concubinatus, which was so far restricted that a man could not have two concubines at once, or a wife and a concubine, was, that the children could be legitimatised, and so placed on a footing with the offspring of a legal marriage. (See next section.) Between the formation of such a union, and the contracting of a legal marriage, there seems to have been no difference except what rested in the intention of the parties. If two persons lived together, it was the intention with which they did so that decided whether the union was concubinage or marriage. Concubinam ex sola animi destinatione aestimari oportet. (D. xxv. 7. 4.) If there was no affectio maritalis, no intention to treat the woman as a wife, she was not a wife. Of course, practically, the question of consent was seldom, if ever, left doubtful. Generally speaking, an instrument fixing the amount settled respectively by the husband and wife, was drawn up, and the consent was publicly given in the presence of friends. And as concubinage was a dishonourable state, the presumption in favour of marriage, when the woman was of honest parentage and of good character, was very strong. To the union of concubinage none of the incidents of marriage attached. No dos could be asked for, no donatio was made by the man: the children were not in the power of the father.

In a legal marriage, without conventio in manum, the marriage portion of the wife (dos) belonged to the husband during the continuance of the marriage. In early times his power over the dos was unrestricted, but afterwards successive limitations of this power were introduced. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3; Tit. 8. pr.) The settlement on the wife by the husband (donatio propter nuptias) belonged, during the marriage, to the wife, but was managed by the husband. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3.) Divorce was always permitted if either party ceased to wish to preserve the tie of marriage, which was only looked on as a contract resting on mutual consent. A woman in manu could not divorce herself from her husband, while a woman, not in manu but in the potestas of her father, might be divorced from her husband by her father, but Marcus Aurelius forbade the father to exercise his power except for some grave reasons. (Cod. v. 17. 5.) Unless, however, both parties consented to a divorce, heavy penalties were attached to its being insisted on by one alone, unless any of the grounds for divorce established by law, such as adultery or criminal conduct (Cod. v. 17. 8), could be shown to exist; and, by the lex Julia de adulteris, the fact of repudiation had to be established by the presence of seven citizens as witnesses, and a libellus repudii. After the divorce either party might, after a fixed interval, marry again, until, at a late period of Roman law, this power of remarriage was curtailed by the Theodosian code. (Cod. Th. iii. 16. 2.)

13. Aliquando autem evenit, ut liberi quidem statim, ut nati sunt, in potestate parentum non fiant, postea autem redigantur in potestatem. Qualis est is, qui, dum naturalis fuerat, postea curiæ datus potestati patris subicitur. Nec non is, qui a muliere libera procreatus, ejus matrimonium minime legibus interdictum fuerat, sed ad quam pater consuetudinem habuerat, postea ex nostra constitutione dotalibus instrumentis compositis, in potestate patris efficitur: quod et alii si ex eodem matrimonio fuerint procreati, similiter nostra constitutio præbuit.

13. It sometimes happens that children who at their birth were not in the power of their father, are brought under it afterwards. Such is the case of a natural son, who is given to the curia, and then becomes subject to his father's power. Again, a child born of a free woman, with whom marriage was not prohibited by any law, but with whom the father only cohabited, will likewise become subject to the power of his father if at any time afterwards dotal instruments are drawn up according to the provisions of our constitution. And this constitution carries with it the same result as to any other children who may be subsequently born of the same marriage.

GAI. i. 65; C. v. 27. 10.

Legitimation
By legitimation the offspring of concubinage were placed in the position of liberi legitimi, and this was effected in three ways: 1. By oblation to the curia; 2. By the subsequent marriage of the parents; and 3. By a rescript of the emperor, a mode introduced by Justinian in the 74th Novel. The curia was the class from which, in provincial towns, the magistrates were eligible. To be a member was a distinction, but an onerous one, from the expenses and burdens attached to the position. In order to prevent

In a legal marriage, without conventio in manum, the marriage portion of the wife (dos) belonged to the husband during the continuance of the marriage. In early times his power over the dos was unrestricted, but afterwards successive limitations of this power were introduced. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3; Tit. 8. pr.) The settlement on the wife by the husband (donatio propter nuptias) belonged, during the marriage, to the wife, but was managed by the husband. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 7. 3.) Divorce was always permitted if either party ceased to wish to preserve the tie of marriage, which was only looked on as a contract resting on mutual consent. A woman in manu could not divorce herself from her husband, while a woman, not in manu but in the potestas of her father, might be divorced from her husband by her father, but Marcus Aurelius forbade the father to exercise his power except for some grave reasons. (Cod. v. 17. 5.) Unless, however, both parties consented to a divorce, heavy penalties were attached to its being insisted on by one alone, unless any of the grounds for divorce established by law, such as adultery or criminal conduct (Cod. v. 17. 8), could be shown to exist; and, by the lex Julia de adulteris, the fact of repudiation had to be established by the presence of seven citizens as witnesses, and a libellus repudii. After the divorce either party might, after a fixed interval, marry again, until, at a late period of Roman law, this power of remarriage was curtailed by the Theodosian code. (Cod. Th. iii. 16. 2.)

18. Aliquando autem evenit, ut liberi quidem statim, ut nati sunt, in potestate parentum non fiant, postea autem redigantur in potestatem. Qualis est is, qui, dum naturalis fuerat, postea curiæ datus potestati patris subicitur. Nec non is, qui a muliere libera procreatus, ejus matrimonium minime legibus interdictum fuerat, sed ad quam pater consuetudinem habuerat, postea ex nostra constitutione dotalius instrumentis compositis, in potestate patris efficitur: quod et alii si ex eodem matrimonio fuerint procreati, similiter nostra constitutio præbuit.

13. It sometimes happens that children who at their birth were not in the power of their father, are brought under it afterwards. Such is the case of a natural son, who is given to the curia, and then becomes subject to his father's power. Again, a child born of a free woman, with whom marriage was not prohibited by any law, but with whom the father only cohabited, will likewise become subject to the power of his father if at any time afterwards dotal instruments are drawn up according to the provisions of our constitution. And this constitution carries with it the same result as to any other children who may be subsequently born of the same marriage.

GAL. i. 65; C. v. 27. 10.

Legitimation
By legitimation the offspring of concubinage were placed in the position of liberi legitimi, and this was effected in three ways: 1. By oblation to the curia; 2. By the subsequent marriage of the parents; and 3. By a rescript of the emperor, a mode introduced by Justinian in the 74th Novel. The curia was the class from which, in provincial towns, the magistrates were eligible. To be a member was a distinction, but an onerous one, from the expenses and burdens attached to the position. In order to prevent the order decaying through unwillingness to incur the expenses attending it, Theodosius and Valentinian permitted citizens, whether themselves members of the civitas or not, to present their children born in concubinage to, and make them members of, the order (Cod. v. 27. 3), by which they became legitimate, and the heirs of their father. This mode of legitimation, which could, of course, only be adopted when the parents were rich, did not, however, make the children complete members of the father's family. They became his legitimate children, but gained no new relationship or right of succession to any other member of his family. (C. v. 27. 9.)

Constantine first established that natural children should be made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents. Justinian required that at the moment of conception the parents should have been capable of a legal marriage; that an instrument settling the dos (instrumentum dotale), or, at least, attesting the marriage (instrumentum nuptiale), should be drawn up, and that the children should ratify the legitimation, for no one was made legitimate against his will. (Nov. 89. 11.)

If the mother was dead or had disappeared, and the marriage was thus impossible, Justinian enacted that the natural children (if there was no legitimate one) might, by an imperial rescript, be placed in the position they would have held if the marriage had taken place; and this rescript might be given to the children after the father's death, if the father, by his testament, expressed his wish to that effect. (Nov. 89. 9. 10.)

The readings of the last sentence of the text are very various, and Huschke inserts non before fuertint procreati; but the meaning of the passage would then be so obscure that it seems necessary to retain the reading adopted in most texts.

TIT. XI. DE ADOPTIONIBUS.

Non solum tamen naturales liberi secundum ea, quæ diximus, in potestate nostra sunt, verum etiam ii, quos adoptamus. Not only are our natural children, as we have said, in our power, but those also whom we adopt.

GAI. i. 97.

Before the time of Justinian, the effect of adoption (see Introd. sec. 42) was to place the person adopted exactly in the position he would have held had he been born a son of the person adopting him. All the property of the adoptive son belonged to his adoptive father. The adoptive son was heir to his adoptive father, if intestate, bore his name (retaining, however, the name of his own gens with the change of -us into -anus, as Octavius, Octavianus), and shared the sacred rites of the family he entered.

Naturales liberi is here opposed to adoptivi, not, as in the last Title, to legitimi.

304604

the order decaying through unwillingness to incur the expenses attending it, Theodosius and Valentinian permitted citizens, whether themselves members of the curia or not, to present their children born in concubinage to, and make them members of, the order (Cod. v. 27. 3), by which they became legitimate, and the heirs of their father. This mode of legitimation, which could, of course, only be adopted when the parents were rich, did not, however, make the children complete members of the father's family. They became his legitimate children, but gained no new relationship or right of succession to any other member of his family. (C. v. 27. 9.)

Constantine first established that natural children should be made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents. Justinian required that at the moment of conception the parents should have been capable of a legal marriage; that an instrument settling the dos (instrumentum dotale), or, at least, attesting the marriage (instrumentum nuptiale), should be drawn up, and that the children should ratify the legitimation, for no one was made legitimate against his will. (Nov. 89. 11.)

If the mother was dead or had disappeared, and the marriage was thus impossible, Justinian enacted that the natural children (if there was no legitimate one) might, by an imperial rescript, be placed in the position they would have held if the marriage had taken place; and this rescript might be given to the children after the father's death, if the father, by his testament, expressed his wish to that effect. (Nov. 89. 9. 10.)

The readings of the last sentence of the text are very various, and Huschke inserts non before fuertint procreati; but the meaning of the passage would then be so obscure that it seems necessary to retain the reading adopted in most texts.

TIT. XI. DE ADOPTIONIBUS.

Non solum tamen naturales liberi secundum ea, quæ diximus, in potestate nostra sunt, verum etiam ii, quos adoptamus.

Not only are our natural children, as we have said, in our power, but those also whom we adopt.

GAI. i. 97.

Before the time of Justinian, the effect of adoption (see Introd. sec. 42) was to place the person adopted exactly in the position he would have held had he been born a son of the person adopting him. All the property of the adoptive son belonged to his adoptive father. The adoptive son was heir to his adoptive father, if intestate, bore his name (retaining, however, the name of his own gens with the change of -us into -anus, as Octavius, Octavianus), and shared the sacred rites of the family he entered.

Naturales liberi is here opposed to adoptivi, not, as in the last Title, to legitimi.

304604

1. Adoptio autem duobus modis fit, aut principali rescripto aut imperio magistratus. Imperatoris auctoritate adoptamus eos easve, qui quæve sui juris sunt. Quæ species adoptionis dicitur arrogatio. Imperio magistratus adoptamus eos easve, qui quæve in potestate parentum sunt, sive primum gradum liberorum optineant, qualis est filius filia, sive inferiorem, qualis est nepos neptis, pronepos proneptis.

1. Adoption takes place in two ways, either by imperial rescript, or by the authority of the magistrate. The imperial rescript gives power to adopt persons of either sex who are sui juris; and this species of adoption is called arrogation. By the authority of the magistrate we may adopt persons of either sex in the power of an ascendant, whether in the first degree, as sons and daughters, or in an inferior degree, as grandchildren or great-grandchildren.

GAI. i. 98, 99.

A public character was always attached in ancient Roman law to so important an alteration in families as adoption. (See Introd. sec. 42.) The sanction of the curiæ was probably necessary to its validity, when the family of a member of the curiæ was affected. If the person adopted was sui juris, his entry into a new family (arrogatio) was jealously watched, as the pontifices would never allow it where there was any likelihood of the sacred rites of the family he quitted becoming extinct by his departure from it. The form of gaining the consent of the curiæ was even continued when the curiæ were only represented by thirty lictors, until the rescript of the emperor was substituted as a means of effecting arrogations.

What were the forms of arrogation, when neither the person arrogated nor the person arrogating belonged to the body of the curiæ, we have no certain knowledge; but we may guess that arrogation was effected by a fictitious suit, in which the person arrogated was claimed as the child of the arrogator, and let judgment go by default.

If the person adopted was under the power of another, the person under whose power he was had to release him from that power, which he did by selling him (mancipatio) three several times, which destroyed his own patria potestas (see Introd. sec. 42), and then giving him up to the adopting parent by a fictitious process of law, called 'in jure cessio,' in which he was claimed and acknowledged as the child of the person who adopted him, and pronounced to be so by the magistrate before whom the proceeding was held (imperio magistratus). The word adoptio was common to both processes, both to arrogatio, said by Gaius to be derived from rogare, because the consent of the person arrogating, of the person arrogated, and of the populus, was asked (GAI. i. 99), and to adoptio in its more limited sense of the adoption of a person not sui juris. For the ceremonies previously required for the adoption of a person alieni juris, Justinian substituted the simple proceeding of executing, in presence of a magistrate, a deed, declaring the fact of the adoption—the parties to the adoption, that is, the person giving, the person given, and the person receiving, being personally present to give their consent. But it was sufficient if the consent of the party adopted was expressed by

1. Adoptio autem duobus modis fit, aut principali rescripto aut imperio magistratus. Imperatoris auctoritate adoptamus eos easve, qui quæve sui juris sunt. Quæ species adoptionis dicitur arrogatio. Imperio magistratus adoptamus eos easve, qui quæve in potestate parentum sunt, sive primum gradum liberorum optineant, qualis est filius filia, sive inferiorem, qualis est nepos neptis, pronepos proneptis.

1. Adoption takes place in two ways, either by imperial rescript, or by the authority of the magistrate. The imperial rescript gives power to adopt persons of either sex who are sui juris; and this species of adoption is called arrogatio. By the authority of the magistrate we may adopt persons of either sex in the power of an ascendant, whether in the first degree, as sons and daughters, or in an inferior degree, as grandchildren or great-grandchildren.

GAI. i. 98, 99.

A public character was always attached in ancient Roman law to so important an alteration in families as adoption. (See Introd. sec. 42.) The sanction of the curie was probably necessary to its validity, when the family of a member of the curie was affected. If the person adopted was sui juris, his entry into a new family (arrogatio) was jealously watched, as the pontifices would never allow it where there was any likelihood of the sacred rites of the family he quitted becoming extinct by his departure from it. The form of gaining the consent of the curie was even continued when the curie were only represented by thirty lictors, until the rescript of the emperor was substituted as a means of effecting arrogations.

What were the forms of arrogation, when neither the person arrogated nor the person arrogating belonged to the body of the curie, we have no certain knowledge; but we may guess that arrogation was effected by a fictitious suit, in which the person arrogated was claimed as the child of the arrogator, and let judgment go by default.

If the person adopted was under the power of another, the person under whose power he was had to release him from that power, which he did by selling him (mancipatio) three several times, which destroyed his own patria potestas (see Introd. sec. 42), and then giving him up to the adopting parent by a fictitious process of law, called 'in jure cessio,' in which he was claimed and acknowledged as the child of the person who adopted him, and pronounced to be so by the magistrate before whom the proceeding was held (imperio magistratus). The word adoptio was common to both processes, both to arrogatio, said by Gaius to be derived from roga, because the consent of the person arrogating, of the person arrogated, and of the populus, was asked (GAI. i. 99), and to adoptio in its more limited sense of the adoption of a person not sui juris. For the ceremonies previously required for the adoption of a person alieni juris, Justinian substituted the simple proceeding of executing, in presence of a magistrate, a deed, declaring the fact of the adoption—the parties to the adoption, that is, the person giving, the person given, and the person receiving, being personally present to give their consent. But it was sufficient if the consent of the party adopted was expressed by his not declaring his dissent—non contradicente. (C. viii. 48. 11; Tit. 12. 8.)

2. Sed hodie ex nostra constitutione, cum filiusfamilias a patre naturali extraneæ personæ in adoptionem datur, jura potestatis naturalis patris minime dissolvuntur nec quidquam ad patrem adoptivum transit nec in potestate ejus est, licet ab intestato jura successionis ei a nobis tributa sunt. Si vero pater naturalis non extraneo, sed avo filii sui materno, vel si ipse pater naturalis fuerit emancipatus, etiam paterno, vel proavo simili modo paterno vel materno filium suum dedit in adoptionem: in hoc casu quia in unam personam concurrunt et naturalia et adoptionis jura, manet stabile jus patris adoptivi, et naturali vinculo copulatum et legitimo adoptionis modo constructum, ut et in familia et in potestate hujusmodi patris adoptivi sit.

2. But now, by our constitution, when a filiusfamilias is given in adoption by his natural father to a stranger, the power of the natural father is not dissolved; no right passes to the adoptive father, nor is the adopted son in his power, although we allow such son the right of succession to his adoptive father dying intestate. But if a natural father should give his son in adoption, not to a stranger, but to the son's maternal grandfather; or, supposing the natural father has been emancipated, if he gives the son in adoption to the son's paternal grandfather, or to the son's paternal great-grandfather; or if the natural father gives the son in adoption to the son's maternal grandfather, then in these cases, as the rights of nature and adoption concur in the same person, the power of the adoptive father, knit by natural ties and strengthened by a legal form of adoption, is preserved undiminished, so that the adopted son is both in the family, and in the power, of his adoptive father.

C. viii. 48. 10.

The change made by Justinian in the law of adoption (C. viii. 48. 10) completely altered its character. It used sometimes to happen under the old law, that a son lost the succession to his own father by being adopted, and to his adoptive father by a subsequent emancipation. Justinian wished to remedy this effectually. He therefore provided that the son given in adoption to a stranger, that is, any one not an ascendant, should be in the same position to his own father as before, but gain by adoption the succession to his adoptive father, if the adoptive father died intestate. The adoptive father was not, however, bound, like the natural father (Bk. ii. Tit. 18), to leave him a share of his property, if he made a will. In this kind of adoption, which commentators have termed the adoptio minus plena, the adoptive son still remained in the family of his natural father; and the only change which adoption caused was, that he acquired a right of succession to his adoptive father, if intestate. (Bk. iii. Tit. 1. 14.)

When the person to whom the adoptive son was given, was one of his own ascendants, then the old law was permitted to regulate the effects of the adoption, and the adoption in this case was what the commentators term adoptio plena. The adoptive son entered the family of the ascendant, who became his adoptive father. A grandson was not naturally in the same family with his maternal grandfather, and could only enter the family of his

his not declaring his dissent—non contradicente. (C. viii. 48. 11; Tit. 12. 8.)

2. Sed hodie ex nostra constitutione, cum filiusfamilias a patre naturali extraneæ personæ in adoptionem datur, jura potestatis naturalis patris minime dissolvuntur nec quidquam ad patrem adoptivum transit nec in potestate ejus est, licet ab intestato jura successionis ei a nobis tributa sunt. Si vero pater naturalis non extraneo, sed avo filii sui materno, vel si ipse pater naturalis fuerit emancipatus, etiam paterno, vel proavo simili modo paterno vel materno filium suum dederit in adoptionem: in hoc casu quia in unam personam concurrunt et naturalia et adoptionis jura, manet stabile jus patris adoptivi, et naturali vinculo copulatum et legitimo adoptionis modo constructum, ut et in familia et in potestate hujusmodi patris adoptivi sit.

2. But now, by our constitution, when a filiusfamilias is given in adoption by his natural father to a stranger, the power of the natural father is not dissolved; no right passes to the adoptive father, nor is the adopted son in his power, although we allow such son the right of succession to his adoptive father dying intestate. But if a natural father should give his son in adoption, not to a stranger, but to the son's maternal grandfather; or, supposing the natural father has been emancipated, if he gives the son in adoption to the son's paternal grandfather, or to the son's paternal great-grandfather; or if the natural father gives the son in adoption to the son's maternal grandfather, then in these cases, as the rights of nature and adoption concur in the same person, the power of the adoptive father, knit by natural ties and strengthened by a legal form of adoption, is preserved undiminished, so that the adopted son is both in the family, and in the power, of his adoptive father.

C. viii. 48. 10.

The change made by Justinian in the law of adoption (C. viii. 48. 10) completely altered its character. It used sometimes to happen under the old law, that a son lost the succession to his own father by being adopted, and to his adoptive father by a subsequent emancipation. Justinian wished to remedy this effectually. He therefore provided that the son given in adoption to a stranger, that is, any one not an ascendant, should be in the same position to his own father as before, but gain by adoption the succession to his adoptive father, if the adoptive father died intestate. The adoptive father was not, however, bound, like the natural father (Bk. ii. Tit. 18), to leave him a share of his property, if he made a will. In this kind of adoption, which commentators have termed the adoptio minus plena, the adoptive son still remained in the family of his natural father; and the only change which adoption caused was, that he acquired a right of succession to his adoptive father, if intestate. (Bk. iii. Tit. 1. 14.)

When the person to whom the adoptive son was given, was one of his own ascendants, then the old law was permitted to regulate the effects of the adoption, and the adoption in this case was what the commentators term adoptio plena. The adoptive son entered the family of the ascendant, who became his adoptive father. A grandson was not naturally in the same family with his maternal grandfather, and could only enter the family of his

his fa
cipale
cognit exquin hones cum rogati
gator

3. When any one, under the age of puberty, is arrogated by imperial rescript, the arrogation is only allowed when inquiry has been made into the circumstances of the case. It is asked, what is the motive leading to the arrogation, and whether the arrogation is honourable and expedient for the pupil. And the arrogation is always made under certain conditions: the arrogator is obliged to give security to a public person, that is, a notary, that if the pupil should die within the age of puberty, he will restore all the property to those who would have succeeded him if no adoption had been made. Nor, again, can the arrogator emancipate the person arrogated, unless, on examination into the case, it appears that the latter is worthy of emancipation; and then the arrogator must restore the property belonging to the person he emancipates. Also, if the arrogator, on his deathbed, has disinherited his arrogated son, or, during his life, has emancipated him without just cause, he is obliged to give up to him the fourth part of all his goods, besides what the son brought to him at the time of arrogation, or has acquired for him afterwards.

Conditions of Agency

Im: ...

Answer:

5

1

1

2

1.

3

1

□

3

Formerly neither women nor children under the age of puberty could be arrogated. Arrogation was first permitted in the case of the latter by Antoninus Pius (ULP. Reg. viii. 5), but only after strict inquiry had been made into the circumstances of the case. When arrogation by imperial rescript was introduced, women also might be arrogated. (D. i. 7. 21.) Besides the general inquiry which took place in every case of adoption, as to the ages of the parties, and the possible injustice to other members of the family, to which the introduction of a new member might give rise, in the case of an impubes inquiry was made whether the character and circumstances of the proposed arrogator were such as to make it probable that the arrogation would be beneficial to the person arrogated. Further, certain regulations were made, designed to protect the property of the impubes, which were briefly as follows:—1. If the

his fa
cipale
cognit
exquin
hones cum rogati
gator

3. When any one, under the age of puberty, is arrogated by imperial rescript, the arrogation is only allowed when inquiry has been made into the circumstances of the case. It is asked, what is the motive leading to the arrogation, and whether the arrogation is honourable and expedient for the pupil. And the arrogation is always made under certain conditions: the arrogator is obliged to give security to a public person, that is, a notary, that if the pupil should die within the age of puberty, he will restore all the property to those who would have succeeded him if no adoption had been made. Nor, again, can the arrogator emancipate the person arrogated, unless, on examination into the case, it appears that the latter is worthy of emancipation; and then the arrogator must restore the property belonging to the person he emancipates. Also, if the arrogator, on his deathbed, has disinherited his arrogated son, or, during his life, has emancipated him without just cause, he is obliged to give up to him the fourth part of all his goods, besides what the son brought to him at the time of arrogation, or has acquired for him afterwards.

Conditions of Agency

GAL. i. 102; D. i. 7. 18; D. xxxviii. 5. 13.

Formerly neither women nor children under the age of puberty could be arrogated. Arrogation was first permitted in the case of the latter by Antoninus Pius (ULP. Reg. viii. 5), but only after strict inquiry had been made into the circumstances of the case. When arrogation by imperial rescript was introduced, women also might be arrogated. (D. i. 7. 21.) Besides the general inquiry which took place in every case of adoption, as to the ages of the parties, and the possible injustice to other members of the family, to which the introduction of a new member might give rise, in the case of an impubes inquiry was made whether the character and circumstances of the proposed arrogator were such as to make it probable that the arrogation would be beneficial to the person arrogated. Further, certain regulations were made, designed to protect the property of the impubes, which were briefly as follows:—1. If the

I arrogated son died before puberty, the arrogator had to restore the
 II property of the son to that son's natural heirs. 2. If the arrogated
 III son was disinherited or was emancipated without good reason before IV puberty, the arrogated son received back all his own property, and also received one-fourth of the property of the arrogator, called the quarta D. Pii, or quarta Antonina, as having been first required by that emperor. 3. If the son was emancipated before puberty for a good reason, the son received his own property from the arrogator, but nothing more. 4. Lastly, if the arrogated son, on attaining puberty, wished to rescind the arrogation, he was at liberty to do so, if he could show it was prejudicial to him. Under Justinian arrogated persons and persons adopted by ascendants were treated as cognati in the succession to the natural father (Bk. iii. Tit. 5. 3); and, in the intestate succession to the arrogated son, the arrogator was postponed to the children and brothers and sisters of the arrogated son (Bk. iii. Tit. 10. 2), and the arrogator had only the usufruct of the property of the arrogated son while the arrogated son was living.

There is some little doubt when arrogation was first made per rescriptum principale. However, Ulpian (Reg. viii. 5) expresses himself too plainly to admit of a doubt that in his time arrogation was made per populum (i.e. by the curie represented by lictors), and not by imperial licence. He further adds, that arrogation was only made at Rome (Reg. viii. 4), but, of course, when the system of permitting it by imperial rescript was adopted, place could have nothing to do with arrogation.

The tabularii here spoken of were public notaries, who kept public registers (tabulae), on which formal acts were recorded.

4. Minorem natu non posse majorem adoptare placet: adoptio enim naturam imitatur, et pro monstro est, ut major sit filius quam pater. Debet itaque is, qui sibi per adrogationem vel adoptionem filium facit, plena pubertate, id est decem et octo annis præcedere.

4. A younger person cannot adopt an older; for adoption imitates nature; and it seems unnatural, that a son should be older than his father. Any one, therefore, who wishes either to adopt or arrogate a son, should be the elder by the term of complete puberty, that is, by eighteen years.

D. i. 7. 15. 3; D. i. 7. 16; D. i. 7. 40. 1.

As long as the required number of years intervened, there was no further positive rule as to age; but it being in the discretion of the emperor to allow arrogation or not, there was generally a disposition to refuse it unless the person who wished to adopt was of such an age, or in such physical circumstances, as to make it improbable he should have children of his own. (D. i. 7. 15.) But unmarried persons might adopt. (D. i. 7. 30.)

The legal age of puberty in males was fourteen; but eighteen was the age at which the body was considered to be fully developed in all cases, plena pubertas.

5. Licet autem et in locum nepotis vel neptis vel in locum prone-

5. But a person may adopt another as grandson or granddaughter, great-

I arrogated son died before puberty, the arrogator had to restore the
 II property of the son to that son's natural heirs. 2. If the arrogated
 III son was disinherited or was emancipated without good reason before IV puberty, the arrogated son received back all his own property, and also received one-fourth of the property of the arrogator, called the quarta D. Pii, or quarta Antonina, as having been first required by that emperor. 3. If the son was emancipated before puberty for a good reason, the son received his own property from the arrogator, but nothing more. 4. Lastly, if the arrogated son, on attaining puberty, wished to rescind the arrogation, he was at liberty to do so, if he could show it was prejudicial to him. Under Justinian arrogated persons and persons adopted by ascendants were treated as cognati in the succession to the natural father (Bk. iii. Tit. 5. 3);
 and, in the intestate succession to the arrogated son, the arrogator was postponed to the children and brothers and sisters of the arrogated son (Bk. iii. Tit. 10. 2), and the arrogator had only the usufruct of the property of the arrogated son while the arrogated son was living.

There is some little doubt when arrogation was first made per rescriptum principale. However, Ulpian (Reg. viii. 5) expresses himself too plainly to admit of a doubt that in his time arrogation was made per populum (i.e. by the curie represented by lictors), and not by imperial licence. He further adds, that arrogation was only made at Rome (Reg. viii. 4), but, of course, when the system of permitting it by imperial rescript was adopted, place could have nothing to do with arrogation.

The tabularii here spoken of were public notaries, who kept public registers (tabulae), on which formal acts were recorded.

4. Minorem natu non posse majorem adoptare placet: adoptio enim naturam imitatur, et pro monstro est, ut major sit filius quam pater. Debet itaque is, qui sibi per adrogationem vel adoptionem filium facit, plena pubertate, id est decem et octo annis præcedere.

4. A younger person cannot adopt an older; for adoption imitates nature; and it seems unnatural, that a son should be older than his father. Any one, therefore, who wishes either to adopt or arrogate a son, should be the elder by the term of complete puberty, that is, by eighteen years.

D. i. 7. 15. 3; D. i. 7. 16; D. i. 7. 40. 1.

As long as the required number of years intervened, there was no further positive rule as to age; but it being in the discretion of the emperor to allow arrogation or not, there was generally a disposition to refuse it unless the person who wished to adopt was of such an age, or in such physical circumstances, as to make it improbable he should have children of his own. (D. i. 7. 15.) But unmarried persons might adopt. (D. i. 7. 30.)

The legal age of puberty in males was fourteen; but eighteen was the age at which the body was considered to be fully developed in all cases, plena pubertas.

5. Licet autem et in locum nepotis vel neptis vel in locum prone-

5. But a person may adopt another as grandson or granddaughter, great-potis vel proneptis vel deinceps grandson or great-granddaughter, or adoptare, quamvis filium quis non any other descendant, although he has habeat. no son.

It would have seemed, without express enactment, that a person, to have a grandson in his power, must have or have had a son, as the sons of his daughter would not be in his power. But, as we know, the maternal grandfather might adopt. With respect to the degrees of marriage, it sometimes made an important difference whether a person was adopted as a son or grandson. The natural (i.e. non-adoptive) granddaughter, for instance, of the person adopting would be cousin or niece of the person adopted, according as he was adopted as a grandson or son, and might marry him in the one case, and not in the other.

6. Et tam filium alienum quis in locum nepotis potest adoptare, quam nepotem in locum filii.

7. Sed si quis nepotis loco adoptet, vel quasi ex eo filio, quem habet jam adoptatum, vel quasi ex illo, quem naturalem in sua potestate habet: in eo casu et filius consentire debet, ne ei invito suus heres adnascatur. Sed ex contrario si avus ex filio nepotem dat in adoptionem, non est necesse filium consentire.

6. A man may adopt the son of another as his grandson, and the grandson of another as his son.

7. If a man adopts a grandson to be the son of a son already adopted, or of a natural son in his power, the consent of this son ought first to be obtained, that he may not have a suus heres given him against his will. But, on the contrary, if a grandfather gives in adoption his grandson by a son, the consent of the son is not necessary.

D. i. 7. 6. 10, 11; D. xxiii. i. 16. 1.

A grandson could be adopted either generally, when he was supposed to be the issue of a deceased son, and so was sui juris at the death of the grandfather; or, specially as the son of a particular son, in which case he came under that son's power when the grandfather died. The grandfather could at his pleasure diminish, but could not add to, the number of his son's family: because otherwise the son would have had a suus heres (see Introd. sec. 77) forced on him against his will, to take a share of his property.

8. In plurimis autem causis assimilatur is, qui adoptatus vel adrogatus est, ei, qui ex legitimo matrimonio natus est. Et ideo si quis per imperatorem sive apud prætorem vel apud præsidem provincie non extraneum adoptaverit, potest eundem alii in adoptionem dare.

8. He who is either adopted or arrogated is assimilated, in many points, to a son born in lawful matrimony; and therefore, if any one adopts by imperial rescript, or if he adopts before the prætor or the præses of a province, any one who is not a stranger, he can afterwards give in adoption to another the person whom he has adopted.

GAI. i. 105.

The text says that the adoptive son is assimilated to the natural in plurimis causis, and not altogether; because, among other differences, if the adoptive son left his adoptive family, he ceased to have any relationship whatever to its members; but the

potis vel proneptis vel deinceps grandson or great-granddaughter, or adoptare, quamvis filium quis non any other descendant, although he has habeat. no son.

It would have seemed, without express enactment, that a person, to have a grandson in his power, must have or have had a son, as the sons of his daughter would not be in his power. But, as we know, the maternal grandfather might adopt. With respect to the degrees of marriage, it sometimes made an important difference whether a person was adopted as a son or grandson. The natural (i.e. non-adoptive) granddaughter, for instance, of the person adopting would be cousin or niece of the person adopted, according as he was adopted as a grandson or son, and might marry him in the one case, and not in the other.

6. Et tam filium alienum quis in locum nepotis potest adoptare, quam nepotem in locum filii.

7. Sed si quis nepotis loco adoptet, vel quasi ex eo filio, quem habet jam adoptatum, vel quasi ex illo, quem naturalem in sua potestate habet: in eo casu et filius consentire debet, ne ei invito suus heres adgnascatur. Sed ex contrario si avus ex filio nepotem dat in adoptionem, non est necesse filium consentire.

6. A man may adopt the son of another as his grandson, and the grandson of another as his son.

7. If a man adopts a grandson to be the son of a son already adopted, or of a natural son in his power, the consent of this son ought first to be obtained, that he may not have a suus heres given him against his will. But, on the contrary, if a grandfather gives in adoption his grandson by a son, the consent of the son is not necessary.

D. i. 7. 6. 10, 11; D. xxiii. i. 16. 1.

A grandson could be adopted either generally, when he was supposed to be the issue of a deceased son, and so was suus juris at the death of the grandfather; or, specially as the son of a particular son, in which case he came under that son's power when the grandfather died. The grandfather could at his pleasure diminish, but could not add to, the number of his son's family: because otherwise the son would have had a suus heres (see Introd. sec. 77) forced on him against his will, to take a share of his property.

8. In plurimis autem causis assimilatur is, qui adoptatus vel adrogatus est, ei, qui ex legitimo matrimonio natus est. Et ideo si quis per imperatorem sive apud prætorem vel apud præsidem provincie non extraneum adoptaverit, potest eundem alii in adoptionem dare.

8. He who is either adopted or arrogated is assimilated, in many points, to a son born in lawful matrimony; and therefore, if any one adopts by imperial rescript, or if he adopts before the prætor or the præses of a province, any one who is not a stranger, he can afterwards give in adoption to another the person whom he has adopted.

GAI. i. 105.

The text says that the adoptive son is assimilated to the natural in plurimis causis, and not altogether; because, among other differences, if the adoptive son left his adoptive family, he ceased to have any relationship whatever to its members; but the natural son was always cognatus to his own blood relations; although, by emancipation or adoption, he might cease to be agnatus to them.

Under Justinian's legislation the person adopting a stranger had no patria potestas over him at all, and therefore could not exercise such a power as that of giving his adoptive son in adoption to another person. If the adoption was made by imperial rescript, if, that is, it was an arrogation that took place, the arrogator had the patria potestas in all cases.

When once the tie of adoption was dissolved, all the relations created by it were entirely at an end, except that marriage was forbidden between the person adopting and the person adopted. (See Tit. 10. 1.) In omni fere jure, finita patris adoptivi potestate, nullum ex pristino jure retinetur vestigium. (D. i. 7. 13.) But the tie could never again be renewed between the same persons. (D. i. 7. 37. 1.)

9. Sed et illud utriusque adoptionis commune est, quod et hi, qui generare non possunt, quales sunt spadones, adoptare possunt, castrati autem non possunt.

9. It is a rule common to both kinds of adoption, that persons, although incapable of procreating, as, for instance, impotent persons, may, but those who are castrated, cannot, adopt.

GAI. i. 108.

The distinction was drawn because it was considered as never perfectly certain that the former (spadones) would not at some time or other have children of their own.

10. Feminae quoque adoptare non possunt, quia nec naturales liberos in potestate sua habent: sed ex indulgentia principis ad solatium iberorum amissorum adoptare possunt.

10. Women, also, cannot adopt; for they have not even their own children in their power; but by the indulgence of the emperor, as a comfort for the loss of their own children, they are allowed to adopt.

GAI. i. 104; C. viii. 48. 5.

Women could not adopt, because the meaning of adoption was that the person adopted passed into the patria potestas of the person adopting. The adoption mentioned in the text (which was permitted by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian, C. viii. 48. 5), only placed the adopted children in the same relation to the woman as her own children would have held. She gained nothing like patria potestas over them.

11. Illud proprium est illius adoptionis, quæ per sacrum oraculum fit, quod is, qui liberos in potestate habet, si se adrogandum dederit, non solum ipse potestati adrogatoris subicitur, sed etiam liberi ejus in ejusdem sunt potestate tamquam nepotes. Sic enim et divus Augustus non ante Tiberium adoptavit, quam is Germanicum adoptavit: ut protinus ado-

11. Adoption by the rescript of the emperor has this peculiarity. If a person, having children under his power, should give himself in arrogation, not only does he submit himself to the power of the arrogator, but his children are also in the arrogator's power, being considered his grandchildren. It was for this reason that Augustus did not adopt Tiberius until Tiberius natural son was always cognatus to his own blood relations; although, by emancipation or adoption, he might cease to be agnatus to them.

Under Justinian's legislation the person adopting a stranger had no patria potestas over him at all, and therefore could not exercise such a power as that of giving his adoptive son in adoption to another person. If the adoption was made by imperial rescript, if, that is, it was an arrogation that took place, the arrogator had the patria potestas in all cases.

When once the tie of adoption was dissolved, all the relations created by it were entirely at an end, except that marriage was forbidden between the person adopting and the person adopted. (See Tit. 10. 1.) In omni fere jure, finita patris adoptivi potestate, nullum ex pristino jure retinetur vestigium. (D. i. 7. 13.) But the tie could never again be renewed between the same persons. (D. i. 7. 37. 1.)

9. Sed et illud utriusque adoptionis commune est, quod et hi, qui generare non possunt, quales sunt spadones, adoptare possunt, castrati autem non possunt.

9. It is a rule common to both kinds of adoption, that persons, although incapable of procreating, as, for instance, impotent persons, may, but those who are castrated, cannot, adopt.

GAL. i. 103.

The distinction was drawn because it was considered as never perfectly certain that the former (spadones) would not at some time or other have children of their own.

10. Feminae quoque adoptare non possunt, quia nec naturales liberos in potestate sua habent: sed ex indulgentia principis ad solatium iberorum amissorum adoptare possunt.

10. Women, also, cannot adopt; for they have not even their own children in their power; but by the indulgence of the emperor, as a comfort for the loss of their own children, they are allowed to adopt.

GAL. i. 104; C. viii. 48. 5.

Women could not adopt, because the meaning of adoption was that the person adopted passed into the patria potestas of the person adopting. The adoption mentioned in the text (which was permitted by a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian, C. viii. 48. 5), only placed the adopted children in the same relation to the woman as her own children would have held. She gained nothing like patria potestas over them.

11. Illud proprium est illius adoptionis, quæ per sacrum oraculum fit, quod is, qui liberos in potestate habet, si se adrogandum dederit, non solum ipse potestati adrogatoris subicitur, sed etiam liberi ejus in ejusdem fiunt potestate tamquam nepotes. Sic enim et divus Augustus non ante Tiberium adoptavit, quam is Germanicum adoptavit: ut protinus ado-

11. Adoption by the rescript of the emperor has this peculiarity. If a person, having children under his power, should give himself in arrogation, not only does he submit himself to the power of the arrogator, but his children are also in the arrogator's power, being considered his grandchildren. It was for this reason that Augustus did not adopt Tiberius until Tiberius

ptione facta incipiat Germanicus Augusti nepos esse.

had adopted Germanicus; so that directly the adoption was made, Germanicus became the grandson of Augustus.

GAI. i. 107.

This is said to be an incident of arrogation only, because when a person not sui juris was adopted, his children were not in his power, and so he could not transfer them to the power of his adoptive father; into which they only came after the death of the person in whose power their own natural father was.

All the property of the person arrogated became, before Justinian's time, the property of the arrogator. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 10.) The adoptive son, as he was previously in the power of his natural father, had no property to pass.

12. Apud Catonem bene scriptum refert antiquitas, servi si a domino adoptati sint, ex hoc ipso posse liberari. Unde et nos eruditi in nostra constitutione etiam eum servum, quem dominus, actis intervenientibus, filium suum nominaverit, liberum esse constituimus, licet hoc ad jus filii accipiendum ei non sufficit.

12. Cato, as we learn from the ancients, has with good reason written, that slaves, when adopted by their masters, are thereby made free. In accordance with which opinion, we have decided by one of our constitutions, that a slave to whom his master by a solemn deed gives the title of son is thereby made free, although he does not acquire thereby the rights of a son.

C. vii. 6. 10.

It is doubtful whether slaves could be adopted, so as to become members of the family of the person adopting them. Aulus Gellius (Noct. Attic. v. 19) says that the majority of the ancient jurists, including Sabinus, held that they could. Theophilus says Cato was of the contrary opinion. They certainly became freedmen, and never ingenui, by adoption; even a freedman never became ingenuus by adoption (D. i. 7. 46), and he could only be adopted by his patron (D. i. 7. 15), and on a good ground, such as the patron having no children. (C. viii. 48.)

TIT. XII. QUIBUS MODIS JUS POTESTATIS SOLVITUR.

Videamus nunc, quibus modis ii, qui alieno juri subjecti sunt, eo jure liberantur. Et quidem servi quemadmodum potestate liberantur, ex his intellegere possumus, quæ de servis manumittendis superius exposuimus. Hi vero, qui in potestate parentis sunt, mortuo eo sui juris fiunt. Sed hoc distinctionem recipit. Nam mortuo patre sane omnimodo filii filive sui juris efficiuntur. Mortuo vero avo non omnimodo nepotes neptesque sui juris fiunt, sed ita, si post

Let us now inquire in what ways persons in the power of others are freed from it. How slaves are freed from the power of their masters may be learnt from what we have already said with regard to manumission. Those who are in the power of an ascendant become sui juris at his death; a rule, however, which admits of a distinction. For when a father dies, his sons and daughters become undoubtedly sui juris; but when a grandfather dies, his grandchildren do not

ptione facta incipiat Germanicus Augusti nepos esse.

had adopted Germanicus; so that directly the adoption was made, Germanicus became the grandson of Augustus.

GAL. i. 107.

This is said to be an incident of arrogation only, because when a person not sui juris was adopted, his children were not in his power, and so he could not transfer them to the power of his adoptive father; into which they only came after the death of the person in whose power their own natural father was.

All the property of the person arrogated became, before Justinian's time, the property of the arrogator. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 10.) The adoptive son, as he was previously in the power of his natural father, had no property to pass.

12. Apud Catonem bene scriptum refert antiquitas, servi si a domino adoptati sint, ex hoc ipso posse liberari. Unde et nos eruditi in nostra constitutione etiam eum servum, quem dominus, actis interventionibus, filium suum nominaverit, liberum esse constituimus, licet hoc ad jus filii accipiendum ei non sufficit.

12. Cato, as we learn from the ancients, has with good reason written, that slaves, when adopted by their masters, are thereby made free. In accordance with which opinion, we have decided by one of our constitutions, that a slave to whom his master by a solemn deed gives the title of son is thereby made free, although he does not acquire thereby the rights of a son.

C. vii. 6. 10.

It is doubtful whether slaves could be adopted, so as to become members of the family of the person adopting them. Aulus Gellius (Noct. Attic. v. 19) says that the majority of the ancient jurists, including Sabinus, held that they could. Theophilus says Cato was of the contrary opinion. They certainly became freedmen, and never ingenui, by adoption; even a freedman never became ingenuus by adoption (D. i. 7. 46), and he could only be adopted by his patron (D. i. 7. 15), and on a good ground, such as the patron having no children. (C. viii. 48.)

TIT. XII. QUIBUS MODIS JUS POTESTATIS SOLVITUR.

Videamus nunc, quibus modis ii, qui alieno juri subjecti sunt, eo jure liberantur. Et quidem servi quemadmodum potestate liberantur, ex his intellegere possumus, quæ de servis manumittendis superius exposuimus. Hi vero, qui in potestate parentis sunt, mortuo eo sui juris fiunt. Sed hoc distinctionem recipit. Nam mortuo patre sane omnimodo filii filivæ sui juris efficiuntur. Mortuo vero avo non omnimodo nepotes neptesque sui juris fiunt, sed ita, si post

Let us now inquire in what ways persons in the power of others are freed from it. How slaves are freed from the power of their masters may be learnt from what we have already said with regard to manumission. Those who are in the power of an ascendant become sui juris at his death; a rule, however, which admits of a distinction. For when a father dies, his sons and daughters become undoubtedly sui juris; but when a grandfather dies, his grandchildren do not necessarily become sui juris, but only if on the grandfather's death they do not fall under the power of their father. Therefore, if their father is alive at the death of their grandfather, and was in his power, then, on the grandfather's death, they become subject to the power of their father. But, if at the time of the grandfather's death their father is either dead, or has already passed out of the grandfather's power by emancipation, then, as they cannot fall under the power of their father, they become sui juris.

mortem avi in potestatem patris sui recasuri non sunt: itaque, si moriente avo pater eorum et vivit et in potestate patris sui est, tunc post obitum avi in potestate patris sui fiunt: si vero is, quo tempore avus moritur, aut jam mortuus est aut exiit de potestate patris, tunc hi, quia in potestatem ejus cadere non possunt, sui juris fiunt.

GAI. i. 124-127.

The modes in which the patria potestas was ended were—

1. The death of the parent; 2. The parent or son suffering loss of freedom or of citizenship; 3. The son attaining certain dignities; 4. Emancipation. All these modes are treated of in this Title.

1. Cum autem is, qui ob aliquod maleficium in insulam deportatur, civitatem amittit, sequitur ut, quia eo modo ex numero civium Romanorum tollitur, perinde acsi mortuo eo desinant liberi in potestate ejus esse. Pari ratione et si is, qui in potestate parentis sit, in insulam deportatus fuerit, desinit in potestate parentis esse. Sed si ex indulgentia principali restituti fuerint, per omnia pristinum statum recipiunt.

1. If a man, convicted of some crime, is deported to an island, he loses the rights of a Roman citizen; whence it follows, that the children of a person thus removed from the list of Roman citizens cease to be under his power, exactly as if he was dead. Equally, if a son is deported, does he cease to be under the power of his ascendant. But, if by the favour of the emperor any one is restored, he regains his former position in every respect.

GAI. i. 128.

The patria potestas belonging exclusively to citizens, and being necessarily exercised over citizens, when a parent or son lost the rights of citizenship, or, as it was termed, underwent a media capitis deminutio (see Tit. 16. 2), the patria potestas was necessarily at an end. (ULP. Reg. x. 3.) The punishment of deportatio in insulam consisted in the condemned being confined within certain local bounds, whether really those of an island, or of some prescribed space of the mainland, and being considered as civily dead, deportatus pro mortuo habetur (D. xxxvii. 4. 10. 8), and looked on as peregrinus, not as a civis. (ULP. Reg. x. 3.) If the condemned was recalled, and by the pardon of the emperor all the effects of his punishment were done away, he was said to be restitutus in integrum: he then resumed all his civil rights, and was placed as exactly as possible in the position which he would have held had he never been deportatus. (Cod. ix. 51. 1.)

The subject of capitis deminutio is resumed in Title 16 in connection with the position of agnati with regard to tutorships.

2. Relegati autem patres in insulam in potestate sua liberos reti-

2. A father who is merely ^{sent away}relegated to an island, still retains his children mortem avi in potestatem patris sui recasuri non sunt: itaque, si moriente avo pater eorum et vivit et in potestate patris sui est, tunc post obitum avi in potestate patris sui fiunt: si vero is, quo tempore avus moritur, aut jam mortuus est aut exiit de potestate patris, tunc hi, quia in potestatem ejus cadere non possunt, sui juris fiunt.

necessarily become sui juris, but only if on the grandfather's death they do not fall under the power of their father. Therefore, if their father is alive at the death of their grandfather, and was in his power, then, on the grandfather's death, they become subject to the power of their father. But, if at the time of the grandfather's death their father is either dead, or has already passed out of the grandfather's power by emancipation, then, as they cannot fall under the power of their father, they become sui juris.

GAI. i. 124-127.

The modes in which the patria potestas was ended were—

1. The death of the parent; 2. The parent or son suffering loss of freedom or of citizenship; 3. The son attaining certain dignities; 4. Emancipation. All these modes are treated of in this Title.

1. Cum autem is, qui ob aliquod maleficium in insulam deportatur, civitatem amittit, sequitur ut, quia eo modo ex numero civium Romanorum tollitur, perinde acsi mortuo eo desinant liberi in potestate ejus esse. Pari ratione et si is, qui in potestate parentis sit, in insulam deportatus fuerit, desinit in potestate parentis esse. Sed si ex indulgentia principali restituti fuerint, per omnia pristinum statum recipiunt.

1. If a man, convicted of some crime, is deported to an island, he loses the rights of a Roman citizen; whence it follows, that the children of a person thus removed from the list of Roman citizens cease to be under his power, exactly as if he was dead. Equally, if a son is deported, does he cease to be under the power of his ascendant. But, if by the favour of the emperor any one is restored, he regains his former position in every respect.

GAI. i. 128.

The patria potestas belonging exclusively to citizens, and being necessarily exercised over citizens, when a parent or son lost the rights of citizenship, or, as it was termed, underwent a media capitis deminutio (see Tit. 16. 2), the patria potestas was necessarily at an end. (ULP. Reg. x. 3.) The punishment of deportatio in insulam consisted in the condemned being confined within certain local bounds, whether really those of an island, or of some prescribed space of the mainland, and being considered as civily dead, deportatus pro mortuo habetur (D. xxxvii. 4. 10. 8), and looked on as peregrinus, not as a civis. (ULP. Reg. x. 3.) If the condemned was recalled, and by the pardon of the emperor all the effects of his punishment were done away, he was said to be restitutus in integrum: he then resumed all his civil rights, and was placed as exactly as possible in the position which he would have held had he never been deportatus. (Cod. ix. 51. 1.)

The subject of capitis deminutio is resumed in Title 16 in connection with the position of agnati with regard to tutorships.

2. Relegati autem patres in insulam in potestate sua liberos reti-

2. A father who is merely ^{sent away}relegated to an island, still retains his children nent; et e contrario liberi relegati in potestate parentum remanent.

in his power; and, conversely, a child who is relegated still remains in the power of his father.

D. xlviii. 22. 4.

The relegatus was merely forbidden to leave a certain spot, and his civil status was in no way altered. (See OVID, Trist. v. 11.)

3. Poenæ servus effectus filios in potestate habere desinit. Servi autem poenæ efficiuntur, qui in metallum damnantur et qui bestiis subiciuntur.

3. When a man becomes a 'slave of punishment,' he ceases to have his sons in his power. Persons become 'slaves of punishment' who are condemned to the mines, or exposed to wild beasts.

D. xlviii. 19. 17. 19.

A slave had no legal power over his children; in whatever way, therefore, a father became a slave, he lost his power over his children. When a person was sentenced to work in the mines, or to contend with wild beasts in the arena, punishments only inflicted for very great crimes, he became, by the mere operation of his sentence, a slave. But as there was no master whose slave he could be considered, it was said that he became the slave of the punishment (servus poenæ).

4. Filiusfamilias si militaverit, vel si senator vel consul fuerit factus, manet in patris potestate. Militia enim vel consularia dignitas patris potestate filium non liberat. Sed ex constitutione nostra summa patriciatus dignitas illico ab imperilibus codicillis præstitis a patria potestate liberat. Quis enim patiat patrem quidem posse per emancipationis modum suæ potestatis nexibus filium relaxare, imperatoriam autem celsitudinem non valere eum, quem sibi patrem elegit, ab aliena eximere potestate?

4. A son, though he becomes a soldier, a senator, or a consul, still remains in the power of his father, from which neither military service nor consular dignity can free him. But by our constitution the supreme dignity of the patriciate frees the son from the power of his father immediately on the grant of the imperial patent. For how can it be tolerated that a father should be able to emancipate his son from the tie of his power, and that the majesty of the emperor should not be able to release from the power of another, one whom he had chosen to be a father of the state?

D. i. 7. 3; C. xii. 3. 5.

Under the old Roman law no child was released from a father's power, by having any dignity or office, except that of a flamen dialis, or a vestal virgin. Persons holding either of these offices, without undergoing any capitis diminutio, or ceasing to be members of their father's family, became sui juris. Justinian conferred the privilege on those enjoying the dignity of the patriciate, and at a later period of his legislation enlarged the number of dignities to which this incident was attached; and the child was freed from the power of his father by being made a bishop, a consul, quaestor of the palace, praetorian praefect, or master of infantry or cavalry; and, in general, all those whose dignity exempted them from the burdens of the curia were freed from the power of their father.

nent; et e contrario liberi relegati in potestate parentum remanent.

in his power; and, conversely, a child who is relegated still remains in the power of his father.

D. xlviii. 22. 4.

The relegatus was merely forbidden to leave a certain spot, and his civil status was in no way altered. (See OVID, Trist. v. 11.)

3. Poenæ servus effectus filios in potestate habere desinit. Servi autem poenæ efficiuntur, qui in metallum damnantur et qui bestiis subiciuntur.

3. When a man becomes a 'slave of punishment,' he ceases to have his sons in his power. Persons become 'slaves of punishment' who are condemned to the mines, or exposed to wild beasts.

D. xlviii. 19. 17. 19.

A slave had no legal power over his children; in whatever way, therefore, a father became a slave, he lost his power over his children. When a person was sentenced to work in the mines, or to contend with wild beasts in the arena, punishments only inflicted for very great crimes, he became, by the mere operation of his sentence, a slave. But as there was no master whose slave he could be considered, it was said that he became the slave of the punishment (servus pœnæ).

4. Filiusfamilias si militaverit, vel si senator vel consul fuerit factus, manet in patris potestate. Militia enim vel consularia dignitas patris potestate filium non liberat. Sed ex constitutione nostra summa patriciatus dignitas illico ab imperilibus codicillis præstitis a patria potestate liberat. Quis enim patiat patrem quidem posse per emancipationis modum sue potestatis nexibus filium relaxare, imperatoriam autem celsitudinem non valere eum, quem sibi patrem elegit, ab aliena eximere potestate?

4. A son, though he becomes a soldier, a senator, or a consul, still remains in the power of his father, from which neither military service nor consular dignity can free him. But by our constitution the supreme dignity of the patriciate frees the son from the power of his father immediately on the grant of the Imperial patent. For how can it be tolerated that a father should be able to emancipate his son from the tie of his power, and that the majesty of the emperor should not be able to release from the power of another, one whom he had chosen to be a friend of the state?

D. i. 7. 3; C. xii. 3. 5.

Under the old Roman law no child was released from a father's power, by having any dignity or office, except that of a flamen dialis, or a vestal virgin. Persons holding either of these offices, without undergoing any capitis diminutio, or ceasing to be members of their father's family, became sui iuris. Justinian conferred the privilege on those enjoying the dignity of the patriciate, and at a later period of his legislation enlarged the number of dignities to which this incident was attached; and the child was freed from the power of his father by being made a bishop, a consul, quaestor of the palace, praetorian praefect, or master of infantry or cavalry; and, in general, all those whose dignity exempted them from the burdens of the curia were freed from the power of their father.

(Nov. 31; C. x. 31. 66.) When under Justinian's legislation a child was released by attaining a dignity, he still, as in the older law, remained a member of his father's family, and enjoyed all his rights of succession and agnation. (Nov. 81. 2.)

Constantine changed the meaning of patricius, by making it a title of the highest honour conferred on persons who enjoyed the chief place in the emperor's esteem. The power of making patricii was, in general, used very sparingly by the emperors, and hence the title became an object of ambition even to foreign princes.

5. Si ab hostibus captus fuerit parens, quamvis servus hostium fiat, tamen pendet jus liberorum propter jus postliminii: quia hi, qui ab hostibus capti sunt, si reversi fuerint, omnia pristina jura recipiunt. Idcirco reversus et liberus habebit in potestate, quia postliminium fingit eum, qui captus est, semper in civitate fuisse: si vero ibi decesserit, exinde, ex quo captus est pater, filius sui juris fuisse videtur. Ipse quoque filius neposve si ab hostibus captus fuerit, similiter dicimus propter jus postliminii jus quoque potestatis parentis in suspenso esse. Dictum est autem postliminium a LIMINE et POST, et eum, qui ab hostibus captus in fines nostros postea pervenit, postliminio reversum recte dicimus. Nam limina sicut in domibus finem quandam faciunt, sic et imperii finem limen esse veteres voluerunt. Hinc et limes dictus est quasi finis quidam et terminus. Ab eo postliminium dictum, quia eodem limine revertebatur, quo amissus erat. Sed et qui victis hostibus recuperatur, postliminio rediisse existimatur.

5. If an ascendant is taken prisoner, although he becomes the slave of the enemy, yet his paternal power is only suspended, owing to the jus postliminii; for captives, when they return, are restored to all their former rights. Thus, on his return, the father will have his children in his power: for the postliminium supposes that the captive has never been absent. If, however, a prisoner dies in captivity, the son is considered to have been sui juris from the time when his father was taken prisoner. So, too, if a son, or grandson, is taken prisoner, the power of the ascendant, by means of the jus postliminii, is only in suspense. The term postliminium is derived from post and limen. We therefore say of a person taken by the enemy, and then returning into our territory, that he is come back by postliminium. For, just as the threshold forms the boundary of a house, so the ancients have termed the boundary of the empire a threshold. Whence limes, also, is derived, and is used to signify a boundary and limit. Thence comes the word postliminium, because the prisoner returned to the same limits whence he had been lost. The prisoner, also, who is retaken on the defeat of the enemy, is considered to have come back by postliminium.

GAL. i. 129; D. xlix. 15. 29. 3; D. xlix. 15. 26.

By the jus postliminii, property taken in war, and retaken from the enemy, was restored to the original owners (see Bk. ii. Tit. 1. 17); and captives, on their return to their own country, were re-established in all their former rights. When the captive returned, all the time of his captivity was, in the eye of the law, blotted out, and he was exactly in the position he would have held if he had not been taken captive. (D. xlix. 15. 21. 6.) The manner of his return was quite immaterial. Nihil interest quomodo captivus reversus est. (D. xlix. 15. 26.) When the father

(Nov. 31; C. x. 31. 66.) When under Justinian's legislation a child was released by attaining a dignity, he still, as in the older law, remained a member of his father's family, and enjoyed all his rights of succession and agnation. (Nov. 81. 2.)

Constantine changed the meaning of patricius, by making it a title of the highest honour conferred on persons who enjoyed the chief place in the emperor's esteem. The power of making patricii was, in general, used very sparingly by the emperors, and hence the title became an object of ambition even to foreign princes.

5. Si ab hostibus captus fuerit parens, quamvis servus hostium fiat, tamen pendet jus liberorum propter jus postliminii: quia hi, qui ab hostibus capti sunt, si reversi fuerint, omnia pristina jura recipiunt. Idcirco reversus et liberus habebit in potestate, quia postliminium fingit eum, qui captus est, semper in civitate fuisse: si vero ibi decesserit, exinde, ex quo captus est pater, filius sui juris fuisse videtur. Ipse quoque filius neposve si ab hostibus captus fuerit, similiter dicimus propter jus postliminii jus quoque potestatis parentis in suspenso esse. Dictum est autem postliminium a LIMINE et POST, et eum, qui ab hostibus captus in fines nostros postea pervenit, postliminio reversum recte dicimus. Nam limina sicut in domibus finem quandam faciunt, sic et imperii finem limen esse veteres voluerunt. Hinc et limes dictus est quasi finis quidam et terminus. Ab eo postliminium dictum, quia eodem limine revertebatur, quo amissus erat. Sed et qui victis hostibus recuperatur, postliminio rediisse existimatur.

5. If an ascendant is taken prisoner, although he becomes the slave of the enemy, yet his paternal power is only suspended, owing to the jus postliminii: for captives, when they return, are restored to all their former rights. Thus, on his return, the father will have his children in his power: for the postliminium supposes that the captive has never been absent. If, however, a prisoner dies in captivity, the son is considered to have been sui juris from the time when his father was taken prisoner. So, too, if a son, or grandson, is taken prisoner, the power of the ascendant, by means of the jus postliminii, is only in suspense. The term postliminium is derived from post and limen. We therefore say of a person taken by the enemy, and then returning into our territory, that he is come back by postliminium. For, just as the threshold forms the boundary of a house, so the ancients have termed the boundary of the empire a threshold. Whence limes, also, is derived, and is used to signify a boundary and limit. Thence comes the word postliminium, because the prisoner returned to the same limits whence he had been lost. The prisoner, also, who is retaken on the defeat of the enemy, is considered to have come back by postliminium.

Gai. i. 129; D. xlix. 15. 29. 3; D. xlix. 15. 26.

By the jus postliminii, property taken in war, and retaken from the enemy, was restored to the original owners (see Bk. ii. Tit. 1. 17); and captives, on their return to their own country, were re-established in all their former rights. When the captive returned, all the time of his captivity was, in the eye of the law, blotted out, and he was exactly in the position he would have held if he had not been taken captive. (D. xlix. 15. 21. 6.) The manner of his return was quite immaterial. Nihil interest quomodo captivus reversus est. (D. xlix. 15. 26.) When the father returned, he resumed all his rights over his property, and his patria potestas over his children; when a child returned, he regained his rights of succession and agnation, and at the same time he fell again under the patria potestas of his father. (D. xlix. 15. 14.) If the captive did not return from captivity, the law considered him to have died at the moment of his captivity commencing, a point important with regard to testaments (see Bk. ii. Tit. 12. 5); and also as making children sui juris, and giving them all property acquired by them, from the time of the parent's captivity. Gaius says that in his time this point in favour of the children was not established (GAI. i. 129); but, at any rate, it was so when Ulpian wrote. (D. xlix. 15. 18.)

6. Præterea emancipatione quoque desinunt liberi in potestate parentum esse. Sed ea emancipatio antea quidem vel per antiquam legis observationem procedebat, quæ per imaginarias venditiones et intercedentes manumissiones celebrabatur, vel ex imperiali rescripto. Nostra autem providentia et hoc in melius per constitutionem reformavit, ut, fictione pristina explosa, recta via apud competentes iudices vel magistratus parentes intrent et filios suos vel filias vel nepotes vel neptes ac deinceps sua manu dimitterent. Et tunc ex edicto prætoris in hujus filii vel filie, nepotis vel neptis bonis, qui vel quæ a parente manumissus vel manumissa fuerit, eadem jura præstantur parenti, quæ tribuuntur patrono in bonis liberti: et præterea si impubes sit filius vel filia vel ceteri, ipse parens ex manumissione tutelam ejus nanciscitur.

6. Children, also, cease to be under the power of their ascendants by emancipation. Formerly emancipation was effected, either by adopting the process of the ancient law, consisting of imaginary sales, each followed by a manumission, or by imperial rescript; but we, in our wisdom, have introduced a reform on this point by one of our constitutions. The old fictitious process is now done away with, and ascendants may now appear directly before a proper judge or magistrate, and free from their power their children, or grandchildren, or other descendants. And then, according to the prætorian edict, the ascendant has the same rights over the goods of those whom he emancipates, as the patron has over the goods of his freedman. And further, if the children emancipated, whether sons or daughters or other descendants, are within the age of puberty, the ascendant, by the emancipation, becomes their tutor.

GAI. i. 132, 134; D. xxxvii. 12. 1; D. xxvi. 4. 3. 10; C. viii. 49. 5, 6.

We have no trace of any other form of giving freedom, in early times, than that of emancipation. In the law of the Twelve Tables we find it laid down, 'Si pater filium ter vendidit (sells), filius a patre liber esto.' The father might sell his son, and he would then be in the mancipium of the purchaser; but when the purchaser freed him, the son would fall again under his father's power. This might happen over and over again; but the Twelve Tables, whether making a new enactment, or sanctioning an old custom, declared that after a third sale the father's power was extinguished for ever. This may perhaps have been originally intended as a kind of check on the father abusing his power of selling his son, and have been afterwards used as a means of giving freedom by a fictitious sale; or it may have been expressly enacted in the Twelve Tables to extinguish all doubts whether the custom of freeing from a father's power by three sales was valid.

returned, he resumed all his rights over his property, and his patria potestas over his children; when a child returned, he regained his rights of succession and agnation, and at the same time he fell again under the patria potestas of his father. (D. xlix. 15. 14.) If the captive did not return from captivity, the law considered him to have died at the moment of his captivity commencing, a point important with regard to testaments (see Bk. ii. Tit. 12. 5); and also as making children sui juris, and giving them all property acquired by them, from the time of the parent's captivity. Gaius says that in his time this point in favour of the children was not established (GAI. i. 129); but, at any rate, it was so when Ulpian wrote. (D. xlix. 15. 18.)

6. Præterea emancipatione quoque desinunt liberi in potestate parentum esse. Sed ea emancipatio antea quidem vel per antiquam legis observationem procedebat, quæ per imaginarias venditiones et intercedentes manumissiones celebrabatur, vel ex imperiali rescripto. Nostra autem providentia et hoc in melius per constitutionem reformavit, ut, fictione pristina explosa, recta via apud competentes iudices vel magistratus parentes intrent et filios suos vel filias vel nepotes vel neptes ac deinceps sua manu dimitterent. Et tunc ex edicto prætoris in hujus filii vel filie, nepotis vel neptis bonis, qui vel quæ a parente manumissus vel manumissa fuerit, eadem jura præstantur parenti, quæ tribuntur patrono in bonis liberti: et præterea si impubes sit filius vel filia vel ceteri, ipse parens ex manumissione tutelam ejus nanciscitur.

6. Children, also, cease to be under the power of their ascendants by emancipation. Formerly emancipation was effected, either by adopting the process of the ancient law, consisting of imaginary sales, each followed by a manumission, or by imperial rescript; but we, in our wisdom, have introduced a reform on this point by one of our constitutions. The old fictitious process is now done away with, and ascendants may now appear directly before a proper judge or magistrate, and free from their power their children, or grandchildren, or other descendants. And then, according to the prætorian edict, the ascendant has the same rights over the goods of those whom he emancipates, as the patron has over the goods of his freedman. And further, if the children emancipated, whether sons or daughters or other descendants, are within the age of puberty, the ascendant, by the emancipation, becomes their tutor.

GAI. i. 132, 134; D. xxxvii. 12. 1; D. xxvi. 4. 3. 10; C. viii. 49. 5, 6.

We have no trace of any other form of giving freedom, in early times, than that of emancipation. In the law of the Twelve Tables we find it laid down, 'Si pater filium ter vendidit (sells), filius a patre liber esto.' The father might sell his son, and he would then be in the manu of the purchaser; but when the purchaser freed him, the son would fall again under his father's power. This might happen over and over again; but the Twelve Tables, whether making a new enactment, or sanctioning an old custom, declared that after a third sale the father's power was extinguished for ever. This may perhaps have been originally intended as a kind of check on the father abusing his power of selling his son, and have been afterwards used as a means of giving freedom by a fictitious sale; or it may have been expressly enacted in the Twelve Tables to extinguish all doubts whether the custom of freeing from a father's power by three sales was valid.

In the form the fictitious sale took in the times of historical certainty, the father three times sold his son to a fictitious purchaser, who, between the first and the second sale, and also between the second and the third, manumitted the son, i.e. discharged him from his power as a master which he had acquired by the sale. After the third sale, the son was in the mancipium of the fictitious purchaser, and if this purchaser had manumitted him, he would have been the son's patron. But as the father generally wished to be the patron of his son, the relation giving him, among other things, the right of succeeding to the son if intestate and childless, the purchaser, instead of manumitting him, resold (remancipavit) him to the father, who then himself manumitted him, and became his patron. In cases where the fictitious purchaser manumitted the third time, he was considered as a trustee for the father of all the rights of patronage. Originally, an express contract was made, contractu fiducia, to bind the purchaser to remancipate or to manumit, reserving the rights of patronage to the father, as the case might be; but in later times the purchaser was considered bound by an implied contract, and the praetorian edict, as we learn from the text, secured to the father in all cases the rights of patronage.

As the law of the Twelve Tables spoke only of a son, it was considered by a strict interpretation of the term, 'son,' that one sale instead of three was sufficient in the case of a daughter or grandchild. (GAI. i. 134, 135 b.)

Anastasius (A.D. 503) introduced a new mode of freeing the child from the power of the father. The emperor issued, in cases where he thought it proper, a rescript authorising the emancipation; and this rescript being registered by a magistrate, the consent of the child, if of age, being declared, and the final permission of the emperor being given, the process was complete. (C. viii. 49. 5.)

Justinian, in giving the greatest possible facility to emancipation, preserved all the effects which the process had had under the old system of fictitious sales. Both under his system and that of Anastasius, a child could be emancipated in his absence, which was not possible in the times when the old forms of manumission were strictly observed.

7. Admonendi autem sumus, liberum esse arbitrium ei, qui filium et ex eo nepotem vel neptem in potestate habebit, filium quidem de potestate dimittere, nepotem vero vel neptem retinere: et ex diverso filium quidem in potestate retinere, nepotem vero vel neptem manumittere (eadem et de pronepote vel pronepte dicta esse intellegantur) vel omnes sui juris efficere.

7. It is also to be observed, that a person having in his power a son, and by that son a grandson or granddaughter, may emancipate his son, and retain in his power his grandson or granddaughter; or, conversely, he may emancipate his grandson or granddaughter, and retain his son in his power; and the same may be understood as said of a great-grandson, or a great-granddaughter: or he may make them all sui juris.

In the form the fictitious sale took in the times of historical certainty, the father three times sold his son to a fictitious purchaser, who, between the first and the second sale, and also between the second and the third, manumitted the son, i.e. discharged him from his power as a master which he had acquired by the sale. After the third sale, the son was in the mancipium of the fictitious purchaser, and if this purchaser had manumitted him, he would have been the son's patron. But as the father generally wished to be the patron of his son, the relation giving him, among other things, the right of succeeding to the son if intestate and childless, the purchaser, instead of manumitting him, resold (remancipavit) him to the father, who then himself manumitted him, and became his patron. In cases where the fictitious purchaser manumitted the third time, he was considered as a trustee for the father of all the rights of patronage. Originally, an express contract was made, contracta fiducia, to bind the purchaser to remancipate or to manumit, reserving the rights of patronage to the father, as the case might be; but in later times the purchaser was considered bound by an implied contract, and the praetorian edict, as we learn from the text, secured to the father in all cases the rights of patronage.

As the law of the Twelve Tables spoke only of a son, it was considered by a strict interpretation of the term, 'son,' that one sale instead of three was sufficient in the case of a daughter or grandchild. (GAL. i. 134, 135 b.)

Anastasius (A.D. 503) introduced a new mode of freeing the child from the power of the father. The emperor issued, in cases where he thought it proper, a rescript authorising the emancipation; and this rescript being registered by a magistrate, the consent of the child, if of age, being declared, and the final permission of the emperor being given, the process was complete. (C. viii. 49. 5.)

Justinian, in giving the greatest possible facility to emancipation, preserved all the effects which the process had had under the old system of fictitious sales. Both under his system and that of Anastasius, a child could be emancipated in his absence, which was not possible in the times when the old forms of manumission were strictly observed.

7. Admonendi autem sumus, liberum esse arbitrium ei, qui filium et ex eo nepotem vel neptem in potestate habebit, filium quidem de potestate dimittere, nepotem vero vel neptem retinere: et ex diverso filium quidem in potestate retinere, nepotem vero vel neptem manumittere (eadem et de pronepote vel pronepte dicta esse intellegantur) vel omnes sui juris efficere.

7. It is also to be observed, that a person having in his power a son, and by that son a grandson or granddaughter, may emancipate his son, and retain in his power his grandson or granddaughter; or, conversely, he may emancipate his grandson or granddaughter, and retain his son in his power; and the same may be understood as said of a great-grandson, or a great-granddaughter: or he may make them all sui juris.

8. Sed et si pater filium, quem in potestate habet, avo vel proavo naturali secundum nostras constitutiones super his habitas in adoptionem dederit, id est si hoc ipsum, actis intervenientibus, apud competentem judicem manifestavit, præsente eo, qui adoptatur, et non contradicente nec non eo, qui adoptat, solvitur quidem jus potestatis patris naturalis, transit autem in hujusmodi parentem adoptivum, in cuius persona adoptionem plenissimam esse antea diximus.

8. If a father has a son in his power, and gives him in adoption to the son's natural grandfather or great-grandfather, in conformity with our constitutions enacted on this subject, that is, if he declares his intention in a formal act before a competent judge, in the presence and without the dissent of the person adopted, and also in the presence of the person who adopts, then the right of paternal power is extinguished as to the natural father, and passes from him to the adoptive father; with regard to whom, as we have before observed, adoption preserves all its effects.

C. viii. 47. 11.

The adoptive father could not acquire any patria potestas by fictitious sales; he could only extinguish that of the natural father. In order to gain it himself, he had recourse to another fictitious process, called in jure cessio. He claimed the child as his before a magistrate, and the natural father notwithstanding the claim, the child was given into the patria potestas of the adoptive father. For the change made by Justinian in the law of adoption, see Tit. 11. 1, 2.

9. Illud autem scire oportet, quod, si nurus tua ex filio tuo conceperit et filium postea emancipaveris vel in adoptionem dederis prægnante nuru tua, nihilo minus quod ex ea nascitur, in potestate tua nascitur: quod si post emancipationem vel adoptionem fuerit conceptum, patris sui emancipati vel avi adoptivi potestati subicitur: et quod neque naturales liberi neque adoptivi ullo pene modo possunt eogere parentem de potestate sua eos dimittere.

9. It must be observed, that, if your daughter-in-law conceives by your son, and if during her pregnancy you emancipate your son, or give him in adoption, the child will be born in your power; but if the child is conceived subsequently to the emancipation or adoption, he is born in the power of his emancipated father, or his adoptive grandfather. Children, natural or adoptive, have no means, or almost none, of compelling their parents to free them from their power.

GAI. i. 135, 137; D. i. 7. 31, 33.

The rights of a child were always determined by reference to the moment of conception, not of birth, when he was born in justo matrimonio, because he then followed the condition of his father. But when he followed the condition of his mother, as he did when he was born out of justum matrimonium, reference was had to the time of his birth (GAI. i. 89), or, in the later law, to the time of his conception, of his birth, or to any intermediate time, as might be most favourable to him. (See Tit. 4. pr.)

The exceptional cases alluded to in the words neque ullo pene modo only occurred where the father attempted to make a base use of his power over his children, or abandoned them (C. xi. 40. 6; viii. 52. 2); or when a person, arrogated under the age of puberty, on attaining that age, compelled his adoptive father to emancipate him. (D. i. 7. 33.)

Exceptional

8. Sed et si pater filium, quem in potestate habet, avo vel proavo naturali secundum nostras constitutiones super his habitas in adoptionem dederit, id est si hoc ipsum, actis intervenientibus, apud competentem judicem manifestavit, præsente eo, qui adoptatur, et non contradicente nec non eo, qui adoptat, solvitur quidem jus potestatis patris naturalis, transit autem in hujusmodi parentem adoptivum, in cujus persona adoptionem plenissimam esse antea diximus.

8. If a father has a son in his power, and gives him in adoption to the son's natural grandfather or great-grandfather, in conformity with our constitutions enacted on this subject, that is, if he declares his intention in a formal act before a competent judge, in the presence and without the dissent of the person adopted, and also in the presence of the person who adopts, then the right of paternal power is extinguished as to the natural father, and passes from him to the adoptive father; with regard to whom, as we have before observed, adoption preserves all its effects.

C. viii. 47. 11.

The adoptive father could not acquire any patria potestas by fictitious sales; he could only extinguish that of the natural father. In order to gain it himself, he had recourse to another fictitious process, called in jure cessio. He claimed the child as his before a magistrate, and the natural father notwithstanding the claim, the child was given into the patria potestas of the adoptive father. For the change made by Justinian in the law of adoption, see Tit. 11. 1, 2.

9. Illud autem scire oportet, quod, si nurus tua ex filio tuo conceperit et filium postea emancipaveris vel in adoptionem dederis pregnantem nuru tua, nihilo minus quod ex ea nascitur, in potestate tua nascitur: quod si post emancipationem vel adoptionem fuerit conceptum, patris sui emancipati vel avi adoptivi potestati subicitur: et quod neque naturales liberi neque adoptivi ullo pene modo possunt eogere parentem de potestate sua eos dimittere.

9. It must be observed, that, if your daughter-in-law conceives by your son, and if during her pregnancy you emancipate your son, or give him in adoption, the child will be born in your power; but if the child is conceived subsequently to the emancipation or adoption, he is born in the power of his emancipated father, or his adoptive grandfather. Children, natural or adoptive, have no means, or almost none, of compelling their parents to free them from their power.

GAI. i. 135, 137; D. i. 7. 31, 33.

The rights of a child were always determined by reference to the moment of conception, not of birth, when he was born in justo matrimonio, because he then followed the condition of his father. But when he followed the condition of his mother, as he did when he was born out of justum matrimonium, reference was had to the time of his birth (GAI. i. 89), or, in the later law, to the time of his conception, of his birth, or to any intermediate time, as might be most favourable to him. (See Tit. 4. pr.)

The exceptional cases alluded to in the words neque ullo pene modo only occurred where the father attempted to make a base use of his power over his children, or abandoned them (C. xi. 40. 6; viii. 52. 2); or when a person, arrogated under the age of puberty, on attaining that age, compelled his adoptive father to emancipate him. (D. i. 7. 33.)

Exceptio

TIT. XIII. DE TUTELIS.

Transeamus nunc ad aliam divisionem. Nam ex his personis, quæ in potestate non sunt, quædam vel in tutela sunt, vel in curatione, quædam neutro jure tenentur. Videamus igitur de his, quæ in tutela vel in curatione sunt: ita enim intellegemus ceteras personas, quæ neutro jure tenentur. Ac prius dispiciamus de his, quæ in tutela sunt.

Let us now proceed to another division. Of those who are not in the power of an ascendant, some are under a tutor, some under a curator, some under neither. Let us treat, then, of those persons who are under a tutor or curator; for we shall thus ascertain who are they who are not subject to either. And first of persons under a tutor.

GAI. i. 142, 143.

This is rather a subdivision of persons sui juris than another division of persons generally. There were some persons who were exempt from the patria potestas, and yet required constant protection and assistance. When this arose from youth, or, in the old law of Rome, from the incapacity supposed always to attach to females (propter animi levitatem, GAI. i. 144), the protector was called a tutor; when it arose from mental incapacity, he was called a curator. The two offices greatly resembled each other; but there was one leading distinction between them. The tutor was said to be given to the person (Tit. 15. 4); he not only administered the property of the pupil, but he also supplied what was wanting to complete the pupil's legal character. The curator was said to be given to the property: his duty was exclusively to see that the person under his care did not waste his goods. (See Introd. sec. 43.)

1. Est autem tutela, ut Servius definivit, jus ac potestas in capite libero ad tuendum eum, qui propter ætatem se defendere nequit, jure civili data ac permissa.

1. Tutelage, as Servius has defined it, is an authority and power over a free person, given and permitted by the civil law, in order to protect one whose tender years prevent him defending himself.

D. xxvi. 1. 1.

By a free person is meant here one sui juris. The power of a tutor (potestas) was either given (data) by the civil law, when it devolved on the next of kin, or allowed (permissa) by that law, when it was conferred by testament.

2. Tutores autem sunt, qui eam vim ac potestatem habent, exque re ipsa nomen ceperunt. Itaque appellantur tutores quasi tuitores atque defensores, sicut æditui dicuntur, qui ædes tuentur.

2. Tutors are those who have this authority and power, and they take their name from the nature of their office; for they are called tutors, as being protectors (tutores) and defenders; just as those who have the care of the sacred edifices are called æditui.

TIT. XIII. DE TUTELIS.

Transeamus nunc ad aliam divisionem. Nam ex his personis, quæ in potestate non sunt, quædam vel in tutela sunt, vel in curatione, quædam neutro jure tenentur. Videamus igitur de his, quæ in tutela vel in curatione sunt: ita enim intellegemus ceteras personas, quæ neutro jure tenentur. Ac prius dispiciamus de his, quæ in tutela sunt.

Let us now proceed to another division. Of those who are not in the power of an ascendant, some are under a tutor, some under a curator, some under neither. Let us treat, then, of those persons who are under a tutor or curator; for we shall thus ascertain who are they who are not subject to either. And first of persons under a tutor.

GAI. i. 142, 143.

This is rather a subdivision of persons sui juris than another division of persons generally. There were some persons who were exempt from the patria potestas, and yet required constant protection and assistance. When this arose from youth, or, in the old law of Rome, from the incapacity supposed always to attach to females (propter animi levitatem, GAI. i. 144), the protector was called a tutor; when it arose from mental incapacity, he was called a curator. The two offices greatly resembled each other; but there was one leading distinction between them. The tutor was said to be given to the person (Tit. 15. 4); he not only administered the property of the pupil, but he also supplied what was wanting to complete the pupil's legal character. The curator was said to be given to the property: his duty was exclusively to see that the person under his care did not waste his goods. (See Introductio. sec. 43.)

1. Est autem tutela, ut Servius definivit, jus ac potestas in capite libero ad tuendum eum, qui propter ætatem se defendere nequit, jure civili data ac permissa.

1. Tutelage, as Servius has defined it, is an authority and power over a free person, given and permitted by the civil law, in order to protect one whose tender years prevent him defending himself.

D. xxvi. 1. 1.

By a free person is meant here one sui juris. The power of a tutor (potestas) was either given (data) by the civil law, when it devolved on the next of kin, or allowed (permissa) by that law, when it was conferred by testament.

2. Tutores autem sunt, qui eam vim ac potestatem habent, exque re ipsa nomen ceperunt. Itaque appellantur tutores quasi tutores atque defensores, sicut æditui dicuntur, qui ædes tuentur.

2. Tutors are those who have this authority and power, and they take their name from the nature of their office; for they are called tutors, as being protectors (tutores) and defenders; just as those who have the care of the sacred edifices are called æditui.

3. Permissum est itaque parentibus, liberis impuberibus, quos in potestate habent, testamento tutores dare. Et hoc in filio filiaque omnimodo procedit; nepotibus tamen neptibusque ita demum parentes possunt testamento tutores dare, si post mortem eorum in patris sui potestatem non sint recasuri. Itaque si filius tuus mortis tue tempore in potestate tua sit, nepotes ex eo non poterunt testamento tuo tutorem habere, quamvis in potestate tua fuerint; scilicet quia mortuo te in patris sui potestatem recasuri sunt.

3. Ascendants may give tutors by testament to such of their children as have not attained the age of puberty, and are under their power. And this without any distinction in the case of all sons and daughters. But grandfathers can only give tutors to their grandchildren when these will not fall under the power of their father on the death of the grandfather. Hence, if your son is in your power at the time of your death, your grandchildren by that son cannot have a tutor appointed them by your testament, although they were in your power; because, at your decease, they will fall under the power of their father.

GAI. i. 144, 146.

The law of the Twelve Tables said, 'Uti legassit super pecunia tutelave suae rei, ita jus esto.' None but the head of the family could appoint a tutor by testament, and for none but children, or descendants in his power, who were included in the term sua res. Further, he could only appoint a tutor for those who, on his death, became sui juris, and were under age.

4. Cum autem in compluribus aliis causis postumi pro jam natis habentur, et in hac causa placuit non minus postumis quam jam natis testamento tutores dari posse, si modo in ea causa sint, ut, si vivis parentibus nascerentur, sui et in potestate eorum fierent.

4. Posthumous children, as in many other respects, so also in this respect, are considered as already born before the death of their fathers; and tutors may be given by testament to posthumous children, as well as to children already born, provided that the posthumous children, had they been born in the lifetime of their ascendant, would have been sui heredes, and in their ascendant's power.

GAI. i. 147.

It was a maxim of Roman law that nothing could be given by testament to an uncertain person, and a posthumous child was looked on in this light, so much so that he could not be heir, nor take a legacy, nor have a tutor appointed by will; afterwards this was so far modified that as regarded the chief of his family he was looked on as if born in the father's lifetime. (pro jam nato habebatur); that is, the ascendant might make him heir, disinherit him, give him a legacy, or appoint a tutor for him.

It was not until the time of Justinian that the posthumous child of a stranger was capable of taking under a testament. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 1.) The words in compluribus causis are extracted from Gaius; Justinian left no point of difference between the posthumous child and the child born in its father's lifetime. (C. vi. 48.) The proper meaning of posthumus is 'born after the death of a person.' Under special legislation it received the artificial sense of 'born after the date of a testament.' (Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 2.)

3. Permissum est itaque parentibus, liberis impuberibus, quos in potestate habent, testamento tutores dare. Et hoc in filio filiaque omnimodo procedit; nepotibus tamen neptibusque ita demum parentes possunt testamento tutores dare, si post mortem eorum in patris sui potestatem non sint recasuri. Itaque si filius tuus mortis tue tempore in potestate tua sit, nepotes ex eo non poterunt testamento tuo tutorem habere, quamvis in potestate tua fuerint; scilicet quia mortuo te in patris sui potestatem recasuri sunt.

3. Ascendants may give tutors by testament to such of their children as have not attained the age of puberty, and are under their power. And this without any distinction in the case of all sons and daughters. But grandfathers can only give tutors to their grandchildren when these will not fall under the power of their father on the death of the grandfather. Hence, if your son is in your power at the time of your death, your grandchildren by that son cannot have a tutor appointed them by your testament, although they were in your power; because, at your decease, they will fall under the power of their father.

GAI. i. 144, 146.

The law of the Twelve Tables said, 'Uti legassit super pecunia tutelave suae rei, ita jus esto.' None but the head of the family could appoint a tutor by testament, and for none but children, or descendants in his power, who were included in the term sua res. Further, he could only appoint a tutor for those who, on his death, became sui juris, and were under age.

4. Cum autem in compluribus aliis causis postumi pro jam natis habentur, et in hac causa placuit non minus postumis quam jam natis testamento tutores dari posse, si modo in ea causa sint, ut, si vivis parentibus nascerentur, sui et in potestate eorum fierent.

4. Posthumous children, as in many other respects, so also in this respect, are considered as already born before the death of their fathers; and tutors may be given by testament to posthumous children, as well as to children already born, provided that the posthumous children, had they been born in the lifetime of their ascendant, would have been sui heredes, and in their ascendant's power.

GAI. i. 147.

It was a maxim of Roman law that nothing could be given by testament to an uncertain person, and a posthumous child was looked on in this light, so much so that he could not be heir, nor take a legacy, nor have a tutor appointed by will; afterwards this was so far modified that as regarded the chief of his family he was looked on as if born in the father's lifetime (pro jam nato habebatur); that is, the ascendant might make him heir, disinherit him, give him a legacy, or appoint a tutor for him.

It was not until the time of Justinian that the posthumous child of a stranger was capable of taking under a testament. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 1.) The words in compluribus causis are extracted from Gaius; Justinian left no point of difference between the posthumous child and the child born in its father's lifetime. (C. vi. 48.) The proper meaning of posthumus is 'born after the death of a person.' Under special legislation it received the artificial sense of 'born after the date of a testament.' (Bk. ii. Tit. 13. 2.)

By the term sui heredes were meant those persons who, on the death of the head of the family, having no one above them in the line of ascent, became sui juris, and were the necessary heirs of the deceased, if intestate. (See Introd. sec. 77.)

5. Sed si emancipato filio tutor a patre testamento datus fuerit, confirmandus est ex sententia præsidis omnimodo, id est sine inquisitione.

5. But, if a father gives a tutor by testament to his emancipated son, the appointment must be confirmed by the sentence of the præses in all cases, that is, without inquiry.

D. xxvi. 3. 1.

The emancipated child, not being in the power of his father, could not, strictly speaking, be subject to the father's directions as to his tutor; but a magistrate had power to carry out an appointment of a tutor in a testament if there was only this technical objection to be surmounted. The wishes of a father were considered so sure an indication to the magistrate of the fittest person to be tutor, that they were always carried out without examining into the suitability of the appointment (sine inquisitione), unless some change in the position of the tutor since the making of the testament made him obviously unfit for the office. (D. xxvi. 8. 9.)

A father could appoint by testament a tutor for his illegitimate children if he left them property; and the mother, the patron, and indeed a stranger who instituted as heir an infant sui juris, might appoint a tutor by testament, and the magistrate carried out the appointment, but in these cases not until he had examined all the circumstances of the case. (D. xxvi. 2. 4. and 3. 4.) The husband might also by testament appoint a tutor to his wife in manu, or give her the option of fixing on a tutor. (GAI. i. 148-154.)

TIT. XIV. QUI DARI TUTORES TESTAMENTO POSSUNT.

Dari autem potest tutor non solum paterfamilias, sed etiam paterfamilias may be appointed tutor, but also a filiusfamilias.

The office of tutor was looked on as in some respects a public one, as the tutor supplied what was wanting to the persona of a citizen; and a filiusfamilias was always capable of holding any public office. (D. i. 6. 9.)

Any one could be made a tutor by testament with whom there was the testamenti factio (D. xxvi. 2. 21), or, in other words, any one who had the rights of citizenship sufficiently to enable him to go through the peculiar forms of Roman law.

Women could not be appointed tutors according to the old law, but the emperors would confirm the power of a mother named by testament tutor of her children. (D. xxvi. 1. 18.)

By the term sui heredes were meant those persons who, on the death of the head of the family, having no one above them in the line of ascent, became sui juris, and were the necessary heirs of the deceased, if intestate. (See Introd. sec. 77.)

5. Sed si emancipato filio tutor a patre testamento datus fuerit, confirmandus est ex sententia præsidis omnimodo, id est sine inquisitione.

5. But, if a father gives a tutor by testament to his emancipated son, the appointment must be confirmed by the sentence of the præses in all cases, that is, without inquiry.

D. xxvi. 3. 1.

The emancipated child, not being in the power of his father, could not, strictly speaking, be subject to the father's directions as to his tutor; but a magistrate had power to carry out an appointment of a tutor in a testament if there was only this technical objection to be surmounted. The wishes of a father were considered so sure an indication to the magistrate of the fittest person to be tutor, that they were always carried out without examining into the suitability of the appointment (sine inquisitione), unless some change in the position of the tutor since the making of the testament made him obviously unfit for the office. (D. xxvi. 8. 9.)

A father could appoint by testament a tutor for his illegitimate children if he left them property; and the mother, the patron, and indeed a stranger who instituted as heir an infant sui juris, might appoint a tutor by testament, and the magistrate carried out the appointment, but in these cases not until he had examined all the circumstances of the case. (D. xxvi. 2. 4. and 3. 4.) The husband might also by testament appoint a tutor to his wife in manu, or give her the option of fixing on a tutor. (GAI. i. 148-154.)

TIT. XIV. QUI DARI TUTORES TESTAMENTO POSSUNT.

Dari autem potest tutor non solum paterfamilias, sed etiam paterfamilias may be appointed tutor, but also a filiusfamilias.

The office of tutor was looked on as in some respects a public one, as the tutor supplied what was wanting to the persona of a citizen; and a filiusfamilias was always capable of holding any public office. (D. i. 6. 9.)

Any one could be made a tutor by testament with whom there was the testamenti factio (D. xxvi. 2. 21), or, in other words, any one who had the rights of citizenship sufficiently to enable him to go through the peculiar forms of Roman law.

Women could not be appointed tutors according to the old law, but the emperors would confirm the power of a mother named by testament tutor of her children. (D. xxvi. 1. 18.)

1. Sed et servus proprius testamento cum libertate recte tutor dari potest. Sed sciendum est, eum et sine libertate tutorem datum tacite et libertatem directam accepisse videri et per hoc recte tutorem esse. Plane si per errorem quasi liber tutor datus sit, aliud dicendum est. Servus autem alienus pure inutiliter datur testamento tutor: sed ita cum liber erit utiliter datur. Proprius autem servus inutiliter eo modo datur tutor.

1. A man may also by testament appoint as a tutor his own slave, at the same time giving him his liberty. But it must be observed that if a slave is appointed tutor without an express gift of liberty, he is still held to receive by implication a direct freedom, and thus can legally be tutor. If, however, it is by mistake, and from the testator supposing him to be free, that he is appointed tutor, the decision would be different. The appointment of a slave belonging to another person as tutor is ineffectual, if unconditional; but is valid when made with this condition, 'when he shall be free.' If, however, any one appoints his own slave with such a condition, the appointment is void.

D. xxvi. 2. 32. 2.

A slave was incapable of holding any legal office. It was therefore necessary to enfranchise him in order that he might become a tutor. If the appointment was made without express enfranchisement, it was the opinion of Paul (D. xxvi. 2. 32) that the appointment implied enfranchisement, and this as if given by the testator himself (directa), and not entrusted to his heir to give (fideicommissaria). Valerian and Gallian, however, decided subsequently by a rescript (C. vii. 4. 9), that it was only a libertus fideicommissarius which such an appointment carried with it. Justinian here restores the authority of the former opinion.

The appointment of the slave of another carried with it the libertas fideicommissaria, that is, it was incumbent on the heir to purchase and emancipate the slave, who could then discharge the office of tutor. (D. xxvi. 2. 10. 4.) If the heir was not able to purchase the slave, then the slave could not act as tutor until he gained his freedom in some other way. Even if the testator had not used the words cum liber erit, or some corresponding expression, he was presumed to have intended to use them, unless a contrary intention appeared. (D. xxvi. 2. 10. 4; Cod. vii. 4. 9.) If a testator said of his own slave that he was to be tutor when free, this showed that the testator, who had the power to enfranchise him, did not choose to exercise it; and as he thus voluntarily made his own appointment void, the law would not help him.

2. Furiosus vel minor viginti quinque annis tutor testamento datus tutor erit, cum compos mentis aut major viginti quinque annis fuerit factus.

2. If a madman or a person under the age of twenty-five years is by testament appointed tutor, the one is to begin to act when he becomes of sound mind, and the other when he has completed his twenty-fifth year.

D. xxvi. 1. 11; xxvi. 2. 32. 2.

Meanwhile the magistrate would appoint another tutor. (See Tit. 20.)

1. Sed et servus proprius testamento cum libertate recte tutor dari potest. Sed sciendum est, eum et sine libertate tutorem datum tacite et libertatem directam accepisse videri et per hoc recte tutorem esse. Plane si per errorem quasi liber tutor datus sit, aliud dicendum est. Servus autem alienus pure inutiliter datur testamento tutor: sed ita cum liber erit utiliter datur. Proprius autem servus inutiliter eo modo datur tutor.

1. A man may also by testament appoint as a tutor his own slave, at the same time giving him his liberty. But it must be observed that if a slave is appointed tutor without an express gift of liberty, he is still held to receive by implication a direct freedom, and thus can legally be tutor. If, however, it is by mistake, and from the testator supposing him to be free, that he is appointed tutor, the decision would be different. The appointment of a slave belonging to another person as tutor is ineffectual, if unconditional; but is valid when made with this condition, 'when he shall be free.' If, however, any one appoints his own slave with such a condition, the appointment is void.

D. xxvi. 2. 32. 2.

A slave was incapable of holding any legal office. It was therefore necessary to enfranchise him in order that he might become a tutor. If the appointment was made without express enfranchisement, it was the opinion of Paul (D. xxvi. 2. 32) that the appointment implied enfranchisement, and this as if given by the testator himself (directa), and not entrusted to his heir to give (fideicommissaria). Valerian and Gallian, however, decided subsequently by a rescript (C. vii. 4. 9), that it was only a libertus fideicommissarius which such an appointment carried with it. Justinian here restores the authority of the former opinion.

The appointment of the slave of another carried with it the libertas fideicommissaria, that is, it was incumbent on the heir to purchase and emancipate the slave, who could then discharge the office of tutor. (D. xxvi. 2. 10. 4.) If the heir was not able to purchase the slave, then the slave could not act as tutor until he gained his freedom in some other way. Even if the testator had not used the words cum liber erit, or some corresponding expression, he was presumed to have intended to use them, unless a contrary intention appeared. (D. xxvi. 2. 10. 4; Cod. vii. 4. 9.) If a testator said of his own slave that he was to be tutor when free, this showed that the testator, who had the power to enfranchise him, did not choose to exercise it; and as he thus voluntarily made his own appointment void, the law would not help him.

2. Furiosus vel minor viginti quinque annis tutor testamento datus tutor erit, cum compos mentis aut major viginti quinque annis fuerit factus.

2. If a madman or a person under the age of twenty-five years is by testament appointed tutor, the one is to begin to act when he becomes of sound mind, and the other when he has completed his twenty-fifth year.

D. xxvi. 1. 11; xxvi. 2. 32. 2.

Meanwhile the magistrate would appoint another tutor. (See Tit. 20.)

3. Ad certum tempus vel ex certo tempore vel sub conditione vel ante heredis institutionem posse dari tutorem non dubitatur.

3. There is no doubt that a tutor may be appointed either until a certain time, or from a certain time, or conditionally, or before the institution of an heir.

The old law regarded the naming of the persons designed to take as heirs under the testament, as the base of the testament, and passed over every declaration of the testator's wishes placed before this as out of due order and entirely void. The Proculians (GAI. ii. 231) thought this ought not to be extended to the appointment of a tutor, and Justinian did away with the doctrine altogether. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 14. pr.)

4. Certæ autem rei vel causæ tutor dari non potest, quia personæ, non causæ vel rei datur.

4. A tutor cannot be appointed for a particular thing or business, as it is to a person, and not for a business or a thing, that a tutor is appointed.

D. xxvi. 2. 12. 14.

The tutor had to take charge of the whole interests of the pupil, and complete his persona, and therefore to appoint him to take charge of his interest in any one matter only was inconsistent with the nature of his office, and such an appointment was void. (D. xxvi. 2. 13.) If, however, the property of the pupil was situated in provinces far apart from each other, a separate tutor might be appointed to take care of his interests in each province. (D. xxvi. 2. 15.)

5. Si quis filiabus suis vel filiis tutores dederit, etiam postumæ vel postumo videtur dedisse, quia filii vel filiæ appellatione et postumus et postuma continentur. Quid, si nepotes sint, an appellatione filiorum et ipsis tutores dati sunt? Dicendum est, ut ipsis quoque dati videantur, si modo liberos dixit. Ceterum si filios, non continebuntur: aliter enim filii, aliter nepotes appellantur. Plane si postumis dederit, tam filii postumi quam ceteri liberi continebuntur.

5. If any one appoints a tutor to his sons or daughters, he is held also to appoint him as tutor to his posthumous children; because, under the appellation of son or daughter, a posthumous son or daughter is included. But if there are grandchildren, are they included in the appointment of a tutor to sons? We answer that under an appointment to children, grandchildren are included, but not under an appointment to sons; for son and grandson are quite distinct words. But, if a testator appoints a tutor to those who are posthumous, the term obviously includes all posthumous children, whether sons or grandsons.

TIT. XV. DE LEGITIMA ADGNATORUM TUTELA.

Quibus autem testamento tutor datus non sit, his ex lege duodecim tabularum agnati sunt tutores, qui vocantur legitimi.

They to whom no tutor has been appointed by testament, have their agnati as tutors, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and such tutors are called 'legal tutors.'

GAI. i. 155; D. xxvi. 4. 1.

3. Ad certum tempus vel ex certo tempore vel sub condicione vel ante heredis institutionem posse dari tutorem non dubitatur.

3. There is no doubt that a tutor may be appointed either until a certain time, or from a certain time, or conditionally, or before the institution of an heir.

The old law regarded the naming of the persons designed to take as heirs under the testament, as the base of the testament, and passed over every declaration of the testator's wishes placed before this as out of due order and entirely void. The Proculians (GAI. ii. 231) thought this ought not to be extended to the appointment of a tutor, and Justinian did away with the doctrine altogether. (See note on Bk. ii. Tit. 14. pr.)

4. Certæ autem rei vel causæ tutor dari non potest, quia personæ, non causæ vel rei datur.

4. A tutor cannot be appointed for a particular thing or business, as it is to a person, and not for a business or a thing, that a tutor is appointed.

D. xxvi. 2. 12. 14.

The tutor had to take charge of the whole interests of the pupil, and complete his persona, and therefore to appoint him to take charge of his interest in any one matter only was inconsistent with the nature of his office, and such an appointment was void. (D. xxvi. 2. 13.) If, however, the property of the pupil was situated in provinces far apart from each other, a separate tutor might be appointed to take care of his interests in each province. (D. xxvi. 2. 15.)

5. Si quis filiabus suis vel filiis tutores dederit, etiam postumæ vel postumo videtur dedisse, quia filii vel filiæ appellatione et postumus et postuma continentur. Quid, si nepotes sint, an appellatione filiorum et ipsis tutores dati sunt? Dicendum est, ut ipsis quoque dati videantur, si modo liberos dixit. Ceterum si filios, non continebuntur: aliter enim filii, aliter nepotes appellantur. Plane si postumis dederit, tam filii postumi quam ceteri liberi continebuntur.

5. If any one appoints a tutor to his sons or daughters, he is held also to appoint him as tutor to his posthumous children; because, under the appellation of son or daughter, a posthumous son or daughter is included. But if there are grandchildren, are they included in the appointment of a tutor to sons? We answer that under an appointment to children, grandchildren are included, but not under an appointment to sons; for son and grandson are quite distinct words. But, if a testator appoints a tutor to those who are posthumous, the term obviously includes all posthumous children, whether sons or grandsons.

TIT. XV. DE LEGITIMA ADGNATORUM TUTELA.

Quibus autem testamento tutor datus non sit, his ex lege duodecim tabularum adgnati sunt tutores, qui vocantur legitimi.

They to whom no tutor has been appointed by testament, have their agnati as tutors, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and such tutors are called 'legal tutors.'

GAI. i. 155; D. xxvi. 4. 1.

Tutores legitimi means tutors appointed by a law, that is, by the law of the Twelve Tables, or according to some inference from its provisions, as in the case of patrons. (See Tit. 17.) 'Legal' must be here understood as equivalent to 'by virtue of a law.'

1. Sunt autem adgnati per virilis sexus cognationem conjuncti, quasi a patre cognati, veluti frater eodem patre natus, fratris filius neposve ex eo, item patruus et patrum filius neposve ex eo. At qui per feminini sexus personas cognatione junguntur, non sunt adgnati, sed alias naturali jure cognati. Itaque amittit tunc filius non est tibi adgnatus, sed cognatus (et invicem scilicet tu illi eodem jure conjungeris), quia qui nascuntur, patris, non matris familiam sequuntur.

1. Agnati are those who are related to each other through males, that is, are related through the father, as, for instance, a brother by the same father, or the son of such a brother, or the son of such a son, or, again, a father's brother, or a father's brother's son, or the son of such a son. But those who are related to us through females are not agnati, but merely cognati by natural relationship. Thus the son of a father's sister is related to you not by agnation, but by cognation, and you are also related to him by cognation; as children belong to the family of their father, and not to that of their mother.

GAI. i. 156.

The law gave the rights of relationship, such as inheritance and appointment as tutors, to the agnati only. All persons, related by ties of blood, were cognati to each other. Within this larger circle the members of any one family were agnati to each other. (See Introd. sec. 44, 45.) A family, in this sense, consisted of all persons related to each other, by having a common ancestor, in whose power, if he was alive, they would all be. A brother and sister, for instance, were agnati, and a nephew and aunt, by the father's side. For if the grandfather were alive all would be in his power. But the tie was dissolved by the sister or aunt marrying in manum (see Introd. sec. 46); and as the children of females would be in the power of the husband, they could never be agnati to their mother's agnati, except by adoption; and hence it is here said that agnati are related through males only. By the 118th Novel Justinian abolished this distinction between agnati and cognati, and the nearest in blood was thenceforth the tutor legitimus. (Nov. 118. 4, 5.)

2. Quod autem lex ab intestato vocat ad tutelam adgnatos, non hanc habet significationem, si omnino non fecerit testamentum is, qui poterat tutores dare, sed si quantum ad tutelam pertinet, intestatus decesserit. Quod tunc quoque accidere intellegitur, cum is, qui datus est tutor, vivo testatore decesserit.

2. The law calling the agnati to be tutors in case of intestacy does not refer merely to the case of a person who might have appointed a tutor, dying without having made any testament at all, but also to that of a person dying intestate only so far as regards the appointment of a tutor, and this includes the case of a tutor nominated by testament dying in the lifetime of the testator.

Tutores legitimi means tutors appointed by a law, that is, by the law of the Twelve Tables, or according to some inference from its provisions, as in the case of patrons. (See Tit. 17.) 'Legal' must be here understood as equivalent to 'by virtue of a law.'

1. Sunt autem adgnati per virilis sexus cognationem conjuncti, quasi a patre cognati, veluti frater eodem patre natus, fratris filius neposve ex eo, item patruus et patrum filius neposve ex eo. At qui per feminini sexus personas cognatione junguntur, non sunt adgnati, sed alias naturali jure cognati. Itaque amittæ tuæ filius non est tibi adgnatus, sed cognatus (et invicem scilicet tu illi eodem jure conjungeris), quia qui nascuntur, patris, non matris familiam sequuntur.

1. Agnati are those who are related to each other through males, that is, are related through the father, as, for instance, a brother by the same father, or the son of such a brother, or the son of such a son, or, again, a father's brother, or a father's brother's son, or the son of such a son. But those who are related to us through females are not agnati, but merely cognati by natural relationship. Thus the son of a father's sister is related to you not by agnation, but by cognation, and you are also related to him by cognation; as children belong to the family of their father, and not to that of their mother.

GAI. i. 156.

The law gave the rights of relationship, such as inheritance and appointment as tutors, to the agnati only. All persons, related by ties of blood, were cognati to each other. Within this larger circle the members of any one family were agnati to each other. (See Introd. sec. 44, 45.) A family, in this sense, consisted of all persons related to each other, by having a common ancestor, in whose power, if he was alive, they would all be. A brother and sister, for instance, were agnati, and a nephew and aunt, by the father's side. For if the grandfather were alive all would be in his power. But the tie was dissolved by the sister or aunt marrying in manum (see Introd. sec. 46); and as the children of females would be in the power of the husband, they could never be agnati to their mother's agnati, except by adoption; and hence it is here said that agnati are related through males only. By the 118th Novel Justinian abolished this distinction between agnati and cognati, and the nearest in blood was thenceforth the tutor legitimus. (Nov. 118. 4, 5.)

2. Quod autem lex ab intestato vocat ad tutelam adgnatos, non hanc habet significationem, si omnino non fecerit testamentum is, qui poterat tutores dare, sed si quantum ad tutelam pertinet, intestatus decesserit. Quod tunc quoque accidere intellegitur, cum is, qui datus est tutor, vivo testatore decesserit.

2. The law calling the agnati to be tutors in case of intestacy does not refer merely to the case of a person who might have appointed a tutor, dying without having made any testament at all, but also to that of a person dying intestate only so far as regards the appointment of a tutor, and this includes the case of a tutor nominated by testament dying in the lifetime of the testator.

D. xxvi. 4. 6.

It was necessary to state expressly that the testament was good as far as it went, and that the law remedied its deficiency by making the agnati tutors, because it was a maxim of Roman law that a man could not die partly testate and partly intestate. (See note on Bk. II. Tit. 14. 9.)

8. Sed adgnationis quidem jus omnibus modis capitis deminutione plerumque perimitur: nam adgnatio juris est nomen. Cognationis vero jus non omnibus modis commutatur, quia civilis ratio civilia quidem jura corrumpere potest, naturalia vero non utique.

3. The right of agnation is ordinarily taken away universally by capitis deminutio, for agnation is a term of civil law; but the right of cognation is not lost in every case by capitis deminutio, for although civil law may destroy civil rights, it cannot destroy natural rights.

GAL. I. 158.

The tie of agnation being created by law, could also be dissolved by it: not so that of cognation, which was a tie of nature. But the law could take away the legal rights attaching to the natural tie; and this it did in the case of the maxima and of the media capitis deminutio. (See next Title, 6.)

A constitution of Theodosius and Arcadius provided that the mother, if she has not remarried, and undertakes not to remarry, may have the tutela of her children given her. (C. v. 35. 2.) And Justinian, by the 118th Novel, extended this to the grandmother, as well as the mother, if there was no testamentary tutor.

TIT. XVI. DE CAPITIS MINUTIONE.

Est autem capitis deminutio prioris status commutatio, eaque tribus modis accidit; nam aut maxima est capitis deminutio aut minor, quam quidam mediam vocant, aut minima.

Capitis deminutio is a change of status, which may happen in three ways: for it may be the greatest capitis deminutio, or the less, also called the middle, or the least.

GAL. I. 159.

The status of a Roman citizen was composed of three elements: Tria sunt quae habemus: libertatem, civitatem, familiam (D. iv. 5. 11). The citizen was free, he had his position as a civis, he had his position in a family. Caput, originally signifying the mention made of the citizen in the registers of the census, meant the sum of the legal capacities of a persona, the possession of which gave him his status; and if a citizen changed his status, that is, if he lost his liberty or his civic rights, or changed his family position by adoption or emancipation, he underwent what was termed a capitis deminutio, this capitis deminutio being termed maxima, media, or minima, according to which of the three elements of status it was that was primarily affected.

1. Maxima est capitis deminutio, cum aliquis simul et civitatem et libertatem amittit. Quod accidit in his, qui servi poenae efficiuntur atrocitate sententiae, vel liberti ut in-

1. The greatest capitis deminutio is, when a man loses both his citizenship and his liberty; as they do who by a terrible sentence are made 'the slaves of punishment;' or freedmen, con-

It was necessary to state expressly that the testament was good as far as it went, and that the law remedied its deficiency by making the agnati tutors, because it was a maxim of Roman law that a man could not die partly testate and partly intestate. (See note on Bk. II. Tit. 14. 9.)

3. Sed adgnationis quidem jus omnibus modis capitis deminutione plerumque perimitur: nam adgnatio juris est nomen. Cognationis vero jus non omnibus modis commutatur, quia civilis ratio civilia quidem jura corrumpere potest, naturalia vero non utique.

3. The right of agnation is ordinarily taken away universally by capitis deminutio, for agnation is a term of civil law; but the right of cognation is not lost in every case by capitis deminutio, for although civil law may destroy civil rights, it cannot destroy natural rights.

GAL. i. 158.

The tie of agnation being created by law, could also be dissolved by it: not so that of cognation, which was a tie of nature. But the law could take away the legal rights attaching to the natural tie; and this it did in the case of the maxima and of the media capitis deminutio. (See next Title, 6.)

A constitution of Theodosius and Arcadius provided that the mother, if she has not remarried, and undertakes not to remarry, may have the tutela of her children given her. (C. v. 35. 2.) And Justinian, by the 118th Novel, extended this to the grandmother, as well as the mother, if there was no testamentary tutor.

TIT. XVI. DE CAPITIS MINUTIONE.

Est autem capitis deminutio prioris status commutatio, eaque tribus modis accidit; nam aut maxima est capitis deminutio aut minor, quam quidam mediam vocant, aut minima.

Capitis deminutio is a change of status, which may happen in three ways: for it may be the greatest capitis deminutio, or the less, also called the middle, or the least.

GAL. i. 159.

The status of a Roman citizen was composed of three elements: Tria sunt quae habemus: libertatem, civitatem, familiam (D. iv. 5. 11). The citizen was free, he had his position as a civis, he had his position in a family. Caput, originally signifying the mention made of the citizen in the registers of the census, meant the sum of the legal capacities of a persona, the possession of which gave him his status; and if a citizen changed his status, that is, if he lost his liberty or his civic rights, or changed his family position by adoption or emancipation, he underwent what was termed a capitis deminutio, this capitis deminutio being termed maxima, media, or minima, according to which of the three elements of status it was that was primarily affected.

1. Maxima est capitis deminutio, cum aliquis simul et civitatem et libertatem amittit. Quod accidit in his, qui servi poenae efficiuntur atrocitate sententiae, vel liberti ut in-grati circa patronos condemnati, vel qui ad pretium participandum se venundari passi sunt.

1. The greatest capitis deminutio is, when a man loses both his citizenship and his liberty; as they do who by a terrible sentence are made 'the slaves of punishment;' or freedmen, condemned for ingratitude towards their patrons; or those who suffer themselves to be sold in order to share the price obtained.

GAI. i. 160; D. xxviii. 3. 6. 6; xxv. 3. 7. 1.

See Tit. 12. 3; Tit. 3. 4 note.

2. Minor sive media est capitis deminutio, cum civitas quidem amittitur, libertas vero retinetur. Quod accedit ei, cui aqua et igni interdictum fuerit, vel ei, qui in insulam deportatus est.

2. The less or middle capitis deminutio is, when a man loses his citizenship, but retains his liberty; as is the case when any one is forbidden the use of fire and water, or is deported to an island.

GAI. i. 161.

In this kind of capitis deminutio, as well as in the preceding, the position in the familia was lost, its rights belonging only to citizens. In this lesser kind, freedom is preserved; but the person who undergoes the change of status becomes a stranger, peregrinus fit. (ULP. Reg. 10. 3.) It was a maxim of Roman law, that no one could cease to be a citizen against his will. Civitatem nemo unquam ullo populi jussu amittit invito. (CIC. pro Dom. 29.) The condemned was therefore denied the necessities of life, until he was driven to withdraw himself from the city. Id autem ut esset faciendum, non ademptione civitatis, sed tecti, et aquae et ignis interdictione faciebant. (CIC. pro Dom. 30.) The aquae et ignis interdictio thus became a form by which a sentence of perpetual banishment was inflicted. The deportatio in insulam superseded this form. (D. xlvi. 29. 2.) The person who was banished was confined to certain limits, out of which he could not stir without rendering himself punishable with death. This must be kept distinct from simple relegatio, which was also an exile within prescribed limits, but did not in any way affect the status. (D. xlvi. 22. 7. See Tit. 12. 1 and 2.)

3. Minima capitis deminutio est, cum et civitas et libertas retinetur, sed status hominis commutatur. Quod accedit in his, qui, cum sui juris fuerunt, ceperunt alieno juri subjecti esse, vel contra.

3. The least capitis deminutio is, when a person's status is changed without forfeiture either of citizenship or liberty; as when a person sui juris becomes subject to the power of another, or a person alieni juris becomes sui juris.

GAI. i. 162.

The status was changed (commutatur) by the change of family position; but the person who underwent this form of capitis deminutio had still after it all the three elements of status. Whether the minima capitis deminutio involved a degradation or merely a change has been much debated by commentators. Savigny (see I Poste's Gaius, p. 128) was of opinion that capitis deminutio always involved a degradation. The French commentators take II the other view, that there was merely a change implied, and they

grati circa patronos condemnati, vel qui ad pretium participandum se venundari passi sunt.

demned for ingratitude towards their patrons; or those who suffer themselves to be sold in order to share the price obtained.

GAI. I. 160; D. xxviii. 3. 6. 6; xxv. 3. 7. 1.

See Tit. 12. 3; Tit. 3. 4 note.

2. Minor sive media est capitis deminutio, cum civitas quidem amittitur, libertas vero retinetur. Quod accidit ei, cui aqua et igni interdictum fuerit, vel ei, qui in insulam deportatus est.

2. The less or middle capitis deminutio is, when a man loses his citizenship, but retains his liberty; as is the case when any one is forbidden the use of fire and water, or is deported to an island.

GAI. I. 161.

In this kind of capitis deminutio, as well as in the preceding, the position in the familia was lost, its rights belonging only to citizens. In this lesser kind, freedom is preserved; but the person who undergoes the change of status becomes a stranger, peregrinus fit. (ULP. Reg. 10. 3.) It was a maxim of Roman law, that no one could cease to be a citizen against his will. Civitatem nemo unquam ullo populi jussu amittit invito. (CIC. pro Dom. 29.) The condemned was therefore denied the necessities of life, until he was driven to withdraw himself from the city. Id autem ut esset furcendum, non ademptione civitatis, sed tecti, et aquae et ignis interdictione faciebant. (CIC. pro Dom. 30.) The aquae et ignis interdictio thus became a form by which a sentence of perpetual banishment was inflicted. The deportatio in insulam superseded this form. (D. xlvi. 29. 2.) The person who was banished was confined to certain limits, out of which he could not stir without rendering himself punishable with death. This must be kept distinct from simple relegatio, which was also an exile within prescribed limits, but did not in any way affect the status. (D. xlvi. 22. 7. See Tit. 12. 1 and 2.)

3. Minima capitis deminutio est, cum et civitas et libertas retinetur, sed status hominis commutatur. Quod accidit in his, qui, cum sui juris fuerunt, ceperunt alieno juri subjecti esse, vel contra.

3. The least capitis deminutio is, when a person's status is changed without forfeiture either of citizenship or liberty; as when a person sui juris becomes subject to the power of another, or a person alieni juris becomes sui juris.

GAI. I. 162.

The status was changed (commutatur) by the change of family position; but the person who underwent this form of capitis deminutio had still after it all the three elements of status. Whether the minima capitis deminutio involved a degradation or merely a change has been much debated by commentators. Savigny (see I Poste's Gaius, p. 128) was of opinion that capitis deminutio always involved a degradation. The French commentators take II the other view, that there was merely a change implied, and they have, perhaps, if not the better arguments, the clearer authorities on their side. Thus Ulpian says the minima capitis deminutio takes place salvo statu. (D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 8.) What is said in the Digest of change of family by arrogation and emancipation must be extended to adoption. (D. iv. 5. 3.) In old times, the wife who passed in manum viri, or the freeman who was given in mancipio, underwent this minima capitis deminutio. (GAI. i. 162.)

After the words vel contra, at the end of this paragraph, some texts have the following words: veluti si filiusfamilias a patre emancipatus fuerit, est capite deminutus. The addition is probably owing to some writer having perceived that it was only in the case of emancipation that it was true that when a person became sui juris he was capite minutus. There was no change of family when a son became sui juris on the death of his father.

The person who underwent the minima capitis deminutio was, in the eyes of the law, a new person. He could not, therefore, until the prætor permitted an action against him, be sued for debts previously contracted. (D. iv. 5. 2.) And we shall see, in the Second Book, that in the old law a usufruct was extinguished by the minima capitis deminutio of the usufructuary. (Bk. ii. Tit. 4. 3.) The capite minutus also, as we shall see in the Third Book (Tit. 1. 9 and 10. 1), forfeited his place in intestate succession, except so far as he was helped by the prætor, or by legislation.

4. Servus autem manumissus capite non minuitur, quia nullum caput habuit.

4. A slave who is manumitted is not said to be capite minutus, as he has no 'caput.'

D. iv. 5. 3. 2.

5. Quibus autem dignitas magis quam status permutatur, capite non minuuntur: et ideo senatu motos capite non minui constat.

5. Those whose dignity rather than their status is changed, do not undergo a capitis deminutio, and so persons removed from the senatorial dignity undergo none.

D. i. 9. 3.

Even infamia, during the Empire at any rate, did not produce a capitis deminutio. (D. l. 16. 103.)

6. Quod autem dictum est, manere cognationis jus et post capitis deminutionem, hoc ita est, si minima capitis deminutio interveniat: manet enim cognatio. Nam si maxima capitis deminutio incurrat, jus quoque cognationis perit, ut puta servitute alicujus cognati, et ne quidem, si manumissus fuerit, recipit cognationem. Sed et si in insulam deportatus quis sit, cognatio solvitur.

6. In saying that the right of cognation remains in spite of a capitis deminutio, we were speaking only of the least deminutio, after which the cognation subsists. For, by the greater deminutio, as, for example, if one of the cognati becomes a slave, the right of cognation is wholly destroyed, so as not to be recovered even by manumission. So, too, the right of cognation is put an end to by deportation to an island.

D. xxxviii. 8. 5. 7.

have, perhaps, if not the better arguments, the clearer authorities on their side. Thus Ulpian says the minima capitis deminutio takes place salvo statu. (D. xxxviii. 17. 1. 8.) What is said in the Digest of change of family by arrogation and emancipation must be extended to adoption. (D. iv. 5. 3.) In old times, the wife who passed in manum viri, or the freeman who was given in mancipio, underwent this minima capitis deminutio. (GAI. i. 162.)

After the words vel contra, at the end of this paragraph, some texts have the following words: veluti si filiusfamilias a patre emancipatus fuerit, est capite deminutus. The addition is probably owing to some writer having perceived that it was only in the case of emancipation that it was true that when a person became sui juris he was capite minutus. There was no change of family when a son became sui juris on the death of his father.

The person who underwent the minima capitis deminutio was, in the eyes of the law, a new person. He could not, therefore, until the prætor permitted an action against him, be sued for debts previously contracted. (D. iv. 5. 2.) And we shall see, in the Second Book, that in the old law a usufruct was extinguished by the minima capitis deminutio of the usufructuary. (Bk. ii. Tit. 4. 3.) The capite minutus also, as we shall see in the Third Book (Tit. 1. 9 and 10. 1), forfeited his place in intestate succession, except so far as he was helped by the prætor, or by legislation.

4. Servus autem manumissus capite non minuitur, quia nullum caput habuit.

4. A slave who is manumitted is not said to be capite minutus, as he has no 'caput.'

D. iv. 5. 3. 2.

5. Quibus autem dignitas magis quam status permutatur, capite non minuuntur: et ideo senatu motos capite non minui constat.

5. Those whose dignity rather than their status is changed, do not undergo a capitis deminutio, and so persons removed from the senatorial dignity undergo none.

D. i. 9. 3.

Even infamia, during the Empire at any rate, did not produce a capitis deminutio. (D. 1. 16. 103.)

6. Quod autem dictum est, manere cognationis jus et post capitis deminutionem, hoc ita est, si minima capitis deminutio interveniat: manet enim cognatio. Nam si maxima capitis deminutio incurrat, jus quoque cognationis perit, ut puta servitute alicujus cognati, et ne quidem, si manumissus fuerit, recipit cognationem. Sed et si in insulam deportatus quis sit, cognatio solvitur.

6. In saying that the right of cognation remains in spite of a capitis deminutio, we were speaking only of the least deminutio, after which the cognation subsists. For, by the greater deminutio, as, for example, if one of the cognati becomes a slave, the right of cognation is wholly destroyed, so as not to be recovered even by manumission. So, too, the right of cognation is put an end to by deportation to an island.

D. xxxviii. 8. 5. 7.

See Tit. 15. 1. A change of the civil family by adoption or arrogation never dissolved the natural tie of cognatio, or destroyed its attendant civil rights; but these were destroyed by a sentence which involved the loss of the civitas. And if the civitas was once lost and then regained, the restored, or rather new, civis was in all respects the founder of a new family, excepting when he was restitutus in integrum, that is, restored by the emperor to the same position that he had formerly held. (See Tit. 12. 1.)

7. Cum autem ad agnatos tutela pertineat, non simul ad omnes pertinet, sed ad eos tantum, qui proximio gradu sint, vel, si ejusdem gradus sint, ad omnes.

7. The right to be tutor, which belongs to the agnati, does not belong to all at the same time, but to the nearest in degree only; or if there are many in the same degree, then to all in that degree.

GAI. i. 164.

The principle of the law was, that those persons should have the burden of the tutelage who had the hope of the succession. (Tit. 17. pr.) The nearest in degree of the agnati were therefore the tutors in case of intestacy. The nearest in degree might, however, happen to be a woman or an infant, and then, although this person was the next in succession to the inheritance, it was necessary to go a step further off to find the tutor. (D. xxvi. 4. 1. 1.)

TIT. XVII. DE LEGITIMA PATRONORUM TUTELA.

Ex eadem lege duodecim tabularum libertorum et libertarum tutela ad patronos liberosque eorum pertinet, quæ et ipsa legitima tutela vocatur: non quia nominatim ea lege de hac tutela cavetur, sed quia perinde accepta est per interpretationem, atque si verbis legis introducta esset. Eo enim ipso, quod hereditates libertorum libertarumque, si intestati decessissent, jusserat lex ad patronos liberosve eorum pertinere, crediderunt veteres, voluisse legem etiam tutelas ad eos pertinere, cum et agnatos, quos ad hereditatem vocat, eosdem et tutores esse jussit et quia plerumque, ubi successionis est emolumentum, ibi et tutelæ onus esse debet. Ideo autem diximus plerumque, quia, si a femina impubes manumittatur, ipsa ad hereditatem vocatur, cum alius est tutor.

By the same law of the Twelve Tables, the tutelage of freedmen and freedwomen belongs to their patrons, and to the children of their patrons; and this tutelage, too, is called legal tutelage: not that the law contains any express provision on the subject, but because it has been as firmly established by interpretation, as if it had been introduced by the express words of the law. For as the law had ordered that patrons and their children should succeed to the inheritance of their freedmen or freedwomen who should die intestate, the ancients were of opinion that the intent of the law was that the tutelage also belonged to them; seeing that the law, which calls agnati to the inheritance, also appoints them to be tutors, because in most cases, where the advantage of the succession is, there also ought to be the burden of the tutelage. We say 'in most cases,' because, if a person below the age of puberty is manumitted by a female, she is called to the inheritance, while another person is tutor.

GAI. i. 165; D. xxvi. 4. 1. 1. 3.

See Tit. 15. 1. A change of the civil family by adoption or arrogation never dissolved the natural tie of cognatio, or destroyed its attendant civil rights; but these were destroyed by a sentence which involved the loss of the civitas. And if the civitas was once lost and then regained, the restored, or rather new, civis was in all respects the founder of a new family, excepting when he was restitutus in integrum, that is, restored by the emperor to the same position that he had formerly held. (See Tit. 12. 1.)

7. Cum autem ad agnatos tutela pertineat, non simul ad omnes pertinet, sed ad eos tantum, qui proximior gradu sint, vel, si ejusdem gradus sint, ad omnes.

7. The right to be tutor, which belongs to the agnati, does not belong to all at the same time, but to the nearest in degree only; or if there are many in the same degree, then to all in that degree.

GAI. i. 164.

The principle of the law was, that those persons should have the burden of the tutelage who had the hope of the succession. (Tit. 17. pr.) The nearest in degree of the agnati were therefore the tutors in case of intestacy. The nearest in degree might, however, happen to be a woman or an infant, and then, although this person was the next in succession to the inheritance, it was necessary to go a step further off to find the tutor. (D. xxvi. 4. 1. 1.)

TIT. XVII. DE LEGITIMA PATRONORUM TUTELA.

Ex eadem lege duodecim tabularum libertorum et libertarum tutela ad patronos liberosque eorum pertinet, quæ et ipsa legitima tutela vocatur: non quia nominatim ea lege de hac tutela cavetur, sed quia perinde accepta est per interpretationem, atque si verbis legis introducta esset. Eo enim ipso, quod hereditates libertorum libertarumque, si intestati decessissent, jusserat lex ad patronos liberosve eorum pertinere, crediderunt veteres, voluisse legem etiam tutelas ad eos pertinere, cum et agnatos, quos ad hereditatem vocat, eosdem et tutores esse jussit et quia plerumque, ubi successionis est emolumentum, ibi et tutelæ onus esse debet. Ideo autem diximus plerumque, quia, si a femina impubes manumittatur, ipsa ad hereditatem vocatur, cum alius est tutor.

By the same law of the Twelve Tables, the tutelage of freedmen and freedwomen belongs to their patrons, and to the children of their patrons; and this tutelage, too, is called legal tutelage: not that the law contains any express provision on the subject, but because it has been as firmly established by interpretation, as if it had been introduced by the express words of the law. For as the law had ordered that patrons and their children should succeed to the inheritance of their freedmen or freedwomen who should die intestate, the ancients were of opinion that the intent of the law was that the tutelage also belonged to them; seeing that the law, which calls agnati to the inheritance, also appoints them to be tutors, because in most cases, where the advantage of the succession is, there also ought to be the burden of the tutelage. We say 'in most cases,' because, if a person below the age of puberty is manumitted by a female, she is called to the inheritance, while another person is tutor.

GAI. i. 165; D. xxvi. 4. 1. 1. 3.

The law gave the patron the right of succession to the inheritance of the freedman ; and as the right of succession was connected with the tutelage in the case of the agnati, it seemed natural to connect the two in the case of the patron.

TIT. XVIII. DE LEGITIMA PARENTUM TUTELA.

Exemplo patronorum recepta est et alia tutela, quæ et ipsa legitima vocatur. Nam si quis filium aut filiam, nepotem aut neptem ex filio et deinceps impuberes emancipaverit, legitimus eorum tutor erit.

In imitation of the tutelage of patrons, there is, too, another kind which also is said to be legal: for if any one emancipates, below the age of puberty, a son, or a daughter, or a grandson, or a granddaughter, being the issue of a son, or any other descendant, he is their legal tutor.

GAI. I. 175.

This has already been stated in Title 12. 6. (See note to that paragraph.)

TIT. XIX. DE FIDUCIARIA TUTELA.

Fiduciary
Est et alia tutela, quæ fiduciaria appellatur. Nam si parens filium vel filiam, nepotem vel neptem et deinceps impuberes manumiserit, legitimam nanciscitur eorum tutelam: quo defuncto, si liberi virilis sexus extant, fiduciarii tutores filiorum suorum vel fratris vel sororis et ceterorum efficiuntur. Atqui patrono legitimo tutore mortuo, liberi quoque ejus legitimi sunt tutores: quoniam filius quidem defuncti, si non esset a vivo patre emancipatus, post obitum ejus sui juris efficeretur nec in fratrum potestatem recideret ideoque nec in tutelam, libertus autem si servus mansisset, utique eodem jure apud liberos domini post mortem ejus futurus esset. Ita tamen ii ad tutelam vocantur, si perfectæ ætatis sint. Quod nostra constitutio generaliter in omnibus tutelis et curationibus observari præcepit.

There is another kind of tutelage called fiduciary; for if an ascendant emancipates, below the age of puberty, a son or a daughter, a grandson or a granddaughter, or any other descendant, he is their legal tutor; but if, at his death, he leaves male children, they become the fiduciary tutors of their own sons, or brother, or sister, or other descendants of the deceased. But when a patron, who is a legal tutor, dies, his children also become legal tutors; the reason of this distinction being that a son, who has not been emancipated in his father's lifetime, becomes sui juris at the death of his father, and does not fall under power of his brothers, nor, therefore, under their tutelage; while the freedman, had he remained a slave, would also have been, after the death of his master, the slave of his master's children. These persons, however, are not called to be tutors unless of full age, a rule which by our constitution applies generally to all tutors and curators.

D. xxvi. 4. 3, 4; C. v. 30. 5.

When it is said that the sons become the fiduciary tutors of their own sons, reference is made to the case of the grandsons having been emancipated by the grandfather.

The person who emancipated the child succeeded to all the

The law gave the patron the right of succession to the inheritance of the freedman; and as the right of succession was connected with the tutelage in the case of the agnati, it seemed natural to connect the two in the case of the patron.

TIT. XVIII. DE LEGITIMA PARENTUM TUTELA.

Exemplo patronorum recepta est et alia tutela, quæ et ipsa legitima vocatur. Nam si quis filium aut filiam, nepotem aut neptem ex filio et deinceps impuberes emancipaverit, legitimus eorum tutor erit.

In imitation of the tutelage of patrons, there is, too, another kind which also is said to be legal: for if any one emancipates, below the age of puberty, a son, or a daughter, or a grandson, or a granddaughter, being the issue of a son, or any other descendant, he is their legal tutor.

GAL. i. 175.

This has already been stated in Title 12. 6. (See note to that paragraph.)

TIT. XIX. DE FIDUCIARIA TUTELA.

Est et alia tutela, quæ fiduciaria appellatur. Nam si parens filium vel filiam, nepotem vel neptem et deinceps impuberes manumiserit, legitimam nanciscitur eorum tutelam: quo defuncto, si liberi virilis sexus extant, fiduciarii tutores filiorum suorum vel fratris vel sororis et ceterorum efficiuntur. Atqui patrono legitimo tutore mortuo, liberi quoque ejus legitimi sunt tutores: quoniam filius quidem defuncti, si non esset a vivo patre emancipatus, post obitum ejus sui juris efficeretur nec in fratrum potestatem recideret ideoque nec in tutelam, libertus autem si servus mansisset, utique eodem jure apud liberos domini post mortem ejus futurus esset. Ita tamen ii ad tutelam vocantur, si perfectæ ætatis sint. Quod nostra constitutio generaliter in omnibus tutelis et curationibus observari præcepit.

There is another kind of tutelage called fiduciary; for if an ascendant emancipates, below the age of puberty, a son or a daughter, a grandson or a granddaughter, or any other descendant, he is their legal tutor; but if, at his death, he leaves male children, they become the fiduciary tutors of their own sons, or brother, or sister, or other descendants of the deceased. But when a patron, who is a legal tutor, dies, his children also become legal tutors; the reason of this distinction being that a son, who has not been emancipated in his father's lifetime, becomes sui juris at the death of his father, and does not fall under power of his brothers, nor, therefore, under their tutelage; while the freedman, had he remained a slave, would also have been, after the death of his master, the slave of his master's children. These persons, however, are not called to be tutors unless of full age, a rule which by our constitution applies generally to all tutors and curators.

D. xxvi. 4. 3, 4; C. v. 30. 5.

When it is said that the sons become the fiduciary tutors of their own sons, reference is made to the case of the grandsons having been emancipated by the grandfather.

The person who emancipated the child succeeded to all the rights of a patron over the child; if, as was usual (see Tit. 12. 6, note), it was the father, then, as being the patron, he was included in the terms of the law of the Twelve Tables, and was a tutor legitimus (GAI. i. 172; D. xxvi. 4. 3-10); if it was not, he was a tutor fiduciarius (GAI. i. 166), a tutor bound to the father by a trust. In the case of a slave, the children of a patron succeeded to the rights of patronage; but this did not extend to the case of emancipated children: the children not emancipated were not the patrons of those who were. They were not tutors, therefore, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and the word fiduciarii is borrowed from its more proper usage to express their position, and is in this case merely opposed to legitimi. (D. xxvi. 4. 4.) The reason given in the text for their being only tutores fiduciarii, viz., that the emancipated infant would have been sui juris if he had not been emancipated, is manifestly an imperfect one. For it would not be necessarily true when a grandfather emancipated his grandson; supposing his father were living and in the power of the grandfather, the grandson would not on the grandfather's death become sui juris, if he were not emancipated. If the father of the emancipated child left no other children above the age of puberty, the nearest agnatus, as, for instance, the father's brother, was the tutor, and he, too, was called the tutor fiduciarius. (THEOPH. Paraph.)

The perfecta ætas was the age of twenty-five years.

TIT. XX. DE ATILIANO TUTORE VEL EO, QUI EX LEGE JULIA ET TITIA DABATUR.

Si cui nullus omnino tutor fuerat, ei datur in urbe quidem Roma a prætore urbano et majore parte tribunorum plebis tutor ex lege Atilia, in provinciis vero a præsidibus provinciarum ex lege Julia et Titia.

If any one had no tutor at all, one used to be given him, in the city of Rome by the prætor urbanus, and a majority of the tribunes of the plebs, under the lex Atilia; in the provinces, by the præsides under the lex Julia et Titia.

GAI. i. 185.

The date of the lex Atilia is unknown, but it must have been in existence in the year of the city 557, when Livy (xxxix. 9) says of a liberta, 'Post patroni mortem, quia in nullius manu erat, tutore a tribunis et prætore petito.' And as the necessity for some means of appointing a tutor, where one was not appointed by testament or law, must have been early felt, the lex Atilia, or one similar to it, must probably have existed long before the time of which Livy speaks. The date of the lex Julia et Titia was probably 723 A.U.C. As there were ten tribunes, the majority would be at least six.

The term tutor dativus is used by Justinian (Cod. i. 3. 52) to express a tutor given by the magistrate; this term being used by Gaius (i. 154) to express tutors given by testament.

1. Sed et si testamento tutor sub condicione aut die certo datus fuerat,

1. Again, if a testamentary tutor had been appointed conditionally, or rights of a patron over the child; if, as was usual (see Tit. 12. 6, note), it was the father, then, as being the patron, he was included in the terms of the law of the Twelve Tables, and was a tutor legitimus (GAI. i. 172; D. xxvi. 4. 3-10); if it was not, he was a tutor fiduciarius (GAI. i. 166), a tutor bound to the father by a trust. In the case of a slave, the children of a patron succeeded to the rights of patronage; but this did not extend to the case of emancipated children: the children not emancipated were not the patrons of those who were. They were not tutors, therefore, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and the word fiduciarii is borrowed from its more proper usage to express their position, and is in this case merely opposed to legitimi. (D. xxvi. 4. 4.) The reason given in the text for their being only tutores fiduciarii, viz., that the emancipated infant would have been sui juris if he had not been emancipated, is manifestly an imperfect one. For it would not be necessarily true when a grandfather emancipated his grandson; supposing his father were living and in the power of the grandfather, the grandson would not on the grandfather's death become sui juris, if he were not emancipated. If the father of the emancipated child left no other children above the age of puberty, the nearest agnatus, as, for instance, the father's brother, was the tutor, and he, too, was called the tutor fiduciarius. (THEOPH. Paraph.)

The perfecta ætas was the age of twenty-five years.

TIT. XX. DE ATILIANO TUTORE VEL EO, QUI EX LEGE JULIA ET TITIA DABATUR.

Si cui nullus omnino tutor fuerat, ei dabatur in urbe quidem Roma a prætore urbano et majore parte tribunorum plebis tutor ex lege Atilia, in provinciis vero a præsidibus provinciarum ex lege Julia et Titia.

If any one had no tutor at all, one used to be given him, in the city of Rome by the prætor urbanus, and a majority of the tribunes of the plebs, under the lex Atilia; in the provinces, by the præsides under the lex Julia et Titia.

GAI. i. 185.

The date of the lex Atilia is unknown, but it must have been in existence in the year of the city 557, when Livy (xxxix. 9) says of a liberta, 'Post patroni mortem, quia in nullius manu erat, tutore a tribunis et prætore petito.' And as the necessity for some means of appointing a tutor, where one was not appointed by testament or law, must have been early felt, the lex Atilia, or one similar to it, must probably have existed long before the time of which Livy speaks. The date of the lex Julia et Titia was probably 723 A.U.C. As there were ten tribunes, the majority would be at least six.

The term tutor dativus is used by Justinian (Cod. i. 3. 52) to express a tutor given by the magistrate; this term being used by Gaius (i. 154) to express tutors given by testament.

1. Sed et si testamento tutor sub condicione aut die certo datus fuerat,

1. Again, if a testamentary tutor had been appointed conditionally, or quamdiu condicio aut dies pendebat, ex iisdem legibus tutor dari poterat. Item si pure datus fuerat, quamdiu nemo ex testamento heres existerat, tamdiu ex iisdem legibus tutor petendus erat, qui desinebat tutor esse, si condicio existeret aut dies veniret aut heres existeret.

from a certain time, then until the completion of the condition or arrival of the time fixed, another tutor might be appointed under the same laws. Also, if a tutor had been given unconditionally, yet, as long as no one had accepted the inheritance, as heir by the testament, another tutor might under the same laws be appointed for the interval. But his office ceased when the condition was accomplished, when the time arrived, or the inheritance was entered upon.

GAI. i. 186; D. xxvi. 2. 11.

If the wishes of the testator were declared to any extent respecting the appointment of a tutor, this entirely excluded the tutores legitimi, and every deficiency in the declaration was remedied by the interposition of the magistrate. (D. xxvi. 2. 11.)

No testament took effect until an heir entered on the inheritance. (See Introd. sec. 76.) If it was known that a testament existed appointing a tutor, this excluded the agnati from being tutors; but the tutor under the testament did not commence his tutela until the testament took effect. Meantime a tutor appointed by the magistrate took care of the pupil.

2. Ab hostibus quoque tutore capto, ex his legibus tutor petebatur, qui desinebat esse tutor, si is, qui captus erat, in civitatem reversus fuerat: nam reversus recipiebat tutelam jure postliminii.

2. If, again, a tutor was taken prisoner by the enemy, application could be made, under the same laws, for another tutor, whose office ceased when the first tutor returned from captivity; for on his return he resumed the tutelage by the jus postliminii.

GAI. i. 187.

For an account of the jus postliminii, see Title 12. 5.

3. Sed ex his legibus pupillis tutores desiderat dari, posteaquam primo consules pupillis utriusque sexus tutores ex inquisitione dare ceperunt, deinde prætores ex constitutionibus. Nam supra scriptis legibus neque de cautione a tutoribus exigenda rem salvam pupillis fore, neque de compellendis tutoribus ad tutelæ administrationem quidquam cavetur.

3. But tutors have ceased to be appointed under these laws, since they have been appointed to pupils of either sex, first by the consuls, after inquiry into the case, and subsequently by the prætors under imperial constitutions. For the above-mentioned laws required no security from the tutors for the safety of the pupils' property, nor did they contain any provisions to compel them to discharge the duties of the office.

The power to appoint tutors was given by Claudius to the consuls (SUET. in Claud. 23), and transferred by Antoninus Pius (JUL. CAPIT. in Vit. M. Anton. 10) to the prætors.

4. Sed hoc jure utimur, ut Romæ quidem præfectus urbis vel prætor

4. Under our present system tutors are appointed at Rome by the præfect was at Rome by been - in the provinces

the prætor

quamdiu condicio aut dies pende-bat, ex iisdem legibus tutor dari poterat.
Item si pure datus fuerat, quamdiu nemo ex testamento heres existeret, tamdiu ex iisdem legibus tutor pe-tendus erat, qui desinebat tutor esse, si condicio existeret aut dies veniret aut heres existeret.

from a certain time, then until the completion of the condition or arrival of the time fixed, another tutor might be appointed under the same laws.
Also, if a tutor had been given unconditionally, yet, as long as no one had accepted the inheritance, as heir by the testament, another tutor might under the same laws be appointed for the interval. But his office ceased when the condition was accomplished, when the time arrived, or the inheritance was entered upon.

GAL. i. 186; D. xxvi. 2. 11.

If the wishes of the testator were declared to any extent respecting the appointment of a tutor, this entirely excluded the tutores legitimi, and every deficiency in the declaration was remedied by the interposition of the magistrate. (D. xxvi. 2. 11.)

No testament took effect until an heir entered on the inheritance. (See Introd. sec. 76.) If it was known that a testament existed appointing a tutor, this excluded the agnati from being tutors; but the tutor under the testament did not commence his tutela until the testament took effect. Meantime a tutor appointed by the magistrate took care of the pupil.

2. Ab hostibus quoque tutore capto, ex his legibus tutor petebatur, qui desinebat esse tutor, si is, qui captus erat, in civitatem reversus fuerat: nam reversus recipiebat tutelam jure postliminii.

2. If, again, a tutor was taken prisoner by the enemy, application could be made, under the same laws, for another tutor, whose office ceased when the first tutor returned from captivity; for on his return he resumed the tutelage by the jus post- liminii.

GAL. i. 187.

For an account of the jus postliminii, see Title 12. 5.

3. Sed ex his legibus pupillis tutores desierunt dari, posteaquam primo consules pupillis utriusque sexus tutores ex inquisitione dare coeperunt, deinde praetores ex constitutionibus. Nam supra scriptis legibus neque de cautione a tutoribus exigenda rem salvam pupillis fore, neque de compellendis tutoribus ad tutelae administrationem quidquam cavetur.

3. But tutors have ceased to be appointed under these laws, since they have been appointed to pupils of either sex, first by the consuls, after inquiry into the case, and subsequently by the praetors under imperial constitutions.
For the above-mentioned laws required no security from the tutors for the safety of the pupils' property, nor did they contain any provisions to compel them to discharge the duties of the office.

The power to appoint tutors was given by Claudius to the consuls (SUET. in Claud. 23), and transferred by Antoninus Pius (JUL. CAPIT. in Vit. M. Anton. 10) to the praetors.

4. Sed hoc jure utimur, ut Romae quidem praefectus urbis vel praetor

4. Under our present system tutors are appointed at Rome by the praefect was at Rome by them. In the provinces the praefect

secundum suam jurisdictionem, in provinciis autem praesides ex inquisitione tutores crearent, vel magistratus jussu praesidium, si non sint magnae pupilli facultates.

of the city, or the praetor, according to his jurisdiction, and, in the provinces, by the praesides, after inquiry; or by an inferior magistrate, at the command of the praeses, if the property of the pupil is only small.

D. xxvi. 5. 1.

The praefectus urbis was, from the time of Augustus, an officer who had the superintendence of the city and its police, and power to decide on both civil and criminal cases, his civil jurisdiction extending one hundred miles from the city, his criminal jurisdiction evidently extending over the whole of Italy. (D. i. 12.) As he was considered the direct representative of the emperor, much that previously belonged to the praetor urbanus fell gradually into his hands. The praefectus urbis appointed tutors in cases where pupils of higher rank and larger fortune were concerned; the praetor, when the pupils were of humbler station and smaller fortune; and this it is which is referred to in the words secundum suam jurisdictionem.

In the provinces, the praeses appointed; but until Justinian altered the law (see next paragraph), not only could municipal magistrates not appoint without the authority of the praeses, but no one could be authorised by the praeses unless he was a magistrate. (D. xxvi. 5. 8.)

5. Nos autem per constitutionem nostram et hujusmodi difficultates hominum resecantes nec expectata jussione praesidium, disponimus, si facultas pupilli vel adulti usque ad quingentos solidos valeat, defensores civitatum (una cum ejusdem civitatis religiosissimo antistite vel apud alias publicas personas) vel magistratus, vel iudicem Alexandrinae civitatis tutores vel curatores creare, legitima cautela secundum ejusdem constitutionis normam praestanda, videlicet eorum periculo, qui eam accipiant.

5. But by one of our constitutions, to do away with the difficulties to which these provisions as to different persons gave rise, and to avoid the necessity of waiting for the order of the praeses, we have enacted, that if the property of the pupil or minor does not exceed five hundred solidi, tutors or curators shall be appointed by the defensores of the city (acting in conjunction with the holy bishop, or before other public persons), or by the magistrates, or, in the city of Alexandria, by the judge; but legal security must be given according to the terms of the same constitution, that is to say, at the risk of those who accept it.

C. i. 4. 30.

The constitution of Justinian provided that, where the fortune of the person requiring a tutor or curator did not amount to more than 500 solidi (the aureus, 1*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* of English money, after the time of Alexander Severus was called a solidus), a local magistrate, without the authorisation of the praeses, could appoint, not making a formal examination into the position and character of the tutor or curator (inquisitio), but merely taking a money security for the faithful performance of his duties.

Si facultas pupilli, &c. This is an ambiguous translation of the clause in the Code: ἐπερ ἄχρι πεντακοσίων χρυσῶν καὶ μόνον τὰ τῆς περιουσίας εἴη τῶν νέων.

secundum suam jurisdictionem, in provinciis autem praesides ex inquisitione tutores crearent, vel magistratus jussu praesidium, si non sint magnae pupilli facultates.

of the city, or the praetor, according to his jurisdiction, and, in the provinces, by the praesides, after inquiry; or by an inferior magistrate, at the command of the praeses, if the property of the pupil is only small.

D. xxvi. 5. 1.

The praefectus urbis was, from the time of Augustus, an officer who had the superintendence of the city and its police, and power to decide on both civil and criminal cases, his civil jurisdiction extending one hundred miles from the city, his criminal jurisdiction evidently extending over the whole of Italy. (D. i. 12.) As he was considered the direct representative of the emperor, much that previously belonged to the praetor urbanus fell gradually into his hands. The praefectus urbis appointed tutors in cases where pupils of higher rank and larger fortune were concerned; the praetor, when the pupils were of humbler station and smaller fortune; and this it is which is referred to in the words secundum suam jurisdictionem.

In the provinces, the praeses appointed; but until Justinian altered the law (see next paragraph), not only could municipal magistrates not appoint without the authority of the praeses, but no one could be authorised by the praeses unless he was a magistrate. (D. xxvi. 5. 8.)

5. Nos autem per constitutionem nostram et hujusmodi difficultates hominum resecantes nec expectata jussione praesidium, disponimus, si facultas pupilli vel adulti usque ad quingentos solidos valeat, defensores civitatum (una cum ejusdem civitatis religiosissimo antistite vel apud alias publicas personas) vel magistratus, vel iudicium Alexandrinae civitatis tutores vel curatores creare, legitima cautela secundum ejusdem constitutionis normam praestanda, videlicet eorum periculo, qui eam accipiant.

5. But by one of our constitutions, to do away with the difficulties to which these provisions as to different persons gave rise, and to avoid the necessity of waiting for the order of the praeses, we have enacted, that if the property of the pupil or minor does not exceed five hundred solidi, tutors or curators shall be appointed by the defensores of the city (acting in conjunction with the holy bishop, or before other public persons), or by the magistrates, or, in the city of Alexandria, by the judge; but legal security must be given according to the terms of the same constitution, that is to say, at the risk of those who accept it.

C. i. 4. 30.

The constitution of Justinian provided that, where the fortune of the person requiring a tutor or curator did not amount to more than 500 solidi (the aureus, 1*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* of English money, after the time of Alexander Severus was called a solidus), a local magistrate, without the authorisation of the praeses, could appoint, not making a formal examination into the position and character of the tutor or curator (inquisitio), but merely taking a money security for the faithful performance of his duties.

Si facultas pupilli, &c. This is an ambiguous translation of the clause in the Code: ἐπερ ἄχρι πεντακοσίων χρυσῶν καὶ μόνον τὰ τῆς περιουσίας εἴη τῶν νέων.

The defensor was a magistrate appointed for two years out of the decuriones of a city. His principal business was to act as a check on the præses, and he had besides a limited civil and criminal jurisdiction.

6. Impuberes autem in tutela esse naturali jure conveniens est, ut is, qui perfectæ ætatis non sit, alterius tutela regatur.

6. It is agreeable to the law of nature, that persons under the age of puberty should be under tutelage, so that persons of tender years may be under the government of another.

GAI. i. 189.

Gaius, in his Institutes, after the words extracted from him in the text, proceeds to contrast with the tutelage of minors, which is an institution natural and necessary in all communities, the tutelage of women, which he considers founded on no reasonable basis. The original reason of this tutelage was probably the incapability of women to share in the proceedings of the curia, and their being supposed unfit to go through solemn forms. In default of a testamentary tutor appointed by the father of the woman if she was in his power, or by the husband if she was in manu—and it may be mentioned that the husband could by testament either appoint a tutor to his wife in manu, or give her the option of choosing one (GAI. i. 148 et seq.)—the nearest agnatus was the tutor, women being either alieni juris, or else under a tutor all their lives; the tutor being allowed in certain cases to transfer his office (GAI. i. 168), and the woman being allowed to demand a substituted tutor in place of one absent. (GAI. i. 173.) The lex Atilia and the lex Julia et Titia applied to women. (ULP. Reg. 11. 18.) The lex Papia Poppæa exempted from tutelage women who had three children (GAI. i. 145), and a lex Claudia (A.D. 45) suppressed the tutelage of the agnati altogether in the case of women of free birth, leaving only the tutelage of ascendants and patrons. (GAI. i. 157.) This modified tutelage of women existed in the time of Ulpian (Reg. 11. 8), but had fallen into desuetude in the time of Justinian. While the tutelage of women lasted, the woman above puberty (see GAI. i. 190 et seq.) managed her own affairs, and the tutor was only called in to give his auctoritas on occasions of moment, the prætor interposing to force a tutor to give his authority when necessary, but the prætor would not adopt this course where the tutor was an ascendant or patron, unless some very strong reason existed.

7. Cum igitur pupillorum pupillarumque tutores negotia gerunt, post pubertatem tutelæ judicio rationem reddunt.

7. As tutors administer the affairs of their pupils, they may be compelled to account, by the actio tutelæ, when their pupils arrive at puberty.

GAI. i. 191.

The modes by which the faithful discharge of his duty by a tutor was insured are given in the 24th Title.

TIT. XXI. DE AUCTORITATE TUTORUM. ✓

Auctoritas autem tutoris in quibuscumque causis necessaria pupillis est,

In some cases it is necessary that the tutor should authorise the acts of

+ administer the pupil's affairs

The defensor was a magistrate appointed for two years out of the decuriones of a city. His principal business was to act as a check on the præses, and he had besides a limited civil and criminal jurisdiction.

6. Impuberes autem in tutela esse naturali jure conveniens est, ut is, qui perfectæ ætatis non sit, alterius tutela regatur.

6. It is agreeable to the law of nature, that persons under the age of puberty should be under tutelage, so that persons of tender years may be under the government of another.

GAI. i. 189.

Gaius, in his Institutes, after the words extracted from him in the text, proceeds to contrast with the tutelage of minors, which is an institution natural and necessary in all communities, the tutelage of women, which he considers founded on no reasonable basis. The original reason of this tutelage was probably the incapability of women to share in the proceedings of the curia, and their being supposed unfit to go through solemn forms. In default of a testamentary tutor appointed by the father of the woman if she was in his power, or by the husband if she was in manu—and it may be mentioned that the husband could by testament either appoint a tutor to his wife in manu, or give her the option of choosing one (GAI. i. 148 et seq.)—the nearest agnatus was the tutor, women being either alieni juris, or else under a tutor all their lives; the tutor being allowed in certain cases to transfer his office (GAI. i. 168), and the woman being allowed to demand a substituted tutor in place of one absent. (GAI. i. 173.) The lex Atilia and the lex Julia et Titia applied to women. (ULP. Reg. 11. 18.) The lex Papia Poppæa exempted from tutelage women who had three children (GAI. i. 145), and a lex Claudia (A.D. 45) suppressed the tutelage of the agnati altogether in the case of women of free birth, leaving only the tutelage of ascendants and patrons. (GAI. i. 157.) This modified tutelage of women existed in the time of Ulpian (Reg. 11. 8), but had fallen into desuetude in the time of Justinian. While the tutelage of women lasted, the woman above puberty (see GAI. i. 190 et seq.) managed her own affairs, and the tutor was only called in to give his auctoritas on occasions of moment, the prætor interposing to force a tutor to give his authority when necessary, but the prætor would not adopt this course where the tutor was an ascendant or patron, unless some very strong reason existed.

7. Cum igitur pupillorum pupillarumque tutores negotia gerunt, post pubertatem tutelæ judicio rationem reddunt.

7. As tutors administer the affairs of their pupils, they may be compelled to account, by the actio tutelæ, when their pupils arrive at puberty.

GAI. i. 191.

The modes by which the faithful discharge of his duty by a tutor was insured are given in the 24th Title.

TIT. XXI. DE AUCTORITATE TUTORUM. ✓

Auctoritas autem tutoris in quibusdam causis necessaria pupillis est,

In some cases it is necessary that the tutor should authorise the acts of

+ administer the pupil's affairs

in quibusdam non est necessaria. Ut ecce si quid dari sibi stipulentur, non est necessaria tutoris auctoritas: quod si aliis pupilli promittant, necessaria est: namque placuit, meliorem quidem suam condicionem licere eis facere etiam sine tutoris auctoritate, deteriorem vero non aliter quam tutore auctore. Unde in his causis, ex quibus mutuae obligationes nascuntur, in emptionibus venditionibus, locationibus conductionibus, mandatis, depositis, si tutoris auctoritas non interveniat, ipsi quidem, qui cum his contrahunt, obligantur, at invicem pupilli non obligantur.

the pupil, in others not. When, for instance, the pupil stipulates for something to be given him, the authorisation of the tutor is not requisite; but if the pupil makes the promise, it is requisite; for the rule is, that pupils may make their condition better, even without the authorisation of their tutor, but not worse unless with the tutor's authorisation. And therefore in all cases of reciprocal obligation, as in contracts of buying, selling, letting, hiring, bailment deposit, if the tutor does not authorise the pupil to enter into the contract, the person who contracts with the pupil is bound, but the pupil is not bound.

D. xix. 1. 13. 29.

The duties of the tutor were twofold: to administer the affairs of the pupil, and to interpose what was termed his authority. It is to the second head* of his functions that this Title refers.

There were many things in which the Roman law, in its stricter times, did not allow one person to represent another. Much that to us seems only to belong to private life was bound up with political and public duties and rights. (See Introd. sec. 43.) The law could not contemplate one beneath the age of puberty acting as if he was a member of the curia, or any one else coming forward to fill for him his place in the list of citizens. No one could bring actions of strict law in another name, or go through, for another, the fictitious process of in jure cessio, or through the forms of manumission and adoption, or perform for another any of those acts to which a solemn ceremony was attached, such as mancipation or stipulation. (D. xl. 2. 24; D. xlv. 4. 13. 10.) It was necessary that a minor should himself go through the forms and repeat the words requisite for the validity of such transactions; but it was also necessary that the tutor should be present and give his sanction. The auctoritas of the tutor was the complement (auctoritas is derived from augeo) to the symbolical forms through which the child went. (See Introd. sec. 43.) It represented the intention or the mental act on which those forms ultimately rested. If the child could not speak (infans from fari), no such forms could be used; if he could speak, but could scarcely understand the import of what he said, or, in technical language, if, being still infanti proximus, he had as yet little or no intellectus (GAI. iii. 109), the tutor could but very rarely, by interposing his sanction, give legal validity to words uttered without understanding. (It was only when the act would confer a very great and very clear benefit on the child, that this was allowed) and although the tutor was, to a certain extent, permitted to act for an infant, it was not until a very late period of Roman law that a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 426 (C. vi. 30. 18. 2), permitted a tutor to enter on an inheritance in the name of an infant. (D. xxix. 2. 9.)

in quibusdam non est necessaria. Ut ecce si quid dari sibi stipulentur, non est necessaria tutoris auctoritas: quod si aliis pupilli promittant, necessaria est: namque placuit, meliorem quidem suam condicionem licere eis facere etiam sine tutoris auctoritate, deteriorem vero non aliter quam tutore auctore. Unde in his causis, ex quibus mutuae obligationes nascuntur, in emptionibus venditionibus, locationibus conductionibus, mandatis, depositis, si tutoris auctoritas non interveniat, ipsi quidem, qui cum his contrahunt, obligantur, at invicem pupilli non obligantur.

the pupil, in others not. When, for instance, the pupil stipulates for something to be given him, the authorisation of the tutor is not requisite; but if the pupil makes the promise, it is requisite; for the rule is, that pupils may make their condition better, even without the authorisation of their tutor, but not worse unless with the tutor's authorisation. And therefore in all cases of reciprocal obligation, as in contracts of buying, selling, letting, hiring, bailment deposit, if the tutor does not authorise the pupil to enter into the contract, the person who contracts with the pupil is bound, but the pupil is not bound.

D. xix. 1. 13. 29.

The duties of the tutor were twofold: to administer the affairs of the pupil, and to interpose what was termed his authority. It is to the second head of his functions that this Title refers.

There were many things in which the Roman law, in its stricter times, did not allow one person to represent another. Much that to us seems only to belong to private life was bound up with political and public duties and rights. (See Introd. sec. 43.) The law could not contemplate one beneath the age of puberty acting as if he was a member of the curia, or any one else coming forward to fill for him his place in the list of citizens. No one could bring actions of strict law in another name, or go through, for another, the fictitious process of in jure cessio, or through the forms of manumission and adoption, or perform for another any of those acts to which a solemn ceremony was attached, such as mancipation or stipulation. (D. xl. 2. 24; D. xlv. 4. 13. 10.) It was necessary that a minor should himself go through the forms and repeat the words requisite for the validity of such transactions; but it was also necessary that the tutor should be present and give his sanction. The auctoritas of the tutor was the complement (auctoritas is derived from augeo) to the symbolical forms through which the child went. (See Introd. sec. 43.) It represented the intention or the mental act on which those forms ultimately rested. If the child could not speak (infans from fari), no such forms could be used; if he could speak, but could scarcely understand the import of what he said, or, in technical language, if, being still infanti proximus, he had as yet little or no intellectus (GAI. iii. 109), the tutor could but very rarely, by interposing his sanction, give legal validity to words uttered without understanding. (It was only when the act would confer a very great and very clear benefit on the child, that this was allowed) and although the tutor was, to a certain extent, permitted to act for an infant, it was not until a very late period of Roman law that a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian, A.D. 426 (C. vi. 30. 18. 2), permitted a tutor to enter on an inheritance in the name of an infant. (D. xxix. 2. 9.)

But when the child had entered on his eighth year, and was now pubertati proximus or approaching thereto, he was considered to have intellectus, but not judicium (THEOPH. Paraph. on Bk. iii. 19. 9); that is, he understood the meaning of the form, but could not decide for himself whether it was to his advantage to go through the act or not. This want of judgment the tutor supplied; and in every case where the tutor gave his sanction, the act was legally valid. Supposing, however, a pupil acted without the auctoritas of the tutor, what was the consequence? In the case of contracts the pupil acting without authorisation took every benefit, but sustained no injury from the contract; because while his tender years shielded him, the person with whom he contracted, having by the agreement made a formal expression of his will, must abide the event. But when it is said that a pupil took every benefit of the contract, it must not be understood that he could continue to enjoy at pleasure the advantages of another's property without giving anything for the enjoyment. The original owner might reclaim the property; and if a profit was being derived from its possession might take that profit to himself. (D. xxvi. 8. 5. 1.) Only he could never make the pupil restore or refund anything that was once gone; and while a pupil could always disclaim an executory contract made to his disadvantage, he could always, through the intervention of his tutor, enforce one that promised to benefit him. (Bk. ii. Tit. 8. 2.) In other cases, however, the act of the pupil without authorisation was altogether invalid, because there was a risk involved; and although it might practically happen that the act would have been advantageous to the pupil, the law guarded him against the risk by making his act invalid. What these cases were is learned from the next paragraph.

1. Neque tamen hereditatem adire neque bonorum possessionem petere neque hereditatem ex fideicommisso suscipere aliter possunt nisi tutoris auctoritate, quamvis lucrosa sit neque ullum damnum habeat.

1. Pupils, however, cannot, without the authorisation of the tutor, enter on an inheritance, demand the possession of goods, or take an inheritance given by a fideicommisso, even though to do so would be to their gain, and could involve them in no risk.

D. xxvi. 8. 9. 11.

The hereditas was the legal succession to the property of the deceased, the bonorum possessio here spoken of was an interest in the property of a deceased person, accorded by the prætor (Bk. iii. Tit. 9), and the hereditas ex fideicommisso was a succession received through the intervention of a trustee appointed by the testator. (See Introd. sec. 76.)

2. Tutor autem statim in ipso negotio præsens debet auctor fieri, si hoc pupillo prodesse existimaverit. Post tempus vero aut per

2. A tutor who wishes to authorise any act, which he esteems advantageous to his pupil, should do so at once while the business is going on,

But when the child had entered on his eighth year, and was now pubertati proximus or approaching thereto, he was considered to have intellectus, but not judicium (THEOPH. Paraph. on Bk. iii. 19. 9); that is, he understood the meaning of the form, but could not decide for himself whether it was to his advantage to go through the act or not. This want of judgment the tutor supplied; and in every case where the tutor gave his sanction, the act was legally valid. Supposing, however, a pupil acted without the auctoritas of the tutor, what was the consequence? In the case of contracts the pupil acting without authorisation took every benefit, but sustained no injury from the contract; because while his tender years shielded him, the person with whom he contracted, having by the agreement made a formal expression of his will, must abide the event. But when it is said that a pupil took every benefit of the contract, it must not be understood that he could continue to enjoy at pleasure the advantages of another's property without giving anything for the enjoyment. The original owner might reclaim the property; and if a profit was being derived from its possession might take that profit to himself. (D. xxvi. 8. 5. 1.) Only he could never make the pupil restore or refund anything that was once gone; and while a pupil could always disclaim an executory contract made to his disadvantage, he could always, through the intervention of his tutor, enforce one that promised to benefit him. (Bk. ii. Tit. 8. 2.) In other cases, however, the act of the pupil without authorisation was altogether invalid, because there was a risk involved; and although it might practically happen that the act would have been advantageous to the pupil, the law guarded him against the risk by making his act invalid. What these cases were is learned from the next paragraph.

1. Neque tamen hereditatem adire neque bonorum possessionem petere neque hereditatem ex fideicommisso suscipere aliter possunt nisi tutoris auctoritate, quamvis lucrosa sit neque ullum damnum habeat.

1. Pupils, however, cannot, without the authorisation of the tutor, enter on an inheritance, demand the possession of goods, or take an inheritance given by a fideicommisso, even though to do so would be to their gain, and could involve them in no risk.

D. xxvi. 8. 9. 11.

The hereditas was the legal succession to the property of the deceased, the bonorum possessio here spoken of was an interest in the property of a deceased person, accorded by the prætor (Bk. iii. Tit. 9), and the hereditas ex fideicommisso was a succession received through the intervention of a trustee appointed by the testator. (See Introd. sec. 76.)

2. Tutor autem statim in ipso negotio præsens debet auctor fieri, si hoc pupillo prodesse existimaverit. Post tempus vero aut per

2. A tutor who wishes to authorise any act, which he esteems advantageous to his pupil, should do so at once while the business is going on, and in person, for his authorisation is of no effect if given afterwards or by letter.

epistulam interposita auctoritas nihil agit.

D. xxvi. 8. 9. 5.

3. Si inter tutorem pupillumve judicium agendum sit, quia ipse tutor in rem suam auctor esse non potest, non pratorius tutor, ut olim, constituitur, sed curator in locum ejus datur, quo interveniente judicium peragitur et eo peracto curator esse desinit.

3. When a suit is to be commenced between a tutor and his pupil, as the tutor cannot give authority with regard to his own cause, a curator, and not, as formerly, a pratorian tutor, is appointed, with whose intervention the suit is carried on, and who ceases to be curator when the suit is determined.

GAI. i. 184.

Although the person who assisted the pupil in an action in which the tutor was concerned did exactly what the tutor did for the pupil in any other action, and thus, as having to authorise the proceedings, might be spoken of as a tutor (ULP. Reg. 11. 24), yet, as he was given for a particular purpose, which tutors were not (see Tit. 14. 4.), it was very natural that he should, in preference, receive the name of curator.

Subsequently the 72nd Novel (cap. 2) provided that, if the pupil became at any time the debtor of the tutor, another tutor should be added to protect the pupil.

TIT. XXII. QUIBUS MODIS TUTELA FINITUR.

Pupilli pupillæque cum puberes esse cœperint, tutela liberantur. Pubertatem autem veteres quidem non solum ex annis, sed etiam ex habitu corporis in masculis æstimari volebant. Nostra autem majestas dignum esse castitate temporum nostrorum bene putavit, quod in feminis et antiquis impudicum esse visum est, id est inspectionem habitudinis corporis, hoc etiam in masculos extendere. Et ideo sancta constitutione promulgata, pubertatem in masculis post quartum decimum annum completum illico initium accipere disposuimus, antiquitatis normam in femininis personis bene positam suo ordine relinquentes, ut post duodecimum annum completum viripotentes esse credantur.

Pupils, both male and female, are freed from tutelage when they attain the age of puberty. The ancients judged of puberty in males, not only by their years, but also by the development of their bodies. But we, from a wish to conform to the purity of the present times, have thought it proper, that what seemed, even to the ancients, to be indecent towards females, namely, the inspection of the body, should be thought no less so towards males; and, therefore, by our sacred constitution we have enacted, that puberty in males should be considered to commence immediately on the completion of their fourteenth year; while, as to females, we have preserved the wise rule adopted by the ancients, by which they are esteemed fit for marriage on the completion of their twelfth year.

GAI. i. 196; C. v. 60. 3.

We learn from Gaius and Ulpian (Reg. 11. 28) that the Proculians were in favour of a particular age being fixed as that of puberty; the Sabinians wished to let it be decided by nature.

epistulam interposita auctoritas nihil agit.

and in person, for his authorisation is of no effect if given afterwards or by letter.

D. xxvi. 8. 9. 5.

3. Si inter tutorem pupillumve iudicium agendum sit, quia ipse tutor in rem suam auctor esse non potest, non prætorius tutor, ut olim, constituitur, sed curator in locum ejus datur, quo interveniente iudicium peragitur et eo peracto curator esse desinit.

3. When a suit is to be commenced between a tutor and his pupil, as the tutor cannot give authority with regard to his own cause, a curator, and not, as formerly, a prætorian tutor, is appointed, with whose intervention the suit is carried on, and who ceases to be curator when the suit is determined.

GAI. i. 184.

Although the person who assisted the pupil in an action in which the tutor was concerned did exactly what the tutor did for the pupil in any other action, and thus, as having to authorise the proceedings, might be spoken of as a tutor (ULP. Reg. 11. 24), yet, as he was given for a particular purpose, which tutors were not (see Tit. 14. 4.), it was very natural that he should, in preference, receive the name of curator.

Subsequently the 72nd Novel (cap. 2) provided that, if the pupil became at any time the debtor of the tutor, another tutor should be added to protect the pupil.

TIT. XXII. QUIBUS MODIS TUTELA FINITUR.

Pupilli pupillæque cum puberes esse cœperint, tutela liberantur. Pubertatem autem veteres quidem non solum ex annis, sed etiam ex habitu corporis in masculis æstimari volebant. Nostra autem majestas dignum esse castitate temporum nostrorum bene putavit, quod in feminis et antiquis impudicum esse visum est, id est inspectionem habitudinis corporis, hoc etiam in masculos extendere. Et ideo sancta constitutione promulgata, pubertatem in masculis post quartum decimum annum completum illico initium accipere disposuimus, antiquitatis normam in femininis personis bene positam suo ordine relinquentes, ut post duodecimum annum completum viripotentes esse credantur.

Pupils, both male and female, are freed from tutelage when they attain the age of puberty. The ancients judged of puberty in males, not only by their years, but also by the development of their bodies. But we, from a wish to conform to the purity of the present times, have thought it proper, that what seemed, even to the ancients, to be indecent towards females, namely, the inspection of the body, should be thought no less so towards males; and, therefore, by our sacred constitution we have enacted, that puberty in males should be considered to commence immediately on the completion of their fourteenth year; while, as to females, we have preserved the wise rule adopted by the ancients, by which they are esteemed fit for marriage on the completion of their twelfth year.

GAI. i. 196; C. v. 60. 3.

We learn from Gaius and Ulpian (Reg. 11. 28) that the Proculians were in favour of a particular age being fixed as that of puberty; the Sabinians wished to let it be decided by nature.

Justinian here decides in favour of the former. All agreed, however, that the age could in no case be taken as later than eighteen years.

1. Item finitur tutela, si adrogati sint adhuc impuberes vel deportati: item si in servitutem pupillus redigatur, ut ingratus a patrono, vel ab hostibus fuerit captus.

1. Tutelage is also determined, if the pupil, before attaining the age of puberty, is either arrogated, or suffers deportation, or is reduced to slavery as guilty of ingratitude on the demand of his patron, or if he becomes a captive.

D. xxvi. 1. 14.

The pubertati proximus was considered liable to criminal punishment (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 18; C. ix. 47. 7), and he might be made a slave for ingratitude towards his patron. If he returned from captivity, the tutelage would recommence. (See Tit. 20. 2.)

2. Sed et si usque ad certam condicionem datus sit testamento, æque evenit, ut desinat esse tutor existente condicione.

2. Again, if a person is appointed by testament to be tutor until a condition is accomplished, he ceases to be tutor on the accomplishment of the condition.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 5.

3. Simili modo finitur tutela morte vel tutorum vel pupillorum.

3. Tutelage ends also by the death of the tutor, or of the pupil.

D. xxvii. 3. 4.

4. Sed et capitis deminutione tutoris, per quam libertas vel civitas ejus amittitur, omnis tutela perit. Minima autem capitis deminutione tutoris, veluti si se in adoptionem dederit, legitima tantum tutela perit, ceteræ non pereunt. Sed pupilli et pupillæ capitis deminutio, licet minima sit, omnes tutelas tollit.

4. When, again, a tutor, by a capitis deminutio, loses his liberty or his citizenship, his tutelage is wholly at an end. But if he undergoes only the least capitis deminutio, as when a tutor gives himself in adoption, then only legal tutelage is ended, and not the other kinds; but any capitis deminutio of the pupil, even the least, always puts an end to the tutelage.

D. iv. 5. 7; D. xxvi. 4. 2.

The tutela legitima belonged to the nearest of the agnati in right of his position in the family; but a tutor appointed by testament or by any special means had a charge committed to him personally, and his change of family could not alter this.

The minima deminutio capitis suffered by the pupil would make him under the power of the arrogator; and as he would be no longer sui juris, he could no longer have a tutor.

5. Præterea qui ad certum tempus testamento dantur tutores, finito eo, deponunt tutelam.

5. A tutor, again, who is appointed by testament to hold office during a certain time, lays down his office when the time is expired.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 3.

6. Desinunt autem esse tutores, qui vel remouentur a tutela ob id, quod suspecti visi sunt, vel ex justa causa sese excusant et onus admi-

6. They also cease to be tutors who are removed from their office on suspicion, or who excuse themselves on good grounds from the burden of Justinian here decides in favour of the former. All agreed, however, that the age could in no case be taken as later than eighteen years.

1. Item finitur tutela, si adrogati sint adhuc impuberes vel deportati: item si in servitutum pupillus redigatur, ut ingratus a patrono, vel ab hostibus fuerit captus.

1. Tutelage is also determined, if the pupil, before attaining the age of puberty, is either arrogated, or suffers deportation, or is reduced to slavery as guilty of ingratitude on the demand of his patron, or if he becomes a captive.

D. xxvi. 1. 14.

The pubertati proximus was considered liable to criminal punishment (Bk. iv. Tit. 1. 18; C. ix. 47. 7), and he might be made a slave for ingratitude towards his patron. If he returned from captivity, the tutelage would recommence. (See Tit. 20. 2.)

2. Sed et si usque ad certam condicionem datus sit testamento, æque evenit, ut desinat esse tutor existente condicione.

2. Again, if a person is appointed by testament to be tutor until a condition is accomplished, he ceases to be tutor on the accomplishment of the condition.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 5.

3. Simili modo finitur tutela morte vel tutorum vel pupillorum.

3. Tutelage ends also by the death of the tutor, or of the pupil.

D. xxvii. 3. 4.

4. Sed et capitis deminutione tutoris, per quam libertas vel civitas ejus amittitur, omnis tutela perit. Minima autem capitis deminutione tutoris, veluti si se in adoptionem dederit, legitima tantum tutela perit, ceteræ non pereunt. Sed pupilli et pupillæ capitis deminutio, licet minima sit, omnes tutelæ tollit.

4. When, again, a tutor, by a capitis deminutio, loses his liberty or his citizenship, his tutelage is wholly at an end. But if he undergoes only the least capitis deminutio, as when a tutor gives himself in adoption, then only legal tutelage is ended, and not the other kinds; but any capitis deminutio of the pupil, even the least, always puts an end to the tutelage.

D. iv. 5. 7; D. xxvi. 4. 2.

The tutela legitima belonged to the nearest of the agnati in right of his position in the family; but a tutor appointed by testament or by any special means had a charge committed to him personally, and his change of family could not alter this.

The minima deminutio capitis suffered by the pupil would make him under the power of the arrogator; and as he would be no longer sui juris, he could no longer have a tutor.

5. Præterea qui ad certum tempus testamento dantur tutores, finito eo, deponunt tutelam.

5. A tutor, again, who is appointed by testament to hold office during a certain time, lays down his office when the time is expired.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 3.

6. Desinunt autem esse tutores, qui vel remouentur a tutela ob id, quod suspecti visi sunt, vel ex justa causa sese excusant et onus admi-

6. They also cease to be tutors who are removed from their office on suspicion, or who excuse themselves on good grounds from the burden of nistrandæ tutelæ deponunt secundum ea, quæ inferius proponemus.

the tutelage, and rid themselves of it according to the rules we shall give hereafter.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 4.

At the end of the tutelage the pupil could bring an action to make the tutor account (actio tutelæ directa); the tutor could bring one to procure indemnification for all losses he had sustained (actio tutelæ contraria). (Bk. iii. Tit. 27. 2.) In each case the action could be brought by and against their respective heirs. In the same way there was an action for similar purposes against and in behalf of a curator (actio utilis, curationis causa directa vel contraria), which could be brought only when the curatorship ceased.

TIT. XXIII. DE CURATORIBUS.

Masculi puberes et feminae viripotentes usque ad vicesimum quintum annum completum curatores accipiunt; qui licet puberes sint, adhuc tamen huius ætatis sunt, ut negotia sua tueri non possint.

Males arrived at the age of puberty, and females of a marriageable age, receive curators, until they have completed their twenty-fifth year; for, although they have attained the age of puberty, they are still of an age which makes them unfit to protect their own interests.

GAI. i. 197.

The law of the Twelve Tables provided for the appointment of curators in the case of madmen and prodigals, but did not make any provision for the protection of young persons who had attained the age of puberty. The first enactment on the subject, of which we have any knowledge, is the lex Platoria, or, as it is often written, Lactoria, passed before the time of Plautus (Pseud. act i. sc. 3: Lex me perdit quinarvicenaria! metunt credere omnes), which, fixing the time of the perfecta ætas at twenty-five years, provided that any one overreaching a person under that age should be liable to a criminal prosecution and to infamy (Cic. de Nat. Deor. 3. 30; de Off. 3. 15); and, possibly, it permitted the appointment of curators in cases where a good reason for the appointment was given. The lex Platoria, however, applied only to cases of fraud. The prætor subsequently provided a remedy, which was a great protection to persons under twenty-five years who came before him, by directing, in all cases where they had been prejudiced, a restitutio in integrum; that is, that the applicant should be placed exactly in the position in which he would have been had not the dealings to his prejudice taken place. The minor had not to prove fraud. Finally, Marcus Aurelius ordered that curators should be given in all cases, without inquiry, on the application of the pubes. This seems the most probable and consistent account of the matter, which has been the subject of much dispute among commentators. The chief authority is Julius Capitolinus, in Vita M. Aurel. Anton. cap. 10, who says: De curatoribus vero, quum ante non nisi ex lege Lactoria vel propter nistrandæ tutelæ deponunt secundum ea, quæ inferius proponemus. the tutelage, and rid themselves of it according to the rules we shall give hereafter.

D. xxvi. 1. 14. 4.

At the end of the tutelage the pupil could bring an action to make the tutor account (actio tutelæ directa); the tutor could bring one to procure indemnification for all losses he had sustained (actio tutelæ contraria). (Bk. iii. Tit. 27. 2.) In each case the action could be brought by and against their respective heirs. In the same way there was an action for similar purposes against and in behalf of a curator (actio utilis, curationis causa directa vel contraria), which could be brought only when the curatorship ceased.

TIT. XXIII. DE CURATORIBUS.

Masculi puberes et feminae viripotentes usque ad vicesimum quintum annum completum curatores accipiunt; qui licet puberes sint, adhuc tamen huius ætatis sunt, ut negotia sua tueri non possint.

Males arrived at the age of puberty, and females of a marriageable age, receive curators, until they have completed their twenty-fifth year; for, although they have attained the age of puberty, they are still of an age which makes them unfit to protect their own interests.

GAL. i. 197.

The law of the Twelve Tables provided for the appointment of curators in the case of madmen and prodigals, but did not make any provision for the protection of young persons who had attained the age of puberty. The first enactment on the subject, of which we have any knowledge, is the lex Platoria, or, as it is often written, Lactoria, passed before the time of Plautus (Pseud. act i. sc. 3: Lex me perdit quinquagenaria! metunt credere omnes), which, fixing the time of the perfecta ætas at twenty-five years, provided that any one overreaching a person under that age should be liable to a criminal prosecution and to infamy (Cic. de Nat. Deor. 3. 30; de Off. 3. 15); and, possibly, it permitted the appointment of curators in cases where a good reason for the appointment was given. The lex Platoria, however, applied only to cases of fraud. The prætor subsequently provided a remedy, which was a great protection to persons under twenty-five years who came before him, by directing, in all cases where they had been prejudiced, a restitutio in integrum; that is, that the applicant should be placed exactly in the position in which he would have been had not the dealings to his prejudice taken place. The minor had not to prove fraud. Finally, Marcus Aurelius ordered that curators should be given in all cases, without inquiry, on the application of the pubes. This seems the most probable and consistent account of the matter, which has been the subject of much dispute among commentators. The chief authority is Julius Capitolinus, in Vita M. Aurel. Anton. cap. 10, who says: De curatoribus vero, quum ante non nisi ex lege Lactoria vel propter lasciviam vel propter dementiam darentur, ita statuit [M. Antoninus], ut omnes adulti curatorem acciperent non redditis causis.

1. Dantur autem curatores ab iisdem magistratibus, a quibus et tutores. Sed curator testamenti non datur, sed datus confirmatur decreto prætoris vel præsidis.

1. Curators are appointed by the same magistrates who appoint tutors. A curator cannot be appointed by testament, but if appointed he may be confirmed in his office by a decree of the prætor or the præses.

GAL. i. 198; D. xxvi. 3. 1. 3.

The magistrates who appointed the curators were, therefore, at Rome, the præfectus urbis or the prætor; in the provinces, the præses or municipal magistrate. (See Tit. 20. 4.) A curator could not be appointed by testament, because it was not certain that the adolescens would require one. If he did require one, it was natural that the person named in the testament of the father should be selected by the magistrate as the most proper person.

2. Item inviti adulescentes curatores non accipiunt præterquam in litem: curator enim et ad certam causam dari potest.

2. No adolescent is obliged to receive a curator against his will, unless in case of a law-suit, for a curator may be appointed for a particular special purpose.

D. xxvi. 6. 2. 5.

A person who had attained the age of puberty was not obliged to have a curator; but, practically, he was almost sure, if he had much property, to apply for one, as it was part of his tutor's duty to urge him to do so (D. xxvi. 7. 5. 5), and he could not, at the age of fourteen, be fit to manage his own affairs. There were two other cases, besides that mentioned in the text, in which a curator was given against the will of the adolescent for whom he was appointed. When a debtor wished to pay a debt owed to the adolescent (D. iv. 4. 7. 2), or the tutor to settle his accounts with him (C. v. 31. 7), a curator was appointed to watch the interests of the adolescent, and thus to make the payment and settlement indisputably valid; for if the adolescent was left to himself, and suffered any damage, the prætor would order a restitutio in integrum. The curator, once appointed, held his office until the adolescent attained the age of twenty-five, and the minor could not alienate, and perhaps could not contract, without the sanction of his curator; but if an adolescent who had a curator was thought capable of managing his affairs, he might, by the special grant of the emperor, have a dispensation (venia ætatis) from waiting for the full age; but it was requisite, to obtain this, that a man should be twenty, and a woman eighteen years of age. (D. iv. 4. 3; C. ii. 45.)

3. Furiosi quoque et prodigi, licet majores viginti quinque annis sint, tamen in curatione sunt adgnatorum ex lege duodecim tabularum. Sed solent Romæ præfectus urbis vel

3. Madmen and prodigals, although past the age of twenty-five, are yet placed under the curatorship of their agnati by the law of the Twelve Tables. But, ordinarily, curators are appointed lasciviam vel propter dementiam darentur, ita statuit [M. Antoninus], ut omnes adulti curatorem acciperent non redditis causis.

1. Dantur autem curatores ab iisdem magistratibus, a quibus et tutores. Sed curator testamento non datur, sed datus confirmatur decreto prætoris vel præsidis.

1. Curators are appointed by the same magistrates who appoint tutors. A curator cannot be appointed by testament, but if appointed he may be confirmed in his office by a decree of the prætor or the præses.

GAL. i. 198; D. xxvi. 3. 1. 3.

The magistrates who appointed the curators were, therefore, at Rome, the præfectus urbis or the prætor; in the provinces, the præses or municipal magistrate. (See Tit. 20. 4.) A curator could not be appointed by testament, because it was not certain that the adolescens would require one. If he did require one, it was natural that the person named in the testament of the father should be selected by the magistrate as the most proper person.

2. Item inviti adulescentes curatores non accipiunt præterquam in litem: curator enim et ad certam causam dari potest.

2. No adolescent is obliged to receive a curator against his will, unless in case of a law-suit, for a curator may be appointed for a particular special purpose.

D. xxvi. 6. 2. 5.

A person who had attained the age of puberty was not obliged to have a curator; but, practically, he was almost sure, if he had much property, to apply for one, as it was part of his tutor's duty to urge him to do so (D. xxvi. 7. 5. 5), and he could not, at the age of fourteen, be fit to manage his own affairs. There were two other cases, besides that mentioned in the text, in which a curator was given against the will of the adolescent for whom he was appointed. When a debtor wished to pay a debt owed to the adolescent (D. iv. 4. 7. 2), or the tutor to settle his accounts with him (C. v. 31. 7), a curator was appointed to watch the interests of the adolescent, and thus to make the payment and settlement indisputably valid; for if the adolescent was left to himself, and suffered any damage, the prætor would order a restitutio in integrum. The curator, once appointed, held his office until the adolescent attained the age of twenty-five, and the minor could not alienate, and perhaps could not contract, without the sanction of his curator; but if an adolescent who had a curator was thought capable of managing his affairs, he might, by the special grant of the emperor, have a dispensation (venia ætatis) from waiting for the full age; but it was requisite, to obtain this, that a man should be twenty, and a woman eighteen years of age. (D. iv. 4. 3; C. ii. 45.)

3. Furiosi quoque et prodigi, licet majores viginti quinque annis sint, tamen in curatione sunt adgnatorum ex lege duodecim tabularum. Sed solent Romæ præfectus urbis vel

3. Madmen and prodigals, although past the age of twenty-five, are yet placed under the curatorship of their agnati by the law of the Twelve Tables. But, ordinarily, curators are appointed

prætor et in provinciis præsidēs ex inquisitione eis dare curatores.

for them, at Rome by the præfect of the city or the prætor, in the provinces by the præsides, after inquiry into the circumstances has been made.

D. xxvii. 10. 1.

The words of the law of the Twelve Tables with regard to the furiosus were: Si furiosus est, agnatorum gentiliūque in eo pecuniāque ejus potestas esto. (Cic. de Invent. ii. 50.) The prodigus was first interdicted by the magistrate; and this, Ulpian says, was recognised by custom even before the date of the Twelve Tables: Lege XII. Tabularum prodigo interdictur bonorum suorum administratio; quod moribus ab initio interdictum est. (D. xxvii. 10. 1. pr.) He was then placed under the curatorship of the agnate. Hence Horace says:

Interdicto huic omne adimat jus
Prætor, et ad sanos abeat tutela propinquos.

Sat. ii. 3. 218.

While, however, the prodigus was interdicted, the furiosus was not, and what he did was valid if he was not mad at the particular time when he did it. The form of the interdiction of the prodigus is given by Paul: Quando tibi bona paterna avitæque nequitia tua disperdis, liberosque tuos ad egestatem perducis, ob eam rem tibi cere commercioque interdicto. (Sent. iii. 4. a. 7.) The agnates were, however, the curatores legitimi of the prodigus, under the law of the Twelve Tables, only when the goods he was wasting had come to him as the successor ab intestato of an ascendant. (Ulp. Reg. xii. 3.) But the prætor extended the interdiction of prodigi to all cases where there was a prodigal waste of goods, just as he extended the curatorship of furiosi to other forms of madness or incapacity (see next paragraph); and the magistrate appointed the curator in all cases which came under either head of this extension of the law by the prætor. The text further tells us that, although the legal curatorship of the agnate was still recognised in the cases of furiosi and prodigi wasting goods under an intestate succession to an ascendant, yet in practice the magistrate generally appointed; and even before this practice grew up, the magistrate, if he thought an agnate having the legal right to be curator unfit, would give the practical administration of the property to some one else. (D. xxvii. 10. 13.)

4. Sed et mente captis et surdis et mutis et qui morbo perpetuo laborant, quia rebus suis superesse non possunt, curatores dandi sunt.

4. Persons who are of unsound mind, or who are deaf, dumb, or subject to any incurable malady, since they are unable to manage their own affairs, must be placed under curators.

D. xxvii. 10. 2.

The word furiosi, that is, the mad as opposed to the imbecile, in the law of the Twelve Tables, was taken strictly, and there was no legal curator for any one suffering under any other form of mental malady.

The reason why the blind are not included is given by Paul:

prætor et in provinciis præsides ex inquisitione eis dare curatores.

for them, at Rome by the præfect of the city or the prætor, in the provinces by the præsides, after inquiry into the circumstances has been made.

D. xxvii. 10. 1.

The words of the law of the Twelve Tables with regard to the furiosus were: Si furiosus est, agnatorum gentilibusque in eo pecuniaque ejus potestas esto. (Cic. de Invent. ii. 50.) The prodigus was first interdicted by the magistrate; and this, Ulpian says, was recognised by custom even before the date of the Twelve Tables: Lege XII. Tabularum prodigo interdictur bonorum suorum administratio; quod moribus ab initio interdictum est. (D. xxvii. 10. 1. pr.) He was then placed under the curatorship of the agnate. Hence Horace says:

Interdicto huic omne adimat jus

Prætor, et ad sanos abeat tutela propinquos.

Sat. ii. 3. 218.

While, however, the prodigus was interdicted, the furiosus was not, and what he did was valid if he was not mad at the particular time when he did it. The form of the interdiction of the prodigus is given by Paul: Quando tibi bona paterna avitæque nequitia tua disperdis, liberosque tuos ad egestatem perducis, ob eam rem tibi cere commercioque interdicto. (Sent. iii. 4. a. 7.) The agnates were, however, the curatores legitimi of the prodigus, under the law of the Twelve Tables, only when the goods he was wasting had come to him as the successor ab intestato of an ascendant. (Ulp. Reg. xii. 3.) But the prætor extended the interdiction of prodigi to all cases where there was a prodigal waste of goods, just as he extended the curatorship of furiosi to other forms of madness or incapacity (see next paragraph); and the magistrate appointed the curator in all cases which came under either head of this extension of the law by the prætor. The text further tells us that, although the legal curatorship of the agnate was still recognised in the cases of furiosi and prodigi wasting goods under an intestate succession to an ascendant, yet in practice the magistrate generally appointed; and even before this practice grew up, the magistrate, if he thought an agnate having the legal right to be curator unfit, would give the practical administration of the property to some one else. (D. xxvii. 10. 13.)

4. Sed et mente captis et surdis et mutis et qui morbo perpetuo laborant, quia rebus suis superesse non possunt, curatores dandi sunt.

4. Persons who are of unsound mind, or who are deaf, dumb, or subject to any incurable malady, since they are unable to manage their own affairs, must be placed under curators.

D. xxvii. 10. 2.

The word furiosi, that is, the mad as opposed to the imbecile, in the law of the Twelve Tables, was taken strictly, and there was no legal curator for any one suffering under any other form of mental malady.

The reason why the blind are not included is given by Paul:

Cæco curator dari non potest, quia ipse sibi procuratorem instituere potest. (Sent. iv. 12. 9.)

5. Interdum autem et pupilli curatores accipiunt, ut puta si legitimus tutor non sit idoneus, quia habenti tutorem tutor dari non potest. Item si testamento datus tutor vel a prætore vel a præside idoneus non sit ad administrationem nec tamen fraudulenter negotia administrat, solet ei curator adjungi. Item in locum tutorum, qui non in perpetuum, sed ad tempus a tutela excusantur, solent curatores dari.

5. Sometimes even pupils receive curators; as, for instance, when the legal tutor is unfit for the office; for a person who already has a tutor cannot have another given him; again, if a tutor appointed by testament, or by the prætor or præses, is unfit to administer the affairs of his pupil, although there is nothing fraudulent in the way he administers them, it is usual to appoint a curator to act conjointly with him. It is also usual to assign curators in the place of tutors excused for a time only, and not permanently.

D. xxvi. 1. 13; D. xxvi. 2. 27; D. xxvi. 5. 15 and 16.

6. Quodsi tutor adversa valetudine vel alia necessitate impeditur, quo minus negotia pupilli administrare possit, et pupillus vel absit vel infans sit, quem velit, actorem periculo ipsius prætor vel qui provincie præerit, decreto constituet.

6. If a tutor is prevented by illness or otherwise from administering the affairs of his pupil, and his pupil is absent, or an infant, then the prætor or præses of the province will, at the tutor's risk, appoint by decree some one to be the agent of the pupil on the nomination of the tutor.

D. xxvi. 7. 24.

This 'agent' is to be distinguished from a curator. He is merely a person who acts under the tutor, and for whom the tutor is responsible. If the pupil was present, and past the age of infancy, he, with the authorisation of the tutor, could appoint the agent, and there would be no necessity for the confirmation of a magistrate; hence the words et pupillus vel absit vel infans sit.

The uncertain duration of mental incapacity made the person entrusted with the care of one suffering under it be termed a curator, not a tutor; otherwise the sufferer might be as incapable of going through legal forms as an infant. An adolescent and a prodigus could go through all the forms of law, and therefore there was no necessity, in their case, for the curator having an auctoritas. If they went through the prescribed forms, they were legally bound, whether the curator consented or not; but unless the curator consented, the prætor would always interpose and relieve them from any consequences that might be prejudicial; and so they were not really bound, unless with the curator's consent.

of security, for the
TIT. XXIV. DE SATISDATIONE TUTORUM VEL CURATORUM.

documentary
Ne tamen pupillorum pupillarumve et eorum, qui quæve in curatione sunt, negotia a tutoribus curatoribusve consumantur vel deminuantur, curat prætor, ut et tutores et curatores eo nomine satisfient.

To prevent the property of pupils and persons placed under curators being wasted or destroyed by tutors or curators, the prætor sees that tutors and curators give security against such conduct. But this is not always

Cæco curator dari non potest, quia ipse sibi procuratorem instituere potest. (Sent. iv. 12. 9.)

5. Interdum autem et pupilli curatores accipiunt, ut puta si legitimus tutor non sit idoneus, quia habenti tutorem tutor dari non potest. Item si testamento datus tutor vel a prætorè vel a præside idoneus non sit ad administrationem nec tamen fraudulenter negotia administrat, solet ei curator adjungi. Item in locum tutorum, qui non in perpetuum, sed ad tempus a tutela excusantur, solent curatores dari.

5. Sometimes even pupils receive curators; as, for instance, when the legal tutor is unfit for the office; for a person who already has a tutor cannot have another given him; again, if a tutor appointed by testament, or by the prætor or præses, is unfit to administer the affairs of his pupil, although there is nothing fraudulent in the way he administers them, it is usual to appoint a curator to act conjointly with him. It is also usual to assign curators in the place of tutors excused for a time only, and not permanently.

D. xxvi. 1. 13; D. xxvi. 2. 27; D. xxvi. 5. 15 and 16.

6. Quodsi tutor adversa valetudine vel alia necessitate impeditur, quo minus negotia pupilli administrare possit, et pupillus vel absit vel infans sit, quem velit, actorem periculo ipsius prætor vel qui provincie præerit, decreto constituet.

6. If a tutor is prevented by illness or otherwise from administering the affairs of his pupil, and his pupil is absent, or an infant, then the prætor or præses of the province will, at the tutor's risk, appoint by decree some one to be the agent of the pupil on the nomination of the tutor.

D. xxvi. 7. 24.

This 'agent' is to be distinguished from a curator. He is merely a person who acts under the tutor, and for whom the tutor is responsible. If the pupil was present, and past the age of infancy, he, with the authorisation of the tutor, could appoint the agent, and there would be no necessity for the confirmation of a magistrate; hence the words et pupillus vel absit vel infans sit.

The uncertain duration of mental incapacity made the person entrusted with the care of one suffering under it be termed a curator, not a tutor; otherwise the sufferer might be as incapable of going through legal forms as an infant. An adolescent and a prodigus could go through all the forms of law, and therefore there was no necessity, in their case, for the curator having an auctoritas. If they went through the prescribed forms, they were legally bound, whether the curator consented or not; but unless the curator consented, the prætor would always interpose and relieve them from any consequences that might be prejudicial; and so they were not really bound, unless with the curator's consent.

of security for the
TIT. XXIV. DE SATISDATIONE TUTORUM VEL CURATORUM.

Ne tamen pupillorum pupillarumve et eorum, qui quæve in curatione sunt, negotia a tutoribus curatoribusve consumantur vel deminantur, curat prætor, ut et tutores et curatores eo nomine satisfient.

To prevent the property of pupils and persons placed under curators being wasted or destroyed by tutors or curators, the prætor sees that tutors and curators give security against such conduct. But this is not always necessary; a testamentary tutor is not compelled to give security, as his fidelity and diligence have been recognised by the testator. And tutors and curators appointed upon inquiry are not obliged to give security, because they have been chosen as being proper persons.

Sed hoc non est perpetuum: nam tutores testamento dati satisfacere non coguntur, quia fides eorum et diligentia ab ipso testatore probata est; item ex inquisitione tutores vel curatores dati satisfactione non onerantur, quia idonei electi sunt.

GAI. i. 199, 200.

A patron and a father, when tutors, were ordinarily, though not as a matter of right, exempt from the necessity of giving caution.. (D. xxvi. 4. 5. 1.) This necessity, therefore, only fell on tutores or curatores legitimi, and those appointed by inferior magistrates; those appointed by higher magistrates being only appointed after inquiry, which rendered the giving security needless. (See Tit. 20. 4.) The persons who became sureties (for the security demanded was always the guarantee of third persons) went through the form of fidejussio. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 20.) The pupil or the person requiring a curator asked the surety whether he guaranteed the safety of the property, Fide jubesne rem salvam fore? And he answered, Fide jubeo. If the pupil or minor could not go through the ceremony, his slave, or, if he had no slave, or his means did not suffice to buy one, a public slave, went through the form for him; and, when the rule that one free person could not represent another was relaxed, a free person might go through the form for him. (D. xlv. 6. 2.)

Besides the guarantee taken for the fidelity of the tutor and curator, and the general liability of the whole of the tutor's or curator's property to make good any losses incurred through their neglect, a constitution of Constantine having subjected their property to a tacit hypothec in favour of the pupil or minor (C. v. 37. 20), those entrusted to their care had a further protection in the necessity under which the tutor and curator were to make an inventory of all the property of the pupil or the person requiring a curator (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 2), and after the publication of the 78th Novel, by the tutor or curator being obliged to pledge himself by oath that he would act as a 'bonus paterfamilias' would act. (Nov. 78, cap. 7.)

1. Sed et si ex testamento vel inquisitione duo pluresve dati fuerint, potest unus offerre satis de indemnitate pupilli vel adulescentis et contutori vel concutori preferri, ut solus administret, vel ut contutor satis offerens præponatur ei et ipse solus administret. Itaque per se non potest petere satis a contutore vel concutore suo, sed offerre debet, ut electionem det contutori suo, utrum velit satis accipere an satis dare. Quodsi nemo eorum satis offerat, si quidem adscriptum fuerit a testatore, quis gerat, ille

1. If two or more are appointed by testament, or by a magistrate, after inquiry, as tutors or curators, any of them, by offering security for the indemnification of the pupil or adolescent, may be preferred to his co-tutor or co-curator, so that he may either alone administer the property, or may oblige his co-tutor or co-curator to give security, if he wishes to obtain the preference and become the sole administrator. Thus he cannot directly demand security from his co-tutor or co-curator; he must offer it himself, and so give his co-tutor or necessary; a testamentary tutor is not compelled to give security, as his fidelity and diligence have been recognised by the testator. And tutors and curators appointed upon inquiry are not obliged to give security, because they have been chosen as being proper persons.

Sed hoc non est perpetuum: nam tutores testamento dati satisfacere non coguntur, quia fides eorum et diligentia ab ipso testatore probata est; item ex inquisitione tutores vel curatores dati satisfactione non onerantur, quia idonei electi sunt.

GAL. i. 199, 200.

A patron and a father, when tutors, were ordinarily, though not as a matter of right, exempt from the necessity of giving caution.. (D. xxvi. 4. 5. 1.) This necessity, therefore, only fell on tutores or curatores legitimi, and those appointed by inferior magistrates; those appointed by higher magistrates being only appointed after inquiry, which rendered the giving security needless. (See Tit. 20. 4.) The persons who became sureties (for the security demanded was always the guarantee of third persons) went through the form of fidejussio. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 20.) The pupil or the person requiring a curator asked the surety whether he guaranteed the safety of the property, Fide jubesne rem salvam fore? And he answered, Fide jubeo. If the pupil or minor could not go through the ceremony, his slave, or, if he had no slave, or his means did not suffice to buy one, a public slave, went through the form for him; and, when the rule that one free person could not represent another was relaxed, a free person might go through the form for him. (D. xlv. 6. 2.)

Besides the guarantee taken for the fidelity of the tutor and curator, and the general liability of the whole of the tutor's or curator's property to make good any losses incurred through their neglect, a constitution of Constantine having subjected their property to a tacit hypothec in favour of the pupil or minor (C. v. 37. 20), those entrusted to their care had a further protection in the necessity under which the tutor and curator were to make an inventory of all the property of the pupil or the person requiring a curator (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 2), and after the publication of the 78th Novel, by the tutor or curator being obliged to pledge himself by oath that he would act as a 'bonus paterfamilias' would act. (Nov. 78, cap. 7.)

1. Sed et si ex testamento vel inquisitione duo pluresve dati fuerint, potest unus offerre satis de indemnitate pupilli vel adolescentis et contutori vel concutori preferri, ut solus administret, vel ut contutor satis offerens præponatur ei et ipse solus administret. Itaque per se non potest petere satis a contutore vel concutore suo, sed offerre debet, ut electionem det contutori suo, utrum velit satis accipere an satis dare. Quodsi nemo eorum satis offerat, si quidem adscriptum fuerit a testatore, quis gerat, ille

1. If two or more are appointed by testament, or by a magistrate, after inquiry, as tutors or curators, any of them, by offering security for the indemnification of the pupil or adolescent, may be preferred to his co-tutor or co-curator, so that he may either alone administer the property, or may oblige his co-tutor or co-curator to give security, if he wishes to obtain the preference and become the sole administrator. Thus he cannot directly demand security from his co-tutor or co-curator; he must offer it himself, and so give his co-tutor or co-curator the choice to receive or to give security. If no tutor offers security, then the one, if any, appointed by the testator to manage the property shall manage it; but if no tutor is so appointed, then the administration will fall to him whom a majority of the tutors shall choose, as is provided by the prætorian edict. If the tutors disagree in their choice, the prætor must interpose. And in the same way, when several are appointed after inquiry by a magistrate, the majority of those appointed is to determine which of them shall administer.

gerere debet: quodsi non fuerit adscriptum, quem major pars elegerit, ipse gerere debet, ut edicto prætoris cavetur. Sin autem ipsi tutores dissenserint circa eligendum eum vel eos, qui gerere debent, prætor partes suas interponere debet. Idem et in pluribus ex inquisitione datis probandum est, id est ut major pars eligere possit, per quem administratio fieret.

D. xxvi. 2. 17. 19. 1; D. xxvi. 7. 3. 1. 7, 8, 9.

As it was generally most convenient that one tutor alone should act, although all continued responsible (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 2. 6), it was necessary that the tutor who did act, tutor onerarius (opposed to tutores honorarii, those who did not act), should give security to the co-tutors. If he did not, he could be compelled, by the means described in the text, either to do so or to allow some other co-tutor to take his place. Sometimes the tutelage was apportioned by the magistrate among the different tutors, and each had a separate duty to perform, for which he alone was responsible. (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 9.)

2. Sciendum autem est, non solum tutores vel curatores pupillis et adultis ceterisque personis ex administratione teneri, sed etiam in eos, qui satisfactionem accipiunt, subsidiariam actionem esse, quæ ultimum eis præsidium possit afferre. Subsidiaria autem actio datur in eos, qui vel omnino a tutoribus vel curatoribus satisfacere non curaverint, aut non idonee passi essent caveri. Quæ quidem tam ex prudentium responsis quam ex constitutionibus imperialibus et in heredes eorum extenditur.

2. It should be observed that it is not only tutors and curators who are responsible for their administration to pupils, minors, and the other persons we have mentioned, but, as a last safeguard, a subsidiary action may be brought against the magistrate who has accepted the security as sufficient. The subsidiary action may be brought against a magistrate who has wholly omitted to take security, or has taken insufficient security; and the liability to this action, according to the responses of the jurists, as well as the imperial constitutions, extends also to the heirs of the magistrate.

D. xxvii. 8. 1. 11, 12. 4. 6.

The heirs of the magistrate were only liable where the negligence of the magistrate had been very great. (D. xxvii. 8. 6.)

Adultus, in its strict legal sense, meant one who has reached the age of puberty but not the perfecta ætas.

3. Quibus constitutionibus et illud exprimitur, ut, nisi caveant tutores vel curatores, pignoribus captis coerceantur.

3. The same constitutions also expressly enact, that tutors and curators who do not give security, may be compelled to do so by seizure of their goods as pledges.

C. v. 35. 2.

The magistrate would order a portion of their property to be seized, and retained until they gave security (THEOPHIL. Paraphr.)

gerere debet: quodsi non fuerit adscriptum, quem major pars elegerit, ipse gerere debet, ut edicto prætoris cavetur. Sin autem ipsi tutores dissenserint circa eligendum eum vel eos, qui gerere debent, prætor partes suas interponere debet. Idem et in pluribus ex inquisitione datis probandum est, id est ut major pars eligere possit, per quem administratio fieret.

co-curator the choice to receive or to give security. If no tutor offers security, then the one, if any, appointed by the testator to manage the property shall manage it; but if no tutor is so appointed, then the administration will fall to him whom a majority of the tutors shall choose, as is provided by the prætorian edict. If the tutors disagree in their choice, the prætor must interpose. And in the same way, when several are appointed after inquiry by a magistrate, the majority of those appointed is to determine which of them shall administer.

D. xxvi. 2. 17. 19. 1; D. xxvi. 7. 3. 1. 7, 8, 9.

As it was generally most convenient that one tutor alone should act, although all continued responsible (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 2. 6), it was necessary that the tutor who did act, tutor onerarius (opposed to tutores honorarii, those who did not act), should give security to the co-tutors. If he did not, he could be compelled, by the means described in the text, either to do so or to allow some other co-tutor to take his place. Sometimes the tutelage was apportioned by the magistrate among the different tutors, and each had a separate duty to perform, for which he alone was responsible. (D. xxvi. 7. 3. 9.)

2. Sciendum autem est, non solum tutores vel curatores pupillis et adultis ceterisque personis ex administratione teneri, sed etiam in eos, qui satisfactionem accipiunt, subsidiariam actionem esse, quæ ultimum eis præsidium possit afferre. Subsidiaria autem actio datur in eos, qui vel omnino a tutoribus vel curatoribus satisfacti non curaverint, aut non idonee passim essent caveri. Quæ quidem tam ex prudentium responsis quam ex constitutionibus imperialibus et in heredes eorum extenditur.

2. It should be observed that it is not only tutors and curators who are responsible for their administration to pupils, minors, and the other persons we have mentioned, but, as a last safeguard, a subsidiary action may be brought against the magistrate who has accepted the security as sufficient. The subsidiary action may be brought against a magistrate who has wholly omitted to take security, or has taken insufficient security; and the liability to this action, according to the responses of the jurisprudents, as well as the imperial constitutions, extends also to the heirs of the magistrate.

D. xxvii. 8. 1. 11, 12. 4. 6.

The heirs of the magistrate were only liable where the negligence of the magistrate had been very great. (D. xxvii. 8. 6.)

Adultus, in its strict legal sense, meant one who has reached the age of puberty but not the perfecta ætas.

3. Quibus constitutionibus et illud exprimitur, ut, nisi caveant tutores vel curatores, pignoris captis coerceantur.

3. The same constitutions also expressly enact, that tutors and curators who do not give security, may be compelled to do so by seizure of their goods as pledges.

C. v. 35. 2.

The magistrate would order a portion of their property to be seized, and retained until they gave security (THEOPHIL. Paraphr.)

4. Neque autem præfectus urbis neque prætor neque præses provinciæ neque quis alius, cui tutores dandi jus est, hac actione tenebitur: sed hi tantummodo, qui satisfactionem exigere solent.

4. Neither the præfect of the city, nor the prætor, nor the prases of a province, nor any one else to whom the appointment of tutors belongs, will be liable to this action, but only those whose ordinary duty it is to exact security.

D. xxvii. 8. 1. 1.

The words of the text, which are borrowed from Ulpian, do not quite accurately describe the law under Justinian, as the municipal magistrates, whose business it was to take security, could in some cases appoint tutors (Tit. 20. 5), and they were always liable to this action.

TIT. XXV. DE EXCUSATIONIBUS TUTORUM VEL CURATORUM.

Excusantur autem tutores vel curatores variis ex causis: plerumque autem propter liberos, sive in potestate sint sive emancipati. Si enim tres liberos quis superstites Romæ habeat vel in Italia quattuor vel in provinciis quinque, a tutela vel cura possunt excusari exemplo ceterorum munerum: nam et tutelam et curam placuit publicum munus esse. Sed adoptivi liberi non prosunt, in adoptionem autem dati naturali patri prosunt. Item nepotes ex filio prosunt, ut in locum patris succedant: ex filia non prosunt. Filii autem superstites tantum ad tutelæ vel curæ muneris excusationem prosunt: defuncti non prosunt. Sed si in bello amissi sunt, quæsitum est, an prosint. Et constat, eos solos prodesse, qui in acie amittuntur: hi enim, quia prore publica ceciderunt, in perpetuum per gloriam vivere intelleguntur.

Tutors and curators are excused on different grounds; most frequently on account of the number of their children, whether in their power or emancipated. For any one who at Rome has three children living, in Italy four, or in the provinces five, may be excused from being tutor or curator as from other offices, for the office of both a tutor and a curator is considered a public one. Adopted children will not avail the adopter; though given in adoption, they are reckoned in favour of their natural father. Grandchildren by a son may be reckoned in the number, so as to take the place of their father, but not grandchildren by a daughter. It is only those children who are living that can be reckoned to excuse any one from being tutor or curator, and not those who are dead. It has been questioned, however, whether those who have perished in war may not be reckoned; and it has been decided, that those who die in battle may, but they only, for glory renders those immortal who have fallen for their country.

D. xxvii. 1. 2. 2, &c.; D. xxvii. 1. 18.

It was considered a matter of public policy that tutors or curators should act when their assistance was necessary, and therefore those who were appointed were obliged to accept the office, unless they could establish any valid reason for being excused. This Title gives a number of grounds on which a person appointed tutor or curator was excused from holding the office. These grounds of excuse may be classed with tolerable accuracy under four heads. Tutors and curators were excused as—1. Having

4. Neque autem præfectus urbis neque prætor neque præses provincæ neque quis alius, cui tutores dandi jus est, hac actione tenebitur: sed hi tantummodo, qui satisfactionem exigere solent.

4. Neither the præfect of the city, nor the prætor, nor the præses of a province, nor any one else to whom the appointment of tutors belongs, will be liable to this action, but only those whose ordinary duty it is to exact security.

D. xxvii. 8. 1. 1.

The words of the text, which are borrowed from Ulpian, do not quite accurately describe the law under Justinian, as the municipal magistrates, whose business it was to take security, could in some cases appoint tutors (Tit. 20. 5), and they were always liable to this action.

TIT. XXV. DE EXCUSATIONIBUS TUTORUM VEL CURATORUM.

Excusantur autem tutores vel curatores variis ex causis: plerumque autem propter liberos, sive in potestate sint sive emancipati. Si enim tres liberos quis superstites Romæ habeat vel in Italia quattuor vel in provinciis quinque, a tutela vel cura possunt excusari exemplo ceterorum munerum: nam et tutelam et curam placuit publicum munus esse. Sed adoptivi liberi non prosunt, in adoptionem autem dati naturali patri prosunt. Item nepotes ex filio prosunt, ut in locum patris succedant: ex filia non prosunt. Filii autem superstites tantum ad tutelæ vel curæ muneris excusationem prosunt: defuncti non prosunt. Sed si in bello amissi sunt, quæsitum est, an prosint. Et constat, eos solos prodesse, qui in acie amittuntur: hi enim, quia pro re publica ceciderunt, in perpetuum per gloriam vivere intelleguntur.

Tutors and curators are excused on different grounds; most frequently on account of the number of their children, whether in their power or emancipated. For any one who at Rome has three children living, in Italy four, or in the provinces five, may be excused from being tutor or curator as from other offices, for the office of both a tutor and a curator is considered a public one. Adopted children will not avail the adopter; though given in adoption, they are reckoned in favour of their natural father. Grandchildren by a son may be reckoned in the number, so as to take the place of their father, but not grandchildren by a daughter. It is only those children who are living that can be reckoned to excuse any one from being tutor or curator, and not those who are dead. It has been questioned, however, whether those who have perished in war may not be reckoned; and it has been decided, that those who die in battle may, but they only, for glory renders those immortal who have fallen for their country.

D. xxvii. 1. 2, &c.; D. xxvii. 1. 18.

It was considered a matter of public policy that tutors or curators should act when their assistance was necessary, and therefore those who were appointed were obliged to accept the office, unless they could establish any valid reason for being excused. This Title gives a number of grounds on which a person appointed tutor or curator was excused from holding the office. These grounds of excuse may be classed with tolerable accuracy under four heads. Tutors and curators were excused as—1. Having rendered a service to the public, or being engaged in the discharge of some public duty (pr. and paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 14, 15); 2. Being in a position adverse to the pupil or adult (paragraphs 4, 9, 11, 12, 19); 3. Being incompetent to sustain the burden of the office (paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 13); 4. Filling or having filled similar offices (5, 18).

It was the lex Papia Poppaea that first introduced exemption on the ground of the number of the children.

Grandchildren by the daughter were not reckoned, as, otherwise, they would have been reckoned by two different persons, their maternal grandfather and their father or paternal grandfather.

1. Item divus Marcus in semestribus rescripsit, eum, qui res fisci administrat, a tutela vel cura, quam diu administrat, excusari posse.

1. The Emperor Marcus declared by rescript in his Semestria, that a person engaged in administering the property of the fiscus is excused from being tutor or curator while his administration lasts.

D. xxvii. 1. 41.

Augustus and Tiberius held a council of senators every six months for the discussion of affairs (SUET. Aug. 35); and we gather from the text that the practice was also adopted by Marcus Aurelius, who published the records of the councils under the name of Semestria.

2. Item qui rei publicæ causa absunt, a tutela et cura excusantur. Sed et si fuerunt tutores vel curatores, deinde rei publicæ causa abesse cœperunt, a tutela et cura excusantur, quatenus rei publicæ causa absunt, et interea curator loco eorum datur. Qui si reversi fuerint, recipiunt onus tutelæ, nec anni habent vacationem, ut Papinianus responsorum libro quinto scripsit; nam hoc spatium habent ad novas tutelas vocati.

2. Persons absent on the service of the state are excused from being tutors or curators; and if those who have already been appointed either as tutors or curators should afterwards be absent on the public service, they are excused during their absence on such service, and meanwhile a curator is appointed in their place. On their return, they must again take upon them the burden of tutelage; and, according to Papinian's opinion, expressed in the fifth book of his answers, are not entitled to the privilege of a year's dispensation, which is only allowed them when they are called to a new tutelage.

D. xxvii. 1. 10. pr. and 2.

The meaning of the text is that, if they had commenced holding the office of tutor before their absence, they were obliged to resume it immediately on their return. If, when they returned, a new tutelage was imposed on them, they might delay for a year to enter on its duties.

3. Et qui potestatem aliquam habent, excusare se possunt, ut divus Marcus rescripsit, sed cœptam tutelam deserere non possunt.

3. By a rescript of the Emperor Marcus, all persons invested with any public authority may excuse themselves; but they cannot abandon the office of tutor, which they have already undertaken.

D. xxvii. 1. 17. 5.

rendered a service to the public, or being engaged in the discharge of some public duty (pr. and paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 14, 15); 2. Being in a position adverse to the pupil or adult (paragraphs 4, 9, 11, 12, 19); 3. Being incompetent to sustain the burden of the office (paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 13); 4. Filling or having filled similar offices (5, 18).

It was the lex Papia Poppæa that first introduced exemption on the ground of the number of the children.

Grandchildren by the daughter were not reckoned, as, otherwise, they would have been reckoned by two different persons, their maternal grandfather and their father or paternal grandfather.

1. Item divus Marcus in semestribus rescripsit, eum, qui res fisci administrat, a tutela vel cura, quam diu administrat, excusari posse.

1. The Emperor Marcus declared by rescript in his Semestria, that a person engaged in administering the property of the fiscus is excused from being tutor or curator while his administration lasts.

D. xxvii. 1. 41.

Augustus and Tiberius held a council of senators every six months for the discussion of affairs (SUET. Aug. 35); and we gather from the text that the practice was also adopted by Marcus Aurelius, who published the records of the councils under the name of Semestria.

2. Item qui rei publicæ causa absunt, a tutela et cura excusantur. Sed et si fuerunt tutores vel curatores, deinde rei publicæ causa abesse cœperunt, a tutela et cura excusantur, quatenus rei publicæ causa absunt, et interea curator loco eorum datur. Qui si reversi fuerint, recipiunt onus tutelæ, nec anni habent vacationem, ut Papinianus responsorum libro quinto scripsit; nam hoc spatium habent ad novas tutelas vocati.

2. Persons absent on the service of the state are excused from being tutors or curators; and if those who have already been appointed either as tutors or curators should afterwards be absent on the public service, they are excused during their absence on such service, and meanwhile a curator is appointed in their place. On their return, they must again take upon them the burden of tutelage; and, according to Papinian's opinion, expressed in the fifth book of his answers, are not entitled to the privilege of a year's dispensation, which is only allowed them when they are called to a new tutelage.

D. xxvii. 1. 10. pr. and 2.

The meaning of the text is that, if they had commenced holding the office of tutor before their absence, they were obliged to resume it immediately on their return. If, when they returned, a new tutelage was imposed on them, they might delay for a year to enter on its duties.

3. Et qui potestatem aliquam habent, excusare se possunt, ut divus Marcus rescripsit, sed cœptam tutelam deserere non possunt.

3. By a rescript of the Emperor Marcus, all persons invested with any public authority may excuse themselves; but they cannot abandon the office of tutor, which they have already undertaken.

D. xxvii. 1. 17. 5.

Qui potestatem aliquam habent: i.e. all magistrates, including municipal magistrates. Potestas is here probably contrasted with dignitas, which was not a ground of excuse. (D. xxvii. 6. 15. 2.)

4. Item propter litem, quam cum pupillo vel adulto tutor vel curator habet, excusare se nemo potest: nisi forte de omnibus bonis vel hereditate controversia sit.

4. No tutor or curator can excuse himself by alleging a law-suit with the pupil or minor; unless the suit embraces the whole of his property, or is for an inheritance.

D. xxvii. i. 21. pr.

Justinian afterwards, in the 72nd Novel (c. 1), decided that no creditor or debtor of the pupil or minor should be allowed to become tutor or curator.

5. Item tria onera tutelæ non affectatæ vel curæ præstant vacationem, quamdiu administrantur: ut tamen plurimum pupillorum tutela vel cura eorundem honorum, veluti fratrum, pro una computetur.

5. Three tutelages or curatorships, if unsolicited, serve as an excuse from filling any other such office while the holder continues to discharge the duties. But the tutelage of several pupils, or the curatorship of property belonging at once to several persons, as where the pupils or minors are brothers, is reckoned as one only.

D. xxvii. i. 3. 15, 15.

6. Sed et propter paupertatem excusationem tribui tam divi fratres quam per se divus Marcus rescripsit, si quis imparem se oneri injuncto possit docere.

6. Poverty also is a sufficient excuse, when it can be proved to be such as to render a man incapable of the burden imposed upon him, according to the rescripts given both by the imperial brothers together, and by the Emperor Marcus singly.

D. xxvii. i. 7.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus and Lucius Verus were the divi fratres.

7. Item propter adversam valetudinem, propter quam nec suis quidem negotiis interesse potest, excusatio locum habet.

7. Ill-health, also, if it prevents a man from attending to his own affairs, affords a ground of excuse.

8. Similiter eum, qui litteras ne-sciret, excusandum esse, divus Pius rescripsit: quamvis et imperiti litterarum possunt ad administrationem negotiorum sufficere.

8. So, too, a person who could not read was to be excused, according to the rescript of the Emperor Antoninus Pius; yet persons who cannot read may have business capabilities.

D. xxvii. i. 6. 19.

The magistrate would have to decide whether the property was so small, and the position of the pupil or minor so humble, that this ignorance would be no bar.

9. Item si propter inimicitiam aliquem testamento tutorem pater dederit, hoc ipsum præstat ei excusationem: sicut per contrarium non excusantur, qui se tutelam patri

9. If it is through enmity that the father appoints by testament any one as tutor, this circumstance itself will afford a sufficient excuse; just as, on the other hand, they who have pro-

Qui potestatem aliquam habent: i.e. all magistrates, including municipal magistrates. Potestas is here probably contrasted with dignitas, which was not a ground of excuse. (D. xxvii. 6. 15. 2.)

4. Item propter litem, quam cum pupillo vel adulto tutor vel curator habet, excusare se nemo potest: nisi forte de omnibus bonis vel hereditate controversia sit.

4. No tutor or curator can excuse himself by alleging a law-suit with the pupil or minor; unless the suit embraces the whole of his property, or is for an inheritance.

D. xxvii. i. 21. pr.

Justinian afterwards, in the 72nd Novel (c. 1), decided that no creditor or debtor of the pupil or minor should be allowed to become tutor or curator.

5. Item tria onera tutelæ non affectatæ vel curæ præstant vacationem, quamdiu administrantur: ut tamen plurium pupillorum tutela vel cura eorundem bonorum, veluti fratrum, pro una computetur.

5. Three tutelages or curatorships, if unsolicited, serve as an excuse from filling any other such office while the holder continues to discharge the duties. But the tutelage of several pupils, or the curatorship of property belonging at once to several persons, as where the pupils or minors are brothers, is reckoned as one only.

D. xxvii. i. 3. 15, 15.

6. Sed et propter paupertatem excusationem tribui tam divi fratres quam per se divus Marcus rescripsit, si quis imparem se oneri injuncto possit docere.

6. Poverty also is a sufficient excuse, when it can be proved to be such as to render a man incapable of the burden imposed upon him, according to the rescripts given both by the imperial brothers together, and by the Emperor Marcus singly.

D. xxvii. 1. 7.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus and Lucius Verus were the divi fratres.

7. Item propter adversam valetudinem, propter quam nec suis quidem negotiis interesse potest, excusatio locum habet.

7. Ill-health, also, if it prevents a man from attending to his own affairs, affords a ground of excuse.

8. Similiter eum, qui litteras ne-sciret, excusandum esse, divus Pius rescripsit: quamvis et imperiti litterarum possunt ad administrationem negotiorum sufficere.

8. So, too, a person who could not read was to be excused, according to the rescript of the Emperor Antoninus Pius; yet persons who cannot read may have business capabilities.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 19.

The magistrate would have to decide whether the property was so small, and the position of the pupil or minor so humble, that this ignorance would be no bar.

9. Item si propter inimicitiam aliquem testamento tutorem pater dederit, hoc ipsum præstat ei excusationem: sicut per contrarium non excusantur, qui se tutelam patri

9. If it is through enmity that the father appoints by testament any one as tutor, this circumstance itself will afford a sufficient excuse; just as, on the other hand, they who have propupillorum administraturos promiserunt.

promised the father of the pupils to fill the office of tutor, cannot be excused.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 17.

10. Non esse autem admittendam excusationem ejus, qui hoc solo utitur, quod ignotus patri pupillorum sit, divi fratres rescripserunt.

10. That the tutor was unknown to the father of a pupil is not of itself to be admitted as a sufficient excuse, as is decided by a rescript of the imperial brothers.

D. xxvii. 1. 15. 14.

11. Inimicitiae, quas quis cum patre pupillorum vel adulterorum exercuit, si capitales fuerunt nec reconciliatio intervenit, a tutela solent excusare.

11. Enmity against the father of the pupil or minor, if it is of a deadly character, and no reconciliation has taken place, is usually considered as an excuse from being tutor.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 17.

12. Item si quis status controversiam a pupillorum patre passus est, excusatur a tutela.

12. So, too, he whose status has been called in question by the father of the pupil, is excused from the office of tutor.

That is, if the deceased has attempted to show that the person appointed tutor was a slave.

13. Item major septuaginta annis a tutela vel cura se potest excusare. Minores autem viginti et quinque annis olim quidem excusabantur: a nostra autem constitutione prohibentur ad tutelam vel curam adspirare, adeo ut nec excusatione opus fiat. Qua constitutione cavetur, ut nec pupillus ad legitimam tutelam vocetur nec adultus: cum erat incivile, eos, qui alieno auxilio in rebus suis administrandis egere noscuntur et sub aliis reguntur, aliorum tutelam vel curam subire.

13. Persons above seventy years of age may be excused from being tutors or curators. Persons under the age of twenty-five were formerly excused, but, by our constitution, they are now prohibited from aspiring to these offices, so that excuses are become unnecessary. This constitution provides that neither pupils nor minors shall be called to a legal tutelage. For it is absurd that persons who are themselves governed, and are known to need assistance in the administration of their own affairs, should become the tutors or curators of others.

D. xxvii. 1. 2. 10. 7; C. v. 30. 5.

14. Idem et in milite observandum est, ut nec volens ad tutelam munus admittatur.

14. The same rule holds good also as to military persons. They cannot, even though they wish it, be admitted to the office of tutor or curator.

15. Item Romae grammatici, rhetores et medici et qui in patria sua id exercent et intra numerum sunt, a tutela vel cura habent vacationem.

15. Grammarians, rhetoricians, and physicians at Rome, and those also who exercise such professions in their own country, and are within the number authorised, are exempted from being tutors or curators.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 1.

It was Antoninus Pius who fixed the number which each city was to have. (D. xxvii. 1. 6. 2.) The largest provincial city was not allowed to have more than ten physicians, five grammarians, and five rhetoricians.

pupillorum administraturos promiserunt.

mised the father of the pupils to fill the office of tutor, cannot be excused.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 17.

10. Non esse autem admittendam excusationem ejus, qui hoc solo utitur, quod ignotus patri pupillorum sit, divi fratres rescripserunt.

10. That the tutor was unknown to the father of a pupil is not of itself to be admitted as a sufficient excuse, as is decided by a rescript of the imperial brothers.

D. xxvii. 1. 15. 14.

11. Inimicitiae, quas quis cum patre pupillorum vel adulterorum exercuit, si capitales fuerint nec reconciliatio intervenit, a tutela solent excusare.

11. Enmity against the father of the pupil or minor, if it is of a deadly character, and no reconciliation has taken place, is usually considered as an excuse from being tutor.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 17.

12. Item si quis status controversiam a pupillorum patre passus est, excusatur a tutela.

12. So, too, he whose status has been called in question by the father of the pupil, is excused from the office of tutor.

That is, if the deceased has attempted to show that the person appointed tutor was a slave.

13. Item major septuaginta annis a tutela vel cura se potest excusare. Minores autem viginti et quinque annis olim quidem excusabantur: a nostra autem constitutione prohibentur ad tutelam vel curam adspirare, adeo ut nec excusatione opus fiat. Qua constitutione cavetur, ut nec pupillus ad legitimam tutelam vocetur nec adultus: cum erat incivile, eos, qui alieno auxilio in rebus suis administrandis egere noscuntur et sub aliis reguntur, aliorum tutelam vel curam subire.

13. Persons above seventy years of age may be excused from being tutors or curators. Persons under the age of twenty-five were formerly excused, but, by our constitution, they are now prohibited from aspiring to these offices, so that excuses are become unnecessary. This constitution provides that neither pupils nor minors shall be called to a legal tutelage. For it is absurd that persons who are themselves governed, and are known to need assistance in the administration of their own affairs, should become the tutors or curators of others.

D. xxvii. 1. 2. 10. 7; C. v. 30. 5.

14. Idem et in milite observandum est, ut nec volens ad tutelam munus admittatur.

14. The same rule holds good also as to military persons. They cannot, even though they wish it, be admitted to the office of tutor or curator.

15. Item Romae grammatici, rhetores et medici et qui in patria sua id exercent et intra numerum sunt, a tutela vel cura habent vacationem.

15. Grammarians, rhetoricians, and physicians at Rome, and those also who exercise such professions in their own country, and are within the number authorised, are exempted from being tutors or curators.

D. xxvii. 1. 6. 1.

It was Antoninus Pius who fixed the number which each city was to have. (D. xxvii. 1. 6. 2.) The largest provincial city was not allowed to have more than ten physicians, five grammarians, and five rhetoricians.

Philosophers were also excepted (D. xxvii. 1. 6. 5); jurisprudents who were members of the council of the emperor (xxvii. 1. 30); and all clerici (C. i. 3. 52).

16. Qui autem se vult excusare, si plures habeat excusationes et de quibusdam non probaverit, aliis uti intra tempora non prohibetur. Qui excusare se volunt, non appellant: sed intra dies quinquaginta continuos, ex quo cognoverunt, excusare se debent (cujuscumque generis sunt, id est qualitercumque dati fuerint tutores), si intra centesimum lapidem sunt ab eo loco, ubi tutores dati sunt: si vero ultra centesimum habitant, dinumeratione facta viginti millium diurnorum et amplius triginta dierum. Quod tamen, ut Scaevola dicebat, sic debet computari, ne minus sint quam quinquaginta dies.

16. If a person wishes to excuse himself, and has several excuses, even supposing some are not admitted, there is nothing to prevent him employing others, provided he does so within the prescribed time. Those who wish to excuse themselves are not to appeal, but whatever kind of tutors they may be, that is, however they may have been appointed, must offer their excuses within the fifty days next after they have known of their appointment, if they are within a hundred miles of the place where they were appointed. If they are at a greater distance, they are allowed a day for every twenty miles, and thirty days besides; but in calculating the time, as Scaevola pointed out, a minimum of fifty days must always be allowed.

D. xxvii. 1. 21. 13.

If he lived anywhere within four hundred miles, he would, reckoning a day for each twenty miles, and thirty days besides, fall short of fifty days, and therefore the rule was laid down as stated in the concluding sentence of the text. If he did not excuse himself within the appointed time, he could not afterwards escape the charge.

Dies continui are opposed to dies utiles, the days on which legal business could be done; dies continui meaning the successive days, of whatever kind.

The ordinary rule was that persons called to a public office had, in order not to serve, to appeal to a higher magistrate than the one appointing them.

17. Datus autem tutor ad universum patrimonium datus esse creditur.

17. The tutor who is appointed is considered as appointed for the whole patrimony.

D. xxvii. 1. 21. 2.

The tutor was appointed for the whole patrimony; but if it was situated in very different parts, he might apply to have other tutors appointed to act in the different localities. (D. xxvii. 1. 21. 2.)

18. Qui tutelam alicujus gessit, invitus curator ejusdem fieri non compellitur, in tantum ut, licet pater, qui testamento tutorem dederit, adiecit, se eundem curatorem dare, tamen invitum eum

18. A person who has discharged the office of tutor is not compelled against his will to become the curator of the same person; so much so, that although the father, after appointing a tutor by testament, adds that he also

Philosophers were also excepted (D. xxvii. 1. 6. 5); jurisprudents who were members of the council of the emperor (xxvii. 1. 30); and all clerici (C. i. 3. 52).

16. Qui autem se vult excusare, si plures habeat excusationes et de quibusdam non probaverit, aliis uti intra tempora non prohibetur. Qui excusare se volunt, non appellant: sed intra dies quinquaginta continuos, ex quo cognoverunt, excusare se debent (cujuscumque generis sunt, id est qualitercumque dati fuerint tutores), si intra centesimum lapidem sunt ab eo loco, ubi tutores dati sunt: si vero ultra centesimum habitant, dinumeratione facta viginti millium diurnorum et amplius triginta dierum. Quod tamen, ut Scaevola dicebat, sic debet computari, ne minus sint quam quinquaginta dies.

16. If a person wishes to excuse himself, and has several excuses, even supposing some are not admitted, there is nothing to prevent him employing others, provided he does so within the prescribed time. Those who wish to excuse themselves are not to appeal, but whatever kind of tutors they may be, that is, however they may have been appointed, must offer their excuses within the fifty days next after they have known of their appointment, if they are within a hundred miles of the place where they were appointed. If they are at a greater distance, they are allowed a day for every twenty miles, and thirty days besides; but in calculating the time, as Scaevola pointed out, a minimum of fifty days must always be allowed.

D. xxvii. 1. 21. 13.

If he lived anywhere within four hundred miles, he would, reckoning a day for each twenty miles, and thirty days besides, fall short of fifty days, and therefore the rule was laid down as stated in the concluding sentence of the text. If he did not excuse himself within the appointed time, he could not afterwards escape the charge.

Dies continui are opposed to dies utiles, the days on which legal business could be done; dies continui meaning the successive days, of whatever kind.

The ordinary rule was that persons called to a public office had, in order not to serve, to appeal to a higher magistrate than the one appointing them.

17. Datus autem tutor ad universum patrimonium datus esse creditor.

17. The tutor who is appointed is considered as appointed for the whole patrimony.

D. xxvii. 1. 21. 2.

The tutor was appointed for the whole patrimony; but if it was situated in very different parts, he might apply to have other tutors appointed to act in the different localities. (D. xxvii. 1. 21. 2.)

18. Qui tutelam alicujus gessit, invitus curator ejusdem fieri non compellitur, in tantum ut, licet pater, qui testamento tutorem dederit, adject, se eundem curatorem dare, tamen invitum eum

18. A person who has discharged the office of tutor is not compelled against his will to become the curator of the same person; so much so, that although the father, after appointing a tutor by testament, adds that he also curam suscipere non cogendum, divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

appoints the same person to be curator, the person so appointed, if unwilling, cannot be compelled to take the office of curator; so it has been decided by the rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus.

It is Antoninus Caracalla who is here meant.

19. Idem rescripserunt, maritum uxori suæ curatorem datum excusare se posse, licet se immisceat.

19. The same emperors have decided by rescript, that a husband appointed as curator to his wife may excuse himself from the office, although he intermeddles with her affairs.

D. xxvii. 1. 1. 5.

The husband not only might excuse himself from the curatorship of his wife, but in the time of Justinian he could not fill the office (C. v. 34. 2); neither could the wife's curator marry her (C. v. 6).

It was the general rule that a tutor or curator who intermeddled with the affairs of the pupil or adult renounced the right of offering excuses.

20. Si quis autem falsis allegationibus excusationem tutelæ meruit, non est liberatus onere tutelæ.

20. If any one has succeeded by false allegations in getting himself excused from the office of tutor, he is not discharged from the burden of the office.

D. xxiii. 2. 60. pr.

TIT. XXVI. DE SUSPECTIS TUTORIBUS ET CURATORIBUS.

Sciendum est suspecti crimen e lege duodecim tabularum descendere.

It is to be observed that the right of accusing a suspected tutor or curator is derived from the law of the Twelve Tables.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 2.

1. Datum est autem jus removendi suspectos tutores Romæ prætori et in provinciis præsidibus earum et legato proconsulis.

1. The right of removing suspected tutors belongs at Rome to the prætor; in the provinces to the præsides, or to the legate of the proconsul.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 3, 4.

2. Ostendimus, qui possunt de suspecto cognoscere: nunc videamus, qui suspecti fieri possunt. Et quidem omnes tutores possunt, sive testamentarii sint sive alterius generis tutores. Quare et si legitimus sit tutor, accusari poterit. Quid si patronus? Adhuc idem erit dicendum: dummodo meminerimus, famæ patroni parcendum, licet ut suspectus remotus fuerit.

2. We have shown what magistrates may take cognisance of suspected persons: let us now inquire, what persons may become suspected. All tutors may become so, whether testamentary or others; thus even a legal tutor may be accused. But what is the case with a patron? He, too, may be accused; but we must remember, that his reputation must be spared, although he be removed as suspected.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 5.

curam suscipere non cogendum, divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

appoints the same person to be curator, the person so appointed, if unwilling, cannot be compelled to take the office of curator; so it has been decided by the rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus.

It is Antoninus Caracalla who is here meant.

19. Idem rescripserunt, maritum uxori suæ curatorem datum excusare se posse, licet se immisceat.

19. The same emperors have decided by rescript, that a husband appointed as curator to his wife may excuse himself from the office, although he intermeddles with her affairs.

D. xxvii. 1. 1. 5.

The husband not only might excuse himself from the curatorship of his wife, but in the time of Justinian he could not fill the office (C. v. 34. 2); neither could the wife's curator marry her (C. v. 6).

It was the general rule that a tutor or curator who intermeddled with the affairs of the pupil or adult renounced the right of offering excuses.

20. Si quis autem falsis allegationibus excusationem tutelæ meruit, non est liberatus onere tutelæ.

20. If any one has succeeded by false allegations in getting himself excused from the office of tutor, he is not discharged from the burden of the office.

D. xxiii. 2. 60. pr.

TIT. XXVI. DE SUSPECTIS TUTORIBUS ET CURATORIBUS.

Sciendum est suspecti crimen e lege duodecim tabularum descendere.

It is to be observed that the right of accusing a suspected tutor or curator is derived from the law of the Twelve Tables.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 2.

1. Datum est autem jus removendi suspectos tutores Romæ prætori et in provinciis præsidibus earum et legato proconsulis.

1. The right of removing suspected tutors belongs at Rome to the prætor; in the provinces to the præsides, or to the legate of the proconsul.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 3, 4.

2. Ostendimus, qui possunt de suspecto cognoscere: nunc videamus, qui suspecti fieri possunt. Et quidem omnes tutores possunt, sive testamentarii sint sive alterius generis tutores. Quare et si legitimus sit tutor, accusari poterit. Quid si patronus? Adhuc idem erit dicendum: dummodo meminerimus, famæ patroni parcendum, licet ut suspectus remotus fuerit.

2. We have shown what magistrates may take cognisance of suspected persons: let us now inquire, what persons may become suspected. All tutors may become so, whether testamentary or others; thus even a legal tutor may be accused. But what is the case with a patron? He, too, may be accused; but we must remember, that his reputation must be spared, although he be removed as suspected.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 5.

The descendants could not bring an action to which infamy attached against an ascendant. They and the libertus could only call for the interference of the law to protect their property, not to punish the tutor with infamy. (D. xxxvii. 15. 5.) And in the case of all legal tutors it was customary, except in very bad cases, not to remove them, but to join a curator with them. (D. xxvi. 10. 9.) By famæ parcendum is meant that the grounds of the decision for their removal were not to be expressed.

3. Consequens est, ut videamus, qui possint suspectos postulare. Et sciendum est, quasi publicam esse hanc actionem, hoc est omnibus patere. Quin immo et mulieres admittuntur ex rescripto divorum Severi et Antonini, sed hæc solæ, quæ pietatis necessitudine ductæ ad hoc procedunt, ut puta mater: nutrix quoque et avia possunt, potest et soror: sed et si qua mulier fuerit, cujus prætor propensam in pietatem mentem intellexerit non sexus verecundiam egredientem, sed pietate productam non continere injuriam pupillorum, admittit eam ad accusationem.

3. Let us now inquire, by whom suspected persons may be accused. Now an accusation of this sort is in a measure public, that is, it is open to all. Nay, by a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, even women are admitted to be accusers; but only those who are irresistibly induced to do so through feelings of affection; as a mother, a nurse, or a grandmother, or a sister, who may all become accusers. But the prætor will admit any woman to make the accusation, in whom he recognises a character that, bent on the fulfilment of duty and not overstepping the modesty of the sex, but animated by dutiful affection, cannot endure that the pupil should suffer harm.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 6, 7.

The action is called quasi publica, because on the one hand it had the private object of securing the pupil's interests, and on the other had, like public actions, criminal consequences, and might be brought by a person not interested in the private result.

Women, as a general rule, could not institute public actions. (D. xlviii. 2. 1.)

4. Impuberes non possunt tutores suos suspectos postulare: puberes autem curatores suos ex consilio necessariorum suspectos possunt arguere: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

4. No person below the age of puberty can bring an accusation against his tutor as suspected; but those who have attained that age may, under the advice of their near relations, accuse their curators. Such is the decision given in a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus.

D. xxvi. 10. 7. pr.

5. Suspectus est autem, et qui non ex fide tutelam gerit, licet solvendo est, ut Julianus quoque scripsit. Sed et antequam incipiat gerere tutelam tutor, posse eum quasi suspectum removeri, idem Julianus scripsit et secundum eum constitutum est.

5. A tutor is suspected who does not faithfully execute his trust, although perfectly solvent, as Julian writes, who also thinks that even before he enters on his office, a tutor may be removed as suspected; and a constitution has been made in accordance with this opinion.

D. xxvi. 10. 8.

Ulpian says that a tutor could not be suspectus before

The descendants could not bring an action to which infamy attached against an ascendant. They and the libertus could only call for the interference of the law to protect their property, not to punish the tutor with infamy. (D. xxxvii. 15. 5.) And in the case of all legal tutors it was customary, except in very bad cases, not to remove them, but to join a curator with them. (D. xxvi. 10. 9.) By famæ parcendum is meant that the grounds of the decision for their removal were not to be expressed.

3. Consequens est, ut videamus, qui possint suspectos postulare. Et sciendum est, quasi publicam esse hanc actionem, hoc est omnibus patere. Quin immo et mulieres admittuntur ex rescripto divorum Severi et Antonini, sed hæ solæ, quæ pietatis necessitudine ductæ ad hoc procedunt, ut puta mater: nutrix quoque et avia possunt, potest et soror: sed et si qua mulier fuerit, cujus prætor propensam in pietatem mentem intellexerit non sexus vercundiam egredientem, sed pietate productam non continere injuriam pupillorum, admittit eam ad accusationem.

3. Let us now inquire, by whom suspected persons may be accused. Now an accusation of this sort is in a measure public, that is, it is open to all. Nay, by a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, even women are admitted to be accusers; but only those who are irresistibly induced to do so through feelings of affection; as a mother, a nurse, or a grandmother, or a sister, who may all become accusers. But the prætor will admit any woman to make the accusation, in whom he recognises a character that, bent on the fulfilment of duty and not overstepping the modesty of the sex, but animated by dutiful affection, cannot endure that the pupil should suffer harm.

D. xxvi. 10. 1. 6, 7.

The action is called quasi publica, because on the one hand it had the private object of securing the pupil's interests, and on the other had, like public actions, criminal consequences, and might be brought by a person not interested in the private result.

Women, as a general rule, could not institute public actions. (D. xlviii. 2. 1.)

4. Impuberes non possunt tutores suos suspectos postulare: puberes autem curatores suos ex consilio necessariorum suspectos possunt arguere: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

4. No person below the age of puberty can bring an accusation against his tutor as suspected; but those who have attained that age may, under the advice of their near relations, accuse their curators. Such is the decision given in a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus.

D. xxvi. 10. 7. pr.

5. Suspectus est autem, et qui non ex fide tutelam gerit, licet solvendo est, ut Julianus quoque scripsit. Sed et antequam incipiat gerere tutelam tutor, posse eum quasi suspectum removeri, idem Julianus scripsit et secundum eum constitutum est.

5. A tutor is suspected who does not faithfully execute his trust, although perfectly solvent, as Julian writes, who also thinks that even before he enters on his office, a tutor may be removed as suspected; and a constitution has been made in accordance with this opinion.

D. xxvi. 10. 8.

Ulpian says that a tutor could not be suspectus before on his office, and that if there was any reason to think him an improper person beforehand, the magistrate would forbid him to assume the administration. (D. xxvi. 10. 3. 5 and 12.) Justinian decides in opposition to this.

6. Suspectus autem remotus, si quidem ob dolum, famosus est: si ob culpam, non æque.

6. A suspected person, if removed on account of fraud, is infamous, but not so if for neglect only.

C. v. 40. 9; D. xxvi. 10. 3. 18.

For the meaning of the word infamia see Introd. sec. 48.

7. Si quis autem suspectus postulat, quoad cognitio finiatur, interdicitur ei administratio, ut Papiniano visum est.

7. If an accusation is brought against any one as suspected, his administration, according to Papinian, is suspended while the accusation is pending.

D. xlv. 3. 14. 1.

8. Sed si suspecti cognitio suscepta fuerit posteaque tutor vel curator decesserit, extinguitur cognitio suspecti.

8. If a process is commenced against a tutor or curator, as suspected, and he dies while it is going on, the process is at an end.

The action to force the tutor or curator to give in his accounts would be brought against the heirs of the tutor or curator. But the suspecti cognitio could not, as its object was to remove the tutor or curator, not to recover money from him. The crimen suspecti could only be brought against a person actually tutor or curator, and was at an end if the office came to an end, not only by death, but in any way. (D. xxvi. 10. 11.)

9. Si quis tutor copiam sui non faciat, ut alimenta pupillo decernantur, cavetur epistula divorum Severi et Antonini, ut in possessionem bonorum ejus pupillus mittatur; et quæ mora deteriora futura sunt, dato curatore distrahi jubentur. Ergo ut suspectus removeri poterit, qui non præstat alimenta.

9. If a tutor fails to present himself in order that a certain amount of maintenance may be fixed on for his pupil, it is provided by a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, that the pupil shall be put into the possession of the effects of the tutor, and that, after a curator has been appointed for the purpose, any portion of these effects which would be deteriorated in value by delay, may be sold. Therefore a tutor who does not afford maintenance to his pupil may be removed, as suspected.

D. xxvi. 10. 7. 2 and 10. 3. 14.

The prætor generally determined the amount to be annually expended on the maintenance and education of the pupil (the word alimenta must be taken very widely), when it was not determined by the testament of the father. The tutor had therefore to attend before the magistrate to state what amount the fortune of the pupil would bear; and if he wilfully neglected to do this, and absented himself, he was treated like a defaulting debtor absenting himself, and the pupil was put in possession of his goods.

on his office, and that if there was any reason to think him an improper person beforehand, the magistrate would forbid him to assume the administration. (D. xxvi. 10. 3. 5 and 12.) Justinian decides in opposition to this.

6. Suspectus autem remotus, si quidem ob dolum, famosus est: si ob culpam, non æque.

6. A suspected person, if removed on account of fraud, is infamous, but not so if for neglect only.

C. v. 40. 9; D. xxvi. 10. 3. 18.

For the meaning of the word infamia see Introd. sec. 48.

7. Si quis autem suspectus postulat, quoad cognitio finiatur, interdicitur ei administratio, ut Papiniano visum est.

7. If an accusation is brought against any one as suspected, his administration, according to Papinian, is suspended while the accusation is pending.

D. xlv. 3. 14. 1.

8. Sed si suspecti cognitio suscepta fuerit posteaque tutor vel curator decesserit, extinguitur cognitio suspecti.

8. If a process is commenced against a tutor or curator, as suspected, and he dies while it is going on, the process is at an end.

The action to force the tutor or curator to give in his accounts would be brought against the heirs of the tutor or curator. But the suspecti cognitio could not, as its object was to remove the tutor or curator, not to recover money from him. The crimen suspecti could only be brought against a person actually tutor or curator, and was at an end if the office came to an end, not only by death, but in any way. (D. xxvi. 10. 11.)

9. Si quis tutor copiam sui non faciat, ut alimenta pupillo decernantur, cavetur epistula divorum Severi et Antonini, ut in possessionem bonorum ejus pupillus mittatur; et quæ mora deteriora futura sunt, dato curatore distrahi jubentur. Ergo ut suspectus removeri poterit, qui non præstat alimenta.

9. If a tutor fails to present himself in order that a certain amount of maintenance may be fixed on for his pupil, it is provided by a rescript of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, that the pupil shall be put into the possession of the effects of the tutor, and that, after a curator has been appointed for the purpose, any portion of these effects which would be deteriorated in value by delay, may be sold. Therefore a tutor who does not afford maintenance to his pupil may be removed, as suspected.

D. xxvi. 10. 7. 2 and 10. 3. 14.

The prætor generally determined the amount to be annually expended on the maintenance and education of the pupil (the word alimenta must be taken very widely), when it was not determined by the testament of the father. The tutor had therefore to attend before the magistrate to state what amount the fortune of the pupil would bear; and if he wilfully neglected to do this, and absented himself, he was treated like a defaulting debtor absenting himself, and the pupil was put in possession of his goods.

10. Sed si quis præsens negat, propter inopiam alimenta posse decerni, si hoc per mendacium dicat, remittendum eum esse ad præfectum urbis puniendum placuit, sicut ille remittitur, qui data pecunia ministerium tutelæ redemit.

10. But if the tutor appears, and alleges that maintenance cannot be decreed in consequence of the smallness of the pupil's estate; then, if he says this falsely, he shall be handed over to the præfect of the city, to be punished, just as a person is handed over who has purchased a tutelage by bribery.

D. xxvi. 10. 3. 15.

The prætor had no criminal jurisdiction, and therefore persons were sent for punishment to the præfectus urbis. (D. i. 12. 1.) In the provinces the præses could punish, as well as remove, the tutor.

11. Libertus quoque, si fraudulenter gessisse tutelam filiorum vel nepotum patroni probetur, ad præfectum urbis remittitur puniendus.

11. Also a freedman, who is proved to have been guilty of fraud, when acting as tutor to the son or grandson of his patron, is handed over to the præfect of the city to be punished.

D. xxvi. 10. 2.

12. Novissime sciendum est, eos, qui fraudulenter tutelam vel curam administrant, etiamsi satis offerant, removendos a tutela, quia satisfactio propositum tutoris malevolum non mutat, sed diutius grassandi in re familiari facultatem præstat.

12. Lastly, it must be known that they who are guilty of fraud in their administration, must be removed, although they offer sufficient security. For giving security makes no change in the dishonest intentions of the tutor, but only procures him a longer opportunity of injuring the estate.

D. xxvi. 10. 5. 6.

A person is considered thus open to suspicion whose general character and conduct warrant the suspicion. But a zealous and honest man, as we learn in the next paragraph, is not to be removed on suspicion because he is poor.

13. Suspectum enim eum putamus, qui moribus talis est, ut suspectus sit: enimvero tutor vel curator, quamvis pauper est, fidelis tamen et diligens, removendus non est quasi suspectus.

13. We also deem every man suspected, whose conduct is such that we cannot but suspect him. But a tutor or curator who is faithful and diligent, is not to be removed, as a suspected person, merely because he is poor.

D. xxvi. 10. 8.

10. Sed si quis præsens negat, propter inopiam alimenta posse decerni, si hoc per mendacium dicat, remittendum eum esse ad præfectum urbis puniendum placuit, sicut ille remittitur, qui data pecunia ministerium tutelæ redemit.

10. But if the tutor appears, and alleges that maintenance cannot be decreed in consequence of the smallness of the pupil's estate; then, if he says this falsely, he shall be handed over to the præfect of the city, to be punished, just as a person is handed over who has purchased a tutelage by bribery.

D. xxvi. 10. 3. 15.

The prætor had no criminal jurisdiction, and therefore persons were sent for punishment to the præfectus urbis. (D. i. 12. 1.) In the provinces the præses could punish, as well as remove, the tutor.

11. Libertus quoque, si fraudulenter gessisse tutelam filiorum vel nepotum patroni probetur, ad præfectum urbis remittitur puniendus.

11. Also a freedman, who is proved to have been guilty of fraud, when acting as tutor to the son or grandson of his patron, is handed over to the præfect of the city to be punished.

D. xxvi. 10. 2.

12. Novissime sciendum est, eos, qui fraudulenter tutelam vel curam administrant, etiamsi satis offerant, removendos a tutela, quia satisfactio propositum tutoris malevolum non mutat, sed diutius grassandi in re familiari facultatem præstat.

12. Lastly, it must be known that they who are guilty of fraud in their administration, must be removed, although they offer sufficient security. For giving security makes no change in the dishonest intentions of the tutor, but only procures him a longer opportunity of injuring the estate.

D. xxvi. 10. 5. 6.

A person is considered thus open to suspicion whose general character and conduct warrant the suspicion. But a zealous and honest man, as we learn in the next paragraph, is not to be removed on suspicion because he is poor.

13. Suspectum enim eum putamus, qui moribus talis est, ut suspectus sit: enimvero tutor vel curator, quamvis pauper est, fidelis tamen et diligens, removendus non est quasi suspectus.

13. We also deem every man suspected, whose conduct is such that we cannot but suspect him. But a tutor or curator who is faithful and diligent, is not to be removed, as a suspected person, merely because he is poor.

D. xxvi. 10. 8.

LIBER SECUNDUS.

TIT. I. DE RERUM DIVISIONE.

HAVING treated in the first book of the law relating to persons, the Institutes now proceed to treat of the law relating to things—that is, they pass from persons who exercise rights to things over which rights are exercised. Rights may be divided into those which we have in or over things as against all the world, and those which we have against particular persons. (See Introd. sec. 61.) The second book of the Institutes, and the first portion of the third, treat of the former class, and of the mode in which they are acquired.

The most proper mode of treating the law of things would be, perhaps, first to inquire of what divisions things themselves are susceptible; next, to divide rights over things (jura in rem) according to the extent of the right; and lastly, to treat of the mode in which those rights are acquired. To a certain extent this mode of dividing the subject is adopted in the Institutes, but not very distinctly or expressly. Things themselves may be divided, generally, by making the basis of division either the relation in which they stand to persons, or something inherent in the nature of the things. Things divided in the first way may be divided according as they are the subject of the rights of all men or no men on the one hand, and of particular men on the other, the latter class receiving modifications according to the character in which particular men hold them. This division of things is treated of in the first sections of this Title. The most prominent distinction inherent in things is that of things corporeal and things incorporeal, and this is treated of in the second Title. There are other divisions of things (see Introd. secs. 52–60) which are referred to in the Institutes, but not expressly noticed.

A person may have the whole sum of all rights over a thing, when in Roman law he was said to have the dominium. These rights of the dominus were summed up in the jus utendi, that is, making use of the thing; the jus fruendi, that is, reaping the fruits and profits; and the jus abutendi, that is, consuming the thing, if capable of consumption. Or any one of the jura in rem

LIBER SECUNDUS.

TIT. I. DE RERUM DIVISIONE.

HAVING treated in the first book of the law relating to persons, the Institutes now proceed to treat of the law relating to things—that is, they pass from persons who exercise rights to things over which rights are exercised. Rights may be divided into those which we have in or over things as against all the world, and those which we have against particular persons. (See Introd. sec. 61.) The second book of the Institutes, and the first portion of the third, treat of the former class, and of the mode in which they are acquired.

The most proper mode of treating the law of things would be, perhaps, first to inquire of what divisions things themselves are susceptible; next, to divide rights over things (jura in rem) according to the extent of the right; and lastly, to treat of the mode in which those rights are acquired. To a certain extent this mode of dividing the subject is adopted in the Institutes, but not very distinctly or expressly. Things themselves may be divided, generally, by making the basis of division either the relation in which they stand to persons, or something inherent in the nature of the things. Things divided in the first way may be divided according as they are the subject of the rights of all men or no men on the one hand, and of particular men on the other, the latter class receiving modifications according to the character in which particular men hold them. This division of things is treated of in the first sections of this Title. The most prominent distinction inherent in things is that of things corporeal and things incorporeal, and this is treated of in the second Title. There are other divisions of things (see Introd. secs. 52–60) which are referred to in the Institutes, but not expressly noticed.

A person may have the whole sum of all rights over a thing, when in Roman law he was said to have the dominium. These rights of the dominus were summed up in the jus utendi, that is, making use of the thing; the jus fruendi, that is, reaping the fruits and profits; and the jus abutendi, that is, consuming the thing, if capable of consumption. Or any one of the jura in rem may be separated from the rest and enjoyed by different persons. (See Intro. sec. 64.) These fragments of the dominium, called servitudes, are treated of in the third and three following Titles. Or a person may have a right over a thing in the ownership of another, limited by the extent to which he has a claim against the owner, as a creditor has over the thing given him in pledge as a security for the debt. This right, generally termed in Roman law the jus pignoris, is not spoken of expressly in the Institutes, but a brief sketch of the law on the subject will be found in the conclusion of the notes to the fifth Title.

Fragments of dominion or jura in rem which can be enjoyed by different persons. I. are known as servitudes.

The Institutes then recur to the modos by which the ownership in things is acquired, and the subject is divided according as ownership is acquired in a particular thing, or in a universitas rerum, that is, the aggregate of rights possessed by a particular person. Two of the principal modes of acquiring particular things, occupation, that is, being the first person to appropriate an unappropriated thing, and tradition, that is, the owner handing over the thing to another person with the intention of transferring the ownership, and the transferee receiving the thing with the intention of becoming owner of it, have been treated of in the first Title, as also have certain subordinate modes, e.g. accession, when an owner acquires by the natural increment of the thing owned, and specification, when a new thing is created, and belongs to the creator, even though the materials belonged to another person. All these are said to be modes of acquiring things jure naturali. Two modes of acquiring particular things jure civili are then noticed. (1.) The sixth Title treats of usucapion, the process by which the law attached the legal ownership after a certain length of possession. (2.) The seventh Title treats of certain cases in which gift might be looked on as a different mode of conferring ownership from tradition. This ends the discussion of the modes of acquiring the ownership in particular things. The eighth and ninth Titles speak of certain restrictions on alienation, and of one person acquiring ownership through other persons. In the tenth Title the Institutes proceed to discuss the modes of acquiring a universitas rerum. The two chief modes are, the gift of an hereditas by testament, and the succession to an hereditas in case of intestacy. The subject of testaments occupies the remainder of the second book, and that of succession to an intestate occupies the first nine Titles of the third book. Some minor modes of acquiring a universitas rerum, of which arrogation is the most important, are then noticed; and with the twelfth Title of the third book the treatment of jura in rem, and of the modes of acquiring ownership in them, is brought to a conclusion. This treatment of the modes of acquisition is subject to the inconvenience noticed by Gaius (ii. 191), that legacies, which are a mode of acquiring specific things, are treated of as coming under the acquisition of a universitas rerum by testament.

Previously to the legislation of Justinian, there had been two

Fragments of dominium or jura in rem which can be enjoyed by different persons. I. are known as servitudes.

may be separated from the rest and enjoyed by different persons. (See Intro. sec. 64.) These fragments of the dominium, called servitudes, are treated of in the third and three following Titles. Or a person may have a right over a thing in the ownership of another, limited by the extent to which he has a claim against the owner, as a creditor has over the thing given him in pledge as a security for the debt. This right, generally termed in Roman law the jus pignoris, is not spoken of expressly in the Institutes, but a brief sketch of the law on the subject will be found in the conclusion of the notes to the fifth Title.

The Institutes then recur to the modos by which the ownership in things is acquired, and the subject is divided according as ownership is acquired in a particular thing, or in a universitas rerum, that is, the aggregate of rights possessed by a particular person. Two of the principal modes of acquiring particular things, occupation, that is, being the first person to appropriate an unappropriated thing, and tradition, that is, the owner handing over the thing to another person with the intention of transferring the ownership, and the transferee receiving the thing with the intention of becoming owner of it, have been treated of in the first Title, as also have certain subordinate modes, e.g. accession, when an owner acquires by the natural increment of the thing owned, and specification, when a new thing is created, and belongs to the creator, even though the materials belonged to another person. All these are said to be modes of acquiring things jure naturali. Two modes of acquiring particular things jure civili are then noticed. (1.) The sixth Title treats of usucapion, the process by which the law attached the legal ownership after a certain length of possession. (2.) The seventh Title treats of certain cases in which gift might be looked on as a different mode of conferring ownership from tradition. This ends the discussion of the modes of acquiring the ownership in particular things. The eighth and ninth Titles speak of certain restrictions on alienation, and of one person acquiring ownership through other persons. In the tenth Title the Institutes proceed to discuss the modes of acquiring a universitas rerum. The two chief modes are, the gift of an hereditas by testament, and the succession to an hereditas in case of intestacy. The subject of testaments occupies the remainder of the second book, and that of succession to an intestate occupies the first nine Titles of the third book. Some minor modes of acquiring a universitas rerum, of which arrogation is the most important, are then noticed; and with the twelfth Title of the third book the treatment of jura in rem, and of the modes of acquiring ownership in them, is brought to a conclusion. This treatment of the modes of acquisition is subject to the inconvenience noticed by Gaius (ii. 191), that legacies, which are a mode of acquiring specific things, are treated of as coming under the acquisition of a universitas rerum by testament.

Previously to the legislation of Justinian, there had been two other modes of acquisition jure civili, applicable both in the case of particular things and in that of a universitas rerum, which are treated of by Gaius at considerable length. (GAI. ii. 18-37. See also ULPIAN, Reg. 19. 2.) These were mancipation, the process by which res mancipi were conveyed from one Roman citizen to another (see Introd. sec. 59), and in jure cessio. The cessio in jure was a fictitious suit, in which the person who was to acquire the thing claimed (vindicabat) the thing as his own, the person who was to transfer it acknowledged the justice of the claim, and the magistrate pronounced it to be the property (addicebat) of the claimant. Mancipation and cessionones in jure had become obsolete before the time of Justinian. Ulpian (Reg. 19. 2) also notices two others, adjudicatione, i.e. by property held in common being judicially marked out, so that the portions were owned in severalty (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 20; and Tit. 17. 4, 5, 6, 7), and lege, by some special statute, as when legacies devolved under the lex Papia Poppæa. (Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 8, note.)

The explanation of the term possession, which occurs frequently in this Title, may be conveniently deferred until we reach the sixth Title.

Superiore libro de jure personarum exposuimus: modo videamus de rebus, quæ vel in nostro patrimonio vel extra nostrum patrimonium habentur. Quædam enim naturali jure communia sunt omnium, quædam publica, quædam universitatis, quædam nullius, pleraque singulorum, quæ variis ex causis cuicque adquiruntur, sicut ex subiectis apparebit.

In the preceding book we have treated of the law of persons. Let us now speak of things, which either are in our patrimony, or not in our patrimony. For some things by the law of nature are common to all; some are public; some belong to corporate bodies, and some belong to no one. Most things are the property of individuals, who acquire them in different ways, as will appear hereafter.

GAI. ii. 1; D. i. 8. 2.

Under the word res, thing, is included (whatever is capable of being the subject of a right.) The principal division of Gaius is into things divini juris and humani juris. Here the principal division is according as things are in nostro patrimonio, that is, capable of private ownership; or extra nostrum patrimonium, that is, not capable of private ownership, and either belonging to all men (communes), to the state (publicæ), to no men (nullius), or to bodies of men (universitatis). The words bona and pecunia, it may be observed, are only used of things in nostro patrimonio.

1. Et quidem naturali jure communia sunt omnium hæc: aer et aqua profuens et mare et per hoc litora maris. Nemo igitur ad litus maris accedere prohibetur, dum tamen villis et monumentis et ædificiis absteat, quia non sunt juris gentium, sicut et mare.

1. By the law of nature these things are common to mankind—the air, running water, the sea, and consequently the shores of the sea. No one, therefore, is forbidden to approach the sea-shore, provided that he respects habitations, monuments, and buildings, which are not, like the sea, subject only to the law of nations.

D. i. 8. 2. 1; D. i. 8. 4.

other modes of acquisition jure civili, applicable both in the case of particular things and in that of a universitas rerum, which are treated of by Gaius at considerable length. (GAI. ii. 18–37. See also ULPAN, Reg. 19. 2.) These were mancipation, the process by which res mancipi were conveyed from one Roman citizen to another (see Introd. sec. 59), and in jure cessio. The cessio in jure was a fictitious suit, in which the person who was to acquire the thing claimed (vindicabat) the thing as his own, the person who was to transfer it acknowledged the justice of the claim, and the magistrate pronounced it to be the property (addicebat) of the claimant. Mancipation and cessionones in jure had become obsolete before the time of Justinian. Ulpian (Reg. 19. 2) also notices two others, adjudicatione, i.e. by property held in common being judicially marked out, so that the portions were owned in severalty (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 20; and Tit. 17. 4, 5, 6, 7), and lege, by some special statute, as when legacies devolved under the lex Papia Poppæa. (Bk. ii. Tit. 20. 8, note.)

The explanation of the term possession, which occurs frequently in this Title, may be conveniently deferred until we reach the sixth Title.

Superiore libro de jure personarum exposuimus: modo videamus de rebus, quæ vel in nostro patrimonio vel extra nostrum patrimonium habentur. Quædam enim naturali jure communia sunt omnium, quædam publica, quædam universitatis, quædam nullius, pleraque singulorum, quæ variis ex causis cuique adquiruntur, sicut ex subjectis apparebit.

In the preceding book we have treated of the law of persons. Let us now speak of things, which either are in our patrimony, or not in our patrimony. For some things by the law of nature are common to all; some are public; some belong to corporate bodies, and some belong to no one. Most things are the property of individuals, who acquire them in different ways, as will appear hereafter.

GAI. ii. 1; D. i. 8. 2.

Under the word res, thing, is included (whatever is capable of being the subject of a right.) The principal division of Gaius is into things divini juris and humani juris. Here the principal division is according as things are in nostro patrimonio, that is, capable of private ownership; or extra nostrum patrimonium, that is, not capable of private ownership, and either belonging to all men (communes), to the state (publicæ), to no men (nullius), or to bodies of men (universitatis). The words bona and pecunia, it may be observed, are only used of things in nostro patrimonio.

1. Et quidem naturali jure communia sunt omnium hæc: aer et aqua profuens et mare et per hoc litora maris. Nemo igitur ad litus maris accedere prohibetur, dum tamen villis et monumentis et ædificiis abstineat, quia non sunt juris gentium, sicut et mare.

1. By the law of nature these things are common to mankind—the air, running water, the sea, and consequently the shores of the sea. No one, therefore, is forbidden to approach the seashore, provided that he respects habitations, monuments, and buildings, which are not, like the sea, subject only to the law of nations.

D. i. 8. 2. 1; D. i. 8. 4.

(Of things that are common to all any one may take such a portion as he pleases.) Thus a man may inhale the air, or float his ship on any part of the sea. As long as he occupies any portion, his occupation is respected; but directly his occupation ceases, the thing occupied again becomes common to all. The sea-shore, that is, the shore as far as the waves go at furthest, was considered to belong to all men. For the purposes of self-defence any nation had a right to occupy the shore and to repel strangers. Individuals, if they built on it, by means of piles or otherwise, were secured in exclusive enjoyment of the portion occupied; but if the building was taken away, their occupancy was at an end, and the spot on which the building stood again became common. (D. i. 8. 6.)

2. Flumina autem omnia et portus publica sunt: ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est in portibus fluminibusque.

2. All rivers and ports are public; hence the right of fishing in a port, or in rivers, is common to all men.

D. i. 8. 4. 1; D. xlvii. 10. 13. 7.

The word publicus is sometimes used as equivalent to communis, but is properly used, as here, for what belongs to the people. Things public belong to a particular people, but may be used and enjoyed by all men. Roads, public places, and buildings, might be added to those mentioned in the text. The particular people or nation in whose territory public things lie may permit all the world to make use of them, but exercises a special jurisdiction to prevent any one injuring them. In this light even the shore of the sea was said, though not very strictly, to be a res publica: it is not the property of the particular people whose territory is adjacent to the shore, but it belongs to them to see that none of the uses of the shore are lost by the act of individuals. Celsus says, Litora in quæ populus Romanus imperium habet populi Romani esse arbitror (D. xliii. 8. 3), where, if we are to bring this opinion of Celsus into harmony with the opinions of other jurists, we must understand 'populi Romani esse' to mean 'are subject to the guardianship of the Roman people.'

3. Est autem litus maris, quatenus hibernus fluctus maximus excurrit.

3. The sea-shore extends to the limit reached by the greatest winter flood.

D. i. 16. 96.

Celsus ascribes this definition to Cicero, who apparently borrowed it from Aquilius. (Cic. Top. 7.)

4. Riparum quoque usus publicus est juris gentium, sicut ipsius fluminis: itaque navem ad eas appellere, funes ex arboribus ibi natis religare, onus aliquid in his reponere cuilibet liberum est, sicuti per ipsum flumen navigare. Sed proprietates earum illorum est, quorum

4. The public use of the banks of a river is part of the law of nations, just as is that of the river itself. All persons, therefore, are as much at liberty to bring their vessels to the bank, to fasten ropes to the trees growing there, and to place any part of their cargo there, as to navigate the river itself.

Gen. a. 1. 1. 1. 1.

(Of things that are common to all any one may take such a portion as he pleases.) Thus a man may inhale the air, or float his ship on any part of the sea. As long as he occupies any portion, his occupation is respected; but directly his occupation ceases, the thing occupied again becomes common to all. The sea-shore, that is, the shore as far as the waves go at furthest, was considered to belong to all men. For the purposes of self-defence any nation had a right to occupy the shore and to repel strangers. Individuals, if they built on it, by means of piles or otherwise, were secured in exclusive enjoyment of the portion occupied; but if the building was taken away, their occupancy was at an end, and the spot on which the building stood again became common. (D. i. 8. 6.)

2. Flumina autem omnia et portus publica sunt: ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est in portibus fluminibusque.

2. All rivers and ports are public; hence the right of fishing in a port, or in rivers, is common to all men.

D. i. 8. 4. 1; D. xlvii. 10. 13. 7.

The word publicus is sometimes used as equivalent to communis, but is properly used, as here, for what belongs to the people. Things public belong to a particular people, but may be used and enjoyed by all men. Roads, public places, and buildings, might be added to those mentioned in the text. The particular people or nation in whose territory public things lie may permit all the world to make use of them, but exercises a special jurisdiction to prevent any one injuring them. In this light even the shore of the sea was said, though not very strictly, to be a res publica: it is not the property of the particular people whose territory is adjacent to the shore, but it belongs to them to see that none of the uses of the shore are lost by the act of individuals. Celsus says, Litora in quæ populus Romanus imperium habet populi Romani esse arbitror (D. xliii. 8. 3), where, if we are to bring this opinion of Celsus into harmony with the opinions of other jurists, we must understand 'populi Romani esse' to mean 'are subject to the guardianship of the Roman people.'

3. Est autem litus maris, quatenus herbis fluctus maximus excurrit.

3. The sea-shore extends to the limit reached by the greatest winter flood.

D. i. 16. 96.

Celsus ascribes this definition to Cicero, who apparently borrowed it from Aquilius. (Cic. Top. 7.)

4. Riparum quoque usus publicus est juris gentium, sicut ipsius fluminis: itaque navem ad eas appellere, funes ex arboribus ibi natis religare, onus aliquid in his reponere cuilibet liberum est, sicuti per ipsum flumen navigare. Sed proprietates earum illorum est, quorum

4. The public use of the banks of a river is part of the law of nations, just as is that of the river itself. All persons, therefore, are as much at liberty to bring their vessels to the bank, to fasten ropes to the trees growing there, and to place any part of their cargo there, as to navigate the river itself.

Publicus

1. River 2. Port

3. in river 4. in port

5. in river 6. in port

7. in river 8. in port

9. in river 10. in port

11. in river 12. in port

13. in river 14. in port

15. in river 16. in port

17. in river 18. in port

19. in river 20. in port

21. in river 22. in port

23. in river 24. in port

25. in river 26. in port

27. in river 28. in port

29. in river 30. in port

31. in river 32. in port

33. in river 34. in port

35. in river 36. in port

37. in river 38. in port

39. in river 40. in port

41. in river 42. in port

43. in river 44. in port

45. in river 46. in port

47. in river 48. in port

49. in river 50. in port

51. in river 52. in port

53. in river 54. in port

55. in river 56. in port

57. in river 58. in port

59. in river 60. in port

61. in river 62. in port

63. in river 64. in port

65. in river 66. in port

prædiis hærent : qua de causa arbores quoque in iisdem natæ eorundem sunt.

But the banks of a river are the property of those whose land they adjoin ; and consequently the trees growing on them are also the property of the same persons.

D. i. 8. 5.

The banks of rivers belonged to the proprietors of the adjacent lands ; but the use of them, for the purposes of navigation or otherwise, was open to all. The proprietors, therefore, could alone reap the profits of the soil ; but if they attempted to exercise their rights so as to hinder the public use of the bank they would be restrained by an interdict of the prætor. (See Introd. sec. 107.)

5. Litorum quoque usus publicus juris gentium est, sicut ipsius maris : et ob id quibuscumque liberum est, casam ibi imponere, in qua se recipiant, sicut retia siccare et ex mare deducere. Proprietas autem eorum potest intellegi nullius esse, sed ejusdem juris esse, cujus et mare et quæ subjacent mari, terra vel harena.

5. The public use of the sea-shore, too, is part of the law of nations, as is that of the sea itself ; and therefore any person is at liberty to place on it a cottage, to which he may retreat, or to dry his nets there, and haul them from the sea ; for the shores may be said to be the property of no man, but are subject to the same law as the sea itself, and the ground or sand beneath it.

D. i. 8. 5. pr. and 1.

The shores over which the Roman people had power were not the property of the Roman people, although it belonged specially to the Roman people to see that the free use of them was not hindered. (See note to paragraph 2.)

6. Universitatis sunt, non singulorum, veluti quæ in civitatibus sunt theatra, stadia et similia et si quæ alia sunt communia civitatum.

6. Among things belonging to a corporate body, not to individuals, are, for instance, city theatres, race-courses, and other similar places belonging in common to a whole city.

D. i. 8. 6. 1.

Universitas is a corporate body created by the state, such as municipalities or the guilds (collegia) of different trades ; for instance, the collegium pistorum.

Both the state and corporate bodies might have property which they held exactly like individuals ; as, for instance, the agri vectigales, or slaves and lands belonging to a collegium. Such things were not universitatis in the sense in which the words are used here. They were, like the property of individuals, in nostro patrimonio, the state or corporation being looked on as any other owner. But some universitates, such as municipalities, had things which they owned for the use of the public ; and it is these things that are here spoken of as res universitatis.

7. Nullius autem sunt res sacræ et religiosæ et sanctæ : quod enim

7. Things sacred, religious, and hallowed, belong to no one ; for that

Red Nub

prædiis hærent : qua de causa arbores quoque in iisdem natæ eorundem sunt.

But the banks of a river are the property of those whose land they adjoin ; and consequently the trees growing on them are also the property of the same persons.

D. i. 8. 5.

The banks of rivers belonged to the proprietors of the adjacent lands ; but the use of them, for the purposes of navigation or otherwise, was open to all. The proprietors, therefore, could alone reap the profits of the soil ; but if they attempted to exercise their rights so as to hinder the public use of the bank they would be restrained by an interdict of the prætor. (See Introd. sec. 107.)

5. Litorum quoque usus publicus juris gentium est, sicut ipsius maris : et ob id quibuslibet liberum est, casam ibi imponere, in qua se recipiant, sicut retia siccare et ex mare deducere. Proprietas autem eorum potest intellegi nullius esse, sed ejusdem juris esse, cujus et mare et quæ subjacent mari, terra vel harena.

5. The public use of the sea-shore, too, is part of the law of nations, as is that of the sea itself ; and therefore any person is at liberty to place on it a cottage, to which he may retreat, or to dry his nets there, and haul them from the sea ; for the shores may be said to be the property of no man, but are subject to the same law as the sea itself, and the ground or sand beneath it.

D. i. 8. 5. pr. and 1.

The shores over which the Roman people had power were not the property of the Roman people, although it belonged specially to the Roman people to see that the free use of them was not hindered. (See note to paragraph 2.)

6. Universitatis sunt, non singulorum, veluti quæ in civitatibus sunt theatra, stadia et similia et si quæ alia sunt communia civitatum.

6. Among things belonging to a corporate body, not to individuals, are, for instance, city theatres, race-courses, and other similar places belonging in common to a whole city.

D. i. 8. 6. 1.

Universitas is a corporate body created by the state, such as municipalities or the guilds (collegia) of different trades ; for instance, the collegium pistorum.

Both the state and corporate bodies might have property which they held exactly like individuals ; as, for instance, the agri vectigales, or slaves and lands belonging to a collegium. Such things were not universitatis in the sense in which the words are used here. They were, like the property of individuals, in nostro patrimonio, the state or corporation being looked on as any other owner. But some universitates, such as municipalities, had things which they owned for the use of the public ; and it is these things that are here spoken of as res universitatis.

7. Nullius autem sunt res sacræ et religiosæ et sanctæ : quod enim

7. Things sacred, religious, and hallowed, belong to no one ; for that

Red Nullus

divinijuris est, id nullius in bonis est. which is subject to divine law is not the property of any one.

GAL. ii. 9.

Res nullius are either things unappropriated by any one, in which sense things common, or unoccupied lands, or wild animals, are res nullius; or they are things to which a religious character prevents any human right of property attaching.

8. Sacra sunt, quæ rite et per pontifices Deo consecrata sunt, veluti ædes sacræ et dona, quæ rite ad ministerium Dei dedicata sunt, quæ etiam per nostram constitutionem alienari et obligari prohibuimus, excepta causa redemptionis captivorum. Si quis vero auctoritate sua quasi sacrum sibi constituerit, sacrum non est, sed profanum. Locus autem, in quo sacræ ædes ædificatæ sunt, etiam diruto ædificio, adhuc sacer manet, ut et Papinianus scripsit.

8. Things are sacred which have been duly consecrated by the pontiffs, as sacred buildings and offerings, properly dedicated to the service of God, which we have forbidden by our constitution to be sold or mortgaged, except for the purpose of purchasing the freedom of captives. But, if any one by his own authority makes anything as it were sacred to himself, it is not sacred, but profane. But ground on which a sacred edifice has once been erected, continues to be sacred, even after the building has been destroyed, as Papinian also writes.

D. i. 8. 6. 3; C. i. 2, 21.

The distinction between res sacræ and religiosæ, in the older pagan law, was that the former were things dedicated to the celestial gods, the latter were things abandoned to the infernal—relicte diis manibus. (GAL. ii. 4.) In order that a thing should be sacræ, it was necessary that it should be dedicated by a pontiff and with the authority of the people, afterwards of the senate, finally of the emperor. (D. i. 8. 9. 1.) (Things consecrated were by law inalienable.) The support of the poor in a time of famine (C. i. 2. 21), and afterwards the payment of the debts of the church (Nov. 120. 10), sufficed, as well as the release of captives, as reasons for the sale of consecrated moveables; but immoveables were always inalienable.

9. Religiosum locum unusquisque sua voluntate facit, dum mortuum infert in locum suum. In communem autem locum purum invito socio inferre non licet: in commune vero sepulcrum etiam invitis ceteris licet inferre. Item si alienus ususfructus est, proprietarium placet, nisi consentiente usufructuario, locum religiosum non facere. In alienum locum, concedente domino, licet inferre: et licet postea ratum habuerit, quam illatus est mortuus, tamen religiosus locus fit.

9. Any man at his pleasure makes a place religious by burying a dead body in his own ground; but it is not permitted to bury a dead body in land hitherto pure, which is held in common, against the wishes of a coproprietor. But when a sepulchre is held in common, any one coproprietor may bury in it, even against the wishes of the rest. So, too, if another person has the usufruct, the proprietor may not, without the consent of the usufructuary, render the place religious. But a dead body may be laid in a place belonging to another person, with the consent of the owner; and even if the owner only ratifies the act after the dead body has been buried, yet the place is religious.

GAL. ii. 6; D. i. 8. 6. 4; D. xi. 7.

divini juris est, id nullius in bonis est. which is subject to divine law is not the property of any one.

GAL. ii. 9.

Res nullius are either things unappropriated by any one, in which sense things common, or unoccupied lands, or wild animals, are res nullius; or they are things to which a religious character prevents any human right of property attaching.

8. Sacra sunt, quæ rite et per pontifices Deo consecrata sunt, veluti ædes sacræ et dona, quæ rite ad ministerium Dei dedicata sunt, quæ etiam per nostram constitutionem alienari et obligari prohibuimus, excepta causa redemptionis captivorum. Si quis vero auctoritate sua quasi sacrum sibi constituerit, sacrum non est, sed profanum. Locus autem, in quo sacræ ædes ædificatæ sunt, etiam diruto ædificio, adhuc sacer manet, ut et Papinianus scripsit.

8. Things are sacred which have been duly consecrated by the pontiffs, as sacred buildings and offerings, properly dedicated to the service of God, which we have forbidden by our constitution to be sold or mortgaged, except for the purpose of purchasing the freedom of captives. But, if any one by his own authority makes anything as it were sacred to himself, it is not sacred, but profane. But ground on which a sacred edifice has once been erected, continues to be sacred, even after the building has been destroyed, as Papinian also writes.

D. i. 8. 6. 3; C. i. 2, 21.

The distinction between res sacræ and religiosæ, in the older pagan law, was that the former were things dedicated to the celestial gods, the latter were things abandoned to the infernal—relicte diis manibus. (GAL. ii. 4.) In order that a thing should be sacræ, it was necessary that it should be dedicated by a pontiff and with the authority of the people, afterwards of the senate, finally of the emperor. (D. i. 8. 9. 1.) (Things consecrated were by law inalienable.) The support of the poor in a time of famine (C. i. 2. 21), and afterwards the payment of the debts of the church (Nov. 120. 10), sufficed, as well as the release of captives, as reasons for the sale of consecrated moveables; but immoveables were always inalienable.

9. Religiosum locum unusquisque sua voluntate facit, dum mortuum infert in locum suum. In communem autem locum purum invito socio inferre non licet: in commune vero sepulcrum etiam invitis ceteris licet inferre. Item si alienus ususfructus est, proprietarium placet, nisi consentiente usufructuario, locum religiosum non facere. In alienum locum, concedente domino, licet inferre: et licet postea ratum habuerit, quam illatus est mortuus, tamen religiosus locus fit.

9. Any man at his pleasure makes a place religious by burying a dead body in his own ground; but it is not permitted to bury a dead body in land hitherto pure, which is held in common, against the wishes of a coproprietor. But when a sepulchre is held in common, any one coproprietor may bury in it, even against the wishes of the rest. So, too, if another person has the usufruct, the proprietor may not, without the consent of the usufructuary, render the place religious. But a dead body may be laid in a place belonging to another person, with the consent of the owner; and even if the owner only ratifies the act after the dead body has been buried, yet the place is religious.

GAL. ii. 6; D. i. 8. 6. 4; D. xi. 7.

Directly the body or bones of a dead person, whether slave or free, were buried, the ground in which they were buried became religiosus, although previously pure, that is, neither sacer, religiosus, nor sanctus (D. xi. 7. 2. 4), provided that the person burying the body was the owner of the soil or had the consent of the owner.

Although the place was a res nullius, yet there could be a special kind of property in it. There were tombs and burial-places in which none but certain persons, as, for instance, members of the same family, could be buried; and this kind of interest in a locus religiosus was transmissible to heirs, or even to purchasers of a property, if the right of burying in a particular place was attached, as it might be, to the ownership of that property. (D. xviii. 1. 24.)

10. Sanctæ quoque res, veluti muri et portæ, quodammodo divini juris sunt et ideo nullius in bonis sunt. Ideo autem muros sanctos dicimus, quia pœna capitis constituta sit in eos, qui aliquid in muros deliquerint. Ideo et legum eas partes, quibus pœnas constituimus adversus eos, qui contra leges fecerint, sanctiones vocamus.

10. Hallowed things also, as the walls and gates of a city, are to a certain degree subject to divine law, and therefore are not part of the property of any one. The walls of a city are said to be hallowed, inasmuch as any offence against them is punished capitally; so, too, those parts of laws by which punishments are established against transgressors, we term sanctiones.

GAI. ii. 8; D. i. 8. 8; D. i. 8. 9. 3; D. i. 8. 11.

Res sanctæ are those things which, without being sacred, are protected against the injuries of men (sanctum est quod ab injuria hominum defensum atque munitum est, D. i. 8. 8) by having a severe penalty attached to the violation of their security.

11. Singulorum autem hominum multis modis res fiunt: quarundam enim rerum dominium nanciscimur jure naturali, quod, sicut diximus, appellatur jus gentium, quarundam jure civili. Commodius est itaque a vetustiore jure incipere. Palam est autem, vetustius esse naturale jus, quod cum ipso genere humano rerum natura prodidit: civilia enim jura tunc cœperunt esse, cum et civitates condi et magistratus creari et leges scribi cœperunt.

11. Things become the property of individuals in various ways; of some we acquire the ownership by natural law, which, as we have observed, is termed the law of nations; of others by the civil law. It will be most convenient to begin with the more ancient law; and it is very evident that the law of nature, established by nature at the origin of mankind, is the more ancient, for civil laws could then only begin to exist, when states began to be founded, magistrates to be created, and laws to be written.

D. xli. 1. 1.

We now proceed to inquire how property is acquired in particular things. It is acquired either by natural or civil modes. The natural mode first treated of is occupation, of which there are two essential elements; that the thing, the property in which is acquired, should be a res nullius, that is, a thing capable of being appropriated, but not yet appropriated and that the person acquiring it should bring the thing into his possession, that is, into his

Directly the body or bones of a dead person, whether slave or free, were buried, the ground in which they were buried became religiosus, although previously pure, that is, neither sacer, religiosus, nor sanctus (D. xi. 7. 2. 4), provided that the person burying the body was the owner of the soil or had the consent of the owner.

Although the place was a res nullius, yet there could be a special kind of property in it. There were tombs and burial-places in which none but certain persons, as, for instance, members of the same family, could be buried; and this kind of interest in a locus religiosus was transmissible to heirs, or even to purchasers of a property, if the right of burying in a particular place was attached, as it might be, to the ownership of that property. (D. xviii. 1. 24.)

10. Sanctæ quoque res, veluti muri et portæ, quodammodo divini juris sunt et ideo nullius in bonis sunt. Ideo autem muros sanctos dicimus, quia pœna capitis constituta sit in eos, qui aliquid in muros deliquerint. Ideo et legum eas partes, quibus pœnas constituimus adversus eos, qui contra leges fecerint, sanctiones vocamus.

10. Hallowed things also, as the walls and gates of a city, are to a certain degree subject to divine law, and therefore are not part of the property of any one. The walls of a city are said to be hallowed, inasmuch as any offence against them is punished capitally; so, too, those parts of laws by which punishments are established against transgressors, we term sanctiones.

GAI. ii. 8; D. i. 8. 8; D. i. 8. 9. 3; D. i. 8. 11.

Res sanctæ are those things which, without being sacred, are protected against the injuries of men (sanctum est quod ab injuria hominum defensum atque munitum est, D. i. 8. 8) by having a severe penalty attached to the violation of their security.

11. Singulorum autem hominum multis modis res fiunt: quarundam enim rerum dominium nanciscimur jure naturali, quod, sicut diximus, appellatur jus gentium, quarundam jure civili. Commodius est itaque a vetustiore jure incipere. Palam est autem, vetustius esse naturale jus, quod cum ipso genere humano rerum natura prodidit: civilia enim jura tunc cœperunt esse, cum et civitates condi et magistratus creari et leges scribi cœperunt.

11. Things become the property of individuals in various ways; of some we acquire the ownership by natural law, which, as we have observed, is termed the law of nations; of others by the civil law. It will be most convenient to begin with the more ancient law; and it is very evident that the law of nature, established by nature at the origin of mankind, is the more ancient, for civil laws could then only begin to exist, when states began to be founded, magistrates to be created, and laws to be written.

D. xli. 1. 1.

We now proceed to inquire how property is acquired in particular things. It is acquired either by natural or civil modes. The natural mode first treated of is occupation, of which there are two essential elements; that the thing, the property in which is acquired, should be a res nullius, that is, (a thing capable of being appropriated, but not yet appropriated) and (that the person acquiring it should bring the thing into his possession, that is, into his power, and do so with the intention of holding it as his property) (pro suo habendi).

12. Feræ igitur bestię et volucres et pisces, id est omnia animalia, quę in terra mari cęlo nascuntur, simul atque ab aliquo capta fuerint, jure gentium statim illius esse incipiunt: quod enim ante nullius est, id naturali ratione occupanti conceditur. Nec interest, feras bestias et volucres utrum in suo fundo quisque capiat, an in alieno: plane qui in alienum fundum ingreditur venandi aut aucupandi gratia, potest a domino, si is providerit, prohiberi, ne ingrediat. Quidquid autem eorum ceperis, eo usque tuum esse intellegitur, donec tua custodia coercetur: cum vero evaserit custodiam tuam et in naturalem libertatem se receperit, tuum esse desinit et rursus occupantis fit. Naturalem autem libertatem recipere intellegitur, cum vel oculos tuos effugerit vel ita sit in conspectu tuo, ut difficilis sit ejus persecutio.

12. Wild beasts, birds, fish, that is, all animals, which live either in the sea, the air, or on the earth, so soon as they are taken by any one, immediately become by the law of nations the property of the captor; for natural reason gives to the first occupant that which had no previous owner. And it is immaterial whether a man takes wild beasts or birds upon his own ground, or on that of another. Of course any one who enters the ground of another for the sake of hunting or fowling, may be prohibited by the proprietor, if he perceives his intention of entering. Whatever of this kind you take is regarded as your property, so long as it remains in your keeping, (but when it has escaped and recovered its natural liberty, it ceases to be yours,) and again becomes the property of him who captures it. It is considered to have recovered its natural liberty, if it has either escaped out of your sight, or if, although not out of sight, it yet could not be pursued without great difficulty.

Gar. ii. 67; D. xli. 1. 1. 1; D. xli. 1. 3 pr. and 1; D. xli. 1. 3. 2; D. xli. 1. 5.

Directly the thing ceases to be in the power of the occupant, the property in it is lost, and it is exactly as if it had never been seized or occupied. What is meant by being in the power of the occupant must vary according to the nature of the thing occupied. Several examples are given in this and the following paragraphs.

13. Illud quęsitum est, an, si fera bestia ita vulnerata sit, ut capi possit, statim tua esse intellegatur. Quibusdam placuit, statim tuam esse et eo usque tuam videri, donec eam persequaris; quod si desieris persequi, desinere tuam esse et rursus fieri occupantis. Alii non aliter putaverunt tuam esse, quam si ceperis. Sed posteriorem sententiam nos confirmamus, quia multa accidere solent, ut eam non capias.

13. It has been asked, whether, if you have wounded a wild beast, so that it could be easily taken, it immediately becomes your property. Some have thought that it does become yours directly you wound it, and that it continues to be yours while you continue to pursue it, but that if you cease to pursue it, it then ceases to be yours, and again becomes the property of the first person who captures it. Others have thought that it does not become your property until you have captured it. We confirm this latter opinion, because many accidents may happen to prevent your capturing it.

D. xli. 1. 5. 1.

Gaius, in this passage of the Digest, informs us that the former opinion was that of Trebatius.

power, and do so with the intention of holding it as his property) (pro suo habendi).

12. Feræ igitur bestię et volucres et pisces, id est omnia animalia, quę in terra mari cęlo nascuntur, simul atque ab aliquo capta fuerint, jure gentium statim illius esse incipiunt: quod enim ante nullius est, id naturali ratione occupanti conceditur. Nec interest, feras bestias et volucres utrum in suo fundo quisque capiat, an in alieno: plane qui in alienum fundum ingreditur venandi aut aucupandi gratia, potest a domino, si is providerit, prohiberi, ne ingrediatur. Quidquid autem eorum ceperis, eo usque tuum esse intelligitur, donec tua custodia coercetur: cum vero evaserit custodiam tuam et in naturalem libertatem se receperit, tuum esse desinit et rursus occupantis fit. Naturalem autem libertatem recipere intelligitur, cum vel oculos tuos effugerit vel ita sit in conspectu tuo, ut difficilis sit ejus persecutio.

12. Wild beasts, birds, fish, that is, all animals, which live either in the sea, the air, or on the earth, so soon as they are taken by any one, immediately become by the law of nations the property of the captor; for natural reason gives to the first occupant that which had no previous owner. And it is immaterial whether a man takes wild beasts or birds upon his own ground, or on that of another. Of course any one who enters the ground of another for the sake of hunting or fowling, may be prohibited by the proprietor, if he perceives his intention of entering. Whatever of this kind you take is regarded as your property, so long as it remains in your keeping, (but when it has escaped and recovered its natural liberty, it ceases to be yours,) and again becomes the property of him who captures it. It is considered to have recovered its natural liberty, if it has either escaped out of your sight, or if, although not out of sight, it yet could not be pursued without great difficulty.

Gai. ii. 67; D. xli. 1. 1. 1; D. xli. 1. 3 pr. and 1; D. xli. 1. 3. 2; D. xli. 1. 5.

Directly the thing ceases to be in the power of the occupant, the property in it is lost, and it is exactly as if it had never been seized or occupied. What is meant by being in the power of the occupant must vary according to the nature of the thing occupied. Several examples are given in this and the following paragraphs.

13. Illud quęsitum est, an, si fera bestia ita vulnerata sit, ut capi possit, statim tua esse intelligatur. Quibusdam placuit, statim tuam esse et eo usque tuam videri, donec eam persequaris; quod si desieris persequi, desinere tuam esse et rursus fieri occupantis. Alii non aliter putaverunt tuam esse, quam si ceperis. Sed posteriorem sententiam nos confirmamus, quia multa accidere solent, ut eam non capias.

13. It has been asked, whether, if you have wounded a wild beast, so that it could be easily taken, it immediately becomes your property. Some have thought that it does become yours directly you wound it, and that it continues to be yours while you continue to pursue it, but that if you cease to pursue it, it then ceases to be yours, and again becomes the property of the first person who captures it. Others have thought that it does not become your property until you have captured it. We confirm this latter opinion, because many accidents may happen to prevent your capturing it.

D. xli. 1. 5. 1.

Gaius, in this passage of the Digest, informs us that the former opinion was that of Trebatius.

1700

14. Apium quoque natura fera est. Itaque quæ in arbore tua consederint, antequam a te alveo includantur, non magis tuæ esse intelliguntur, quam volucres, quæ in tua arbore nidum fecerint: ideoque si alius eas incluserit, is earum dominus erit. Favos quoque si quos hæ fecerint, quilibet eximere potest. Plane integra re, si provideris ingredientem in fundum tuum, potes eum jure prohibere, ne ingrediatur. Examen, quod ex alveo tuo evolaverit, eo usque tuum esse intellegitur, donec in conspectu tuo est nec difficilis ejus persecutio est: alioquin occupantis fit.

14. Bees also are wild by nature. Therefore, bees that swarm upon your tree, until you have hived them, are no more considered to be your property than the birds which build their nests on your tree; so if anyone else hives them he becomes their owner. Any one, too, is at liberty to take the honeycombs the bees may have made. But of course, if, before anything has been taken, you see any one entering on your land, you have a right to prevent his entering. A swarm which has flown from your hive is still considered yours as long as it is in your sight and may easily be pursued; otherwise it becomes the property of the first person that takes it.

D. xli. 1. 5. 2-4.

It is said that the owner of the land, if he wished to secure the bees for himself, must prevent any one entering integra re; because if the bees are once taken, they belong to the person who takes them, although the owner of the land may have an action against the person entering against his will.

15. Pavonum et columbarum fera natura est. Nec ad rem pertinet, quod ex consuetudine avolare et revolare solent: nam et apes idem faciunt, quarum constat feram esse naturam: cervos quoque ita quidam mansuetos habent, ut in silvas ire et redire soleant, quorum et ipsorum feram esse naturam nemo negat. In his autem animalibus, quæ ex consuetudine abire et redire solent, talis regula comprobata est, ut eo usque tua esse intellegantur, donec animum revertendi habeant: nam si revertendi animum habere desierint, etiam tua esse desinunt et fiunt occupantium. Revertendi autem animum videntur desinere habere, cum revertendi consuetudinem deseruerint.

15. Peacocks, too, and pigeons are naturally wild; nor does it make any difference that they are in the habit of flying out and then returning again, for bees, which without doubt are naturally wild, do so too. Some persons have deer so tame, that they will go into the woods, and regularly return again; yet no one denies that deer are naturally wild. But, with respect to animals which are in the habit of going and returning, the rule has been adopted, that they are considered yours as long as they have the intention of returning, but if they cease to have this intention, they cease to be yours, and become the property of the first person that takes them. These animals are supposed to have lost the intention, when they have lost the habit of returning.

GAI. II. 68; D. xli. 1. 55.

16. Gallinarum et anserum non est fera natura; idque ex eo possimus intellegere, quod aliæ sunt gallinæ, quas feras vocamus, item alii anseres, quos feros appellamus. Ideoque si anseres tui aut gallinæ tuæ aliquo casu turbati turbatæve evolaverint, licet conspectum tuum effugerint, quocumque tamen loco

16. But fowls and geese are not naturally wild, which we may learn from there being particular kinds of fowls and geese which we term wild. And therefore, if your geese or fowls should be frightened, and take flight, they are still regarded as yours wherever they may be, although you may have lost sight of them; and whoever

14. Apium quoque natura fera est. Itaque quæ in arbore tua considerint, antequam a te alveo includantur, non magis tuæ esse intelliguntur, quam volucres, quæ in tua arbore nidum fecerint: ideoque si alius eas incluserit, is earum dominus erit. Favos quoque si quos hæ fecerint, quilibet eximere potest. Plane integra re, si provideris ingredientem in fundum tuum, potes eum jure prohibere, ne ingrediatur. Examen, quod ex alveo tuo evolaverit, eo usque tuum esse intellegitur, donec in conspectu tuo est nec difficilis ejus persecutio est: alioquin occupantis fit.

14. Bees also are wild by nature. Therefore, bees that swarm upon your tree, until you have hived them, are no more considered to be your property than the birds which build their nests on your tree; so if anyone else hives them he becomes their owner. Any one, too, is at liberty to take the honeycombs the bees may have made. But of course, if, before anything has been taken, you see any one entering on your land, you have a right to prevent his entering. A swarm which has flown from your hive is still considered yours as long as it is in your sight and may easily be pursued; otherwise it becomes the property of the first person that takes it.

D. xli. 1. 5. 2-4.

It is said that the owner of the land, if he wished to secure the bees for himself, must prevent any one entering integra re; because if the bees are once taken, they belong to the person who takes them, although the owner of the land may have an action against the person entering against his will.

15. Pavonum et columbarum fera natura est. Nec ad rem pertinet, quod ex consuetudine avolare et revolare solent: nam et apes idem faciunt, quarum constat feram esse naturam: cervos quoque ita quidam mansuetos habent, ut in silvas ire et redire soleant, quorum et ipsorum feram esse naturam nemo negat. In his autem animalibus, quæ ex consuetudine abire et redire solent, talis regula comprobata est, ut eo usque tua esse intellegantur, donec animum revertendi habeant: nam si revertendi animum habere desiderint, etiam tua esse desinunt et fiunt occupantium. Revertendi autem animum videntur desinere habere, cum revertendi consuetudinem deseruerint.

15. Peacocks, too, and pigeons are naturally wild; nor does it make any difference that they are in the habit of flying out and then returning again, for bees, which without doubt are naturally wild, do so too. Some persons have deer so tame, that they will go into the woods, and regularly return again; yet no one denies that deer are naturally wild. But, with respect to animals which are in the habit of going and returning, the rule has been adopted, that they are considered yours as long as they have the intention of returning, but if they cease to have this intention, they cease to be yours, and become the property of the first person that takes them. These animals are supposed to have lost the intention, when they have lost the habit of returning.

GAI. II. 68; D. xli. 1. 55.

16. Gallinarum et anserum non est fera natura; idque ex eo possunt intellegere, quod aliæ sunt gallinæ, quas feras vocamus, item alii anseres, quos feros appellamus. Ideoque si anseres tui aut gallinæ tuæ aliquo casu turbati turbatæve evolaverint, licet conspectum tuum effugerint, quocumque tamen loco

16. But fowls and geese are not naturally wild, which we may learn from there being particular kinds of fowls and geese which we term wild. And therefore, if your geese or fowls should be frightened, and take flight, they are still regarded as yours wherever they may be, although you may have lost sight of them; and whoever sint, tui tuæve esse intelleguntur: et qui lucrando animo ea animalia retinet, furtum committere intellegitur.

detains such animals with a view to his own profit, commits a theft.

D. xli. 1. 5. 6.

17. Item ea, quæ ex hostibus capimus, jure gentium statim nostra fiunt: adeo quidem, ut et liberi homines in servitutem nostram deducantur, qui tamen, si evaserint nostram potestatem et ad suos reversi fuerint, pristinum statum recipiunt.

17. The things we take from our enemies become immediately ours by the law of nations, so that even free-men thus become our slaves; but if they afterwards escape from us, and return to their own people, they regain their former condition.

GAL. ii. 69; D. xli. 1. 5. 7; D. xli. 1. 7. pr.

The moveables of an enemy were always looked on as res nullius; the first person who took them became the owner. Practically, of course, things taken in war did not belong to the particular soldier who took them, unless in very exceptional cases, because he took them as one of a large body, who by their exertions all contributed, directly or indirectly, to the capture. The army, again, did but represent the state; and though moveables were generally given up to the soldiers and divided among them, land taken in war was claimed by the state, whose servants the soldiers were and in whose behalf they fought.

Just as the freeman, who had been made a prisoner and a slave, regained his status when he returned to his own country by the jus postliminii (see Bk. i. Tit. 12. 5), so everything that returned to its former state of being free from any owner, was said to do so by a process analogous to the jus postliminii. Marcian, for example, speaks in the Digest (i. 8. 6. pr.) of a person building on a shore, and, after having said that the soil is only his while the building remains, goes on, alioquin ædificio dilapso, quasi jure postliminii revertitur locus in pristinam causam.

We have no mention here, which we might expect to have, of the mode by which things retaken in war returned to their owners, nor what things did so return. We know that the things that did return were said to do so by postliminium; Pomponius says, quum due species postliminii sint, ut aut nos revertamur aut aliquid recipiamus. (D. xlix. 15. 14.) Generally speaking, if the property of individuals was captured by an enemy and retaken, it was præda, that is, was part of the spoil of war, and belonged to the state, not to its former owner. But there were certain things to which a jus postliminii attached, and which, if retaken, reverted to their original owner, and did not form part of the præda. These things, so far as we know them, were land, slaves, horses, mules, and ships used in war. (Cic. Top. 8; D. xlix. 15. 2.)

18. Item lapilli, gemmæ et cætera, quæ in litore inveniuntur, jure naturali statim inventoris fiunt.

18. Precious stones, too, gems, and other things, found upon the sea-shore, become immediately by natural law the property of the finder.

D. i. 8. 3.

sint, tui tuæve esse intelleguntur: et qui lucrando animo ea animalia retinet, furtum committere intellegitur.

detains such animals with a view to his own profit, commits a theft.

D. xli. 1. 5. 6.

17. Item ea, quæ ex hostibus capimus, jure gentium statim nostra fiunt: adeo quidem, ut et liberi homines in servitutem nostram deducantur, qui tamen, si evaserint nostram potestatem et ad suos reversi fuerint, pristinum statum recipiunt.

17. The things we take from our enemies become immediately ours by the law of nations, so that even free-men thus become our slaves; but if they afterwards escape from us, and return to their own people, they regain their former condition.

GAL. ii. 69; D. xli. 1. 5. 7; D. xli. 1. 7. pr.

The moveables of an enemy were always looked on as res nullius; the first person who took them became the owner. Practically, of course, things taken in war did not belong to the particular soldier who took them, unless in very exceptional cases, because he took them as one of a large body, who by their exertions all contributed, directly or indirectly, to the capture. The army, again, did but represent the state; and though moveables were generally given up to the soldiers and divided among them, land taken in war was claimed by the state, whose servants the soldiers were and in whose behalf they fought.

Just as the freeman, who had been made a prisoner and a slave, regained his status when he returned to his own country by the jus postliminii (see Bk. i. Tit. 12. 5), so everything that returned to its former state of being free from any owner, was said to do so by a process analogous to the jus postliminii. Marcian, for example, speaks in the Digest (i. 8. 6. pr.) of a person building on a shore, and, after having said that the soil is only his while the building remains, goes on, alioquin ædificio dilapso, quasi jure postliminii revertitur locus in pristinam causam.

We have no mention here, which we might expect to have, of the mode by which things retaken in war returned to their owners, nor what things did so return. We know that the things that did return were said to do so by postliminium; Pomponius says, quum duæ species postliminii sint, ut aut nos revertamur aut aliquid recipiamus. (D. xlix. 15. 14.) Generally speaking, if the property of individuals was captured by an enemy and retaken, it was præda, that is, was part of the spoil of war, and belonged to the state, not to its former owner. But there were certain things to which a jus postliminii attached, and which, if retaken, reverted to their original owner, and did not form part of the præda. These things, so far as we know them, were land, slaves, horses, mules, and ships used in war. (Cic. Top. 8; D. xlix. 15. 2.)

18. Item lapilli, gemmæ et cætera, quæ in litore inveniuntur, jure naturali statim inventoris fiunt.

18. Precious stones, too, gems, and other things, found upon the sea-shore, become immediately by natural law the property of the finder.

D. i. 8. 3.

In the next section Justinian leaves the subject of acquisition by occupation, but afterwards speaks of matters that properly belong to it, of islands rising in the sea (paragr. 22), and things found which have been intentionally abandoned by their owners (paragr. 47, 48).

19. Item ea, quæ ex animalibus dominio tuo subjectis nata sunt, eodem jure tibi adquiruntur.

19. So, too, all the offspring of animals of which you are the owner, become by the same law your property.

D. xli. 1. 6.

From the 19th to the 37th paragraph inclusive, may be taken together as bearing more or less on the subject of accession. The Latin word accessio always means an increase or addition to something previously belonging to us, but commentators have used the word accession not only for the increase itself, but also for the mode in which the increase becomes our property.

I First, there is the instance given in this section and in the 35th section of the produce of animals and the fruits of lands belonging to us. They are really part of that which originally belonged to us. The owner of the wheat-seed is potentially the owner of the blade and the ear; the owner of the animal is potentially the owner of its young.

II Again, a thing may be an accessio, an actual gain or increase to our property, which was in theory of law, but not in fact, ours already. This is the case with an island in a river, an instance given in paragraph 22. The bed of the river becomes publicus by the mere fact of the river flowing over it; if any portion of the bed is dried so as to form an island, that portion ceases to be public, and, becoming private, is presumed to be a part of the adjacent land. It is something not newly acquired, but restored to us by nature; we have been temporarily deprived of it, and again resume our rights over it.

III Again, a person who uses materials sometimes only gives them a new form, sometimes makes with them a new thing, different from the materials themselves. When he does the latter, the thing he makes, the nova species, as the jurists termed it, becomes his by the fact of his making it. The thing did not exist, and he has made it to exist, and it belongs to him by a title not dissimilar to that of occupation: it is a new thing, which he is the first to get into his power. To take an instance given in paragraph 25, a man who makes wine out of another's grapes has made something new of a kind distinct from the grapes themselves, and the wine belongs to him. This specification may be, perhaps, regarded as a distinct mode of acquisition.

IV Again, when two things belonging to different owners are united so as to become integral portions of a common whole, but one portion is subordinate and inferior to the other, we have to ask whether the owner of the greater became the owner of the less. The Roman jurists answered this by asking whether the

In the next section Justinian leaves the subject of acquisition by occupation, but afterwards speaks of matters that properly belong to it, of islands rising in the sea (paragr. 22), and things found which have been intentionally abandoned by their owners (paragr. 47, 48).

19. Item ea, quæ ex animalibus
dominio tuo subjectis nata sunt,
eodem jure tibi adquiruntur.

19. So, too, all the offspring of animals of which you are the owner, become by the same law your property.

D. xli. l. 6.

From the 19th to the 37th paragraph inclusive, may be taken together as bearing more or less on the subject of accession. The Latin word accessio always means an increase or addition to something previously belonging to us, but commentators have used the word accession not only for the increase itself, but also for the mode in which the increase becomes our property.

I First, there is the instance given in this section and in the 35th section of the produce of animals and the fruits of lands belonging to us. They are really part of that which originally belonged to us. The owner of the wheat-seed is potentially the owner of the blade and the ear; the owner of the animal is potentially the owner of its young.

II Again, a thing may be an accessio, an actual gain or increase to our property, which was in theory of law, but not in fact, ours already. This is the case with an island in a river, an instance given in paragraph 22. The bed of the river becomes publicus by the mere fact of the river flowing over it; if any portion of the bed is dried so as to form an island, that portion ceases to be public, and, becoming private, is presumed to be a part of the adjacent land. It is something not newly acquired, but restored to us by nature; we have been temporarily deprived of it, and again resume our rights over it.

III Again, a person who uses materials sometimes only gives them a new form, sometimes makes with them a new thing, different from the materials themselves. When he does the latter, the thing he makes, the nova species, as the jurists termed it, becomes his by the fact of his making it. The thing did not exist, and he has made it to exist, and it belongs to him by a title not dissimilar to that of occupation: it is a new thing, which he is the first to get into his power. To take an instance given in paragraph 25, a man who makes wine out of another's grapes has made something new of a kind distinct from the grapes themselves, and the wine belongs to him. This specification may be, perhaps, regarded as a distinct mode of acquisition.

IV Again, when two things belonging to different owners are united so as to become integral portions of a common whole, but one portion is subordinate and inferior to the other, we have to ask whether the owner of the greater became the owner of the less. The Roman jurists answered this by asking whether the two things could after their union be separated from each other. If this was physically possible, each owner of the respective portions continued to be owner; but if not, the owner of the more important or principal thing became the owner of the less important or accessory thing, for which he gave compensation.

20. Præterea quod per alluvionem agro tuo flumen adjecit, jure gentium tibi acquiritur. Est autem alluvio incrementum latens. Per alluvionem autem id videtur adjici, quod ita paulatim adjicitur, ut intellegere non possis, quantum quoquo momento temporis adjiciatur.

20. Moreover, the alluvial soil added by a river to your land becomes yours by the law of nations. Alluvion is an imperceptible increase; and that is added by alluvion, which is added so gradually that no one can perceive how much is added at any one moment of time.

GAI. ii. 70; D. xli. 1. 7. 1.

The deposit of earth gradually formed by alluvion upon the bank of a river is inseparable from the native soil of the bank; and the owner of the latter acquires the former by right of accession.

An exception was made in the case of agri limitati, that is, lands belonging to the state by right of conquest, and granted or sold in plots. If these plots were enlarged by alluvion, the increase did not become the property of the owner of the plot. (D. xli. 1. 16; xliii. 12. 1. 6.) The reason seems to be that the particles deposited by alluvion were considered public as forming portion of the current of the stream, the waters of which were public, and when these particles were deposited by the side of a plot granted or sold by the state, they were not allowed to enlarge the plot of which the state had already determined the proper size.

21. Quodsi vis fluminis partem aliquam ex tuo prædio detraxerit et vicini prædio appulerit, palam est eam tuam permanere. Plane si longiore tempore fundo vicini hæserit arboresque, quas secum traxerit, in eum fundum radices egerint, ex eo tempore videntur vicini fundo acquisitæ esse.

21. But if the violence of a river should bear away a portion of your land, and unite it to that of your neighbour, it undoubtedly still continues yours. If, however, it remains for a long time united to your neighbour's land, and the trees, which it swept away with it, take root in his ground, these trees from that time become part of your neighbour's estate.

GAI. ii. 71; D. xli. 1. 7. 2.

When a large mass of earth is carried to the side of a river bank, it is quite possible to detach it, and consequently the mass remains the property of its former owner; but if it becomes inseparable in the manner described in the text, then the property in it is changed.

Videntur acquisitæ (for which is found videtur acquisita in the Digest (Florentine MS.)) includes the trees themselves as well as the soil of the fragment.

22. Insula, quæ in mari nata est, quod raro accidit, occupantis fit: nullius enim esse creditur. At in

22. When an island is formed in the sea, which rarely happens, it is the property of the first occupant;

Island in sea - property of 1st occupant

Island in river - property of 1st occupant

two things could after their union be separated from each other. If this was physically possible, each owner of the respective portions continued to be owner; but if not, the owner of the more important or principal thing became the owner of the less important or accessory thing, for which he gave compensation.

20. Præterea quod per alluvionem agro tuo flumen adjecit, jure gentium tibi acquiritur. Est autem alluvio incrementum latens. Per alluvionem autem id videtur adjici, quod ita paulatim adjicitur, ut intellegere non possis, quantum quoquo momento temporis adjiciatur.

20. Moreover, the alluvial soil added by a river to your land becomes yours by the law of nations. Alluvion is an imperceptible increase; and that is added by alluvion, which is added so gradually that no one can perceive how much is added at any one moment of time.

GAI. ii. 70; D. xli. 1. 7. 1.

The deposit of earth gradually formed by alluvion upon the bank of a river is inseparable from the native soil of the bank; and the owner of the latter acquires the former by right of accession.

An exception was made in the case of agri limitati, that is, lands belonging to the state by right of conquest, and granted or sold in plots. If these plots were enlarged by alluvion, the increase did not become the property of the owner of the plot. (D. xli. 1. 16; xliii. 12. 1. 6.) The reason seems to be that the particles deposited by alluvion were considered public as forming portion of the current of the stream, the waters of which were public, and when these particles were deposited by the side of a plot granted or sold by the state, they were not allowed to enlarge the plot of which the state had already determined the proper size.

21. Quodsi vis fluminis partem aliquam ex tuo prædio detraxerit et vicini prædio appulerit, palam est eam tuam permanere. Plane si longiore tempore fundo vicini hæserit arboresque, quas secum traxerit, in eum fundum radices egerint, ex eo tempore videntur vicini fundo adquisitæ esse.

21. But if the violence of a river should bear away a portion of your land, and unite it to that of your neighbour, it undoubtedly still continues yours. If, however, it remains for a long time united to your neighbour's land, and the trees, which it swept away with it, take root in his ground, these trees from that time become part of your neighbour's estate.

GAI. ii. 71; D. xli. 1. 7. 2.

When a large mass of earth is carried to the side of a river bank, it is quite possible to detach it, and consequently the mass remains the property of its former owner; but if it becomes inseparable in the manner described in the text, then the property in it is changed.

Videntur acquisitæ (for which is found videtur acquisita in the Digest (Florentine MS.)) includes the trees themselves as well as the soil of the fragment.

22. Insula, quæ in mari nata est, quod raro accidit, occupantis fit: nullius enim esse creditur. At in

22. When an island is formed in the sea, which rarely happens, it is the property of the first occupant;

Island in sea - property of 1st occupant

Island in sea - property of 1st occupant

flumine nata, quod frequenter accidit, si quidem mediam partem fluminis teneat, communis est eorum, qui ab utraque parte fluminis prope ripam prædia possident, pro modo latitudinis cujusque fundi, quæ latitudo prope ripam sit. Quodsi alteri parti proximior sit, eorum est tantum, qui ab ea parte prope ripam prædia possident. Quodsi aliqua parte divisum flumen, deinde infra unitum agrum alicujus in formam insulæ redegerit, ejusdem permanet is ager, cujus et fuerat.

for before occupation it belongs to no one. But when an island is formed in a river, which frequently happens, then if it occupies the middle of the river, it belongs respectively to those who possess the lands near the banks on each side of the river, in proportion to the extent along the banks of each man's estate. But if the island is nearer to one side than the other, it belongs to those persons only who possess lands contiguous to the bank on that side. But if a river divides itself at a certain point, and lower down unites again, thus giving to any one's land the form of an island, the land still continues to belong to the person to whom it belonged before.

GAL. ii. 72; D. xli. 1. 7. 3, 4.

An island formed by a stream cutting off a portion of land could not be supposed to belong to any one but its former owner. But if the island was formed by the bed of the river becoming dry in any part, it might be doubtful to whom it belonged. The bed of the river, as long as the river flowed over it, was public. Ille alveus quem sibi flumen fecit, et si privatus antea fuit, incipit tamen esse publicus (D. xliii. 12. 1. 7); or rather the use of it was public, while the soil itself was the property of the private individuals to whom the soil of the banks belonged, and therefore when the bed was dried, when it had ceased to be subject to public use, the private owners resumed their respective rights of ownership over it. Quum exsiccatus esset alveus, proximorum fit, quia jam populus eo non utitur. (D. xli. 1. 30. 1.) If the bed was not wholly but partially dried, the island formed would belong to the owner of the nearest bank, if it lay entirely on one side of the stream; or if it lay partly on one side and partly on the other, it would belong to the owners of both banks in such proportion as a line drawn along the middle of the stream would divide it.

23. Quodsi naturali alveo in universum derelicto alia parte fluere cœperit, prior quidem alveus eorum est, qui prope ripam ejus prædia possident, pro modo scilicet latitudinis cujusque agri, quæ latitudo prope ripam sit; novus autem alveus ejus juris esse incipit, cujus et ipsum flumen, id est publici. Quodsi post aliquod tempus ad priorem alveum reversum fuerit flumen, rursus novus alveus eorum esse incipit, qui prope ripam ejus prædia possident.

23. If a river, entirely forsaking its natural channel, begins to flow in another direction, the old bed of the river belongs to those who possess the lands adjoining its banks, in proportion to the extent along the banks of their respective estates. The new bed follows the condition of the river, that is, it becomes public. And, if after some time the river returns to its former channel, the new bed again becomes the property of those who possess the lands along its banks.

D. xli. 1. 7. 5.

It might happen that the soil over which the river flowed was known to have belonged to a different person, and not to the

flumine nata, quod frequenter accidit, si quidem mediam partem fluminis teneat, communis est eorum, qui ab utraque parte fluminis prope ripam prædia possident, pro modo latitudinis cujusque fundi, quæ latitudo prope ripam sit. Quodsi alteri parti proximior sit, eorum est tantum, qui ab ea parte prope ripam prædia possident. Quodsi aliqua parte divisum flumen, deinde infra unitum agrum alicujus in formam insulæ redegerit, ejusdem permanet is ager, cujus et fuerat.

for before occupation it belongs to no one. But when an island is formed in a river, which frequently happens, then if it occupies the middle of the river, it belongs respectively to those who possess the lands near the banks on each side of the river, in proportion to the extent along the banks of each man's estate. But if the island is nearer to one side than the other, it belongs to those persons only who possess lands contiguous to the bank on that side. But if a river divides itself at a certain point, and lower down unites again, thus giving to any one's land the form of an island, the land still continues to belong to the person to whom it belonged before.

GAL. ii. 72; D. xli. 1. 7. 3, 4.

An island formed by a stream cutting off a portion of land could not be supposed to belong to any one but its former owner. But if the island was formed by the bed of the river becoming dry in any part, it might be doubtful to whom it belonged. The bed of the river, as long as the river flowed over it, was public. Ille alveus quem sibi flumen fecit, et si privatus antea fuit, incipit tamen esse publicus (D. xliii. 12. 1. 7); or rather the use of it was public, while the soil itself was the property of the private individuals to whom the soil of the banks belonged, and therefore when the bed was dried, when it had ceased to be subject to public use, the private owners resumed their respective rights of ownership over it. Quum exsiccatus esset alveus, proximorum fit, quia jam populus eo non utitur. (D. xli. 1. 30. 1.) If the bed was not wholly but partially dried, the island formed would belong to the owner of the nearest bank, if it lay entirely on one side of the stream; or if it lay partly on one side and partly on the other, it would belong to the owners of both banks in such proportion as a line drawn along the middle of the stream would divide it.

23. Quodsi naturali alveo in univcrsum derelicto alia parte fluere cœperit, prior quidem alveus eorum est, qui prope ripam ejus prædia possident, pro modo scilicet latitudinis cujusque agri, quæ latitudo prope ripam sit; novus autem alveus ejus juris esse incipit, cujus et ipsum flumen, id est publici. Quodsi post aliquod tempus ad priorem alveum reversum fuerit flumen, rursus novus alveus eorum esse incipit, qui prope ripam ejus prædia possident.

23. If a river, entirely forsaking its natural channel, begins to flow in another direction, the old bed of the river belongs to those who possess the lands adjoining its banks, in proportion to the extent along the banks of their respective estates. The new bed follows the condition of the river, that is, it becomes public. And, if after some time the river returns to its former channel, the new bed again becomes the property of those who possess the lands along its banks.

D. xli. 1. 7. 5.

It might happen that the soil over which the river flowed was known to have belonged to a different person, and not to the owners of the adjacent banks. If the river changed its channel and left the soil dry, to whom was the recovered land to belong? Could its original owner claim it, or was the presumption of law so fixed in favour of the owners of the adjacent banks that nothing was admitted to rebut it? Gaius says that strict law was against the original owner, but adds, via est ut id obtineat (D. xli. 1. 7. 5); while Pomponius decides expressly for the original owner. (D. xli. 1. 30. 5.)

24. Alia sane causa est, si cujus totus ager inundatus fuerit. Neque enim inundatio speciem fundi commutat et ob id, si recesserit aqua, palam est, eum fundum ejus manere, cujus et fuit.

24. The case is quite different if any one's land is completely inundated; for the inundation does not alter the nature of the land, and therefore, if the water recedes, the land remains indisputably the property of the same owner.

D. xli. 1. 7. 6.

An inundation is here contrasted with a change in the course of a river. A field overflowed with water is still a field, and as much belongs to its owner as if it was dry.

25. Cum ex aliena materia species aliqua facta sit ab aliquo, quæri solet, quis eorum naturali ratione dominus sit, utrum is, qui fecerit, an ille potius, qui materiæ dominus fuerit: ut ecce si quis ex alienis uvis aut olivis aut spicis vinum aut oleum aut frumentum fecerit, aut ex alieno auro vel argento vel ære vas aliquod fecerit, vel ex alieno vino et melle mulsum miscerit, vel ex alienis medicamentis emplastrum aut collyrium composuerit, vel ex aliena lana vestimentum fecerit, vel ex alienis tabulis navem vel armarium vel subsellium fabricaverit. Et post multas Sabinianorum et Proculianorum ambiguitates placuit media sententia existimantium, si ea species ad materiam reduci possit, eum videri dominum esse, qui materiæ dominus fuerat; si non possit reduci, eum potius intellegi dominum, qui fecerit: ut ecce vas conflatum potest ad rudem massam æris vel argenti vel auri reduci, vinum autem aut oleum aut frumentum ad uvas et olivas et spicas reverti non potest, ac ne mulsum quidem ad vinum et mel resolvi potest. Quodsi partim ex sua materia, partim ex aliena speciem aliquam fecerit quisque, veluti ex suo vino et alieno melle mulsum aut ex suis et alienis medicamentis emplastrum aut collyrium aut ex sua et aliena lana vestimentum fecerit, dubitan-

25. When one man has given a new form to materials belonging to another, it is often asked which, according to natural reason, ought to be considered the proprietor, whether he who gave the form, or he rather who owned the materials. For instance, suppose a person has made wine, or oil, or wheat, from the grapes, olives, or ears of corn belonging to another; or has cast a vessel out of gold, silver, or brass, belonging to another; has made mead with another man's wine and honey; has composed a plaster, or eye-salve, with another man's medicaments; has made a garment with another's wool; or a ship, a chest, or a bench, with another man's timber. After long controversy between the Sabinians and Proculians, a middle opinion has been adopted, based on the following distinction. If the thing made can be reduced to its former rude materials, then the owner of the materials is also considered the owner of the thing made; but, if the thing can not be so reduced, then he who made it is the owner of it. For example, a vessel when cast, can easily be reduced to its rude materials of brass, silver, or gold; but wine, oil, or wheat cannot be reconverted into grapes, olives, or ears of corn; nor can mead be resolved into wine and honey. But if a man has made a new thing, partly with his own materials, and partly with the materials of another, as if he has made

owners of the adjacent banks. If the river changed its channel and left the soil dry, to whom was the recovered land to belong? Could its original owner claim it, or was the presumption of law so fixed in favour of the owners of the adjacent banks that nothing was admitted to rebut it? Gaius says that strict law was against the original owner, but adds, via est ut id obtineat (D. xli. 1. 7. 5); while Pomponius decides expressly for the original owner. (D. xli. 1. 30. 5.)

24. Alia sane causa est, si cujus totus ager inundatus fuerit. Neque enim inundatio speciem fundi commutat et ob id, si recesserit aqua, palam est, eum fundum ejus manere, cujus et fuit.

24. The case is quite different if any one's land is completely inundated; for the inundation does not alter the nature of the land, and therefore, if the water recedes, the land remains indisputably the property of the same owner.

D. xli. 1. 7. 6.

An inundation is here contrasted with a change in the course of a river. A field overflowed with water is still a field, and as much belongs to its owner as if it was dry.

25. Cum ex aliena materia species aliqua facta sit ab aliquo, quæri solet, quis eorum naturali ratione dominus sit, utrum is, qui fecerit, an ille potius, qui materiæ dominus fuerit: ut ecce si quis ex alienis uvis aut olivis aut spicis vinum aut oleum aut frumentum fecerit, aut ex alieno auro vel argento vel ære vas aliquod fecerit, vel ex alieno vino et melle mulsum miscerit, vel ex alienis medicamentis emplastrum aut collyrium composuerit, vel ex aliena lana vestimentum fecerit, vel ex alienis tabulis navem vel armarium vel subsellium fabricaverit. Et post multas Sabinianorum et Proculianorum ambiguitates placuit media sententia existimantium, si ea species ad materiam reduci possit, eum videri dominum esse, qui materiæ dominus fuerat; si non possit reduci, eum potius intellegi dominum, qui fecerit: ut ecce vas conflatum potest ad rudem massam æris vel argenti vel auri reduci, vinum autem aut oleum aut frumentum ad uvas et olivas et spicas reverti non potest, ac ne mulsum quidem ad vinum et mel resolvi potest. Quodsi partim ex sua materia, partim ex aliena speciem aliquam fecerit quisque, veluti ex suo vino et alieno melle mulsum aut ex suis et alienis medicamentis emplastrum aut collyrium aut ex sua et aliena lana vestimentum fecerit, dubitan-

25. When one man has given a new form to materials belonging to another, it is often asked which, according to natural reason, ought to be considered the proprietor, whether he who gave the form, or he rather who owned the materials. For instance, suppose a person has made wine, or oil, or wheat, from the grapes, olives, or ears of corn belonging to another; or has cast a vessel out of gold, silver, or brass, belonging to another; has made mead with another man's wine and honey; has composed a plaster, or eye-salve, with another man's medicaments; has made a garment with another's wool; or a ship, a chest, or a bench, with another man's timber. After long controversy between the Sabinians and Proculians, a middle opinion has been adopted, based on the following distinction. If the thing made can be reduced to its former rude materials, then the owner of the materials is also considered the owner of the thing made; but, if the thing can not be so reduced, then he who made it is the owner of it. For example, a vessel when cast, can easily be reduced to its rude materials of brass, silver, or gold; but wine, oil, or wheat cannot be reconverted into grapes, olives, or ears of corn; nor can mead be resolved into wine and honey. But if a man has made a new thing, partly with his own materials, and partly with the materials of another, as if he has made dum non est, hoc casu eum esse dominum, qui fecerit: cum non solum operam suam dedit, sed et partem ejusdem materiae prae-stavit.

mead with his own wine and another man's honey, or a plaster or eye-salve, partly with his own, and partly with another man's medicaments, or a garment with his own and also with another man's wool, then in such cases, he who made the thing is undoubtedly the proprietor; since he not only gave his labour, but furnished also a part of the materials.

GAI. ii. 79; D. xli. 1. 7. 7; D. vi. 1. 5. 1; D. xli. 1. 27. 1.

When materials belonging to different persons were mixed together, or one person in good faith bestowed his labour on the materials of another, although one person only might be the owner of the product, yet he did not become so at the expense of others. He was obliged to pay those whose materials or labour had been employed the value of their respective materials or labour, and was liable to a condictio or personal action for the enforcement of the payment. He himself could claim the product itself by vindicatio, or real action, given only to the owner of a thing. (See Introd. sec. 106.) The jurists very commonly speak of a person being able to vindicate a thing as a mode of saying that he is the owner, the test of ownership being whether the supposed owner could or could not claim the thing by vindicatio. If he could bring a vindicatio, he could also bring a preliminary action called the actio ad exhibendum, the object of which was to have the thing claimed produced to the tribunal, or to get damages if it was not produced.

Supposing a person formed a thing with materials belonging to another, which was the one that could claim it by a real action, the maker of the thing or the owner of the materials? The Proculians said, the thing is a new thing; and its maker is the owner; the Sabinians said, the materials remain, although their form is changed, and their proprietor is the owner of the thing made. The distinction sanctioned by Justinian decided the question according to the fact of there being or not being a really new thing made. If there was, then the reasoning of the Proculians held good, and the maker becomes the owner by a species of occupation, quia quod factum est, ante nullius fuerat. (D. xli. 1. 7. 7.) If the thing made was only the old materials in a new form, then it belonged to the owner of the materials in accordance with the opinions of the Sabinians. The opinion of each school, therefore, was admitted where the facts were in accordance with it.

In the latter part of the section Justinian says that if the materials were partly the property of the maker, the thing made certainly belonged to him. This must be understood strictly with reference to the case spoken of in the text, that, namely, of materials, none being merely accessory, i.e. subordinate, to the others, being inseparably mixed together. If some of the materials were only accessory, and the thing made was not a new thing, it would not necessarily belong to the maker, but would only belong dum non est, hoc casu eum esse dominum, qui fecerit: cum non solum operam suam dedit, sed et partem ejusdem materiae prae-stavit.

mead with his own wine and another man's honey, or a plaster or eye-salve, partly with his own, and partly with another man's medicaments, or a garment with his own and also with another man's wool, then in such cases, he who made the thing is undoubtedly the proprietor; since he not only gave his labour, but furnished also a part of the materials.

GAI. ii. 79; D. xli. 1. 7. 7; D. vi. 1. 5. 1; D. xli. 1. 27. 1.

When materials belonging to different persons were mixed together, or one person in good faith bestowed his labour on the materials of another, although one person only might be the owner of the product, yet he did not become so at the expense of others. He was obliged to pay those whose materials or labour had been employed the value of their respective materials or labour, and was liable to a condictio or personal action for the enforcement of the payment. He himself could claim the product itself by vindicatio, or real action, given only to the owner of a thing. (See Introd. sec. 106.) The jurists very commonly speak of a person being able to vindicate a thing as a mode of saying that he is the owner, the test of ownership being whether the supposed owner could or could not claim the thing by vindicatio. If he could bring a vindicatio, he could also bring a preliminary action called the actio ad exhibendum, the object of which was to have the thing claimed produced to the tribunal, or to get damages if it was not produced.

I. Supposing a person formed a thing with materials belonging to another, which was the one that could claim it by a real action, the maker of the thing or the owner of the materials? The Proculians said, the thing is a new thing; and its maker is the owner; the Sabinians said, the materials remain, although their form is changed, and their proprietor is the owner of the thing made. The distinction sanctioned by Justinian decided the question according to the fact of there being or not being a really new thing made. If there was, then the reasoning of the Proculians held good, and the maker becomes the owner by a species of occupation, quia quod factum est, ante nullius fuerat. (D. xli. 1. 7. 7.) If the thing made was only the old materials in a new form, then it belonged to the owner of the materials in accordance with the opinions of the Sabinians. The opinion of each school, therefore, was admitted where the facts were in accordance with it.

In the latter part of the section Justinian says that if the materials were partly the property of the maker, the thing made certainly belonged to him. This must be understood strictly with reference to the case spoken of in the text, that, namely, of materials, none being merely accessory, i.e. subordinate, to the others, being inseparably mixed together. If some of the materials were only accessory, and the thing made was not a new thing, it would not necessarily belong to the maker, but would only belong to him if he was the owner of the principal materials; and if the different materials were separable from each other, they would still belong to their respective owners.

26. Si tamen alienam purpuram quis intexit suo vestimento, licet pretiosior est purpura, accessionis vice cedit vestimento: et qui dominus fuit purpura, adversus eum, qui subripuit, habet furti actionem et condictioem, sive ipse est, qui vestimentum fecit, sive alius. Nam extinctæ res licet vindicari non possint, condici tamen a furibus et a quibusdam aliis possessoribus possunt.

26. If, however, any one has woven purple belonging to another into his own vestment, the purple, although the more valuable, attaches to the vestment as an accession, and its former owner has an action of theft and a condictio against a person who steals it from him, whether it was he who made the vestment or some one else. For although things which have perished cannot be reclaimed by vindication, yet they give ground for a condictio against the thief, and against some other possessors.

D. x. 4. 7. 2; Gai. ii. 79.

This is an instance of what is termed by commentators ad-junctio. Ulpian says, in the Digest (x. 4. 7. 2), that a person whose purple was woven in could bring an action ad exhibendum against the owner of the vestment. This, which is as much as to say that the owner of the purple is still its owner, seems at variance with what Justinian says here of the purple acceding to the vestment, and of the person, qui dominus fuit purpure, having only a personal action. Their respective decisions would, however, be right, according as the purple was not or was an inseparable part of the vestment. Supposing the purple was so woven in that it could be again separated, then its owner, remaining its owner, could bring an action ad exhibendum. If it was made an inseparable part of the vestment, if it was an extincta res, i.e. could no more have a separate, distinct existence, then, being by its nature accessory to the vestment, it would become the property of the owner of the vestment, and its former owner would only have a personal action to recover its value. (D. vi. 1. 23. 5.)

Quibusdam possessoribus. The word quibusdam is used to exclude bona fide possessors of the res extincta, who had not done anything to cause it to perish. Against an actual thief an actio furti and a condictio might be brought, against others only a condictio. (THEOPHIL. Paraphr.)

27. Si duorum materiæ ex voluntate dominorum confusæ sint, totum id corpus, quod ex confusione fit, utriusque commune est, veluti si qui vina sua confuderint aut massas argenti vel auri conflexerint. Sed si diversæ materiæ sint et ob id propria species facta sit, forte ex vino et melle mulsum aut ex auro et argento electrum, idem juris est: nam et eo casu communem esse

27. If materials belonging to two persons are mixed together by their mutual consent, whatever is thence produced is common to both, as if, for instance, they have intermixed their wines, or melted together their lumps of gold or silver. And although the materials are different which are employed in the admixture, and thus a new substance is formed, as when mead is made with wine and honey, to him if he was the owner of the principal materials; and if the different materials were separable from each other, they would still belong to their respective owners.

26. Si tamen alienam purpuram quis intexit suo vestimento, licet pretiosior est purpura, accessionis vice cedit vestimento: et qui dominus fuit purpuræ, adversus eum, qui subripuit, habet furti actionem et conditionem, sive ipse est, qui vestimentum fecit, sive alius. Nam extinctæ res licet vindicari non possint, condici tamen a furibus et a quibusdam aliis possessoribus possunt.

26. If, however, any one has woven purple belonging to another into his own vestment, the purple, although the more valuable, attaches to the vestment as an accession, and its former owner has an action of theft and a condition against a person who steals it from him, whether it was he who made the vestment or some one else. For although things which have perished cannot be reclaimed by vindication, yet they give ground for a condition against the thief, and against some other possessors.

D. x. 4. 7. 2; Gai. ii. 79.

This is an instance of what is termed by commentators ad-junctio. Ulpian says, in the Digest (x. 4. 7. 2), that a person whose purple was woven in could bring an action ad exhibendum against the owner of the vestment. This, which is as much as to say that the owner of the purple is still its owner, seems at variance with what Justinian says here of the purple acceding to the vestment, and of the person, qui dominus fuit purpuræ, having only a personal action. Their respective decisions would, however, be right, according as the purple was not or was an inseparable part of the vestment. Supposing the purple was so woven in that it could be again separated, then its owner, remaining its owner, could bring an action ad exhibendum. If it was made an inseparable part of the vestment, if it was an extincta res, i.e. could no more have a separate, distinct existence, then, being by its nature accessory to the vestment, it would become the property of the owner of the vestment, and its former owner would only have a personal action to recover its value. (D. vi. 1. 23. 5.)

Quibusdam possessoribus. The word quibusdam is used to exclude bona fide possessors of the res extincta, who had not done anything to cause it to perish. Against an actual thief an actio furti and a condictio might be brought, against others only a condictio. (THEOPHIL. Paraphr.)

27. Si duorum materiæ ex voluntate dominorum confusæ sint, totum id corpus, quod ex confusione fit, utriusque commune est, veluti si qui vina sua confuderint aut massas argenti vel auri conflaverint. Sed si diversæ materiæ sint et ob id propria species facta sit, forte ex vino et melle mulsum aut ex auro et argento electrum, idem juris est: nam et eo casu communem esse

27. If materials belonging to two persons are mixed together by their mutual consent, whatever is thence produced is common to both, as if, for instance, they have intermixed their wines, or melted together their lumps of gold or silver. And although the materials are different which are employed in the admixture, and thus a new substance is formed, as when mead is made with wine and honey, speciem non dubitatur. Quodsi fortuito et non voluntate dominorum confusæ fuerint vel diversæ materiæ vel quæ ejusdem generis sunt, idem juris esse placuit.

or electrum by fusing together gold and silver, the rule is the same; for in this case the new substance is undoubtedly common. And if it is by chance, and not by the intention of the proprietors, that materials, whether similar or different, are mixed together, the rule is still the same.

D. xli. 1. 7. 8, 9.

The mixing of liquids is termed by commentators confusio. When the product became common property, then any of the joint proprietors could procure their own share to be given up to them by bringing an action called communi dividundo. (Bk. iv. Tit. 17. 5.)

28. Quodsi frumentum Titii tuo frumento mixtum fuerit, si quidem ex voluntate vestra, commune erit, quia singula corpora, id est singula grana, quæ cujusque propria fuerunt, ex consensu vestro communicata sunt. Quodsi casu id mixtum fuerit vel Titius id miscuerit sine voluntate tua, non videtur commune esse, quia singula corpora in sua substantia durant nec magis istis casibus commune fit frumentum, quam grex communis esse intellegitur, si pecora Titii tuis pecoribus mixta fuerint; sed si ab alterutro vestrum id totum frumentum retineatur, in rem quidem actio pro modo frumenti cujusque competit, arbitrio autem judicis continetur, ut is æstimet, quale cujusque frumentum fuerit.

28. If the wheat of Titius is mixed with yours, and this takes place by your mutual consent, the mixed heap belongs to you in common; because each body, that is, each grain, which before was the property of one or other of you, has by your mutual consent been made your common property; but if the intermixture was accidental, or made by Titius without your consent, the mixed wheat does not then belong to you both in common, because the grains still remain distinct, and retain their proper substance. The wheat in such a case no more becomes common to you both, than a herd would be, if the cattle of Titius were mixed with yours; but, if either one of you keeps the whole quantity of mixed wheat, the other has a real action for the amount of wheat belonging to him, but it is in the province of the judge to estimate the quality of the wheat which belonged to each.

D. vi. 1. 4. 5.

This mixing together of things not liquid is termed by commentators commixtio. If the things mixed, still remaining the property of their former owners, were easy to separate again, as, for instance, cattle united in one herd, when one owner brought his claim by vindicatio, his property was restored to him without difficulty; but if there was difficulty in separating the materials from each other, as in dividing the grains of wheat in a heap, the obvious mode would be to distribute the whole heap in shares proportionate to the quantity of wheat belonging to the respective owners. But it might happen that the wheat mixed together was not all of the same quality, and therefore the owner of the better kind of wheat would lose by having a share determined in amount only by the quantity of his wheat; and the judge therefore was speciem non dubitatur. Quodsi fortuito et non voluntate dominorum confusæ fuerint vel diversæ materiæ vel quæ ejusdem generis sunt, idem juris esse placuit.

or electrum by fusing together gold and silver, the rule is the same; for in this case the new substance is undoubtedly common. And if it is by chance, and not by the intention of the proprietors, that materials, whether similar or different, are mixed together, the rule is still the same.

D. xli. 1. 7. 8, 9.

The mixing of liquids is termed by commentators confusio. When the product became common property, then any of the joint proprietors could procure their own share to be given up to them by bringing an action called communi dividundo. (Bk. iv. Tit. 17. 5.)

28. Quodsi frumentum Titii tuo frumento mixtum fuerit, si quidem ex voluntate vestra, commune erit, quia singula corpora, id est singula grana, quæ ejusque propria fuerunt, ex consensu vestro communicata sunt. Quodsi casu id mixtum fuerit vel Titius id miscerit sine voluntate tua, non videtur commune esse, quia singula corpora in sua substantia durant nec magis istis casibus commune fit frumentum, quam grex communis esse intellegitur, si pecora Titii tuis pecoribus mixta fuerint; sed si ab alterutro vestrum id totum frumentum retineatur, in rem quidem actio pro modo frumenti ejusque competit, arbitrio autem judicis continetur, ut is æstimet, quale ejusque frumentum fuerit.

28. If the wheat of Titius is mixed with yours, and this takes place by your mutual consent, the mixed heap belongs to you in common; because each body, that is, each grain, which before was the property of one or other of you, has by your mutual consent been made your common property; but if the intermixture was accidental, or made by Titius without your consent, the mixed wheat does not then belong to you both in common; because, the grains still remain distinct, and retain their proper substance. The wheat in such a case no more becomes common to you both, than a herd would be, if the cattle of Titius were mixed with yours; but, if either one of you keeps the whole quantity of mixed wheat, the other has a real action for the amount of wheat belonging to him, but it is in the province of the judge to estimate the quality of the wheat which belonged to each.

D. vi. 1. 4. 5.

This mixing together of things not liquid is termed by commentators commixtio. If the things mixed, still remaining the property of their former owners, were easy to separate again, as, for instance, cattle united in one herd, when one owner brought his claim by vindicatio, his property was restored to him without difficulty; but if there was difficulty in separating the materials from each other, as in dividing the grains of wheat in a heap, the obvious mode would be to distribute the whole heap in shares proportionate to the quantity of wheat belonging to the respective owners. But it might happen that the wheat mixed together was not all of the same quality, and therefore the owner of the better kind of wheat would lose by having a share determined in amount only by the quantity of his wheat; and the judge therefore was permitted to exercise his judgment (arbitrio continetur—see Introd. sec. 106) how great an addition ought to be made to his share to compensate for the superior quality of the wheat originally belonging to him.

29. Cum in suo solo aliquis aliena materia ædificaverit, ipse dominus intellegitur ædificii, quia omne, quod inædificatur, solo cedit. Nec tamen ideo is, qui materiæ dominus fuerat, desinit ejus dominus esse: sed tantisper neque vindicare eam potest neque ad exhibendum de ea re agere propter legem duodecim tabularum, qua cavetur, ne quis tignum alienum ædibus suis injunctum eximere cogatur, sed duplum pro eo præstet per actionem, quæ vocatur de tigno juncto (appellatione autem tigni omnis materia significatur, ex qua ædificia fiunt); quod ideo provisum est, ne ædificia rescindi necesse sit. Sed si aliqua ex causa dirutum sit ædificium, poterit materiæ dominus, si non fuerit duplum jam consecutus, tunc eam vindicare et ad exhibendum agere.

29. If a man builds upon his own ground with the materials of another, he is considered the proprietor of the building, because everything built on the soil accedes to it. The owner of the materials does not, however, cease to be owner, but while the building stands he cannot bring a real action for the materials, or demand to have them exhibited, on account of the law of the Twelve Tables, which provides that no one is to be compelled to take out the tignum of another which has been made part of his own building, but that he may be made by the action de tigno juncto to pay double the value; and under the term tignum all materials for building are comprehended. The object of this provision was to prevent the necessity of buildings being pulled down. But if the building is destroyed from any cause, then the owner of the materials, if he has not already obtained the double value, may bring a real action for the materials, and may demand to have them exhibited.

D. xli. 1. 7. 10.

Materials, although forming part of a building belonging to the owner of the ground, were not considered themselves as necessarily belonging to the owner of the building. They were still the property of the person to whom they had belonged before being employed in the building. They were separable from the soil, and if a special law had not prevented it, could have been claimed by their owner, and their production enforced by an action ad exhibendum. The Twelve Tables forbade, however, the needless destruction of buildings, ne ædificia rescindi necesse sit. They suspended the right of claiming the materials, or bringing an action ad exhibendum, until the building was destroyed. When it was destroyed in any way (aliqua ex causa), the materials might be reclaimed, or an action ad exhibendum brought. Meanwhile, by an action termed de tigno juncto, or, as it is sometimes written, injuncto, their owner might, if he preferred, recover double their value, forfeiting, however, thereby all right of eventually reclaiming them.

Such was the law when the builder employed the materials of another quite innocently. If his conduct was tainted with malæ fides, as it would be if he knew that the materials did not belong to him, the law of the Twelve Tables still prevented the materials being at once reclaimed by the compulsory destruction of the permitted to exercise his judgment (arbitrio continetur—see Introd. sec. 106) how great an addition ought to be made to his share to compensate for the superior quality of the wheat originally belonging to him.

29. Cum in suo solo aliquis aliena materia ædificaverit, ipse dominus intellegitur ædificii, quia omne, quod inædificatur, solo cedit. Nec tamen ideo is, qui materiæ dominus fuerat, desinit ejus dominus esse: sed tantisper neque vindicare eam potest neque ad exhibendum de ea re agere propter legem duodecim tabularum, qua cavetur, ne quis tignum alienum ædibus suis injunctum eximere cogatur, sed duplum pro eo præstet per actionem, quæ vocatur de tigno juncto (appellatione autem tigni omnis materia significatur, ex qua ædificia fiunt); quod ideo provisum est, ne ædificia rescindi necesse sit. Sed si aliqua ex causa dirutum sit ædificium, poterit materiæ dominus, si non fuerit duplum jam consecutus, tunc eam vindicare et ad exhibendum agere.

29. If a man builds upon his own ground with the materials of another, he is considered the proprietor of the building, because everything built on the soil accedes to it. The owner of the materials does not, however, cease to be owner, but while the building stands he cannot bring a real action for the materials, or demand to have them exhibited, on account of the law of the Twelve Tables, which provides that no one is to be compelled to take out the tignum of another which has been made part of his own building, but that he may be made by the action de tigno juncto to pay double the value; and under the term tignum all materials for building are comprehended. The object of this provision was to prevent the necessity of buildings being pulled down. But if the building is destroyed from any cause, then the owner of the materials, if he has not already obtained the double value, may bring a real action for the materials, and may demand to have them exhibited.

D. xli. 1. 7. 10.

Materials, although forming part of a building belonging to the owner of the ground, were not considered themselves as necessarily belonging to the owner of the building. They were still the property of the person to whom they had belonged before being employed in the building. They were separable from the soil, and if a special law had not prevented it, could have been claimed by their owner, and their production enforced by an action ad exhibendum. The Twelve Tables forbade, however, the needless destruction of buildings, ne ædificia rescindi necesse sit. They suspended the right of claiming the materials, or bringing an action ad exhibendum, until the building was destroyed. When it was destroyed in any way (aliqua ex causa), the materials might be reclaimed, or an action ad exhibendum brought. Meanwhile, by an action termed de tigno juncto, or, as it is sometimes written, injuncto, their owner might, if he preferred, recover double their value, forfeiting, however, thereby all right of eventually reclaiming them.

Such was the law when the builder employed the materials of another quite innocently. If his conduct was tainted with mala fides, as it would be if he knew that the materials did not belong to him, the law of the Twelve Tables still prevented the materials being at once reclaimed by the compulsory destruction of the building; but in addition to the action de tigno juncto an action ad exhibendum was permitted to be brought as a means of punishing the builder. (D. vi. 1. 23. 6.) The effect of this action in such a case was that the defendant, not producing the thing demanded, was condemned in such a sum as the judge thought right as a punishment for his having put it out of his power to produce it—quasi dolo fecerit quominus possideat. (D. xlvii. 3. 1. 2.) Further, if the building was pulled or fell down, the owner of the materials might reclaim them. (D. xlvii. 3. 2.)

30. Ex diverso si quis in alieno solo sua materia domum edificaverit, illius fit domus, ejus et solum est. Sed hoc casu materiae dominus proprietatem ejus amittit, quia voluntate ejus alienata intellegitur, utique si non ignorabat, in alieno solo se edificare: et ideo, licet diruta sit domus, vindicare materiam non poterit. Certe illud constat, si in possessione constituto aedificatore, soli dominus petat domum suam esse nec solvat pretium materiae et mercedes fabrorum, posse eum per exceptionem doli mali repelli, utique si bonae fidei possessor fuit, qui edificasset: nam scienti, alienum esse solum, potest culpa objici, quod temere aedificaverit in eo solo, quod intellegeret alienum esse.

30. In the converse case, if any one builds with his own materials on the ground of another, the building becomes the property of him to whom the ground belongs. But in this case the owner of the materials loses his property, because he is presumed to have voluntarily parted with them, that is, if he knew he was building upon another's land; and, therefore, if the building should be destroyed, he cannot, even then, bring a real action for the materials. Of course, if the person who builds is in possession of the soil, and the owner of the soil claims the building, but refuses to pay the price of the materials and the wages of the workmen, the owner may be repelled by an exception of dolus malus, provided the builder was in possession bona fide. For if he knew that he was not the owner of the soil, he is barred by his own negligence, because he recklessly built on ground which he knew to be the property of another.

GAI. ii. 73, 76; D. xli. 1. 7. 12.

If a person used his own materials in building on the land of another, we have to consider his position, according as he was or was not still in possession, and according as, in building, he had acted bona fide or mala fide. If he was in possession of the soil, then, if he was acting bona fide, he could not be turned out without the owner paying him for the additional value he had by the building given to the soil, this rather than the price of the materials and wages of workmen, as stated in the text, being the measure of compensation. If he was acting mala fide, that is, if he knew the soil was not his, he could not claim the additional value, but he might take away the materials he had used, if he could separate them without doing damage. (D. vi. 1. 37). There is, however, a passage of Paulus (D. v. 3. 38) which would seem to show that, in the opinion of that jurist, the mala fide possessor could claim the additional value. If he was not in possession of the soil, he might, whether having acted in good or bad faith (D. xl. 1. 7. 12; C. iii. 32. 2), reclaim the materials if the building was destroyed; and, whether he had acted in good faith or bad, building; but in addition to the action de tigno juncto an action ad exhibendum was permitted to be brought as a means of punishing the builder. (D. vi. 1. 23. 6.) The effect of this action in such a case was that the defendant, not producing the thing demanded, was condemned in such a sum as the judge thought right as a punishment for his having put it out of his power to produce it—quasi dolo fecerit quominus possideat. (D. xlvii. 3. 1. 2.) Further, if the building was pulled or fell down, the owner of the materials might reclaim them. (D. xlvii. 3. 2.)

30. Ex diverso si quis in alieno solo sua materia domum edificaverit, illius fit domus, ejus et solum est. Sed hoc casu materiae dominus proprietatem ejus amittit, quia voluntate ejus alienata intellegitur, utique si non ignorabat, in alieno solo se edificare: et ideo, licet diruta sit domus, vindicare materiam non poterit. Certe illud constat, si in possessione constituto aedificatore, soli dominus petat domum suam esse nec solvat pretium materiae et mercedes fabrorum, posse eum per exceptionem doli mali repelli, utique si bonae fidei possessor fuit, qui edificasset: nam scienti, alienum esse solum, potest culpa objici, quod temere aedificaverit in eo solo, quod intellegeret alienum esse.

30. In the converse case, if any one builds with his own materials on the ground of another, the building becomes the property of him to whom the ground belongs. But in this case the owner of the materials loses his property, because he is presumed to have voluntarily parted with them, that is, if he knew he was building upon another's land; and, therefore, if the building should be destroyed, he cannot, even then, bring a real action for the materials. Of course, if the person who builds is in possession of the soil, and the owner of the soil claims the building, but refuses to pay the price of the materials and the wages of the workmen, the owner may be repelled by an exception of dolus malus, provided the builder was in possession bona fide. For if he knew that he was not the owner of the soil, he is barred by his own negligence, because he recklessly built on ground which he knew to be the property of another.

GAI. ii. 73, 76; D. xli. 1. 7. 12.

If a person used his own materials in building on the land of another, we have to consider his position, according as he was or was not still in possession, and according as, in building, he had acted bona fide or mala fide. If he was in possession of the soil, then, if he was acting bona fide, he could not be turned out without the owner paying him for the additional value he had by the building given to the soil, this rather than the price of the materials and wages of workmen, as stated in the text, being the measure of compensation. If he was acting mala fide, that is, if he knew the soil was not his, he could not claim the additional value, but he might take away the materials he had used, if he could separate them without doing damage. (D. vi. 1. 37). There is, however, a passage of Paulus (D. v. 3. 38) which would seem to show that, in the opinion of that jurist, the mala fide possessor could claim the additional value. If he was not in possession of the soil, he might, whether having acted in good or bad faith (D. xl. 1. 7. 12; C. iii. 32. 2), reclaim the materials if the building was destroyed; and, whether he had acted in good faith or bad, he could not bring any action for compensation for the additional value.

This statement of the law is, it will be seen, at variance, in one point, with the language of the text, which says that if the owner of the materials knew he was building on another man's land he could not reclaim the materials, because the fact that he knew this was taken to show that he meant to alienate the materials. The passage in the Code above referred to is inconsistent with this. If the owner of the materials meant to give them to the owner of the soil, no question could arise; but the fact that he used his materials, knowing the soil was not his, was declared by the constitution referred to (being a constitution of Antoninus Caracalla), not to imply, as the text takes for granted that it does imply, the intention to alienate the materials; and if there was no such intention, then the materials could be reclaimed even by the mala fide possessor. The words of the constitution are—Materia ad pristinum dominum reddit, sive bona fide sive mala cedificium exstructum sit, si non donandi animo adificia alieno solo imposita sint. The date of this constitution is A.D. 213, which is posterior to the time of Gaius, from whom the text is taken.

Dolus malus (opposed to dolus bonus, artifice which the law considers honestly employed) means nearly what we mean by fraud. When a plaintiff was repelled by an exception of fraud, such words as these were introduced in the intentio of the action: si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit, neque fiat. (See Intro. sec. 104.)

31. Si Titius alienam plantam in suo solo posuerit, ipsius erit: et ex diverso si Titius suam plantam in Mævii solo posuerit, Mævii planta erit, si modo utroque casu radices egerit. Antequam autem radices egerit, ejus permanet, cujus et fuerat. Adeo autem ex eo, ex quo radices agit planta, proprietates ejus commutatur, ut, si vicini arborem ita terra Titii presserit, ut in ejus fundum radices ageret, Titii effici arborem dicamus: rationem etenim non permittere, ut alterius arbor esse intellegatur, quam cujus in fundum radices egisset. Et ideo prope confinium arbor posita si etiam in vicini fundum radices egerit, communis fit.

31. If Titius places another man's plant in ground belonging to himself, the plant will belong to Titius; conversely, if Titius places his own plant in the ground of Mævius, the plant will belong to Mævius—that is, if, in either case, the plant has taken root; for, before it has taken root, it remains the property of its former owner. But from the time it has taken root, the property in it is changed; so much so, that if the soil of Titius so presses on the tree of a neighbour that the tree takes root in the land of Titius, we pronounce that the tree becomes the property of Titius. For reason does not permit, that a tree should be considered the property of any one else than of him in whose ground it has taken root; and therefore, if a tree, planted near a boundary, extends its roots into the lands of a neighbour, it becomes common.

GAI. II. 74; D. xli. 1. 7. 13.

The tree, after it had once taken root, did not belong to its former owner, although it was afterwards severed from the soil.

he could not bring any action for compensation for the additional value.

This statement of the law is, it will be seen, at variance, in one point, with the language of the text, which says that if the owner of the materials knew he was building on another man's land he could not reclaim the materials, because the fact that he knew this was taken to show that he meant to alienate the materials. The passage in the Code above referred to is inconsistent with this. If the owner of the materials meant to give them to the owner of the soil, no question could arise; but the fact that he used his materials, knowing the soil was not his, was declared by the constitution referred to (being a constitution of Antoninus Caracalla), not to imply, as the text takes for granted that it does imply, the intention to alienate the materials; and if there was no such intention, then the materials could be reclaimed even by the mala fide possessor. The words of the constitution are—Materia ad pristinum dominum reddit, sive bona fide sive mala cedificium exstructum sit, si non donandi animo adificia alieno solo imposita sint. The date of this constitution is A.D. 213, which is posterior to the time of Gaius, from whom the text is taken.

Dolus malus (opposed to dolus bonus, artifice which the law considers honestly employed) means nearly what we mean by fraud. When a plaintiff was repelled by an exception of fraud, such words as these were introduced in the intentio of the action: si in ea re nihil dolo malo Auli Agerii factum sit, neque fiat. (See Intro. sec. 104.)

31. Si Titius alienam plantam in suo solo posuerit, ipsius erit: et ex diverso si Titius suam plantam in Mævii solo posuerit, Mævii planta erit, si modo utroque casu radices egerit. Antequam autem radices egerit, ejus permanet, cujus et fuerat. Adeo autem ex eo, ex quo radices agit planta, proprietates ejus commutatur, ut, si vicini arborem ita terra Titii presserit, ut in ejus fundum radices ageret, Titii effici arborem dicamus: rationem etenim non permittere, ut alterius arbor esse intellegatur, quam cujus in fundum radices egisset. Et ideo prope confinium arbor posita si etiam in vicini fundum radices egerit, communis fit.

31. If Titius places another man's plant in ground belonging to himself, the plant will belong to Titius; conversely, if Titius places his own plant in the ground of Mævius, the plant will belong to Mævius—that is, if, in either case, the plant has taken root; for, before it has taken root, it remains the property of its former owner. But from the time it has taken root, the property in it is changed; so much so, that if the soil of Titius so presses on the tree of a neighbour that the tree takes root in the land of Titius, we pronounce that the tree becomes the property of Titius. For reason does not permit, that a tree should be considered the property of any one else than of him in whose ground it has taken root; and therefore, if a tree, planted near a boundary, extends its roots into the lands of a neighbour, it becomes common.

GAI. II. 74; D. xli. 1. 7. 13.

The tree, after it had once taken root, did not belong to its former owner, although it was afterwards severed from the soil.

It would seem natural that it should belong to him, because it was separable from the soil, and did not become a part of it more than the materials of a building became part of the soil; but the jurists considered that the nourishment it had drawn from the soil had made it a new tree, alia facta est (D. xli. 1. 26. 2), and thus the owner of the soil claimed it by occupation.

When the text says that the tree which strikes root into the soil of Titius belongs to Titius, this is only to be understood of a tree of which all the roots are in the soil of Titius. If only some of the roots were in the soil of Titius, the tree would belong partly to Titius, partly to its former owner.

32. Qua ratione autem plantæ, quæ terra coalescunt, solo cedunt, eadem ratione frumenta quoque, quæ sata sunt, solo cedere intelleguntur. Ceterum sicut is, qui in alieno solo ædificaverit, si ab eo dominus petat ædificium, defendi potest per exceptionem doli mali secundum ea, quæ diximus: ita ejusdem exceptionis auxilio tutus esse potest is, qui alienum fundum sua impensa bona fide consevit.

32. As plants rooted in the earth accede to the soil, so, in the same way, grains of wheat which have been sown are considered to accede to the soil. But as he who has built on the ground of another may, according to what we have said, defend himself by an exception of dolus malus, if the proprietor of the ground claims the building, so also he may protect himself by the aid of the same exception, who, at his own expense and acting bona fide, has sown another man's land.

GAI. ii. 75, 76; D. xli. 1. 9. pr.

33. Litteræ quoque, licet aureæ sint, perinde chartis membranisque cedunt, acsi solo cedere solent ea, quæ inædificantur aut inseruntur: ideoque si in chartis membranisque tuis carmen vel historiam vel orationem Titius scripserit, hujus corporis non Titius, sed tu dominus esse videberis. Sed si a Titio petas, tuos libros tuasve membranas esse, nec impensam scripturæ solvere paratus sis, poterit se Titius defendere per exceptionem doli mali, utique si bona fide earum chartarum membranarumve possessionem nactus est.

33. Written characters, although of gold, accede to the paper or parchment on which they are written, just as whatever is built on, or sown in, the soil, accedes to the soil. And therefore if Titius has written a poem, a history, or an oration, on your paper or parchment, you, and not Titius, will be the owner of the written paper. But if you claim your books or parchments from Titius, and refuse to defray the cost of the writing, then Titius can defend himself by an exception of dolus malus; that is, if it was bona fide that he obtained possession of the papers or parchments.

GAI. ii. 77; D. xli. 1. 9. 1.

In this case the letters are inseparable from, and subordinate to, the substance on which they are written, and become at once the property of the owner of that substance.

34. Si quis in aliena tabula pinxerit, quidam putant tabulam picturæ cedere: aliis videtur pictura, qualiscumque sit, tabulæ cedere. Sed nobis videtur melius esse, tabulam picturæ cedere: ridiculum est enim, picturam Apellis vel Parrhasii in accessionem vilissimæ tabulæ cedere. Unde si a domino

34. If a person has painted on the tablet of another, some think that the tablet accedes to the picture, others that the picture, of whatever quality it may be, accedes to the tablet. It seems to us the better opinion, that the tablet should accede to the picture; for it is ridiculous that a painting of Apelles or Parrhasius should be but the accessory

It would seem natural that it should belong to him, because it was separable from the soil, and did not become a part of it more than the materials of a building became part of the soil; but the jurists considered that the nourishment it had drawn from the soil had made it a new tree, alia facta est (D. xli. 1. 26. 2), and thus the owner of the soil claimed it by occupation.

When the text says that the tree which strikes root into the soil of Titius belongs to Titius, this is only to be understood of a tree of which all the roots are in the soil of Titius. If only some of the roots were in the soil of Titius, the tree would belong partly to Titius, partly to its former owner.

32. Qua ratione autem plantæ, quæ terra coalescunt, solo cedunt, eadem ratione frumenta quoque, quæ sata sunt, solo cedere intelleguntur. Ceterum sicut is, qui in alieno solo ædificaverit, si ab eo dominus petat ædificium, defendi potest per exceptionem doli mali secundum ea, quæ diximus: ita ejusdem exceptionis auxilio tutus esse potest is, qui alienum fundum sua impensa bona fide consevit.

GAI. ii. 75, 76; D. xli. 1. 9. pr.

33. Litteræ quoque, licet aureæ sint, perinde chartis membranisque cedunt, acsi solo cedere solent ea, quæ inædificantur aut inseruntur: ideoque si in chartis membranisque tuis carmen vel historiam vel orationem Titius scripserit, hujus corporis non Titius, sed tu dominus esse videberis. Sed si a Titio petas, tuos libros tuasve membranas esse, nec impensam scripturæ solvere paratus sis, poterit se Titius defendere per exceptionem doli mali, utique si bona fide earum chartarum membranarumve possessionem nactus est.

GAI. ii. 77; D. xli. 1. 9. 1.

In this case the letters are inseparable from, and subordinate to, the substance on which they are written, and become at once the property of the owner of that substance.

34. Si quis in aliena tabula pinxerit, quidam putant tabulam picturæ cedere: aliis videtur pictura, qualiscumque sit, tabulæ cedere. Sed nobis videtur melius esse, tabulam picturæ cedere: ridiculum est enim, picturam Apellis vel Parrhasii in accessionem vilissimæ tabulæ cedere. Unde si a domino

32. As plants rooted in the earth accede to the soil, so, in the same way, grains of wheat which have been sown are considered to accede to the soil. But as he who has built on the ground of another may, according to what we have said, defend himself by an exception of dolus malus, if the proprietor of the ground claims the building, so also he may protect himself by the aid of the same exception, who, at his own expense and acting bona fide, has sown another man's land.

33. Written characters, although of gold, accede to the paper or parchment on which they are written, just as whatever is built on, or sown in, the soil, accedes to the soil. And therefore if Titius has written a poem, a history, or an oration, on your paper or parchment, you, and not Titius, will be the owner of the written paper. But if you claim your books or parchments from Titius, and refuse to defray the cost of the writing, then Titius can defend himself by an exception of dolus malus; that is, if it was bona fide that he obtained possession of the papers or parchments.

34. If a person has painted on the tablet of another, some think that the tablet accedes to the picture, others that the picture, of whatever quality it may be, accedes to the tablet. It seems to us the better opinion, that the tablet should accede to the picture; for it is ridiculous that a painting of Apelles or Parrhasius should be but the accessory

tabulæ imaginem possidente is, qui pinxit, eam petat nec solvat pretium tabulæ, poterit per exceptionem doli mali summoverti: at si is, qui pinxit, possideat, consequens est, ut utilis actio domino tabulæ adversus eum detur, quo casu, si non solvat impensam picturæ, poterit per exceptionem doli mali repelli, utique si bona fide possessor fuerit ille, qui picturam imposuit. Illud enim palam est, quod, sive is, qui pinxit, subripuit tabulas sive alius, competit domino tabularum furti actio.

of a thoroughly worthless tablet. But if the owner of the tablet is in possession of the picture, the painter, should he claim it from him, but refuse to pay the value of the tablet, may be repelled by an exception of dolus malus. If the painter is in possession of the picture, the law permits the owner of the tablet to bring a utilis actio against him; and in this case if the owner of the tablet does not pay the cost of the picture, he may also be repelled by an exception of dolus malus; that is, if the painter obtained possession bona fide. For it is clear that if the tablet has been stolen, whether by the painter or any one else, the owner of the tablet may bring an action of theft.

GAI. II. 78; D. xli. 1. 9. 2.

As written characters belong to the owner of the substance on which they are written, it would seem to follow that a painting also would belong to the owner of the substance on which it was painted; and Paul (D. vi. 1. 23. 3) decides that it does, saying that the painting could not exist without the substance on which it was painted, and therefore acceded to it. Gaius, whose opinion is adopted in the text, treats the opposite view as settled law, but says he knows of no sufficient reason why there should be this exception to the rule. The owner of the tablet or substance, on which the painting was painted, had, however, in one way something of the rights of an owner; for if the painter was in possession of the painting, the owner of the tablet was not left only to a personal action for the value of the board, but could claim the board itself. The action by which he did so was termed utilis, because it was only an equitable method of protecting him, the prætor allowing him to assert fictitiously that he was the owner. (See Introductio sec. 106.) The direct legal power of claiming the tablet (vindicatio recta) was in the painter whose property the tablet had become; but the former owner of the tablet was allowed still to treat it as his, in order to compel the painter to pay its value. If, when the actio utilis was brought, the painter paid the value of the tablet, the right of action was at an end, and the owner of the tablet could not get possession of the picture by offering to pay its cost.

Consequens est ut utilis actio, &c. It would not follow from the painter possessing that the owner of the tablet should have a real action of any kind. On the contrary, it was an exception that then he should have one. Therefore consequens must be taken as meaning 'in accordance with the principles of law;' or the sentence must be taken as meaning, 'If the painter is in possession,' this circumstance places the owner of the tablet in such a hard position that it is thought right he should have a tabulæ imaginem possidente is, qui pinxit, eam petat nec solvat pretium tabulæ, poterit per exceptionem doli mali summoverti: at si is, qui pinxit, possideat, consequens est, ut utilis actio domino tabulæ adversus eum detur, quo casu, si non solvat impensam picturæ, poterit per exceptionem doli mali repelli, utique si bona fide possessor fuerit ille, qui picturam imposuit. Illud enim palam est, quod, sive is, qui pinxit, subripuit tabulas sive alius, competit domino tabularum furti actio.

of a thoroughly worthless tablet. But if the owner of the tablet is in possession of the picture, the painter, should he claim it from him, but refuse to pay the value of the tablet, may be repelled by an exception of dolus malus. If the painter is in possession of the picture, the law permits the owner of the tablet to bring a utilis actio against him; and in this case if the owner of the tablet does not pay the cost of the picture, he may also be repelled by an exception of dolus malus; that is, if the painter obtained possession bona fide. For it is clear that if the tablet has been stolen, whether by the painter or any one else, the owner of the tablet may bring an action of theft.

GAI. ii. 78; D. xli. l. 9. 2.

As written characters belong to the owner of the substance on which they are written, it would seem to follow that a painting also would belong to the owner of the substance on which it was painted; and Paul (D. vi. l. 23. 3) decides that it does, saying that the painting could not exist without the substance on which it was painted, and therefore acceded to it. Gaius, whose opinion is adopted in the text, treats the opposite view as settled law, but says he knows of no sufficient reason why there should be this exception to the rule. The owner of the tablet or substance, on which the painting was painted, had, however, in one way something of the rights of an owner; for if the painter was in possession of the painting, the owner of the tablet was not left only to a personal action for the value of the board, but could claim the board itself. The action by which he did so was termed utilis, because it was only an equitable method of protecting him, the prætor allowing him to assert fictitiously that he was the owner. (See Introductio sec. 106.) The direct legal power of claiming the tablet (vindicatio recta) was in the painter whose property the tablet had become; but the former owner of the tablet was allowed still to treat it as his, in order to compel the painter to pay its value. If, when the actio utilis was brought, the painter paid the value of the tablet, the right of action was at an end, and the owner of the tablet could not get possession of the picture by offering to pay its cost.

Consequens est ut utilis actio, &c. It would not follow from the painter possessing that the owner of the tablet should have a real action of any kind. On the contrary, it was an exception that then he should have one. Therefore consequens must be taken as meaning 'in accordance with the principles of law;' or the sentence must be taken as meaning, 'If the painter is in possession,' this circumstance places the owner of the tablet in such a hard position that it is thought right he should have a utilis actio. The word used in the Digest is not consequens but conveniens.

35. Si quis a non domino, quem dominum esse crederet, bona fide fundum emerit vel ex donatione aliave qua justa causa æque bona fide acceperit: naturali ratione placuit, fructus, quos percepit, ejus esse pro cultura et cura. Et ideo si postea dominus supervenerit et fundum vindicet, de fructibus ab eo consumptis agere non potest. Ei vero, qui sciens alienum fundum possederit, non idem concessum est. Itaque cum fundo etiam fructus, licet consumpti sint, cogitur restituere.

35. If any one has bona fide purchased land from another, whom he believed to be the true owner, when in fact he was not, or has bona fide acquired it from such a person by gift or by any other good title, natural reason demands that the fruits which he has gathered shall be his in return for his care and culture. And therefore, if the real owner afterwards appears and claims his land, he can have no action for fruits which the possessor has consumed. But the same allowance is not made to him who has knowingly been in possession of another's estate; and therefore he is compelled to restore, together with the lands, all the fruits, although they may have been consumed.

D. xli. 1. 48; D. xxii. 1. 45.

Justinian now passes to the interest of a bona fide possessor and a usufructuary in the fruits of land, a subject to which he is led by having spoken of other ways in which the interest of the owner of the soil was limited.

A person would be said to possess bona fide and ex justa causa who had received a thing from a person he believed to be the owner in any method by which ownership could legally pass. (See note on Tit. 6. 10.)

As long as the fruits still adhered to the soil, that is, were still ungathered, they belonged to the owner of the soil. If gathered, but not consumed, they belonged to the bona fide possessor as against every one except the owner of the soil. When the owner of the soil claimed them, they became his, for they had only been the property of the bona fide possessor interim (D. xli. 1. 48), that is, provisionally; but if they had been consumed, the owner of the soil could not recover their value from the bona fide possessor. The mala fide possessor, on the contrary, was obliged to give the value even of those that were consumed (restituere fructus consumptos).

There seems little doubt that the interest of the bona fide possessor extended over all the fruits of the land, and not only over those produced by his cultivation and care (see D. xli. 1. 48), although Pomponius (D. xxii. 1. 45) seems to limit it to the latter.

36. Is, ad quem usufructus fundi pertinet, non aliter fructuum dominus efficitur, quam si eos ipse perceperit. Et ideo licet maturis fructibus, nondum tamen perceptis, decesserit, ad heredem ejus non per-

36. The usufructuary of land does not become owner of the fruits until he has himself gathered them; and therefore, if he should die while the fruits, although ripe, are yet ungathered, they do not belong to his heir, but are utilis actio. The word used in the Digest is not consequens but conveniens.

35. Si quis a non domino, quem dominum esse crederet, bona fide fundum emerit vel ex donatione aliave qua justa causa æque bona fide acceperit: naturali ratione placuit, fructus, quos percepit, ejus esse pro cultura et cura. Et ideo si postea dominus supervenerit et fundum vindicet, de fructibus ab eo consumptis agere non potest. Ei vero, qui sciens alienum fundum possederit, non idem concessum est. Itaque cum fundo etiam fructus, licet consumpti sint, cogitur restituere.

35. If any one has bona fide purchased land from another, whom he believed to be the true owner, when in fact he was not, or has bona fide acquired it from such a person by gift or by any other good title, natural reason demands that the fruits which he has gathered shall be his in return for his care and culture. And therefore, if the real owner afterwards appears and claims his land, he can have no action for fruits which the possessor has consumed. But the same allowance is not made to him who has knowingly been in possession of another's estate; and therefore he is compelled to restore, together with the lands, all the fruits, although they may have been consumed.

D. xli. 1. 48; D. xxii. 1. 45.

Justinian now passes to the interest of a bona fide possessor and a usufructuary in the fruits of land, a subject to which he is led by having spoken of other ways in which the interest of the owner of the soil was limited.

A person would be said to possess bona fide and ex justa causa who had received a thing from a person he believed to be the owner in any method by which ownership could legally pass. (See note on Tit. 6. 10.)

As long as the fruits still adhered to the soil, that is, were still ungathered, they belonged to the owner of the soil. If gathered, but not consumed, they belonged to the bona fide possessor as against every one except the owner of the soil. When the owner of the soil claimed them, they became his, for they had only been the property of the bona fide possessor interim (D. xli. 1. 48), that is, provisionally; but if they had been consumed, the owner of the soil could not recover their value from the bona fide possessor. The mala fide possessor, on the contrary, was obliged to give the value even of those that were consumed (restituere fructus consumptos).

There seems little doubt that the interest of the bona fide possessor extended over all the fruits of the land, and not only over those produced by his cultivation and care (see D. xli. 1. 48), although Pomponius (D. xxii. 1. 45) seems to limit it to the latter.

36. Is, ad quem usufructus fundi pertinet, non aliter fructuum dominus efficitur, quam si eos ipse perceperit. Et ideo licet maturis fructibus, nondum tamen perceptis, decesserit, ad heredem ejus non per-

36. The usufructuary of land does not become owner of the fruits until he has himself gathered them; and therefore, if he should die while the fruits, although ripe, are yet ungathered, they do not belong to his heir, but are tinent, sed domino proprietatis adquiruntur. Eadem fere et de colono dicuntur.

the property of the owner of the soil. And nearly the same may be said of the farmer.

The interest of the usufructuary has a special Title (Tit. 4) devoted to it, and all remarks upon it may be reserved till we arrive at that Title.

Eadem fere. The heirs of the colonus (here used for any person farming land let to him) could gather fruits not gathered by him, for his rights did not perish with him; but the ungathered fruits were legally the property of the owner, and the farmer had to sue through him if they were taken away. (D. xix. 2. 60. 5; C. iv. 65. 10.)

37. In pecudum fructu etiam fetus est, sicuti lac et pilus et lana: itaque agni et hœdi et vituli et equuli statim naturali jure domini sunt fructuarii. Partus vero ancillæ in fructu non est, itaque ad dominum proprietatis pertinet; absurdum enim videbatur, hominem in fructu esse, cum omnes fructus rerum natura hominum gratia comparavit.

37. In the fruits of animals are included their young, as well as their milk, hair, and wool; and therefore lambs, kids, calves, and colts, immediately on their birth become, by the law of nature, the property of the usufructuary; but the offspring of a female slave is not reckoned among fruits, but belongs to the owner of the property. For it seemed absurd that man should be reckoned among fruits, when it is for man's benefit that all fruits are provided by nature.

D. xxii. 1. 28.

Ulpian gives as a reason for the children of slaves not being in fructu, that non temere ancillæ ejus rei causa comparantur, ut pariant. (D. v. 3. 27.) There were, however, many animals, cows or mares for instance, used for draught, that could not be said to be expressly destined to bear offspring, and yet their offspring was in fructu.

38. Sed si gregis usumfructum quis habeat, in locum demortuorum capitum ex fetu fructuarius summittere debet, ut et Juliano visum est, et in vinearum demortuorum vel arborum locum alias debet substituere. Recte enim colere debet et quasi bonus paterfamilias uti.

38. The usufructuary of a flock ought to replace any of the flock that may happen to die, by supplying the deficiency out of the young, as Julian too was of opinion. So, too, the usufructuary ought to supply the place of dead vines or trees. For he ought to cultivate with care, and to use everything as a good paterfamilias would use it.

This paragraph relates entirely to the subject of Title 4.

39. Thesaurus, quos quis in suo loco invenerit, divus Hadrianus, naturalem æquitatem secutus, ei concessit, qui invenerit. Idemque statuit, si quis in sacro aut in religioso loco fortuito casu invenerit. At si quis in alieno loco non data ad hoc opera, sed fortuito invenerit, dimi-

39. The Emperor Hadrian, in accordance with natural equity, allowed any treasure found by a man in his own land to belong to the finder, as also any treasure found by chance in a sacred or religious place. But if any one found treasure without any express search, but by mere chance, in a place tinent, sed domino proprietatis adquiruntur. Eadem fere et de colono dicuntur.

the property of the owner of the soil. And nearly the same may be said of the farmer.

The interest of the usufructuary has a special Title (Tit. 4) devoted to it, and all remarks upon it may be reserved till we arrive at that Title.

Eadem fere. The heirs of the colonus (here used for any person farming land let to him) could gather fruits not gathered by him, for his rights did not perish with him; but the ungathered fruits were legally the property of the owner, and the farmer had to sue through him if they were taken away. (D. xix. 2. 60. 5; C. iv. 65. 10.)

37. In pecudum fructu etiam fetus est, sicuti lac et pilus et lana: itaque agni et hœdi et vituli et equuli statim naturali jure domini sunt fructuarii. Partus vero ancillæ in fructu non est, itaque ad dominum proprietatis pertinet; absurdum enim videbatur, hominem in fructu esse, cum omnes fructus rerum natura hominum gratia comparavit.

37. In the fruits of animals are included their young, as well as their milk, hair, and wool; and therefore lambs, kids, calves, and colts, immediately on their birth become, by the law of nature, the property of the usufructuary; but the offspring of a female slave is not reckoned among fruits, but belongs to the owner of the property. For it seemed absurd that man should be reckoned among fruits, when it is for man's benefit that all fruits are provided by nature.

D. xxii. 1. 28.

Ulpian gives as a reason for the children of slaves not being in fructu, that non temere ancillæ ejus rei causa comparantur, ut pariant. (D. v. 3. 27.) There were, however, many animals, cows or mares for instance, used for draught, that could not be said to be expressly destined to bear offspring, and yet their offspring was in fructu.

38. Sed si gregis usumfructum quis habeat, in locum demortuorum capitum ex fetu fructuarius summittere debet, ut et Juliano visum est, et in vinearum demortuorum vel arborum locum alias debet substituere. Recte enim colere debet et quasi bonus paterfamilias uti.

38. The usufructuary of a flock ought to replace any of the flock that may happen to die, by supplying the deficiency out of the young, as Julian too was of opinion. So, too, the usufructuary ought to supply the place of dead vines or trees. For he ought to cultivate with care, and to use everything as a good paterfamilias would use it.

This paragraph relates entirely to the subject of Title 4.

39. Thesaurus, quos quis in suo loco invenerit, divus Hadrianus, naturalem æquitatem secutus, ei concessit, qui invenerit. Idemque statuit, si quis in sacro aut in religioso loco fortuito casu invenerit. At si quis in alieno loco non data ad hoc opera, sed fortuito invenerit, dimi-

39. The Emperor Hadrian, in accordance with natural equity, allowed any treasure found by a man in his own land to belong to the finder, as also any treasure found by chance in a sacred or religious place. But if any one found treasure without any express search, but by mere chance, in a place

dium domino soli concessit. Et convenienter, si quis in Cæsaris loco invenerit, dimidium inventoris, dimidium Cæsaris esse statuit. Cui conveniens est, et si quis in publico loco vel fiscali invenerit, dimidium ipsius esse, dimidium fisci vel civitatis.

belonging to another, the emperor granted half to the finder and half to the proprietor of the soil; and on the same principle he ordered that, if anything was found in a place belonging to the emperor, half should belong to the finder, and half to the emperor. And consistently with this, if a man finds anything in a place belonging to a city or to the fiscus, half belongs to the finder, and half to the fiscus or the city.

D. xli. 1. 63. pr.; D. xlix. 14. 3. 10.

Thesaurus, says Paul (D. xli. 1. 31. 1), est vetus quedam depositio pecunie (that is, of anything valuable), cujus non extat memoria, ut jam dominum non habeat. Of course if it was known who placed it there, it was known to whom it belonged. But a treasure, though its depositor was unknown, was not considered exactly as a res nullius. The owner of the land in which it was found had always some interest in it. If he found it himself, it all belonged to him; if another person found it, the finder and the owner of the land divided it equally. When there was no owner of the land, as when the place was sacred or religious, the finder took it all. But no one was allowed to make the search for treasure an excuse for digging up tombs and sacred places, or for digging up other men's ground; and therefore it was only when the discovery was quite accidental, and the finder had made no search for it, that the treasure, or the half of it, as the case might be, was permitted to belong to him.

40. Per traditionem quoque jure naturali res nobis adquiruntur: nihil enim tam conveniens est naturali æquitati, quam voluntatem domini, volentis rem suam in alium transferre, ratam haberi. Et ideo ejuscumque generis sit corporalis res, tradi potest et a domino tradita alienatur. Itaque stipendiaria quoque et tributaria prædia eodem modo alienantur. Vocantur autem stipendiaria et tributaria prædia, quæ in provinciis sunt, inter quæ nec non Italica prædia ex nostra constitutione nulla differentia est.

40. Another mode of acquiring things according to natural law is tradition; for nothing is more conformable to natural equity than that the wishes of a person, who is desirous to transfer his property to another, should be confirmed. And therefore corporeal things, of whatever kind, may be passed by tradition, and, when so passed by their owner, are made the property of another. In this way are alienated stipendiary and tributary lands, that is, lands in the provinces, between which and Italian lands there is now, by our constitution, no difference.

D. xli. 1. 9. 3; C. vii. 31.

Before the property in a thing could be transferred from one person to another, it was necessary that the process should be complete in four points:—1. The person who transferred it must be the owner; 2. He must place the person to whom he transferred it in legal possession of the thing; 3. He must transfer the dium domino soli concessit. Et convenienter, si quis in Cæsaris loco invenerit, dimidium inventoris, dimidium Cæsaris esse statuit. Cui conveniens est, et si quis in publico loco vel fiscali invenerit, dimidium ipsius esse, dimidium fisci vel civitatis.

belonging to another, the emperor granted half to the finder and half to the proprietor of the soil; and on the same principle he ordered that, if anything was found in a place belonging to the emperor, half should belong to the finder, and half to the emperor. And consistently with this, if a man finds anything in a place belonging to a city or to the fiscus, half belongs to the finder, and half to the fiscus or the city.

D. xli. 1. 63. pr.; D. xlix. 14. 3. 10.

Thesaurus, says Paul (D. xli. 1. 31. 1), est vetus quædam depositio pecunie (that is, of anything valuable), cujus non extat memoria, ut jam dominum non habeat. Of course if it was known who placed it there, it was known to whom it belonged. But a treasure, though its depositor was unknown, was not considered exactly as a res nullius. The owner of the land in which it was found had always some interest in it. If he found it himself, it all belonged to him; if another person found it, the finder and the owner of the land divided it equally. When there was no owner of the land, as when the place was sacred or religious, the finder took it all. But no one was allowed to make the search for treasure an excuse for digging up tombs and sacred places, or for digging up other men's ground; and therefore it was only when the discovery was quite accidental, and the finder had made no search for it, that the treasure, or the half of it, as the case might be, was permitted to belong to him.

40. Per traditionem quoque jure naturali res nobis adquiruntur: nihil enim tam conveniens est naturali æquitati, quam voluntatem domini, volentis rem suam in alium transferre, ratam haberi. Et ideo ejuscumque generis sit corporalis res, tradi potest et a domino tradita alienatur. Itaque stipendiaria quoque et tributaria prædia eodem modo alienantur. Vocantur autem stipendiaria et tributaria prædia, quæ in provinciis sunt, inter quæ nec non Italica prædia ex nostra constitutione nulla differentia est.

40. Another mode of acquiring things according to natural law is tradition; for nothing is more conformable to natural equity than that the wishes of a person, who is desirous to transfer his property to another, should be confirmed. And therefore corporeal things, of whatever kind, may be passed by tradition, and, when so passed by their owner, are made the property of another. In this way are alienated stipendiary and tributary lands, that is, lands in the provinces, between which and Italian lands there is now, by our constitution, no difference.

D. xli. 1. 9. 3; C. vii. 31.

Before the property in a thing could be transferred from one person to another, it was necessary that the process should be complete in four points:—1. The person who transferred it must be the owner; 2. He must place the person to whom he transferred it in legal possession of the thing; 3. He must transfer the thing with intention to pass the property in it; 4. The person to whom it was transferred must receive it with intention to become the owner.

The placing another in legal possession of a thing was termed the traditio of that thing. In the simplest case, that of a portable moveable, the owner might really hand over the thing to the person who was to become its possessor; but in no case was it necessary that this should be done; what was necessary was that the party who was to receive it should have the thing in his power, and that the two parties should express, in any way whatever, the wish of the one to transfer, of the other to accept, the possession. The thing need not be touched; land, for instance, need not be entered on; but the person who was to be placed in possession must have the thing before him, so as to be able, by a physical act, to exercise power over it. (See SAVIGNY on Possession, Bk. ii. secs. 16 and 17.)

Property could not be transferred by mere agreement. (Traditionibus et usucapionibus dominia rerum, non nudis pactis, transferuntur. C. ii. §. 20.) The agreement was but the expression of the intention of the parties; and this was ineffectual unless it was accompanied by the party being placed in possession to whom the thing was to be transferred.

Prædia stipendiaria were provincial lands belonging to the people, tributaria provincial lands belonging to the emperor. (GAI. ii. 21.) It will be remembered that so long as the distinction remained between Italian and provincial land the Italicum solum was a res mancipi, and could only be transferred by the peculiar form of mancipatio. (See Introd. sec. 59.) The distinction had long been obsolete, and was formally abolished by Justinian. (C. vii. 31.)

41. Sed si quidem ex causa donationis aut dotis aut qualibet alia ex causa tradantur, sine dubio transferuntur: venditæ vero et traditæ non aliter emptori adquirentur, quam si is venditori pretium solverit vel alio modo ei satisfecerit, veluti expromissore aut pignore dato. Quod cavetur quidem etiam lege duodecim tabularum: tamen recte dicitur et jure gentium, id est jure naturali, id effici. Sed et si is, qui vendidit, fidem emptoris secutus fuerit, dicendum est, statim rem emptoris fieri.

41. If things are delivered by way of gift or as a dos or for any other purpose, the property in them is no doubt transferred. But things sold and delivered are not acquired by the buyer until he has paid the seller the price, or satisfied him in some way or other, as by procuring some third person who promises to pay, or by giving a pledge. And, although this is provided by a law of the Twelve Tables, yet it may be rightly said to spring from the law of nations, that is, the law of nature. But if the seller has accepted the credit of the buyer, the thing then becomes immediately the property of the buyer.

D. xviii. 1. 19. 53.

The seller would generally not have the intention to transfer the property until he received the price; but he might be content to look to another person for the payment of the price, or he might choose to accept the credit of the buyer instead of the price itself;

thing with intention to pass the property in it; 4. The person to whom it was transferred must receive it with intention to become the owner.

The placing another in legal possession of a thing was termed the traditio of that thing. In the simplest case, that of a portable moveable, the owner might really hand over the thing to the person who was to become its possessor; but in no case was it necessary that this should be done; what was necessary was that the party who was to receive it should have the thing in his power, and that the two parties should express, in any way whatever, the wish of the one to transfer, of the other to accept, the possession. The thing need not be touched; land, for instance, need not be entered on; but the person who was to be placed in possession must have the thing before him, so as to be able, by a physical act, to exercise power over it. (See SAVIGNY on Possession, Bk. ii. secs. 16 and 17.)

Property could not be transferred by mere agreement. (Traditionibus et usucapionibus dominia rerum, non nudis pactis, transferuntur. C. ii. §. 30.) The agreement was but the expression of the intention of the parties; and this was ineffectual unless it was accompanied by the party being placed in possession to whom the thing was to be transferred.

Prædia stipendiaria were provincial lands belonging to the people, tributaria provincial lands belonging to the emperor. (GAI. ii. 21.) It will be remembered that so long as the distinction remained between Italian and provincial land the Italicum solum was a res mancipi, and could only be transferred by the peculiar form of mancipatio. (See Introd. sec. 59.) The distinction had long been obsolete, and was formally abolished by Justinian. (C. vii. 31.)

41. Sed si quidem ex causa donationis aut dotis aut qualibet alia ex causa tradantur, sine dubio transferuntur: venditæ vero et traditæ non aliter emptori adquiruntur, quam si is venditori pretium solverit vel alio modo ei satisfecerit, veluti expromissore aut pignore dato. Quod cavetur quidem etiam lege duodecim tabularum: tamen recte dicitur et jure gentium, id est jure naturali, id effici. Sed et si is, qui vendidit, fidem emptoris secutus fuerit, dicendum est, statim rem emptoris fieri.

41. If things are delivered by way of gift or as a dos or for any other purpose, the property in them is no doubt transferred. But things sold and delivered are not acquired by the buyer until he has paid the seller the price, or satisfied him in some way or other, as by procuring some third person who promises to pay, or by giving a pledge. And, although this is provided by a law of the Twelve Tables, yet it may be rightly said to spring from the law of nations, that is, the law of nature. But if the seller has accepted the credit of the buyer, the thing then becomes immediately the property of the buyer.

D. xviii. 1. 19. 53.

The seller would generally not have the intention to transfer the property until he received the price; but he might be content to look to another person for the payment of the price, or he might choose to accept the credit of the buyer instead of the price itself;

and if, in either of these cases, he intended to pass the property, it would pass at once, irrespectively of the price being paid. For the meaning of expromissor, see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3.

42. Nihil autem interest, utrum ipse dominus tradat alicui rem, an voluntate ejus alius.

42. It is immaterial whether the owner delivers the thing himself or some one else by his desire.

D. xli. 1. 9. 4.

43. Qua ratione, si cui libera negotiorum administratio a domino permissa fuerit isque ex his negotiis rem vendiderit et tradiderit, facit eam accipientis.

43. Hence, if any one is entrusted by an owner with the uncontrolled administration of his goods, and he sells and delivers anything which is a part of these goods, he passes the property in it to the person who receives the thing.

D. xli. 1. 9. 4.

By the will of the owner, the manager of the property is able to deal with it; and if he deals with it, the will of the owner is expressed through him.

44. Interdum etiam sine traditione nuda voluntas sufficit domini ad rem transferendam, veluti si rem, quam tibi aliquis commodavit aut locavit aut apud te deposuit, vendiderit tibi aut donaverit. Quamvis enim ex ea causa tibi eam non tradiderit, eo tamen ipso, quod patitur tuam esse, statim acquiritur tibi proprietate perinde ac si eo nomine tradita fuisset.

44. Sometimes even the mere wish of the owner, without tradition, is sufficient to transfer the property in a thing, as when a person has lent or let to you anything, or deposited anything with you, and then afterwards sells or gives it to you. For, although he has not delivered it to you by way of sale or gift, yet by the mere fact of his consenting to its becoming yours, you instantly acquire the property in it, as fully as if it had actually been delivered to you for the express purpose of passing the property.

D. xli. 1. 9. 5.

When the person to whom the property in the thing was transferred was already in physical possession of the thing, then, if the wishes of the parties to give and to receive the property in it were added to this, and the person who affected to give the property was the real owner, all the conditions of a transfer were complete. It made no difference what was their respective order in time. Generally the expression of will would precede the placing in possession, but not necessarily. When the person to whom the property in the thing was transferred had only the mere detention of the thing, that is, had it in his keeping and power as a hirer or depositary would have, but had not also the intention of dealing with it as an owner, all that was necessary to change this detention into possession and ownership was a change in the animus with which it was held. The intention to hold it as an owner was sufficiently shown by accepting the transfer of the property. The person, in like manner, who transferred the property, by doing so sufficiently showed his intention of placing the other in possession.

and if, in either of these cases, he intended to pass the property, it would pass at once, irrespectively of the price being paid. For the meaning of expromissor, see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 3.

42. Nihil autem interest, utrum ipse dominus tradat alicui rem, an voluntate ejus alius.

42. It is immaterial whether the owner delivers the thing himself or some one else by his desire.

D. xli. 1. 9. 4.

43. Qua ratione, si cui libera negotiorum administratio a domino permissa fuerit isque ex his negotiis rem vendiderit et tradiderit, facit eam accipientis.

43. Hence, if any one is entrusted by an owner with the uncontrolled administration of his goods, and he sells and delivers anything which is a part of these goods, he passes the property in it to the person who receives the thing.

D. xli. 1. 9. 4.

By the will of the owner, the manager of the property is able to deal with it; and if he deals with it, the will of the owner is expressed through him.

44. Interdum etiam sine traditione nuda voluntas sufficit domini ad rem transferendam, veluti si rem, quam tibi aliquis commodavit aut locavit aut apud te deposuit, vendiderit tibi aut donaverit. Quamvis enim ex ea causa tibi eam non tradiderit, eo tamen ipso, quod patitur tuam esse, statim acquiritur tibi proprietate perinde ac si eo nomine tradita fuisset.

44. Sometimes even the mere wish of the owner, without tradition, is sufficient to transfer the property in a thing, as when a person has lent or let to you anything, or deposited anything with you, and then afterwards sells or gives it to you. For, although he has not delivered it to you by way of sale or gift, yet by the mere fact of his consenting to its becoming yours, you instantly acquire the property in it, as fully as if it had actually been delivered to you for the express purpose of passing the property.

D. xli. 1. 9. 5.

When the person to whom the property in the thing was transferred was already in physical possession of the thing, then, if the wishes of the parties to give and to receive the property in it were added to this, and the person who affected to give the property was the real owner, all the conditions of a transfer were complete. It made no difference what was their respective order in time. Generally the expression of will would precede the placing in possession, but not necessarily. When the person to whom the property in the thing was transferred had only the mere detention of the thing, that is, had it in his keeping and power as a hirer or depositary would have, but had not also the intention of dealing with it as an owner, all that was necessary to change this detention into possession and ownership was a change in the animus with which it was held. The intention to hold it as an owner was sufficiently shown by accepting the transfer of the property. The person, in like manner, who transferred the property, by doing so sufficiently showed his intention of placing the other in possession.

Thus the different elements of traditio were broken up and separated, not, as usual, united in a single act; and this is what is meant in the text by saying the property passes sine traditione.

45. Item si quis merces in horreo depositas vendiderit, simul atque claves horrei tradiderit emptori, transfert proprietatem mercium ad emptorem.

45. So, too, any one, who has sold goods deposited in a warehouse, as soon as he has handed over the keys of the warehouse to the buyer, transfers to the buyer the property in the goods.

D. xli. 1. 9. 6.

Apparently, if we may judge from the statement of Papinian, it was also requisite that the key should be given apud horrea, at the warehouse (D. xviii. 1. 74). A person who was at the warehouse and had the key in his hand was in a position to exercise immediate power over the contents of the warehouse; the goods were in his custody, and he was thus placed in possession of them. The key was not symbolical, but was the means by which he was enabled to deal with the goods as an owner.

46. Hoc amplius interdum et in incertam personam collocata voluntas domini transfert rei proprietatem: ut ecce prætores vel consules, qui missilia jactant in vulgus, ignorant, quid eorum quisque excepturus sit, et tamen, quia volunt, quod quisque exceperit, ejus esse, statim eum dominum efficiunt.

46. Nay, more, sometimes the intention of an owner, although directed only towards an uncertain person, transfers the property in a thing. For instance, when the prætors or consuls throw their largesses to the mob, they do not know what each person in the mob will get; but as it is their intention that each should have what he gets, they make what each gets immediately belong to him.

D. xli. 1. 9. 7.

47. Qua ratione verius esse videtur et, si rem pro derelicto a domino habitam occupaverit quis, statim eum dominum effici. Pro derelicto autem habetur, quod dominus ea mente abjecerit, ut id rerum suarum esse nollet, ideoque statim dominus esse desinit.

47. Accordingly, it is quite true to say that anything which is seized on, when it has been treated as abandoned by its owner, becomes immediately the property of the person who takes possession of it. And anything is considered as abandoned, which its owner has thrown away with the intention no longer to have it as a part of his property; for thereby it immediately ceases to belong to him.

D. xli. 7. 1.

It might seem as if the property in things abandoned was transferred, like that in things thrown to the mob, by the wish of the owner to transfer it to the person who should first take possession of it; but it is much more natural to consider, with the text, that the thing becomes a res nullius by being abandoned, and the property of the first occupant by being taken possession of.

48. Alia causa est earum rerum, quæ in tempestate maris levandæ navis causa ejiciuntur. Hæ enim

48. It is otherwise with respect to things thrown overboard in a storm, to lighten a vessel; for they re-

Thus the different elements of traditio were broken up and separated, not, as usual, united in a single act; and this is what is meant in the text by saying the property passes sine traditione.

45. Item si quis merces in horreo depositas vendiderit, simul atque claves horrei tradiderit emptori, transfert proprietatem mercium ad emptorem.

45. So, too, any one, who has sold goods deposited in a warehouse, as soon as he has handed over the keys of the warehouse to the buyer, transfers to the buyer the property in the goods.

D. xli. 1. 9. 6.

Apparently, if we may judge from the statement of Papinian, it was also requisite that the key should be given apud horrea, at the warehouse (D. xviii. 1. 74). A person who was at the warehouse and had the key in his hand was in a position to exercise immediate power over the contents of the warehouse; the goods were in his custody, and he was thus placed in possession of them. The key was not symbolical, but was the means by which he was enabled to deal with the goods as an owner.

46. Hoc amplius interdum et in incertam personam collocata voluntas domini transfert rei proprietatem: ut ecce prætores vel consules, qui missilia jactant in vulgus, ignorant, quid eorum quisque excepturus sit, et tamen, quia volunt, quod quisque exceperit, ejus esse, statim eum dominum efficiunt.

46. Nay, more, sometimes the intention of an owner, although directed only towards an uncertain person, transfers the property in a thing. For instance, when the prætors or consuls throw their largesses to the mob, they do not know what each person in the mob will get; but as it is their intention that each should have what he gets, they make what each gets immediately belong to him.

D. xli. 1. 9. 7.

47. Qua ratione verius esse videtur et, si rem pro derelicto a domino habitam occupaverit quis, statim eum dominum effici. Pro derelicto autem habetur, quod dominus ea mente abjecerit, ut id rerum suarum esse nollet, ideoque statim dominus esse desinit.

47. Accordingly, it is quite true to say that anything which is seized on, when it has been treated as abandoned by its owner, becomes immediately the property of the person who takes possession of it. And anything is considered as abandoned, which its owner has thrown away with the intention no longer to have it as a part of his property; for thereby it immediately ceases to belong to him.

D. xli. 7. 1.

It might seem as if the property in things abandoned was transferred, like that in things thrown to the mob, by the wish of the owner to transfer it to the person who should first take possession of it; but it is much more natural to consider, with the text, that the thing becomes a res nullius by being abandoned, and the property of the first occupant by being taken possession of.

48. Alia causa est earum rerum, quæ in tempestate maris levandæ navis causa ejiciuntur. Hæ enim

48. It is otherwise with respect to things thrown overboard in a storm, to lighten a vessel, for they re-

dominorum permanent, quia palam est, eas non eo animo ejici, quo quis eas habere non vult, sed quo magis cum ipsa navi periculum maris effugiat: qua de causa si quis eas fluctibus expulsas vel etiam in ipso mari nactus lucrandi animo abstulerit, furtum committit. Nec longe discedere videntur ab his, quæ de rheda currente, non intelligentibus dominis, cadunt.

the property of their owners; as it is evident that they are not thrown away through a wish to get rid of them, but in order that their owner, together with the ship itself, may more easily escape the dangers of the sea. Hence, any one who, with a view to profit himself by such things, takes them away when washed on shore, or when he has found them in the sea, is guilty of theft. And much the same may be said as to things which drop from a carriage in motion, without the knowledge of their owners.

D. xli. 1. 9. 8; D. xlvii. 43. 4.

A thing could not be considered as abandoned and made a res nullius unless its owner intended to cease to be its owner.

TIT. II. DE REBUS INCORPORALIBUS.

Quædam præterea res corporales sunt, quædam incorporales.

Certain things, again, are corporeal, others incorporeal.

GAL. ii. 12; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

Justinian, after having spoken of the natural modes of acquiring property in things, returns in this Title to the division of things, and adds one more division, that of things corporeal and incorporeal, to the divisions given at the beginning of the last Title. Our senses tell us what things corporeal are: things incorporeal are rights, that is, fixed relations in which men stand to things or to other men, relations giving them power over things or claims against persons. And these rights are themselves the objects of rights, and thus fall under the definition of things. For instance, the right to walk over another man's land is said to be an incorporeal thing; for we may have a claim or right to have this right, exactly as, if the land belonged to us, we should have a right to have the land. These rights over things were termed jura in rem, and these jura in rem, some of the more important of which are treated of in this part of the Institutes, were almost exactly on the footing of 'res' in Roman law, and were the subjects of real actions equally with things corporeal. (See Introd. sec. 50.) This language of Roman law is rather in accordance with popular language and practical convenience than theoretically accurate. Strictly speaking, the ownership of a field is just as much incorporeal as the ownership of a right of way over a field, and in both cases the law only treats of the corporeal thing, the field, with reference to the incorporeal rights.

We can hardly speak of the possession of a thing incorporeal, but still the actual exercise of the right so much resembles the occupation and using of a corporeal thing, that the term quasi-possessio has been employed to denote the position of a person dominorum permanent, quia palam est, eas non eo animo ejici, quo quis eas habere non vult, sed quo magis cum ipsa navi periculum maris effugiat: qua de causa si quis eas fluctibus expulsas vel etiam in ipso mari nactus lucrandi animo abstulerit, furtum committit. Nec longe discedere videntur ab his, quæ de rheda currente, non intellegendis dominis, cadunt.

the property of their owners; as it is evident that they are not thrown away through a wish to get rid of them, but in order that their owner, together with the ship itself, may more easily escape the dangers of the sea. Hence, any one who, with a view to profit himself by such things, takes them away when washed on shore, or when he has found them in the sea, is guilty of theft. And much the same may be said as to things which drop from a carriage in motion, without the knowledge of their owners.

D. xli. 1. 9. 8; D. xlvii. 43. 4.

A thing could not be considered as abandoned and made a res nullius unless its owner intended to cease to be its owner.

TIT. II. DE REBUS INCORPORALIBUS.

Quædam præterea res corporales sunt, quædam incorporales.

Certain things, again, are corporeal, others incorporeal.

GAI. ii. 12; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

Justinian, after having spoken of the natural modes of acquiring property in things, returns in this Title to the division of things, and adds one more division, that of things corporeal and incorporeal, to the divisions given at the beginning of the last Title. Our senses tell us what things corporeal are: things incorporeal are rights, that is, fixed relations in which men stand to things or to other men, relations giving them power over things or claims against persons. And these rights are themselves the objects of rights, and thus fall under the definition of things. For instance, the right to walk over another man's land is said to be an incorporeal thing; for we may have a claim or right to have this right, exactly as, if the land belonged to us, we should have a right to have the land. These rights over things were termed jura in rem, and these jura in rem, some of the more important of which are treated of in this part of the Institutes, were almost exactly on the footing of 'res' in Roman law, and were the subjects of real actions equally with things corporeal. (See Introd. sec. 50.) This language of Roman law is rather in accordance with popular language and practical convenience than theoretically accurate. Strictly speaking, the ownership of a field is just as much incorporeal as the ownership of a right of way over a field, and in both cases the law only treats of the corporeal thing, the field, with reference to the incorporeal rights.

We can hardly speak of the possession of a thing incorporeal, but still the actual exercise of the right so much resembles the occupation and using of a corporeal thing, that the term quasi-possessio has been employed to denote the position of a person who exercises the right without opposition, and exercises it as if he was its owner. As little can we speak of the traditio or delivery of a right; but just as quasi-possessio is used to express a position analogous to that of a possessor, so quasi-traditio is a term used to signify the placing of a person in this position.

1. Corporales eæ sunt, quæ sui natura tangi possunt: veluti fundus, homo, vestis, aurum, argentum et denique aliæ res innumerabiles.

1. Corporeal things are those which are by their nature tangible, as land, a slave, a garment, gold, silver, and other things innumerable.

GAI. ii. 13; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

2. Incorporales autem sunt, quæ tangi non possunt. Qualia sunt ea, quæ in jure consistunt: sicut hereditas, usufructus, usus, obligationes quoquo modo contractæ. Nec ad rem pertinet, quod in hereditate res corporales continentur: nam et fructus, qui ex fundo percipiuntur, corporales sunt et id, quod ex aliqua obligatione nobis debetur; plerumque corporale est, veluti fundus, homo, pecunia: nam ipsum jus hereditatis et ipsum jus utendifruendi et ipsum jus obligationis incorporale est.

2. Incorporal things are those which are not tangible. They are such as consist in a right, as an inheritance, a usufruct, a use, or obligations in whatever way contracted. Nor does it make any difference that things corporeal are contained in an inheritance; for fruits, gathered by the usufructuary, are corporeal; and that which is due to us by virtue of an obligation, is generally a corporeal thing, as a field, a slave, or money; while the right of inheritance, the right of usufruct, and the right of obligation, are incorporeal.

GAI. ii. 14; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

3. Eodem numero sunt jura prædiorum urbanorum et rusticorum, quæ et servitutes vocantur.

3. Among things incorporeal are the rights over estates, urban and rural, which are also called servitudes.

GAI. ii. 14; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

In the last section it was said that usufruct, a personal servitude, was an incorporeal thing, and the same is now said of real or prædial servitudes. This is intended as an observation preliminary to the next three Titles, which treat of servitudes. (By servitudes are meant certain portions or fragments of the right of ownership separated from the rest, and enjoyed by persons other than the owner of the thing itself.) When the servitude was given to a particular person, it was said to be a personal servitude. When it was associated with the ownership of another thing, so that whoever was the owner of this other thing was the owner of the servitude, the servitude was said to be a real or prædial servitude; the latter term being used because it was indispensable that there should be an immoveable thing (see paragraph 3 of next Title), in virtue of which the right given by the servitude was exercised; and the word prædium, being taken in a general sense, was used to denote this immoveable. The thing over which the prædial servitude was exercised was also always an immoveable. Things over which servitudes, whether personal or prædial, were exercised, were said to serve the person to whom or the thing to which the servitude was attached; and hence the terms servitus, res serviens, who exercises the right without opposition, and exercises it as if he was its owner. As little can we speak of the traditio or delivery of a right; but just as quasi-possessio is used to express a position analogous to that of a possessor, so quasi-traditio is a term used to signify the placing of a person in this position.

1. Corporales eæ sunt, quæ sui natura tangi possunt: veluti fundus, homo, vestis, aurum, argentum et denique aliæ res innumerabiles.

1. Corporeal things are those which are by their nature tangible, as land, a slave, a garment, gold, silver, and other things innumerable.

GAI. ii. 13; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

2. Incorporales autem sunt, quæ tangi non possunt. Qualia sunt ea, quæ in jure consistunt: sicut hereditas, usufructus, usus, obligationes quoquo modo contractæ. Nec ad rem pertinet, quod in hereditate res corporales continentur: nam et fructus, qui ex fundo percipiuntur, corporales sunt et id, quod ex aliqua obligatione nobis debetur; plerumque corporale est, veluti fundus, homo, pecunia: nam ipsum jus hereditatis et ipsum jus utendifruendi et ipsum jus obligationis incorporale est.

2. Incorporal things are those which are not tangible. They are such as consist in a right, as an inheritance, a usufruct, a use, or obligations in whatever way contracted. Nor does it make any difference that things corporeal are contained in an inheritance; for fruits, gathered by the usufructuary, are corporeal; and that which is due to us by virtue of an obligation, is generally a corporeal thing, as a field, a slave, or money; while the right of inheritance, the right of usufruct, and the right of obligation, are incorporeal.

GAI. ii. 14; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

3. Eodem numero sunt jura prædiorum urbanorum et rusticorum, quæ et servitutes vocantur.

3. Among things incorporeal are the rights over estates, urban and rural, which are also called servitudes.

GAI. ii. 14; D. i. 8. 1. 1.

In the last section it was said that usufruct, a personal servitude, was an incorporeal thing, and the same is now said of real or prædial servitudes. This is intended as an observation preliminary to the next three Titles, which treat of servitudes. (By servitudes are meant certain portions or fragments of the right of ownership separated from the rest, and enjoyed by persons other than the owner of the thing itself.) When the servitude was given to a particular person, it was said to be a personal servitude. When it was associated with the ownership of another thing, so that whoever was the owner of this other thing was the owner of the servitude, the servitude was said to be a real or prædial servitude; the latter term being used because it was indispensable that there should be an immoveable thing (see paragraph 3 of next Title), in virtue of which the right given by the servitude was exercised; and the word prædium, being taken in a general sense, was used to denote this immoveable. The thing over which the prædial servitude was exercised was also always an immoveable. Things over which servitudes, whether personal or prædial, were exercised, were said to serve the person to whom or the thing to which the servitude was attached; and hence the terms servitus, res serviens, were employed, the thing in right of which the servitude was enjoyed being, in opposition, termed res dominans. (See Introd. sec. 64.)

No one could have a servitude over his own thing, nulli res sua servit. (D. viii. 2. 26.) For as he was the owner of all the portions into which the right of ownership was separable, he could not have a second right of ownership over any one portion separated from the rest. Again, as a servitude was the subtraction of some one portion of ownership, it did not have the effect of making the owner of the res serviens do any positive act; its force was either to make him undergo something, as that another should exercise a certain power over a thing of which he was owner, or to make him abstain from doing something which as owner of the thing he had power to do. Servitutum non ea natura est ut aliquid faciat quis, sed ut aliquid patiatur aut non faciat. (D. viii. 1. 15. 1.) Lastly, it may be observed that a prædial servitude was indivisible; the person who enjoyed the servitude could not break up this fragment of ownership into lesser fragments, but a usufruct could be divided. 12-7-25

TIT. III. DE SERVITUTIBUS.

Rusticorum prædiorum jura sunt hæc: iter, actus, via, aquæ ductus. Iter est jus eundi, ambulandi homini, non etiam jumentum agendi vel vehiculum: actus est jus agendi vel jumentum vel vehiculum. Itaque qui iter habet, actum non habet; qui actum habet, et iter habet eoque uti potest etiam sine jumento. Via est jus eundi et agendi et ambulandi: nam et iter et actum in se via continet. Aquæ ductus est jus aquæ ducendæ per fundum alienum.

The servitudes of rural immoveables are, iter, actus, via, and aquæ ductus. Iter is the right of going or passing for a man, not of driving beasts or vehicles. Actus is the right of driving beasts or vehicles. So a man who has the right of passage simply has not the right of passage for beasts or vehicles; but if he has the latter right he has the former, and he may use the right of passage without having any beasts with him. Via is the right of going, of driving beasts or vehicles, and of walking; for the right of way includes the right of passage, and the right of passage for beasts or vehicles. Aquæ ductus is the right of conducting water through the land of another.

D. viii. 3. 1. pr.

For prædium there is no exact English equivalent. 'Estate' suffices when we are speaking of a prædium rusticum, but it is scarcely consonant with usage to speak of a house as an 'urban estate.' The French immeuble exactly corresponds to prædium, and, perhaps, by borrowing the term 'immoveable' we approach as nearly to prædium as the language will permit.

Prædial servitudes, that is, servitudes possessed over one immoveable in right of having another immoveable, were divided were employed, the thing in right of which the servitude was enjoyed being, in opposition, termed res dominans. (See Introd. sec. 64.)

No one could have a servitude over his own thing, nulli res sua servit. (D. viii. 2. 26.) For as he was the owner of all the portions into which the right of ownership was separable, he could not have a second right of ownership over any one portion separated from the rest. Again, as a servitude was the subtraction of some one portion of ownership, it did not have the effect of making the owner of the res serviens do any positive act; its force was either to make him undergo something, as that another should exercise a certain power over a thing of which he was owner, or to make him abstain from doing something which as owner of the thing he had power to do. Servitutum non ea natura est ut aliquid faciat quis, sed ut aliquid patiatur aut non faciat. (D. viii. 1. 15. 1.) Lastly, it may be observed that a prædial servitude was indivisible; the person who enjoyed the servitude could not break up this fragment of ownership into lesser fragments, but a usufruct could be divided. 12-7-25

TIT. III. DE SERVITUTIBUS.

Rusticorum prædiorum jura sunt hæc: iter, actus, via, aquæ ductus. Iter est jus eundi, ambulandi homini, non etiam jumentum agendi vel vehiculum: actus est jus agendi vel jumentum vel vehiculum. Itaque qui iter habet, actum non habet; qui actum habet, et iter habet eoque uti potest etiam sine jumento. Via est jus eundi et agendi et ambulandi: nam et iter et actum in se via continet. Aquæ ductus est jus aquæ ducendæ per fundum alienum.

The servitudes of rural immoveables are, iter, actus, via, and aquæ ductus. Iter is the right of going or passing for a man, not of driving beasts or vehicles. Actus is the right of driving beasts or vehicles. So a man who has the right of passage simply has not the right of passage for beasts or vehicles; but if he has the latter right he has the former, and he may use the right of passage without having any beasts with him. Via is the right of going, of driving beasts or vehicles, and of walking; for the right of way includes the right of passage, and the right of passage for beasts or vehicles. Aquæ ductus is the right of conducting water through the land of another.

D. viii. 3. 1. pr.

For prædium there is no exact English equivalent. 'Estate' suffices when we are speaking of a prædium rusticum, but it is scarcely consonant with usage to speak of a house as an 'urban estate.' The French immeuble exactly corresponds to prædium, and, perhaps, by borrowing the term 'immoveable' we approach as nearly to prædium as the language will permit.

Prædial servitudes, that is, servitudes possessed over one immoveable in right of having another immoveable, were divided into those of rural and urban immoveables (prædia rustica et urbana). The distinction undoubtedly arose from the one kind being more common in the country, the other in the town. But the distinction, as it was practically understood, soon lost the traces of its origin; and a servitude was said to be that of a rural immoveable when it was one which affected the soil itself, and that of an urban immoveable when it was one which affected the superficies, that is, anything raised upon the soil. Servitutes prædiorum alie in solo, alie in superficie consistunt. (D. viii. 1. 3.) If the servitude was one which affected the soil, and for the enjoyment of which the soil itself sufficed, as, for instance, the right to traverse another man's land, or to draw water from his spring, it made no difference where the land or the spring was situated. They might be in the heart of a city, and yet the servitude was one of a rural immoveable. So, too, if the servitude was one which affected something built or placed on the soil, as, for instance, the right to place a beam in another man's building; although this building was in the country, the servitude was one of an urban immoveable. In this paragraph and in paragraph 2, instances are given of servitudes of rural immoveables. The object of the servitude iter was the right of passing across land on foot or horseback: iter est quæ quis pedes vel eques commovere potest. (D. viii. 3. 12.) That of the servitude actus was the right of driving animals or vehicles across land: qui actum habet et plaustrum ducere et jumenta agere potest. (D. viii. 3. 7. pr.) That of the servitude via was the right of using the road in any way whatever, as, for instance, of dragging stones or timber over it, which he could not do if he had only the actus (D. viii. 3. 7. pr.); and of having the road, in the absence of special agreement, of the width provided by the law of the Twelve Tables, that is, eight feet where it ran straight, and sixteen feet where it wound round to change its direction: viæ latitudo ex lege Duodecim Tabularum in porrectum octo pedes habet; in anfractum, id est, ubi flexum est, sedecim. (D. viii. 3. 8.) Of course the larger of these rights comprehended the smaller; if a person had the right of driving over land, he had the right of passing over it. A special agreement might indeed be made to the contrary; a person might, for instance, grant the right of driving beasts, but insist that the way should never be used except when beasts were driven.

1. Prædiorum urbanorum sunt servitutes, quæ ædificiis inhaerent, ideo urbanorum prædiorum dictæ, quoniam ædificia omnia urbana prædia appellantur, etsi in villa ædificata sunt. Item prædiorum urbanorum servitutes sunt hæc: ut vicinus onera vicini sustineat: ut in parietem, ejus liceat vicino tignum immittere: ut stillicidium vel flumen recipiat quis in ædes suas vel in

1. The servitudes of urban immoveables are those which appertain to buildings, and they are said to be servitudes of urban immoveables, because we term all edifices urban immoveables, although really built in the country. Among these servitudes are the following: that a person has to support the weight of the adjoining house; that a neighbour should have the right of inserting a beam into his neighbour's

urban Pr

scrib

scrib

scrib

scrib

scrib

scrib

scrib

scrib

into those of rural and urban immoveables (prædia rustica et urbana). The distinction undoubtedly arose from the one kind being more common in the country, the other in the town. But the distinction, as it was practically understood, soon lost the traces of its origin; and a servitude was said to be that of a rural immoveable when it was one which affected the soil itself, and that of an urban immoveable when it was one which affected the superficies, that is, anything raised upon the soil. Servitutes prædiorum aliae in solo, aliae in superficie consistunt. (D. viii. 1. 3.) If the servitude was one which affected the soil, and for the enjoyment of which the soil itself sufficed, as, for instance, the right to traverse another man's land, or to draw water from his spring, it made no difference where the land or the spring was situated. They might be in the heart of a city, and yet the servitude was one of a rural immoveable. So, too, if the servitude was one which affected something built or placed on the soil, as, for instance, the right to place a beam in another man's building; although this building was in the country, the servitude was one of an urban immoveable. In this paragraph and in paragraph 2, instances are given of servitudes of rural immoveables. The object of the servitude iter was the right of passing across land on foot or horseback: iter est qua quis pedes vel eques commovere potest. (D. viii. 3. 12.) That of the servitude actus was the right of driving animals or vehicles across land: qui actum habet et plaustrum ducere et jumenta agere potest. (D. viii. 3. 7. pr.) That of the servitude via was the right of using the road in any way whatever, as, for instance, of dragging stones or timber over it, which he could not do if he had only the actus (D. viii. 3. 7. pr.); and of having the road, in the absence of special agreement, of the width provided by the law of the Twelve Tables, that is, eight feet where it ran straight, and sixteen feet where it wound round to change its direction: viae latitudo ex lege Duodecim Tabularum in porrectum octo pedes habet; in anfractum, id est, ubi flexum est, sedecim. (D. viii. 3. 8.) Of course the larger of these rights comprehended the smaller; if a person had the right of driving over land, he had the right of passing over it. A special agreement might indeed be made to the contrary; a person might, for instance, grant the right of driving beasts, but insist that the way should never be used except when beasts were driven.

1. Prædiorum urbanorum sunt servitutes, quæ ædificiis inhaerent, ideo urbanorum prædiorum dictæ, quoniam ædificia omnia urbana prædia appellantur, etsi in villa ædificata sunt. Item prædiorum urbanorum servitutes sunt hæ: ut vicinus onera vicini sustineat: ut in parietem ejus liceat vicino tignum immittere: ut stillicidium vel flumen recipiat quis in ædes suas vel in

1. The servitudes of urban immoveables are those which appertain to buildings, and they are said to be servitudes of urban immoveables, because we term all edifices urban immoveables, although really built in the country. Among these servitudes are the following: that a person has to support the weight of the adjoining house; that a neighbour should have the right of inserting a beam into his neighbour's

urban Pr

servitutes of skil

I

II

aream, vel non recipiat; et ne altius tollat quis ædes suas, ne luminibus vicini officiat.

wall; that he has to receive or not to receive the water that drops or runs from another man's house on to his building or into his court; or that he is not to raise his house higher, and thereby obstruct his neighbour's lights.

D. viii. 2. 2.

The words quæ ædificiis inhaerent in the text, are equivalent to the in superficie consistunt of Paul. (D. viii. 2. 20. pr.) The servitudes attach to some building raised on the soil.

Onera vicini sustineat. By this servitude a wall or pillar of the res serviens was obliged to support the weight of the res dominans. The owner of this wall or pillar, so long as he remained owner, was bound to keep it in good repair, so as to continue to support the weight safely. (D. viii. 5. 6. 2.) This was the only case where the owner of the res serviens had to do any positive act. But the owner of the wall, into which a beam was let by the servitude tigni immittendi, was not compelled to repair the wall, in order that the beam might rest there safely. (D. viii. 5. 8. 2.)

It is easy to understand what is meant by the servitudes stillicidii vel fluminis recipiendi and altius non tollendi. By the one the res serviens was made to receive the rain-water of the res dominans, by the other the res serviens was prohibited from being raised above the res dominans. But in the text we have the servitude stillicidii vel fluminis non recipiendi, and in the passage of the Digest (viii. 2. 2), from which much of the text is borrowed, we read of a servitude altius tollendi; and it is not very easy to understand what these servitudes were. Theophilus, in his paraphrase of this section, thus explains the former: Aut tu jus hujusmodi (i.e. stillicidia tua in meas ædes projiciendi) habebas in ædes meas; et rogari te ne stillicidia tua aut canales in domum vel aream meam projiceres. Thus it would appear that the servitude non recipiendi was an extinction of a pre-existent servitude recipiendi made in favour of the owner of the res serviens. So, too, the servitude altius tollendi is explained to mean the allowing the house of a neighbour to be built above ours; so that the neighbour who was previously under a servitude, or at any rate under an obligation, non altius tollendi, by the creation of what may be called a counter-servitude, does away with the impediment to his building above our house. If it was really a servitude, as we should certainly suppose from the language of Theophilus, that was extinguished or nullified by this new counter-servitude, it seems scarcely natural that this should not be given among the modes of ending a servitude, and still more, that the usual language of the jurists with respect to the extinction of a servitude should be departed from. The ordinary phrase was, that the thing affected, the res serviens, was freed, res liberatur, and it seems a very cumbrous mode of effecting the liberatio rei to create a new servitude, when the object would have been at once aream, vel non recipiat; et ne altius tollat quis aedes suas, ne luminibus vicini officiat.

wall; that he has to receive or not to receive the water that drops or runs from another man's house on to his building or into his court; or that he is not to raise his house higher, and thereby obstruct his neighbour's lights.

D. viii. 2. 2.

The words quæ edificiis inhaerent in the text, are equivalent to the in superficie consistunt of Paul. (D. viii. 2. 20. pr.) The servitudes attach to some building raised on the soil.

Onera vicini sustineat. By this servitude a wall or pillar of the res serviens was obliged to support the weight of the res dominans. The owner of this wall or pillar, so long as he remained owner, was bound to keep it in good repair, so as to continue to support the weight safely. (D. viii. 5. 6. 2.) This was the only case where the owner of the res serviens had to do any positive act. But the owner of the wall, into which a beam was let by the servitude tigni immittendi, was not compelled to repair the wall, in order that the beam might rest there safely. (D. viii. 5. 8. 2.)

It is easy to understand what is meant by the servitudes stillicidii vel fluminis recipiendi and altius non tollendi. By the one the res serviens was made to receive the rain-water of the res dominans, by the other the res serviens was prohibited from being raised above the res dominans. But in the text we have the servitude stillicidii vel fluminis non recipiendi, and in the passage of the Digest (viii. 2. 2), from which much of the text is borrowed, we read of a servitude altius tollendi; and it is not very easy to understand what these servitudes were. Theophilus, in his paraphrase of this section, thus explains the former: Aut tu jus huiusmodi (i.e. stillicidia tua in meas aedes projiciendi) habebas in aedes meas; et rogari te ne stillicidia tua aut canales in domum vel aream meam projiceres. Thus it would appear that the servitude non recipiendi was an extinction of a pre-existent servitude recipiendi made in favour of the owner of the res serviens. So, too, the servitude altius tollendi is explained to mean the allowing the house of a neighbour to be built above ours; so that the neighbour who was previously under a servitude, or at any rate under an obligation, non altius tollendi, by the creation of what may be called a counter-servitude, does away with the impediment to his building above our house. If it was really a servitude, as we should certainly suppose from the language of Theophilus, that was extinguished or nullified by this new counter-servitude, it seems scarcely natural that this should not be given among the modes of ending a servitude, and still more, that the usual language of the jurists with respect to the extinction of a servitude should be departed from. The ordinary phrase was, that the thing affected, the res serviens, was freed, res liberatur, and it seems a very cumbrous mode of effecting the liberatio rei to create a new servitude, when the object would have been at once accomplished by merely surrendering the existing servitude to the owner of the res serviens. The commentators are therefore driven to hold that the right previously existing, that, namely, of having our water flow into our neighbour's house, or of having our neighbour's house kept from exceeding a given height, was not a servitude, but was given by law. Positive enactments, such as we read of in TAC. Annal. xv. 43; SUET. Aug. 89; D. xxxix. 1. 1. 17, may have decided that adjoining houses should, in particular places, for the mutual advantage of the owners, be of the same level or pour off their water on to the adjoining house, while those persons who were intended to be benefited might still forego this advantage, if they pleased to allow of a servitude being created to do away with the effect of the enactment. It must, however, be confessed, that no one who reads the passages in which enactments for the regulation of buildings are mentioned, would suppose that individuals were ever allowed to infringe them by the mere permission of their neighbours. All that we can be quite sure of is that these servitudes, which were the contraries of other servitudes, were constituted for the benefit of the owner of a thing that previously had been under some disadvantage.

It is to be observed that words are sometimes used to express servitudes which seem proper to the owner of the res dominans, not to the owner of the res serviens. Thus, if the above explanation is correct, the servitus tollendi means the servitus patiendi vicinum tollere (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 2), and what is termed in the text, as it would seem more properly, the servitus stillicidii recipiendi, is termed in the Digest (viii. 2. 2) the servitus stillicidii avertendi.

The right of view was protected in several ways. The servitude ne luminibus officiatur prevented our neighbour from doing anything, whether by building, planting trees, or by any other means, whereby the light was in any way, however slightly, intercepted from our house. The servitude ne prospectui offendatur prevented our neighbour from doing anything that would make the view from our house less pleasant and open (D. viii. 2. 15, 17. pr.); and the jus humanum forced our neighbour in building a wall to leave apertures through which we could look beyond. (D. viii. 2. 4. 40.)

2. In rusticorum prædiorum servitutibus quidam computari recte putant aquæ haustum, pecoris ad aquam adpulsum, jus pascendi, calcis coquendæ, harenæ fodiendæ.

2. Some think that among servitudes of rural immoveables are rightly included the right of drawing water, of watering cattle, of feeding cattle, of burning lime, of digging sand.

D. viii. 3. 1. 1.

There are many servitudes, both of rural and of urban immoveables, mentioned in the Digest, besides those given as examples in the Institutes.

3. Ideo autem hæ servitutes prædiorum appellantur, quoniam

3. These servitudes are called the servitudes of immoveables, because accomplished by merely surrendering the existing servitude to the owner of the res serviens. The commentators are therefore driven to hold that the right previously existing, that, namely, of having our water flow into our neighbour's house, or of having our neighbour's house kept from exceeding a given height, was not a servitude, but was given by law. Positive enactments, such as we read of in TAC. Annal. xv. 43; SUET. Aug. 89; D. xxxix. 1. 1. 17, may have decided that adjoining houses should, in particular places, for the mutual advantage of the owners, be of the same level or pour off their water on to the adjoining house, while those persons who were intended to be benefited might still forego this advantage, if they pleased to allow of a servitude being created to do away with the effect of the enactment. It must, however, be confessed, that no one who reads the passages in which enactments for the regulation of buildings are mentioned, would suppose that individuals were ever allowed to infringe them by the mere permission of their neighbours. All that we can be quite sure of is that these servitudes, which were the contraries of other servitudes, were constituted for the benefit of the owner of a thing that previously had been under some disadvantage.

It is to be observed that words are sometimes used to express servitudes which seem proper to the owner of the res dominans, not to the owner of the res serviens. Thus, if the above explanation is correct, the servitus tollendi means the servitus patiendi vicinum tollere (see Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 2), and what is termed in the text, as it would seem more properly, the servitus stillicidii recipiendi, is termed in the Digest (viii. 2. 2) the servitus stillicidii avertendi.

The right of view was protected in several ways. The servitude ne luminibus officiatur prevented our neighbour from doing anything, whether by building, planting trees, or by any other means, whereby the light was in any way, however slightly, intercepted from our house. The servitude ne prospectui offendatur prevented our neighbour from doing anything that would make the view from our house less pleasant and open (D. viii. 2. 15, 17. pr.); and the jus luminum forced our neighbour in building a wall to leave apertures through which we could look beyond. (D. viii. 2. 4. 40.)

2. In rusticorum prædiorum servitutibus quidam computari recte putant aquæ haustum, pecoris ad aquam adpulsum, jus pascendi, calcis coquendæ, harenæ fodiendæ.

2. Some think that among servitudes of rural immoveables are rightly included the right of drawing water, of watering cattle, of feeding cattle, of burning lime, of digging sand.

D. viii. 3. 1. 1.

There are many servitudes, both of rural and of urban immoveables, mentioned in the Digest, besides those given as examples in the Institutes.

3. Ideo autem hæ servitutes prædiorum appellantur, quoniam 3. These servitudes are called the servitudes of immoveables, because sine prædiis constitui non possunt. Nemo enim potest servitutem adquirere urbani vel rustici prædii, nisi qui habet prædium, nec quisquam debere, nisi qui habet prædium.

they cannot be constituted without immoveables. For no one can acquire a servitude of a rural or urban immoveable, unless he has an immoveable belonging to him; nor can any one owe such a servitude unless he has an immoveable belonging to him.

D. viii. 4. 1. 1.

The nature of most servitudes of urban immoveables demanded that the immoveable over which, and the immoveable in right of which, the servitude was exercised, should be contiguous; but when the servitude was one of ~~rural~~ immoveables, the prædia need not necessarily be near together. Still, however, a servitude was not permitted to exist which was useless to its owner; a person could not have a right of way, for instance, over the land of another if he was prevented from using the way by land, over which he had no servitude, lying between his land and that over which the servitude was to be exercised. (D. viii. 1. 14. 2.)

There was another difference between the servitudes of rural and urban immoveables. The latter were, for the most part, used continuously, the former only at times. The beam, for instance, always rested in the wall; there was no moment in which the owner of the res serviens was not prohibited from blocking up his neighbour's lights. But the way was not always being used; nor were cattle always being watered (D. viii. 1. 14). From this difference in their nature, there arises an important difference in the modes in which these two kinds of servitudes might be lost by not being used. A continuous servitude could be lost by non-user only when the servient owner did some act inconsistent with the existence of that servitude, and the dominant owner for a certain time acquiesced in the act or neglected to assert his rights. A discontinuous servitude, on the other hand, was lost if a certain time elapsed during which the dominant owner never did the act for the doing of which the servitude was created. (D. viii. 2. 20.)

4. Si quis velit vicino aliquid jus constituere, pactionibus atque stipulationibus id efficere debet. Potest etiam in testamento quis heredem suum dammare, ne altius ædes tollat, ne luminibus ædium vicini officiat: vel ut patiatur eum tignum in parietem immittere vel stillicidium habere: vel ut patiatur eum per fundum ire, agere aquamve ex eo ducere.

4. If any one wishes to create a right of this sort in favour of his neighbour, he must do so by agreements and stipulations. A person can also, by testament, bind his heir not to raise his house higher lest he obstruct a neighbour's lights, to permit a neighbour to insert a beam into his wall, or to receive the water from a neighbour's roof; or, again, he may oblige his heir to allow a neighbour to go across his land, or to drive beasts or vehicles, or to conduct water across it.

GAI. ii. 31; D. viii. 4. 16.

Gainius tells us (ii. 29), that jura prædiorum rusticorum were among res mancipi (see Introd. sec. 59), while jura prædiorum sine prædiis constitui non possunt. Nemo enim potest servitutem adquirere urbani vel rustici prædii, nisi qui habet prædium, nec quisquam debere, nisi qui habet prædium.

they cannot be constituted without immoveables. For no one can acquire a servitude of a rural or urban immoveable, unless he has an immoveable belonging to him; nor can any one owe such a servitude unless he has an immoveable belonging to him.

D. viii. 4. 1. 1.

The nature of most servitudes of urban immoveables demanded that the immoveable over which, and the immoveable in right of which, the servitude was exercised, should be contiguous; but when the servitude was one of ~~rural~~ immoveables, the prædia need not necessarily be near together. Still, however, a servitude was not permitted to exist which was useless to its owner; a person could not have a right of way, for instance, over the land of another if he was prevented from using the way by land, over which he had no servitude, lying between his land and that over which the servitude was to be exercised. (D. viii. 1. 14. 2.)

There was another difference between the servitudes of rural and urban immoveables. The latter were, for the most part, used continuously, the former only at times. The beam, for instance, always rested in the wall; there was no moment in which the owner of the res serviens was not prohibited from blocking up his neighbour's lights. But the way was not always being used; nor were cattle always being watered (D. viii. 1. 14). From this difference in their nature, there arises an important difference in the modes in which these two kinds of servitudes might be lost by not being used. A continuous servitude could be lost by non-user only when the servient owner did some act inconsistent with the existence of that servitude, and the dominant owner for a certain time acquiesced in the act or neglected to assert his rights. A discontinuous servitude, on the other hand, was lost if a certain time elapsed during which the dominant owner never did the act for the doing of which the servitude was created. (D. viii. 2. 20.)

4. Si quis velit vicino aliquid jus constituere, pactionibus atque stipulationibus id efficere debet. Potest etiam in testamento quis heredem suum dammare, ne altius ædes tollat, ne luminibus ædium vicini officiat: vel ut patiatur eum tignum in parietem immittere vel stillicidium habere: vel ut patiatur eum per fundum ire, agere aquamve ex eo ducere.

4. If any one wishes to create a right of this sort in favour of his neighbour, he must do so by agreements and stipulations. A person can also, by testament, bind his heir not to raise his house higher lest he obstruct a neighbour's lights, to permit a neighbour to insert a beam into his wall, or to receive the water from a neighbour's roof; or, again, he may oblige his heir to allow a neighbour to go across his land, or to drive beasts or vehicles, or to conduct water across it.

GAI. ii. 31; D. viii. 4. 16.

Gainius tells us (ii. 29), that jura prædiorum rusticorum were among res mancipi (see Introd. sec. 59), while jura prædiorum

urbanorum were not, and that the former were constituted by mancipatio; the latter, as well as personal servitudes, were constituted by the process termed in jure cessio. (See introductory note to this Book.) But these modes of constituting servitudes were only applicable to the solum Italicum: in the provincial lands, where there was no legal ownership at all, no ownership of servitudes could be given. But Gaius says, that if any one wished to create a servitude over provincial prædia, he could effect it pactionibus et stipulationibus, using the words of the text. The parties agreed to constitute the servitude, and this agreement (pactio) was generally, perhaps almost always, followed by a stipulation or solemn contract (see Introd. sec. 83), by which the person who permitted the servitude to be constituted over his prædium, bound himself to allow the exercise of the right, by subjecting himself to a penalty in case of refusal. (See THEOPHIL. Paraphrase of Teat.) When the right had been once exercised, and the owner of the servitude had thus the quasi-possessio of the servitude, the prætor secured him in the enjoyment of his right by granting him possessory interdicts (see Introd. sec. 107, and note on introductory section of Title 6 of this Book), and also permitted him, if the servitude afterwards passed out of his quasi-possessio, to bring an action to claim it, called the actio Publiciana, by which a bona fide possessor was allowed to represent himself fictitiously as a dominus, and to claim (vindicare) a thing as if he were the owner. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 4; D. vi. 2. 11. 1.) In all probability the same mode of constituting servitudes obtained also with regard to the solum Italicum; although there were proper and peculiar modes of constituting servitudes over prædia Italica, yet if an agreement and stipulation were followed by quasi-possessio, the prætor would protect the quasi-possessor. And hence it was said that servitudes were constituted jure prætorio and were maintained tutitione prætoris.

Modern writers on Roman law are much divided in opinion whether servitudes were really constituted pactionibus atque stipulationibus, by agreements and stipulations alone, or whether we are always to understand that, to perfect the title, what is termed quasi-traditio was necessary. That is, whether, as traditio was necessary to transfer the property in a corporeal thing, so it was necessary, in order to transfer the property in an incorporeal thing, that the person to whom it was transferred should be placed in the legal quasi-possession of his right. If the servitude was a positive one, it is very easy to see how this quasi-possession could be established; for directly the right was exercised with the animus possidendi, and permitted to be so exercised by the owner of the res serviens, the person in favour of whom the servitude was constituted would have the quasi-possession. But when the servitude was a negative one, when the owner of the res serviens was merely bound not to do something, the only evident mode by which possession could be said to be gained was, when the owner of the urbanorum were not, and that the former were constituted by mancipatio; the latter, as well as personal servitudes, were constituted by the process termed in jure cessio. (See introductory note to this Book.) But these modes of constituting servitudes were only applicable to the solum Italicum: in the provincial lands, where there was no legal ownership at all, no ownership of servitudes could be given. But Gaius says, that if any one wished to create a servitude over provincial prædia, he could effect it pactionibus et stipulationibus, using the words of the text. The parties agreed to constitute the servitude, and this agreement (pactio) was generally, perhaps almost always, followed by a stipulation or solemn contract (see Introd. sec. 83), by which the person who permitted the servitude to be constituted over his prædium, bound himself to allow the exercise of the right, by subjecting himself to a penalty in case of refusal. (See THEOPHIL. Paraphrase of Text.) When the right had been once exercised, and the owner of the servitude had thus the quasi-possessio of the servitude, the prætor secured him in the enjoyment of his right by granting him possessory interdicts (see Introd. sec. 107, and note on introductory section of Title 6 of this Book), and also permitted him, if the servitude afterwards passed out of his quasi-possessio, to bring an action to claim it, called the actio Publiciana, by which a bona fide possessor was allowed to represent himself fictitiously as a dominus, and to claim (vindicare) a thing as if he were the owner. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 4; D. vi. 2. 11. 1.) In all probability the same mode of constituting servitudes obtained also with regard to the solum Italicum; although there were proper and peculiar modes of constituting servitudes over prædia Italica, yet if an agreement and stipulation were followed by quasi-possessio, the prætor would protect the quasi-possessor. And hence it was said that servitudes were constituted jure prætorio and were maintained tutione prætoris.

Modern writers on Roman law are much divided in opinion whether servitudes were really constituted pactionibus atque stipulationibus, by agreements and stipulations alone, or whether we are always to understand that, to perfect the title, what is termed quasi-traditio was necessary. That is, whether, as traditio was necessary to transfer the property in a corporeal thing, so it was necessary, in order to transfer the property in an incorporeal thing, that the person to whom it was transferred should be placed in the legal quasi-possession of his right. If the servitude was a positive one, it is very easy to see how this quasi-possession could be established; for directly the right was exercised with the animus possidendi, and permitted to be so exercised by the owner of the res serviens, the person in favour of whom the servitude was constituted would have the quasi-possession. But when the servitude was a negative one, when the owner of the res serviens was merely bound not to do something, the only evident mode by which possession could be said to be gained was, when the owner of the res dominans successfully resisted an attempt of the owner of the res serviens to do the thing which he was bound by the servitude not to do. But as the exercise of the right given by a positive servitude was an act evident and cognisable by all whom it concerned, it is with regard to positive servitudes that the question is principally debated, whether the exercise of the right was an indispensable part of the right being constituted. On the whole, it seems the better opinion that quasi-tradition was a necessary part of the constitution of a servitude. Without quasi-tradition the benefit of the interdicts could not be claimed. (D. viii. 1. 20.)

Mancipation and in jure cessio were quite obsolete in the time of Justinian. We have two modes given in the text by which servitudes might be constituted under his legislation: (1) pactionibus atque stipulationibus, i.e. agreements, whether followed or not by a stipulation, and (2) testamento. When given testamento, a servitude might be given as well directly to the legatee as by condemning the heir to transfer it to him, both modes, in the time of Justinian, having exactly the same effect. To these modes must be added:

3. That adjudicatione, when a judge awarded the property in a servitude under the actions familie eriscundæ and communi dividundo. (See Introd. sec. 103; D. x. 2. 22. 3.)
4. That of reserving the servitude in making a traditio of the rest of the property, when it was in fact constituted by having all the other jura in rem separated from it, instead of, as usual, being itself separated from the rest.
5. Lastly, the possessor who had had a long quasi-possession of a servitude was protected in it. The usucapion of servitudes, which perhaps existed previously, was forbidden by the lex Scribonia, passed probably in the time of Tiberius. (D. xli. 3. 4. 29.) But a long bona fide possession was protected by prætorian actions and interdicts. Traditio plane et patientia servitutum inducet officium prætoris. (D. viii. 3. 1, 2; D. viii. 3. 12.) This, perhaps, principally applied to servitudes urbanorum prædiorum, for these only were capable of a continuous exercise (servitutes quæ in superficie consistunt, possessione retinentur). (D. viii. 2. 20. pr.) But there were particular servitudes rusticorum prædiorum, long usage of which gave rights which were protected. Among these were the jus aquæ ducendæ, the jus itineris, and the jus actus. The possessor had to show that his possession had been neither vi, clam, nor precario; but had not to show any good title for possession. (D. viii. 5. 10. pr.) What was the length of time requisite for the possessor to have exercised the right is not certain, although it may be conjectured to have been the same as for the longi temporis possessio of provincial lands, i.e. ten years if the parties were in the same province, and twenty if the parties were in different provinces. If land was acquired by usucapion, the servitudes that went with it were also acquired in the same way (D. xli. 3. 10. 1), and if a servitude had been lost by non-usage, it could, or at any rate some servitudes could, be regained by two years' usucapion. (PAUL. Sent. i. 27. 2.)

res dominans successfully resisted an attempt of the owner of the res serviens to do the thing which he was bound by the servitude not to do. But as the exercise of the right given by a positive servitude was an act evident and cognisable by all whom it concerned, it is with regard to positive servitudes that the question is principally debated, whether the exercise of the right was an indispensable part of the right being constituted. On the whole, it seems the better opinion that quasi-tradition was a necessary part of the constitution of a servitude. Without quasi-tradition the benefit of the interdicts could not be claimed. (D. viii. 1. 20.)

Mancipation and in jure cessio were quite obsolete in the time of Justinian. We have two modes given in the text by which servitudes might be constituted under his legislation: (1) pactionibus atque stipulationibus, i.e. agreements, whether followed or not by a stipulation, and (2) testamento. When given testamento, a servitude might be given as well directly to the legatee as by condemning the heir to transfer it to him, both modes, in the time of Justinian, having exactly the same effect. To these modes must be added: 3. That adjudicatione, when a judge awarded the property in a servitude under the actions familie eriscundæ and communi dividundo. (See Introd. sec. 103; D. x. 2. 22. 3.) 4. That of reserving the servitude in making a traditio of the rest of the property, when it was in fact constituted by having all the other jura in rem separated from it, instead of, as usual, being itself separated from the rest. 5. Lastly, the possessor who had had a long quasi-possession of a servitude was protected in it. The usucapion of servitudes, which perhaps existed previously, was forbidden by the lex Scribonia, passed probably in the time of Tiberius. (D. xli. 3. 4. 29.) But a long bona fide possession was protected by prætorian actions and interdicts. Traditio plane et patientia servitutum inducet officium prætoris. (D. viii. 3. 1, 2; D. viii. 3. 12.) This, perhaps, principally applied to servitudes urbanorum prædiorum, for these only were capable of a continuous exercise (servitutes quæ in superficie consistunt, possessione retinentur). (D. viii. 2. 20. pr.) But there were particular servitudes rusticorum prædiorum, long usage of which gave rights which were protected. Among these were the jus aquæ ducendæ, the jus itineris, and the jus actus. The possessor had to show that his possession had been neither vi, clam, nor precario; but had not to show any good title for possession. (D. viii. 5. 10. pr.) What was the length of time requisite for the possessor to have exercised the right is not certain, although it may be conjectured to have been the same as for the longi temporis possessio of provincial lands, i.e. ten years if the parties were in the same province, and twenty if the parties were in different provinces. If land was acquired by usucapion, the servitudes that went with it were also acquired in the same way (D. xli. 3. 10. 1), and if a servitude had been lost by non-usage, it could, or at any rate some servitudes could, be regained by two years' usucapion. (PAUL. Sent. i. 27. 2.)

TIT. IV. DE USUFRUCTU.

Ususfructus est jus alienis rebus utendifruendi salva rerum substantia. Est enim jus in corpore: quo sublato et ipsum tolli necesse est.

Usufruct is the right to use and enjoy things belonging to others, provided that the substance of the things used remains unimpaired. For it is a right over something corporeal; and if this thing perishes, the usufruct itself necessarily perishes also.

D. vii. 1. 1, 2.

We now pass to personal servitudes, those, namely, which are given to a person simply as a person, and not as the owner of a particular house or piece of land. In personal as in prædial servitudes one portion of the dominium is detached from the rest, but this portion is made up of many and indefinite rights, not, as in prædial servitudes, of a single and definite right. Personal servitudes also differed from real in being applicable to moveables as well as to immoveables; and the personal servitude ususfructus was divisible, that is, some of the fruits included in the servitude might be parted with, although the servitude usus was, like real servitudes, indivisible.

The person to whom the ususfructus was given had two rights united; he had the jus utendi, that is, the right of making every possible use of the thing apart from consuming it or from taking the fruits of it, as, for instance, the right of living in a house or employing beasts of burden; and he had also the jus fruendi, the right of taking all the fruits of the thing over which the servitude was constituted. The definition of fructus is quicquid in fundo nascitur (D. vii. 1. 59. 1), that is, the ordinary produce, but not accidental accessions or augmentations, such as a treasure found (D. xxiv. 3. 7. 12) or islands formed in a river.

He might sell, or let, or give his right of taking the fruits to another, and the profits he thence derived were termed his fructus civiles (D. vii. 1. 12. 2.) It was only such of the fructus as were actually taken or gathered by him, or those acting under him, that belonged to him; and no fruits which were not gathered at the time of his death passed to his heir. (See Tit. 1. 36.) He was obliged to give security, on entering on the exercise of his right, that he would use his right as a good paterfamilias, and give up, at the time when his right expired, the possession of the thing. (D. vii. 9. 1.) We have had an instance of what was meant by using his right as a good paterfamilias in paragr. 38 of Tit. 1, where it is said that he is bound to replace dead sheep and dead trees. He was also bound not to alter the nature of the thing over which the right extended; he could not, for instance, build on land unbuilt on, or change the use to which land was specially destined. (D. vii. 1. 7. 1; D. vii. 1. 13. 4.) And it is with reference to this

Diff bet
real & pers
(a) servit

(b)?

(c).

Fructus
3

4

5 se

6

TIT. IV. DE USUFRUCTU.

Ususfructus est jus alienis rebus utendifructuendi salva rerum substantia. Est enim jus in corpore: quo sublato et ipsum tolli necesse est.

Usufruct is the right to use and enjoy things belonging to others, provided that the substance of the things used remains unimpaired. For it is a right over something corporeal; and if this thing perishes, the usufruct itself necessarily perishes also.

D. vii. 1. 1, 2.

We now pass to personal servitudes, those, namely, which are given to a person simply as a person, and not as the owner of a particular house or piece of land. In personal as in prædial servitudes one portion of the dominium is detached from the rest, but this portion is made up of many and indefinite rights, not, as in prædial servitudes, of a single and definite right. Personal servitudes also differed from real in being applicable to moveables as well as to immoveables; and the personal servitude ususfructus was divisible, that is, some of the fruits included in the servitude might be parted with, although the servitude usus was, like real servitudes, indivisible.

Diff bet real & pers
(a) servit
(b)
(c)

The person to whom the ususfructus was given had two rights united; he had the jus utendi, that is, the right of making every possible use of the thing apart from consuming it or from taking the fruits of it, as, for instance, the right of living in a house or employing beasts of burden; and he had also the jus fruendi, the right of taking all the fruits of the thing over which the servitude was constituted. The definition of fructus is quicquid in fundo nascitur (D. vii. 1. 59. 1), that is, the ordinary produce, but not accidental accessions or augmentations, such as a treasure found (D. xxiv. 3. 7. 12) or islands formed in a river.

He might sell, or let, or give his right of taking the fruits to another, and the profits he thence derived were termed his fructus civiles (D. vii. 1. 12. 2.) It was only such of the fructus as were actually taken or gathered by him, or those acting under him, that belonged to him; and no fruits which were not gathered at the time of his death passed to his heir. (See Tit. 1. 36.) He was obliged to give security, on entering on the exercise of his right, that he would use his right as a good paterfamilias, and give up, at the time when his right expired, the possession of the thing. (D. vii. 9. 1.) We have had an instance of what was meant by using his right as a good paterfamilias in paragr. 38 of Tit. 1, where it is said that he is bound to replace dead sheep and dead trees. He was also bound not to alter the nature of the thing over which the right extended; he could not, for instance, build on land unbuilt on, or change the use to which land was specially destined. (D. vii. 1. 7. 1; D. vii. 1. 13. 4.) And it is with reference to this

Fructus
3
4
5
6

that the words salva rerum substantia, in the text, are sometimes understood, so that the sentence would mean, usufruct is the right of using and taking the fruits of things belonging to another, but so as not to alter the substance. Ulpian (Reg. 24. 26) certainly uses the words salva rerum substantia in a sense very similar; but the concluding words of the section make it more natural to understand salva rerum substantia as referring here to the duration of the usufruct. It lasts as long as the thing over which it is constituted remains unaltered; for if the thing perishes, the usufruct perishes. The two sentences of this section are taken without alteration from the Digest, but are from different authors, the former being from Paul, the latter from Celsus. (D. vii. 1. 1, 2.) Very probably Paul did not use the words salva rerum substantia with reference to the duration of the servitudes; but the compilers of the Institutes saw that, if they were used in this sense, the two sentences would cohere together.

1. Ususfructus a proprietate separationem recipit idque pluribus modis accidit. Ut ecce si quis alicui ususfructum legaverit; nam heres nudam habet proprietatem, legatarius ususfructum: et contra si fundum legaverit deducto usufructu, legatarius nudam habet proprietatem, heres vero ususfructum: item alii ususfructum, alii deducto eo fundum legare potest. Sine testamento vero si quis velit alii ususfructum constituere, pactionibus et stipulationibus id efficere debet. Ne tamen in universum inutiles essent proprietates semper abscedente usufructu, placuit, certis modis extinguere ususfructum et ad proprietatem reverti.

1. The usufruct may be detached from the property; and this separation takes place in many ways: for example, if the usufruct is given to any one as a legacy; for the heir has then the bare ownership, and the legatee has the usufruct; conversely, if the estate is given as a legacy, subject to the deduction of the usufruct, the legatee has the bare ownership, and the heir has the usufruct. Again, the usufruct may be given as a legacy to one person, and the land minus this usufruct may be given to another. If any one wishes to constitute a usufruct otherwise than by testament, he must effect this by pacts and stipulations. But, lest the property should be rendered wholly profitless by the usufruct being for ever detached, it has been thought right that there should be certain ways in which a usufruct may become extinguished, and be again absorbed in the property.

D. vii. 1. 6. pr.; D. xxxii. 2. 19. pr.; D. vii. 1. 3. pr. and 2; Gai. ii. 31.

Besides the other modes of constituting servitudes mentioned in the note to the fourth paragraph of the last Title we may in the case of usufructs notice that a usufruct was, at least in one instance, constituted lege, i.e. by express enactment. It will be found from the first paragraph of the ninth Title of this Book, that under Justinian's legislation the father acquired the use of his son's peculium. We see from the text that a testator gave or reserved a usufruct by the mere wording of his will. When the dealing was inter vivos, the transferor gave the usufruct by agreement, or else reserved it in making a traditio of the nuda proprietas.

It will be observed that, in putting the third case of gift of

that the words salva rerum substantia, in the text, are sometimes understood, so that the sentence would mean, usufruct is the right of using and taking the fruits of things belonging to another, but so as not to alter the substance. Ulpian (Reg. 24. 26) certainly uses the words salva rerum substantia in a sense very similar; but the concluding words of the section make it more natural to understand salva rerum substantia as referring here to the duration of the usufruct. It lasts as long as the thing over which it is constituted remains unaltered; for if the thing perishes, the usufruct perishes. The two sentences of this section are taken without alteration from the Digest, but are from different authors, the former being from Paul, the latter from Celsus. (D. vii. 1. 1, 2.) Very probably Paul did not use the words salva rerum substantia with reference to the duration of the servitudes; but the compilers of the Institutes saw that, if they were used in this sense, the two sentences would cohere together.

1. Ususfructus a proprietate separationem recipit idque pluribus modis accidit. Ut ecce si quis alicui ususfructum legaverit; nam heres nudam habet proprietatem, legatarius ususfructum: et contra si fundum legaverit deducto usufructu, legatarius nudam habet proprietatem, heres vero ususfructum: item alii ususfructum, alii deducto eo fundum legare potest. Sine testamento vero si quis velit alii ususfructum constituere, pactionibus et stipulationibus id efficere debet. Ne tamen in universum inutiles essent proprietates semper abscedente usufructu, placuit, certis modis extinguere ususfructum et ad proprietatem reverti.

1. The usufruct may be detached from the property; and this separation takes place in many ways: for example, if the usufruct is given to any one as a legacy; for the heir has then the bare ownership, and the legatee has the usufruct; conversely, if the estate is given as a legacy, subject to the deduction of the usufruct, the legatee has the bare ownership, and the heir has the usufruct. Again, the usufruct may be given as a legacy to one person, and the land minus this usufruct may be given to another. If any one wishes to constitute a usufruct otherwise than by testament, he must effect this by pacts and stipulations. But, lest the property should be rendered wholly profitless by the usufruct being for ever detached, it has been thought right that there should be certain ways in which a usufruct may become extinguished, and be again absorbed in the property.

D. vii. 1. 6. pr.; D. xxxii. 2. 19. pr.; D. vii. 1. 8. pr. and 2; GAI. ii. 31.

Besides the other modes of constituting servitudes mentioned in the note to the fourth paragraph of the last Title we may in the case of usufructs notice that a usufruct was, at least in one instance, constituted lege, i.e. by express enactment. It will be found from the first paragraph of the ninth Title of this Book, that under Justinian's legislation the father acquired the use of his son's peculium. We see from the text that a testator gave or reserved a usufruct by the mere wording of his will. When the dealing was inter vivos, the transferor gave the usufruct by agreement, or else reserved it in making a traditio of the nuda proprietas.

It will be observed that, in putting the third case of gift of

usufruct by testament, that, namely, in which the usufruct is given to one legatee, the nuda proprietas to another, the gift to the latter is expressed by the words deducto eo (i.e. usufructu) fundum. The Digest (xxxiii. 2. 19) explains why the words deducto eo should in such a case be carefully added to a gift of the fundus; for if they were not, the second legatee would be treated as having the nuda proprietas, and also as having a joint interest in the usufruct with the first legatee.

2. Constituitur autem ususfructus non tantum in fundo et aedibus, verum etiam in servis et jumentis ceterisque rebus, exceptis his, quæ ipso usu consumuntur: nam eæ neque naturali ratione neque civili recipiunt ususfructum. Quo numero sunt vinum, oleum, frumentum, vestimenta. Quibus proxima est pecunia numerata: namque in ipso usu adsidua permutatione quodammodo extinguitur. Sed utilitatis causa senatus censuit, posse etiam earum rerum ususfructum constitui, ut tamen eo nomine heredi utiliter caveatur. Itaque si pecuniæ ususfructus legatus sit, ita datur legatario, ut ejus fiat, et legatarius satisfaciat heredi de tanta pecunia restituenda, si morietur aut capite minuetur. Ceteræ quoque res ita traduntur legatario, ut ejus fiant: sed æstimatis his satisfacitur, ut, si morietur aut capite minuetur, tanta pecunia restituatur, quanti eæ fuerint æstimatæ. Ergo senatus non fecit quidem earum rerum ususfructum (nec enim poterat), sed per cautionem quasi ususfructum constituit.

2. A usufruct may be constituted not only of lands and buildings, but also of slaves, of beasts of burden, and everything else except things which are consumed by being used, for these are susceptible of a usufruct neither by natural nor by civil law. Among such things are wine, oil, wheat, garments; and of a like nature is coined money; for it, too, is in a manner consumed in the very use made of it, through continually passing from hand to hand. But the senate, thinking such a measure would be useful, has enacted that a usufruct even of these things may be constituted, if only sufficient security is given to the heir; and therefore if the usufruct of money is given to a legatee, the money is considered to be given to him in complete ownership; but he has to give security to the heir for the repayment of an equal sum in the event of his death or his undergoing a capitis deminutio. Other things, too, of the same kind are delivered to the legatee so as to become his property; but their value is estimated and security is given for the payment of the amount at which they are valued, in the event of the legatee dying or undergoing a capitis deminutio. The senate has not then, to speak strictly, created a usufruct of these things, for that was impossible, but, by requiring security, has established a right analogous to a usufruct.

Quasi

D. vii. 1. 3. 1; D. vii. 5. 1, 2, 3, 7.

Properly only things quæ in usu non consumuntur could be the subject of a servitude which consisted in using things only for a time; but as things quæ usu consumuntur, things that perish in the using, are things that may for the most part be easily replaced by similar things of an equal quantity and quality, the senatusconsultum referred to in the text (the date of which is uncertain, but is probably not later than Augustus) permitted that things quæ usu consumuntur should be made subject to a kind of usufruct by which they might be consumed at once, and then, on an event occurring by which a real usufruct would have usufruct by testament, that, namely, in which the usufruct is given to one legatee, the nuda proprietas to another, the gift to the latter is expressed by the words deducto eo (i.e. usufructu) fundum. The Digest (xxxiii. 2. 19) explains why the words deducto eo should in such a case be carefully added to a gift of the fundus; for if they were not, the second legatee would be treated as having the nuda proprietas, and also as having a joint interest in the usufruct with the first legatee.

2. Constituitur autem usufructus non tantum in fundo et aedibus, verum etiam in servis et jumentis ceterisque rebus, exceptis his, quæ ipso usu consumuntur: nam eæ neque naturali ratione neque civili recipiunt usufructum. Quo numero sunt vinum, oleum, frumentum, vestimenta. Quibus proxima est pecunia numerata: namque in ipso usu adsidua permutatione quodammodo extinguitur. Sed utilitatis causa senatus censui, posse etiam earum rerum usufructum constitui, ut tamen eo nomine heredi utiliter caveatur. Itaque si pecuniæ usufructus legatus sit, ita datur legatario, ut ejus fiat, et legatarius satisfaciat heredi de tanta pecunia restituenda, si morietur aut capite minuetur. Ceteræ quoque res ita traduntur legatario, ut ejus fiant: sed æstimatis his satisfacitur, ut, si morietur aut capite minuetur, tanta pecunia restituitur, quanti eæ fuerint æstimatæ. Ergo senatus non fecit quidem earum rerum usufructum (nec enim poterat), sed per cautionem quasi usufructum constituit.

2. A usufruct may be constituted not only of lands and buildings, but also of slaves, of beasts of burden, and everything else except things which are consumed by being used, for these are susceptible of a usufruct neither by natural nor by civil law. Among such things are wine, oil, wheat, garments; and of a like nature is coined money; for it, too, is in a manner consumed in the very use made of it, through continually passing from hand to hand. But the senate, thinking such a measure would be useful, has enacted that a usufruct even of these things may be constituted, if only sufficient security is given to the heir; and therefore if the usufruct of money is given to a legatee, the money is considered to be given to him in complete ownership; but he has to give security to the heir for the repayment of an equal sum in the event of his death or his undergoing a capitis deminutio. Other things, too, of the same kind are delivered to the legatee so as to become his property; but their value is estimated and security is given for the payment of the amount at which they are valued, in the event of the legatee dying or undergoing a capitis deminutio. The senate has not then, to speak strictly, created a usufruct of these things, for that was impossible, but, by requiring security, has established a right analogous to a usufruct.

Quam

D. vii. 1. 3. 1; D. vii. 5. 1, 2, 3, 7.

Properly only things quæ in usu non consumuntur could be the subject of a servitude which consisted in using things only for a time; but as things quæ usu consumuntur, things that perish in the using, are things that may for the most part be easily replaced by similar things of an equal quantity and quality, the senatusconsultum referred to in the text (the date of which is uncertain, but is probably not later than Augustus) permitted that things quæ usu consumuntur should be made subject to a kind of usufruct by which they might be consumed at once, and then, on an event occurring by which a real usufruct would have expired, that is, the death or capitis deminutio of the usufructuary, they were to be replaced by similar things, or, what effected the same object in a different way, their pecuniary value was estimated on the commencement of the quasi-usufruct, as it is termed, and paid at its expiration. Ulpian gives the following as the terms of the senatusconsultum: Ut omnium rerum quas in cuiusque patrimonio esse constaret, ususfructus legari possit. (D. vii. 5. 1.)

It will be observed that the text includes garments, vestimenta, among things of which there was only a quasi-usufruct, whereas the Digest twice speaks of them as things of which there was a real usufruct. (D. vii. 1. 15. 4; vii. 9. 9. 3.) They were, in fact, one or the other according as it was the garments or their value that was to be given to the owner of the nuda proprietas at the end of the usufruct, and this might depend on the intention of the parties or the nature of the materials.

Satisfidatur. The usufructuary not only guaranteed by a stipulation the replacement of the things or the payment of their value, but he procured a surety (fidejussor) to guarantee it also. D. vii. 5. 8.

3. Finitur autem usufructus morte fructuarii et duabus capitis deminutionibus, maxima et media, et non utendo per modum et tempus. Quæ omnia nostra statuit constitutio. Item finitur usufructus, si domino proprietatis ab usufructuario cedatur (nam extraneo cedendo nihil agitur): vel ex contrario si fructuarius proprietatem rei adquisierit, quæ res consolidatio appellatur. Eo amplius constat, si ædes incendio consumptæ fuerint vel etiam terræ motu aut vitio suo corruerint, extinguí usumfructum et nō aræ quidem usumfructum deberi.

3. The usufruct is terminated by the death of the usufructuary, by two kinds of capitis deminutio, namely, the greatest and the middle, and also by not being used according to the manner and during the time fixed; all which points have been decided by our constitution. The usufruct is also terminated if the usufructuary surrenders it to the owner of the property (a cession to a stranger would not have this effect); or, conversely, by the usufructuary acquiring the property, which is called consolidation. Again, if a building is consumed by fire, or thrown down by an earthquake, or falls through decay, the usufruct of it is necessarily extinguished, nor does there remain any usufruct due even of the soil on which it stood.

C. iii. 33. 16. pr. and 1, 2; GAI. ii. 30.

The text points out five ways in which the usufruct would terminate. 1. By the death or capitis deminutio of the usufructuary. If the usufruct belonged to a city or corporation which could not die, it lasted for a hundred years, as being the extreme length of the duration of human life. (D. vii. 1. 56.) Previously to Justinian the minima capitis deminutio extinguished a usufruct (PAUL. Sent. iii. 6. 29), because the person who underwent it was not the same person in the eyes of the law after undergoing it as he was before; he commenced a new existence. Justinian altered the law in this respect (C. iii. 33. 16), and he also decided expired, that is, the death or capitis deminutio of the usufructuary, they were to be replaced by similar things, or, what effected the same object in a different way, their pecuniary value was estimated on the commencement of the quasi-usufruct, as it is termed, and paid at its expiration. Ulpian gives the following as the terms of the senatusconsultum: Ut omnium rerum quas in cuiusque patrimonio esse constaret, ususfructus legari possit. (D. vii. 5. 1.)

It will be observed that the text includes garments, vestimenta, among things of which there was only a quasi-usufruct, whereas the Digest twice speaks of them as things of which there was a real usufruct. (D. vii. 1. 15. 4; vii. 9. 9. 3.) They were, in fact, one or the other according as it was the garments or their value that was to be given to the owner of the nuda proprietas at the end of the usufruct, and this might depend on the intention of the parties or the nature of the materials.

Satisfidatur. The usufructuary not only guaranteed by a stipulation the replacement of the things or the payment of their value, but he procured a surety (fidejussor) to guarantee it also. D. vii. 5. 8.

3. Finitur autem usufructus morte fructuarii et duabus capitis deminutionibus, maxima et media, et non utendo per modum et tempus. Quæ omnia nostra statuit constitutio. Item finitur usufructus, si domino proprietatis ab usufructuario cedatur (nam extraneo cedendo nihil agitur): vel ex contrario si fructuarius proprietatem rei adquisierit, quæ res consolidatio appellatur. Eo amplius constat, si ædes incendio consumptæ fuerint vel etiam terræ motu aut vitio suo corruerint, extinguí usumfructum et ne aræ quidem usumfructum deberi.

3. The usufruct is terminated by the death of the usufructuary, by two kinds of capitis deminutio, namely, the greatest and the middle, and also by not being used according to the manner and during the time fixed; all which points have been decided by our constitution. The usufruct is also terminated if the usufructuary surrenders it to the owner of the property (a cession to a stranger would not have this effect); or, conversely, by the usufructuary acquiring the property, which is called consolidation. Again, if a building is consumed by fire, or thrown down by an earthquake, or falls through decay, the usufruct of it is necessarily extinguished, nor does there remain any usufruct due even of the soil on which it stood.

C. iii. 33. 16. pr. and 1, 2; GAI. ii. 30.

The text points out five ways in which the usufruct would terminate. 1. By the death or capitis deminutio of the usufructuary. If the usufruct belonged to a city or corporation which could not die, it lasted for a hundred years, as being the extreme length of the duration of human life. (D. vii. 1. 56.) Previously to Justinian the minima capitis deminutio extinguished a usufruct (PAUL. Sent. iii. 6. 29), because the person who underwent it was not the same person in the eyes of the law after undergoing it as he was before; he commenced a new existence. Justinian altered the law in this respect (C. iii. 33. 16), and he also decided a question which had divided the jurists, whether a usufruct acquired by a slave or a filiusfamilias terminated on the death of the slave, or death or capitis diminutio of the son, or whether it remained for the benefit of the master or father. He decided that it should remain until the master's or father's natural or civil death, and further, that in the case of a filiusfamilias, it should also continue for his benefit after his father's death; so that the father had the usufruct for his life, and then the son, if he survived the father, had it for his life. (C. iii. 33. 16, 17.)

2. Non utendo per modum et tempus. Secondly, the usufructuary might lose the usufruct by not using it in the way agreed on by the parties during the time fixed by law. The usufructuary might, for instance, have the use of a fundus for the summer, and if he used it only during the winter he would not use the usufruct of the fundus in the way it was given him, and this was equivalent to not using it at all; and if he did not exercise his right at any period previous to the time fixed by law as that when the usufruct became extinct by non-usage, his right was gone. This time was, under the old law, one year when the usufruct affected moveables, and two years when the usufruct affected immoveables. If this period elapsed without the right being exercised, the owner of the nuda proprietas gained the usufruct by usucapion. Justinian altered this by fixing three years as the time for moveables, and ten or twenty years for immoveables, according as the person affected was present or absent. (See Tit. 6. 1.) The usufructuary was placed so far in the position of an owner of a thing, that it required the same length of time to make him lose the usufruct as it did to make the owner lose the property. Hence it is said in the Code (iii. 33. 16. 1) that he was not to lose the usufruct unless talis exceptio (i.e. of usucapion) usufructuario opponatur, quæ etiam si dominum vindicaret posset eum præsentem vel absentem excludere.

Non-usage and capitis diminutio only affected rights already commenced; and in order to avoid their effects the usufruct was often given by legacy in singulos annos, vel menses, vel dies. As a new usufruct thus began each year, month, or day, there could be no non-usage for a longer time than the duration of each usufruct, and capitis diminutio only affected the usufruct existing at the time it was undergone. (D. vii. 4. 1. 3, 28.)

3. Si domino cedatur. Thirdly, usufruct was lost if it was surrendered to the owner of the nuda proprietas. The word cedere belongs, in the corresponding passage of Gaius, to the in jure cessio, the fictitious suit by which personal servitudes were given up in the time of Gaius. This mode of giving up servitudes to the dominus being obsolete, less technical words would be more appropriate in the text. The usufructuary could not transfer the usufruct to another, because the usufruct attached to him personally, and was to terminate by his death or capitis diminutio, and not by that of a stranger. He could allow another to exercise his right

a question which had divided the jurists, whether a usufruct acquired by a slave or a filiusfamilias terminated on the death of the slave, or death or capitis deminutio of the son, or whether it remained for the benefit of the master or father. He decided that it should remain until the master's or father's natural or civil death, and further, that in the case of a filiusfamilias, it should also continue for his benefit after his father's death; so that the father had the usufruct for his life, and then the son, if he survived the father, had it for his life. (C. iii. 33. 16, 17.)

2. Non utendo per modum et tempus. Secondly, the usufructuary might lose the usufruct by not using it in the way agreed on by the parties during the time fixed by law. The usufructuary might, for instance, have the use of a fundus for the summer, and if he used it only during the winter he would not use the usufruct of the fundus in the way it was given him, and this was equivalent to not using it at all; and if he did not exercise his right at any period previous to the time fixed by law as that when the usufruct became extinct by non-usage, his right was gone. This time was, under the old law, one year when the usufruct affected moveables, and two years when the usufruct affected immoveables. If this period elapsed without the right being exercised, the owner of the nuda proprietas gained the usufruct by usucapion. Justinian altered this by fixing three years as the time for moveables, and ten or twenty years for immoveables, according as the person affected was present or absent. (See Tit. 6. 1.) The usufructuary was placed so far in the position of an owner of a thing, that it required the same length of time to make him lose the usufruct as it did to make the owner lose the property. Hence it is said in the Code (iii. 33. 16. 1) that he was not to lose the usufruct unless talis exceptio (i.e. of usucapion) usufructuario opponatur, quæ etiam si dominium vindicaret posset eum præsentem vel absentem excludere.

Non-usage and capitis deminutio only affected rights already commenced; and in order to avoid their effects the usufruct was often given by legacy in singulos annos, vel menses, vel dies. As a new usufruct thus began each year, month, or day, there could be no non-usage for a longer time than the duration of each usufruct, and capitis deminutio only affected the usufruct existing at the time it was undergone. (D. vii. 4. 1. 3, 28.)

3. Si domino cedatur. Thirdly, usufruct was lost if it was surrendered to the owner of the nuda proprietas. The word cedere belongs, in the corresponding passage of Gaius, to the in jure cessio, the fictitious suit by which personal servitudes were given up in the time of Gaius. This mode of giving up servitudes to the dominus being obsolete, less technical words would be more appropriate in the text. The usufructuary could not transfer the usufruct to another, because the usufruct attached to him personally, and was to terminate by his death or capitis deminutio, and not by that of a stranger. He could allow another to exercise his right of taking the fruits until he himself died or lost the servitude, but this did not make that person the owner of the usufruct.

4, 5. The two other modes by which a usufruct might be lost, viz. (4) consolidatio, when the usufruct was extinguished, quia res sua nemini servit, and (5) the thing being consumed, that is, either really perishing, or having its substantia altered, need no explanation.

Of course, if a usufruct was made conditionally, or for a limited time, it expired when the condition was accomplished or the time ended.

Apart from the modes of extinction by death and capitis deminutio peculiar to usufructus and usus, servitudes generally were, in the time of Justinian, extinguished in much the same way as the particular servitude of usufruct, viz.: 1. By the destruction of the thing—the res dominans or the res serviens. 2. By the owner of the res serviens becoming owner of the res dominans, or, in case of personal servitudes, by the usufructuary or usuary acquiring the remainder of the proprietas. 3. By the surrender of the servitude to the owner of the res dominans either, by agreement or by permitting something that destroys the servitude (D. viii. 6. 8). 4. By the expiration of the period during which the duration of the servitude has been limited by the creator. 5. Lastly by non-usage, there being, however, a remarkable difference in this respect between servitudes rusticorum prædiorum and servitudes urbanorum prædiorum; for as the possession of the former was not continuous, that is, the right was not always being exercised, the mere non-usage of the right during the time fixed by law extinguished it; but as the possession of the servitudes urbanorum prædiorum was continuous, it was necessary that the owner of the res serviens should do something to break the possession, or, as it was termed by the jurists, usucapere libertatem (D. viii. 2. 6), i.e. to commence the liberation of the res serviens, as, for instance, to turn a stillicidium away from his premises; and if this was acquiesced in during the time fixed by law, that is two years before Justinian, and, after the changes introduced by Justinian, ten or twenty years according as the parties were or were not in the same province, the owner of the res dominans could not afterwards claim his servitude.

4. Cum autem finitus fuerit usus fructus, revertitur scilicet ad proprietatem et ex eo tempore nudæ proprietatis dominus incipit plenam habere in re potestatem.

4. When the usufruct is ended, it reverts to the property; and the person who had the bare ownership begins thenceforth to have full power over the thing.

Some texts have finitus fuerit totus usufructus; for as the usufruct was divisible, portions of it might exist, and yet other portions have reverted to the owner of the nuda proprietas. It may be remarked that if two persons had a joint interest in the same usufruct, and the usufruct was divided between them, when

of taking the fruits until he himself died or lost the servitude, but this did not make that person the owner of the usufruct.

4, 5. The two other modes by which a usufruct might be lost, viz. (4) consolidatio, when the usufruct was extinguished, quia res sua nemini servit, and (5) the thing being consumed, that is, either really perishing, or having its substantia altered, need no explanation.

Of course, if a usufruct was made conditionally, or for a limited time, it expired when the condition was accomplished or the time ended.

Apart from the modes of extinction by death and capitis deminutio peculiar to usufructus and usus, servitudes generally were, in the time of Justinian, extinguished in much the same way as the particular servitude of usufruct, viz.: 1. By the destruction of the thing—the res dominans or the res serviens. 2. By the owner of the res serviens becoming owner of the res dominans, or, in case of personal servitudes, by the usufructuary or usuary acquiring the remainder of the proprietas. 3. By the surrender of the servitude to the owner of the res dominans either, by agreement or by permitting something that destroys the servitude (D. viii. 6. 8). 4. By the expiration of the period during which the duration of the servitude has been limited by the creator. 5. Lastly by non-usage, there being, however, a remarkable difference in this respect between servitudes rusticorum praediorum and servitudes urbanorum praediorum; for as the possession of the former was not continuous, that is, the right was not always being exercised, the mere non-usage of the right during the time fixed by law extinguished it; but as the possession of the servitudes urbanorum praediorum was continuous, it was necessary that the owner of the res serviens should do something to break the possession, or, as it was termed by the jurists, usucapere libertatem (D. viii. 2. 6), i.e. to commence the liberation of the res serviens, as, for instance, to turn a stillicidium away from his premises; and if this was acquiesced in during the time fixed by law, that is two years before Justinian, and, after the changes introduced by Justinian, ten or twenty years according as the parties were or were not in the same province, the owner of the res dominans could not afterwards claim his servitude.

4. Cum autem finitus fuerit usus fructus, revertitur scilicet ad proprietatem et ex eo tempore nudae proprietatis dominus incipit plenam habere in re potestatem.

4. When the usufruct is ended, it reverts to the property; and the person who had the bare ownership begins thenceforth to have full power over the thing.

Some texts have finitus fuerit totus usufructus; for as the usufruct was divisible, portions of it might exist, and yet other portions have reverted to the owner of the nuda proprietas. It may be remarked that if two persons had a joint interest in the same usufruct, and the usufruct was divided between them, when one died, his share went, not to the owner of the nuda proprietas but to his coproprietor: inter fructuarios est jus accrescendi. (D. vii. 2. 1. pr.)

TIT. V. DE USU ET HABITATIONE.

Isdem istis modis, quibus usus-fructus constituitur, etiam nudus usus constitui solet, iisdemque illis modis finitur, quibus et usufructus desinit.

A naked use is constituted in the same ways as the usufruct; and is terminated in the same ways in which the usufruct also ceases.

D. vii. 1. 3. 3.

The use was a portion of the usufruct. The person to whom this right was given could use the thing, but not take any of its fruits. He had the nudus usus (D. vii. 8. 1), the bare use of the thing, and enjoyed all the advantages he could obtain from the use; but he could avail himself of nothing which the thing produced. He could not, like the usufructuary, let, sell, or give the exercise of his right, for he was excluded from taking what were termed fructus civiles, as much as from taking fructus naturales. The jurists, however, modified in some degree the rigour of this principle; and the owner of the use was allowed, in cases where the right would otherwise have produced no benefit whatever, or where it seemed right to put a favourable interpretation on the wording of a testament, to take as much of certain kinds of produce as was sufficient for his daily wants.

1. Minus autem scilicet juris in usu est quam in usufructu. Namque is, qui fundi nudum usum habet, nihil ulterius habere intellegitur, quam ut oleribus, pomis, floribus, feno, stramentis, lignis ad usum cottidianum utatur: in eoque fundo hactenus ei morari licet, ut neque domino fundi molestus sit neque his, per quos opera rustica fiunt, impedimento sit: nec ulli alii jus, quod habet, aut vendere aut locare aut gratis concedere potest, cum is, qui usufructum habet, potest hæc omnia facere.

1. But, of course, the right of use is less extensive than that of usufruct; for he who has the naked use of lands, is not understood to have anything more than the right of taking herbs, fruit, flowers, hay, straw, and wood, sufficient for his daily supply. He is permitted to establish himself upon the land, so long as he neither annoys the owner, nor hinders those who are engaged in the cultivation of the soil. He cannot sell, or let, or give gratuitously his right to another, while a usufructuary may do all these things.

D. vii. 8. 10. 4; D. vii. 8. 12. 1; D. vii. 8. 11.

The jurists differed as to the fructus of which a certain daily supply might be taken, and as to whether it was necessary that they should be consumed on the spot. (D. vii. 8. 10. 1; D. vii. 8. 12. 1; D. vii. 8. 15.) The station of the usuarius and the abundance of the fruits would make a difference in particular cases.

The usuarius could prevent the owner as well as any one else from coming on land subject to a usus, except for the purpose of cultivating it.

one died, his share went, not to the owner of the nuda proprietas but to his coproprietor: inter fructuarios est jus accrescendi. (D. vii. 2. 1. pr.)

TIT. V. DE USU ET HABITATIONE.

Isdem istis modis, quibus usus-fructus constituitur, etiam nudus usus constitui solet, iisdemque illis modis finitur, quibus et usufructus desinit.

A naked use is constituted in the same ways as the usufruct; and is terminated in the same ways in which the usufruct also ceases.

D. vii. 1. 3. 3.

The use was a portion of the usufruct. The person to whom this right was given could use the thing, but not take any of its fruits. He had the nudus usus (D. vii. 8. 1), the bare use of the thing, and enjoyed all the advantages he could obtain from the use; but he could avail himself of nothing which the thing produced. He could not, like the usufructuary, let, sell, or give the exercise of his right, for he was excluded from taking what were termed fructus civiles, as much as from taking fructus naturales. The jurists, however, modified in some degree the rigour of this principle; and the owner of the use was allowed, in cases where the right would otherwise have produced no benefit whatever, or where it seemed right to put a favourable interpretation on the wording of a testament, to take as much of certain kinds of produce as was sufficient for his daily wants.

1. Minus autem scilicet juris in usu est quam in usufructu. Namque is, qui fundi nudum usum habet, nihil ulterius habere intellegitur, quam ut oleribus, pomis, floribus, feno, stramentis, lignis ad usum cottidianum utatur: in eoque fundo hactenus ei morari licet, ut neque domino fundi molestus sit neque his, per quos opera rustica fiunt, impedimento sit: nec ulli alii jus, quod habet, aut vendere aut locare aut gratis concedere potest, cum is, qui usufructum habet, potest hæc omnia facere.

1. But, of course, the right of use is less extensive than that of usufruct; for he who has the naked use of lands, is not understood to have anything more than the right of taking herbs, fruit, flowers, hay, straw, and wood, sufficient for his daily supply. He is permitted to establish himself upon the land, so long as he neither annoys the owner, nor hinders those who are engaged in the cultivation of the soil. He cannot sell, or let, or give gratuitously his right to another, while a usufructuary may do all these things.

D. vii. 8. 10. 4; D. vii. 8. 12. 1; D. vii. 8. 11.

The jurists differed as to the fructus of which a certain daily supply might be taken, and as to whether it was necessary that they should be consumed on the spot. (D. vii. 8. 10. 1; D. vii. 8. 12. 1; D. vii. 8. 15.) The station of the usuarius and the abundance of the fruits would make a difference in particular cases.

The usuarius could prevent the owner as well as any one else from coming on land subject to a usus, except for the purpose of cultivating it.

Aut gratis concedere. There would be a sort of fructus in being able to gratify the wish of giving and of conferring a favour, instead of receiving a price.

2. Item is, qui ædium usum habet, hactenus juris habere intellegitur, ut ipse tantum habitet, nec hoc jus ad alium transferre potest: et vix receptum videtur, ut hospitum ei recipere liceat et cum uxore sua liberisque suis, item libertis nec non aliis liberis personis, quibus non minus quam servis utitur, habitandi jus habeat et convenienter, si ad mulierem usus ædium pertineat, cum marito habitare ei liceat.

2. He who has the use of a house, has a right over it to the extent of inhabiting it himself; he cannot transfer this right to another; and it is not without hesitation that it has been thought allowable that he should receive a guest in the house, and live in it with his wife and children, and freedmen, and other free persons who may be attached to his service no less than his slaves are; and that a wife, in the same way, if it is she who has the use of a house, may live in it with her husband.

D. vii. 8. 2. 1; D. vii. 8. 4, 6, 8.

The usuarius had the use of the whole thing, and the owner could not make use of any part not used by the usuarius. (D. vii. 8. 22. 1.) So, too, the right of usus was indivisible, and could not be given in detached portions, as that of usufruct could be, to different persons. (D. vii. 8. 19.) But one person could have the use, and another the usufruct of the same thing. (D. vii. 8. 14. 3.)

The doubt expressed in the text had long ago been set at rest, and it was settled that the wife or the husband might use the thing of which the use was given to the other. (D. vii. 8. 4. 1; D. vii. 8. 9.)

slave himself
3. Item is, ad quem servi usus pertinet, ipse tantum operis atque ministerio ejus uti potest: ad alium vero nullo modo jus suum transferre ei concessum est. Idem scilicet juris est et in jumento.

3. So, too, he who has the use of a slave, has only the right of himself using the labour and services of the slave: for he is not permitted in any way to transfer his right to another. And it is the same with regard to beasts of burden.

D. vii. 8. 12. 5, 6.

4. Sed si pecoris vel ovium usus legatus fuerit, neque lacte neque agnis neque lana utetur usuarius, quia ea in fructu sunt. Plane ad stercorandum agrum suum pecoribus uti potest.

4. If the use of cattle or sheep is given as a legacy, the person who has the use cannot take the milk, the lambs, or the wool, for these are among the fruits. But he may certainly make use of the animals to manure his land.

D. vii. 8. 12. 2.

As a flock was hardly of any use if a person might not take any of the fructus, the usuarius was allowed to have a little milk (modicum lac) when the usus had been constituted in a way to admit of a favourable interpretation. (D. vii. 8. 12. 2.)

Aut gratis concedere. There would be a sort of fructus in being able to gratify the wish of giving and of conferring a favour, instead of receiving a price.

2. Item is, qui ædium usum habet, hactenus juris habere intellegitur, ut ipse tantum habitet, nec hoc jus ad alium transferre potest: et vix receptum videtur, ut hospitum ei recipere liceat et cum uxore sua liberisque suis, item libertis nec non aliis liberis personis, quibus non minus quam servis utitur, habitandi jus habeat et convenienter, si ad mulierem usus ædium pertineat, cum marito habitare ei liceat.

2. He who has the use of a house, has a right over it to the extent of inhabiting it himself; he cannot transfer this right to another; and it is not without hesitation that it has been thought allowable that he should receive a guest in the house, and live in it with his wife and children, and freedmen, and other free persons who may be attached to his service no less than his slaves are; and that a wife, in the same way, if it is she who has the use of a house, may live in it with her husband.

D. vii. 8. 2. 1; D. vii. 8. 4, 6, 8.

The usuarius had the use of the whole thing, and the owner could not make use of any part not used by the usuarius. (D. vii. 8. 22. 1.) So, too, the right of usus was indivisible, and could not be given in detached portions, as that of usufruct could be, to different persons. (D. vii. 8. 19.) But one person could have the use, and another the usufruct of the same thing. (D. vii. 8. 14. 3.)

The doubt expressed in the text had long ago been set at rest, and it was settled that the wife or the husband might use the thing of which the use was given to the other. (D. vii. 8. 4. 1; D. vii. 8. 9.)

slave himself
3. Item is, ad quem servi usus pertinet, ipse tantum operis atque ministerio ejus uti potest: ad alium vero nullo modo jus suum transferre ei concessum est. Idem scilicet juris est et in jumento.

3. So, too, he who has the use of a slave, has only the right of himself using the labour and services of the slave: for he is not permitted in any way to transfer his right to another. And it is the same with regard to beasts of burden.

D. vii. 8. 12. 5, 6.

4. Sed si pecoris vel ovium usus legatus fuerit, neque lacte neque agnis neque lana utetur usuarius, quia ea in fructu sunt. Plane ad stercorandum agrum suum pecoribus uti potest.

4. If the use of cattle or sheep is given as a legacy, the person who has the use cannot take the milk, the lambs, or the wool, for these are among the fruits. But he may certainly make use of the animals to manure his land.

D. vii. 8. 12. 2.

As a flock was hardly of any use if a person might not take any of the fructus, the usuarius was allowed to have a little milk (modicum lac) when the usus had been constituted in a way to admit of a favourable interpretation. (D. vii. 8. 12. 2.)

5. Sed si cui habitatio legata sive aliquo modo constituta sit, neque usus videtur neque usufructus, sed quasi proprium aliquod jus. Quam habitationem habentibus propter rerum utilitatem secundum Marcelli sententiam nostra decisione promulgata permisimus non solum in ea degere, sed etiam aliis locare.

5. But if the right of habitation is given to any one, either as a legacy or in any other way, this does not seem a use or a usufruct, but a right that stands as it were by itself. From a regard to what is useful, and conformably to an opinion of Marcellus, we have published a decision, by which we have permitted those who have this right of habitation, not only themselves to inhabit the place over which the right extends, but also to let to others the right of inhabiting it.

D. vii. 8. 10. pr.; C. iii. 33.

The jurists had doubted whether habitatio was to be considered a distinct servitude (D. vii. 8. 10. pr.), which Justinian here pronounces it to be. So far as it differed from the use, or, after Justinian gave the power of letting the house, from the usufruct, of the house, it perhaps differed by being an occupation allowed as a fact rather than as a right, if this is the meaning of Modestinus when, in speaking of a legacy of habitatio given in singulos annos aut menses, he says, potius in facto quam in jure consistit. (D. iv. 5. 10.) It did not cease by non-usage or by capitis deminutio. (D. vii. 8. 10. pr.)

6. Hæc de servitutibus et usufructu et usu et habitatione dixisse sufficiat. De hereditate autem et de obligationibus suis locis proponemus. Exposuimus summam, quibus modis jure gentium res adquiruntur: modo videamus, quibus modis legitimo et civili jure adquiruntur.

6. Let it suffice to have said thus much concerning servitudes, usufruct, use, and habitation. We shall treat of inheritances and obligations in their proper places. We have already briefly explained how things are acquired by the law of nations; let us now examine how they are acquired by statute and the civil law.

Before quitting the subject of servitudes it is proper to observe that, besides the possessory interdicts by which the possession of servitudes was secured, there were two real actions by which a claim was made with regard to a servitude. By the one (actio in rem confessoria), the owner of the servitude claimed to have his servitude protected, and the right to it pronounced to be his, against any one who attempted to disturb him in his quasi-possession, or disputed his right. By the other (actio in rem negatoria), the owner of a thing over which another person claimed or exercised a servitude himself claimed to have this thing pronounced free from the servitude. It might seem as if this was rather a defence to an action for the servitude than itself a real action. But it was considered a substantive and independent action, because the owner of the dominium thereby vindicated his claim to a portion of it, namely, to the servitude which it was attempted to detach from the ownership. (See Book iv. Tit. 6. 2.)

Justinian now returns to the examination of the modes in which things are acquired, and the sixth Title would properly

5. Sed si cui habitatio legata sive aliquo modo constituta sit, neque usus videtur neque usufructus, sed quasi proprium aliquod jus. Quam habitationem habentibus propter rerum utilitatem secundum Marcelli sententiam nostra decisione promulgata permisimus non solum in ea degere, sed etiam aliis locare.

5. But if the right of habitation is given to any one, either as a legacy or in any other way, this does not seem a use or a usufruct, but a right that stands as it were by itself. From a regard to what is useful, and conformably to an opinion of Marcellus, we have published a decision, by which we have permitted those who have this right of habitation, not only themselves to inhabit the place over which the right extends, but also to let to others the right of inhabiting it.

D. vii. 8. 10. pr.; C. iii. 33.

The jurists had doubted whether habitatio was to be considered a distinct servitude (D. vii. 8. 10. pr.), which Justinian here pronounces it to be. So far as it differed from the use, or, after Justinian gave the power of letting the house, from the usufruct, of the house, it perhaps differed by being an occupation allowed as a fact rather than as a right, if this is the meaning of Modestinus when, in speaking of a legacy of habitatio given in singulos annos aut menses, he says, potius in facto quam in jure consistit. (D. iv. 5. 10.) It did not cease by non-usage or by capitis deminutio. (D. vii. 8. 10. pr.)

6. Hæc de servitutibus et usufructu et usu et habitatione dixisse sufficiat. De hereditate autem et de obligationibus suis locis proponemus. Exposuimus summam, quibus modis jure gentium res adquiruntur: modo videamus, quibus modis legitimo et civili jure adquiruntur.

6. Let it suffice to have said thus much concerning servitudes, usufruct, use, and habitation. We shall treat of inheritances and obligations in their proper places. We have already briefly explained how things are acquired by the law of nations; let us now examine how they are acquired by statute and the civil law.

Before quitting the subject of servitudes it is proper to observe that, besides the possessory interdicts by which the possession of servitudes was secured, there were two real actions by which a claim was made with regard to a servitude. By the one (actio in rem confessoria), the owner of the servitude claimed to have his servitude protected, and the right to it pronounced to be his, against any one who attempted to disturb him in his quasi-possession, or disputed his right. By the other (actio in rem negatoria), the owner of a thing over which another person claimed or exercised a servitude himself claimed to have this thing pronounced free from the servitude. It might seem as if this was rather a defence to an action for the servitude than itself a real action. But it was considered a substantive and independent action, because the owner of the dominium thereby vindicated his claim to a portion of it, namely, to the servitude which it was attempted to detach from the ownership. (See Book iv. Tit. 6. 2.)

Justinian now returns to the examination of the modes in which things are acquired, and the sixth Title would properly

follow the latter part of the first. Before, however, we leave the subject of jura in rem falling short of ownership, we must notice three other kinds of such jura in rem besides servitudes, of which the Institutes here make no mention. These are the jus emphyteuticarium, the jus superficium, and the jus pignoris.

The exact time when servitudes first became a part of Roman law is not easy to discover. The Twelve Tables determine the width of a way, but there is nothing to show that this was intended to regulate the width of a way to which one person had a right over the land of another. However, the nature of servitudes makes it almost certain that they must have very early been recognised by law; and, at any rate, we learn that they were so long before the end of the Republic. The period at which the three jura in rem, which we have just named, were established as a part of law, can be ascertained more readily. The first, the jus emphyteuticarium, though based on an institution of the civil law, yet only assumed its peculiar character in the time of the Lower Empire; the two others owed their existence to the prætors.

The jus emphyteuticarium, or, as it is more generally called, emphyteusis (see Book iii. Tit. 24. 3), was the right of enjoying all the fruits, and disposing at pleasure, of the prædium of another, subject to the payment of a yearly rent (pensio, or canon) to the owner. Formerly the lands of the Roman people, of municipalities, or the college of priests, used to be let for different terms of years, sometimes for a short term, such as that of five years, sometimes for a term amounting almost to a perpetuity, under the name of agri vectigales. (Gai. iii. 145.) Afterwards, not only the lands but also the houses of private individuals were let in a similar manner; and these lands and houses so let were termed prædia emphyteutica (C. xi. 58. 61), a name arising from there being a new ownership, or what almost amounted to an ownership, engrafted (ἐν, φρεσύω) on the real dominium. Alongside this new tenure still continued the letting by the state of agri vectigales. Either shortly before, or in the time of Justinian, the two rights, that relating to the agri vectigales, and that of emphyteusis, were united under the common name of emphyteusis, and subjected to particular regulations.

Both lands and buildings could be subject to emphyteusis. (Nov. vii. 3. 1. 2.) The emphyteuta, as the person who enjoyed the right was termed, besides enjoying all the rights of a usufructuary, could dispose of the thing, or rather of his rights over it, in any way he pleased (Nov. vii. 3. 2), except that the dominus had a right of preemption; or, if he did not exercise this right, he had a fine on the transfer of not more than 2 per cent. on the purchase-money. (C. iv. 66. 3.) The emphyteuta could create a servitude over the thing or mortgage it (D. xiii. 7. 16. 2); he had a real action (which, however, was said to be a utilis vindicatio, because he was not the owner, but only in the place of one) to defend or assert his follow the latter part of the first. Before, however, we leave the subject of jura in rem falling short of ownership, we must notice three other kinds of such jura in rem besides servitudes, of which the Institutes here make no mention. These are the jus emphyteuticarium, the jus superficium, and the jus pignoris.

The exact time when servitudes first became a part of Roman law is not easy to discover. The Twelve Tables determine the width of a way, but there is nothing to show that this was intended to regulate the width of a way to which one person had a right over the land of another. However, the nature of servitudes makes it almost certain that they must have very early been recognised by law; and, at any rate, we learn that they were so long before the end of the Republic. The period at which the three jura in rem, which we have just named, were established as a part of law, can be ascertained more readily. The first, the jus emphyteuticarium, though based on an institution of the civil law, yet only assumed its peculiar character in the time of the Lower Empire; the two others owed their existence to the prætors.

The jus emphyteuticarium, or, as it is more generally called, emphyteusis (see Book iii. Tit. 24. 3), was the right of enjoying all the fruits, and disposing at pleasure, of the prædium of another, subject to the payment of a yearly rent (pensio, or canon) to the owner. Formerly the lands of the Roman people, of municipalities, or the college of priests, used to be let for different terms of years, sometimes for a short term, such as that of five years, sometimes for a term amounting almost to a perpetuity, under the name of agri vectigales. (GAI. iii. 145.) Afterwards, not only the lands but also the houses of private individuals were let in a similar manner; and these lands and houses so let were termed prædia emphyteuticaria (C. xi. 58. 61), a name arising from there being a new ownership, or what almost amounted to an ownership, engrafted (ἐν, φυτεύω) on the real dominium. Alongside this new tenure still continued the letting by the state of agri vectigales. Either shortly before, or in the time of Justinian, the two rights, that relating to the agri vectigales, and that of emphyteusis, were united under the common name of emphyteusis, and subjected to particular regulations.

Both lands and buildings could be subject to emphyteusis. (Nov. vii. 3. 1. 2.) The emphyteuta, as the person who enjoyed the right was termed, besides enjoying all the rights of a usufructuary, could dispose of the thing, or rather of his rights over it, in any way he pleased (Nov. vii. 3. 2), except that the dominus had a right of preemption; or, if he did not exercise this right, he had a fine on the transfer of not more than 2 per cent. on the purchase-money. (C. iv. 66. 3.) The emphyteuta could create a servitude over the thing or mortgage it (D. xiii. 7. 16. 2); he had a real action (which, however, was said to be a utilis vindicatio, because he was not the owner, but only in the place of one) to defend or assert his rights; and at his death his right was transmitted to his heirs. (Nov. vii. 3.) He was obliged to pay his pensio under any circumstances, whether he actually benefited by his emphyteusis or not, and could be expelled if the pensio was three years in arrear. (C. iv. 66. 1.) He was also bound to use the thing over which his right extended, so that it was not deteriorated in value at the time his right expired. (Nov. vii. 3. 2.)

The right of superficies was almost identical with that of emphyteusis, but applied only to the superficies, that is, things built on the ground, not to the ground itself. It was the right of disposing freely of a building erected on another man's soil without destroying it, subject to the payment of a yearly rent. (D. vi. 1. 74.) It must have been the creation of the jus pretorium at a time when there was nothing like the emphyteusis of buildings, and when it was only lands that were let as agri vectigales. The rights and duties of the superficiarius, the person who enjoyed the right, may be gathered from those of the emphyteuta.

The jus pignoris was the right given to a creditor over a thing belonging to another, in order to secure the payment of a debt. When the thing over which the right was given passed into the possession of the creditor, the right of the creditor was expressed by the word pignus; when the thing remained in the hands of the debtor, the right of the creditor was expressed by hypotheca. Sometimes only one or more particular things were under a hypotheca, sometimes all the property of the debtor. The right of the creditor extended only to the amount of his debt, but all the thing pledged was subject to his claim. The right might be created by the mere agreement of the parties, without any handing over or tradition of the thing pledged to the creditor. (C. viii. 17. 2. 9.) Sometimes the right was created by a magistrate, who gave execution to a creditor by this means; and in many cases the law created what was called hypotheca tacita over the property, as, for instance, over the property of a tutor, in favour of the pupil, and over the property of a husband, that the dos of the wife might be restored.

The creditor had the right (1) of selling (D. xx. 5) or pledging (C. viii. 24) the thing pledged; (2) of satisfying his own claim before that of any one else out of the proceeds of the sale, or of the money obtained by pledging the thing; (3) of having himself constituted owner of the thing if no purchaser could be found for it. The creditor could not be deprived even by agreement of his power of sale. Justinian enacted that, unless the parties otherwise agreed, the sale should take place not sooner than two years after notice to pay, and in two years more, if no purchaser could be found, the creditor could be declared the owner. (Tit. 8. 1 note.) (4) Of bringing a real action (termed the actio quasi-Serviana) against any third person who unlawfully detained the thing pledged to him, or, if he had only a hypotheca, against the borrower to put him in possession of the thing pledged. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7.)

Cre

1 ag

2 h

3 Law

4

rights; and at his death his right was transmitted to his heirs. (Nov. vii. 3.) He was obliged to pay his pensio under any circumstances, whether he actually benefited by his emphyteusis or not, and could be expelled if the pensio was three years in arrear. (C. iv. 66. 1.) He was also bound to use the thing over which his right extended, so that it was not deteriorated in value at the time his right expired. (Nov. vii. 3. 2.)

The right of superficies was almost identical with that of emphyteusis, but applied only to the superficies, that is, things built on the ground, not to the ground itself. It was the right of disposing freely of a building erected on another man's soil without destroying it, subject to the payment of a yearly rent. (D. vi. 1. 74.) It must have been the creation of the jus pretorium at a time when there was nothing like the emphyteusis of buildings, and when it was only lands that were let as agri vectigales. The rights and duties of the superficiarius, the person who enjoyed the right, may be gathered from those of the emphyteuta.

The jus pignoris was the right given to a creditor over a thing belonging to another, in order to secure the payment of a debt. When the thing over which the right was given passed into the possession of the creditor, the right of the creditor was expressed by the word pignus; when the thing remained in the hands of the debtor, the right of the creditor was expressed by hypotheca. Sometimes only one or more particular things were under a hypotheca, sometimes all the property of the debtor. The right of the creditor extended only to the amount of his debt, but all the thing pledged was subject to his claim. The right might be created by the mere agreement of the parties, without any handing over or tradition of the thing pledged to the creditor. (C. viii. 17. 2. 9.) Sometimes the right was created by a magistrate, who gave execution to a creditor by this means; and in many cases the law created what was called hypotheca tacita, over the property, as, for instance, over the property of a tutor, in favour of the pupil, and over the property of a husband, that the dos of the wife might be restored.

The creditor had the right (1) of selling (D. xx. 5) or pledging (C. viii. 24) the thing pledged; (2) of satisfying his own claim before that of any one else out of the proceeds of the sale, or of the money obtained by pledging the thing; (3) of having himself constituted owner of the thing if no purchaser could be found for it. The creditor could not be deprived even by agreement of his power of sale. Justinian enacted that, unless the parties otherwise agreed, the sale should take place not sooner than two years after notice to pay, and in two years more, if no purchaser could be found, the creditor could be declared the owner. (Tit. 8. 1 note.) (4) Of bringing a real action (termed the actio quasi-Serviana) against any third person who unlawfully detained the thing pledged to him, or, if he had only a hypotheca, against the borrower to put him in possession of the thing pledged. (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 7.)

Cre

1 ag

2 h

3 Law

4

If the same thing was pledged to different creditors, the one to whom it was first pledged had generally a preference, potior tempore, potior jure. But there were certain hypothecæ which had special privileges attached to them, and which had a first claim on the property of the debtor, such as the hypotheca of the fiscus or imperial treasury for the payment of taxes (C. iv. 46. 1), and that of a wife for her dos (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 29; C. viii. 14. 12); and hypothecæ which were created by an instrument signed by three substantial witnesses had a preference over others by a constitution of Leo. (C. viii. 18. 11.)

Gaius speaks of an older form of giving pledge, the contractus fiduciæ, by which the full property in the thing pledged was made over to the creditor by mancipatio or in jure cessio, the debtor being entitled to a reconveyance if he paid the debt; but this was obsolete in the time of Justinian. (GAI. ii. 59, 60.)

TIT. VI. DE USUCAPIONIBUS ET LONGI TEMPORIS POSSESSIONIBUS. •

Jure civili constitutum fuerat, ut, qui bona fide ab eo, qui dominus non erat, cum crediderit, eum dominum esse, rem emerit vel ex donatione aliae qua justa causa acceperit, si eam rem, si mobilis erat, anno ubique, si immobilis, biennio tantum in Italico solo usucapiat, ne rerum dominia in incerto essent. Et cum hoc placitum erat, putantibus antiquioribus, dominis sufficere ad inquirendas res suas præfata tempora, nobis melior sententia resedit, ne domini maturius suis rebus defraudentur neque certo loco beneficium hoc concludatur. Et ideo constitutionem super hoc promulgavimus, qua cautum est, ut res quidem mobiles per triennium usucapiantur, immobiles vero per longi temporis possessionem, id est inter presentes decennio, inter absentes viginti annis usucapiantur et his modis non solum in Italia, sed in omni terra, quæ nostro imperio gubernatur, dominium rerum, justa causa possessionis præcedente adquiratur.

By the civil law it was provided that if any one by purchase, gift, or any other legal means, had bona fide received a thing from a person who was not the owner, but whom he thought to be so, he should acquire this thing by use if he held it for one year, if it was a moveable, wherever it might be, or for two years, if it was an immoveable, but this only if it was in the solum Italicum; the object of this provision being to prevent the ownership of things remaining in uncertainty. Such was the decision of the ancients, who thought the times we have mentioned sufficient for owners to inquire after their property; but we have come to a much better decision from a wish to prevent owners being despoiled of their property too quickly, and to prevent the benefit of this mode of acquisition being confined to any particular locality. We have accordingly published a constitution providing that moveables shall be acquired by a use extending for three years, but immoveables by the 'possession of long time,' that is, ten years for persons present, and twenty for persons absent; and that by these means, provided a just cause of possession precede, the ownership of things may be acquired, not only in Italy, but in every country subject to our empire.

If the same thing was pledged to different creditors, the one to whom it was first pledged had generally a preference, potior tempore, potior jure. But there were certain hypothecæ which had special privileges attached to them, and which had a first claim on the property of the debtor, such as the hypotheca of the fiscus or imperial treasury for the payment of taxes (C. iv. 46. 1), and that of a wife for her dos (Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 29; C. viii. 14. 12); and hypothecæ which were created by an instrument signed by three substantial witnesses had a preference over others by a constitution of Leo. (C. viii. 18. 11.)

Gaius speaks of an older form of giving pledge, the contractus fiduciæ, by which the full property in the thing pledged was made over to the creditor by mancipatio or in jure cessio, the debtor being entitled to a reconveyance if he paid the debt; but this was obsolete in the time of Justinian. (GAI. ii. 59, 60.)

TIT. VI. DE USUCAPIONIBUS ET LONGI TEMPORIS POSSESSIONIBUS. •

Jure civili constitutum fuerat, ut, qui bona fide ab eo, qui dominus non erat, eum crediderit, eum dominum esse, rem emerit vel ex donatione aliave qua justa causa acceperit, is eam rem, si mobilis erat, anno ubique, si immobilis, biennio tantum in Italico solo usucapiat, ne rerum dominia in incerto essent. Et cum hoc placitum erat, putantibus antiquioribus, dominis sufficere ad inquirendas res suas præfata tempora, nobis melior sententia resedit, ne domini maturius suis rebus defraudentur neque certo loco beneficium hoc concludatur. Et ideo constitutionem super hoc promulgavimus, qua cautum est, ut res quidem mobiles per triennium usucapiantur, immobiles vero per longi temporis possessionem, id est inter presentes decennio, inter absentes viginti annis usucapiantur et his modis non solum in Italia, sed in omni terra, quæ nostro imperio gubernatur, dominium rerum justa causa possessionis præcedente adquiratur.

By the civil law it was provided that if any one by purchase, gift, or any other legal means, had bona fide received a thing from a person who was not the owner, but whom he thought to be so, he should acquire this thing by use if he held it for one year, if it was a moveable, wherever it might be, or for two years, if it was an immoveable, but this only if it was in the solum Italicum; the object of this provision being to prevent the ownership of things remaining in uncertainty. Such was the decision of the ancients, who thought the times we have mentioned sufficient for owners to inquire after their property; but we have come to a much better decision from a wish to prevent owners being despoiled of their property too quickly, and to prevent the benefit of this mode of acquisition being confined to any particular locality. We have accordingly published a constitution providing that moveables shall be acquired by a use extending for three years, but immoveables by the 'possession of long time,' that is, ten years for persons present, and twenty for persons absent; and that by these means, provided a just cause of possession precede, the ownership of things may be acquired, not only in Italy, but in every country subject to our empire.

The subject of possessio is only treated indirectly in the Institutes, and it is necessary to have a general conception of the meaning of the term before proceeding to examine the mode of acquiring property called usucapion.

By possessio is meant primarily mere detention, i.e. the physical apprehension of a thing. If the possessor adds the intention (animus) of holding the thing as his own and of exercising over it all the rights of an owner, then he has legal possession of it as opposed to the mere physical possession involved in a simple detention. When a person had legal possession of a thing, he was protected in his possession against any one who had not a better title to possess, and in order to protect him the prætor granted him an interdict. If his possession was not founded on force or fraud, and had been acquired by a legal mode of acquisition, then it ripened, after a length of time laid down by law, into full ownership, and the process by which the change was effected was termed usucapio. Thus the meaning of the term legal or juristical possession, the protection of the rights of the possessor by interdicts, and the transmutation under certain circumstances of possessio into ownership by the lapse of time, are the three main points on which attention has to be fixed in examining the subject of possessio. 1 2 3

The two requisites of legal possession are briefly summed up in the words detentio and animus. The detention of a corporeal thing means such a holding of it as enables the person detaining to deal with the thing at his pleasure. Thus a person who enters on part of a piece of land has detention of the whole because it is at his pleasure to go to any part of it. A person who has the key of a granary has the means of going into the granary. The animus means the intention of the possessor to hold the thing possessed as his own, and not as a borrower holds the thing, for the latter holds it avowedly as belonging to another (alieno nomine).

When a person was in possession of a thing physically, but without the animus possidendi, as a borrower would be of the thing lent, he was said not to possess it, but to be in possession of it, non possidet, est tantum in possessione (D. xli. 2. 10); and a person merely in possession was not protected by interdicts. The Roman jurists contrast natural with civil possession, and in natural possession they include the two cases of a possessor not possessing bona fide and ex justa causa and a person in possessione, while by civil possession they mean such a possession as was capable of transmutation by usucapion, that is, was bona fide and ex justa causa.

The edict fixed certain cases in which the prætor would himself at once give a decision and pronounce what was to be done without sending the case to be examined by a iudex, and the order of the prætor thus given was called an interdict (see Bk. iv. Tit. 15). What was termed an interdictum retinende possessionis was granted to a person whose possession had been disturbed or threatened with disturbance, and an interdictum recuperandæ

The subject of possessio is only treated indirectly in the Institutes, and it is necessary to have a general conception of the meaning of the term before proceeding to examine the mode of acquiring property called usucapion.

By possessio is meant primarily mere detention, i.e. the physical apprehension of a thing. If the possessor adds the intention (animus) of holding the thing as his own and of exercising over it all the rights of an owner, then he has legal possession of it as opposed to the mere physical possession involved in a simple detention. When a person had legal possession of a thing, he was protected in his possession against any one who had not a better title to possess, and in order to protect him the prætor granted him an interdict. If his possession was not founded on force or fraud, and had been acquired by a legal mode of acquisition, then it ripened, after a length of time laid down by law, into full ownership, and the process by which the change was effected was termed usucapio. Thus the meaning of the term legal or juristical possession, the protection of the rights of the possessor by interdicts, and the transmutation under certain circumstances of possessio into ownership by the lapse of time, are the three main points on which attention has to be fixed in examining the subject of possessio. 1 2 3

The two requisites of legal possession are briefly summed up in the words detentio and animus. The detention of a corporeal thing means such a holding of it as enables the person detaining to deal with the thing at his pleasure. Thus a person who enters on part of a piece of land has detention of the whole because it is at his pleasure to go to any part of it. A person who has the key of a granary has the means of going into the granary. The animus means the intention of the possessor to hold the thing possessed as his own, and not as a borrower holds the thing, for the latter holds it avowedly as belonging to another (alieno nomine).

When a person was in possession of a thing physically, but without the animus possidendi, as a borrower would be of the thing lent, he was said not to possess it, but to be in possession of it, non possidet, est tantum in possessione (D. xli. 2. 10); and a person merely in possession was not protected by interdicts. The Roman jurists contrast natural with civil possession, and in natural possession they include the two cases of a possessor not possessing bona fide and ex justa causa and a person in possessione, while by civil possession they mean such a possession as was capable of transmutation by usucapion, that is, was bona fide and ex justa causa.

The edict fixed certain cases in which the prætor would himself at once give a decision and pronounce what was to be done without sending the case to be examined by a iudex, and the order of the prætor thus given was called an interdict (see Bk. iv. Tit. 15). What was termed an interdictum retinende possessionis was granted to a person whose possession had been disturbed or threatened with disturbance, and an interdictum recuperanda possessionis was granted to a person who had been forcibly ejected from his possession. Whenever a person possessed a thing as a matter of fact, with the intention of treating it as if he was the owner, that is, as if it belonged to him, the possessor had a right to the interdicts that protected his possession. But it was only when the possession was bona fide and ex justa causa that the operation of usucapion would transmute his possession into ownership: that is, the possessor must have commenced his possession, thinking he had a real right to possess, and have acquired it by a recognised legal method of acquiring property. A possessio which was commenced under these circumstances was changed into dominium by lapse of time, and the time required, as fixed by the law of the Twelve Tables, was two years if the thing possessed was an immoveable, and one year if it was a moveable. The operation of usucapion was of the greatest importance in the system of Roman law. Things that being res mancipi ought to have been conveyed by mancipation, but had been conveyed without the necessary ceremony, were not legally passed in ownership to the person to whom they were nominally conveyed. But the very short time requisite for the operation of usucapion quickly changed the possession into dominium, and thus ended the separation of the legal and beneficial interests. And, generally, when the prætor gave the possession of property where he could not by strict law give the ownership, that is, when he exercised his equitable jurisdiction, the operation of usucapion soon converted the possessor bonorum into the full legal dominus.

In order that the ownership of a thing should be acquired by usucapion, it was of course necessary that the thing itself should be susceptible of being held in dominio. There was no ownership possible, for instance, in the case of the solum provinciale, and, therefore, no usucapion. The emperor or the people were owners of the soil, and the actual occupier of land in the provinces could not be the owner; he could only be protected in the possession of it; and the prætors protected his possession against the claim of any one asserting himself to be the rightful possessor, by permitting the possessor, when he had held the land for ten years, if he and the claimant had during that time inhabited the same province (inter presentes), or when he had held it for twenty years, if they had not (inter absentes), to repel the action by an exception, which, as being placed at the beginning of the intentio, was termed a prescriptio (see Introd. sec. 104), and would probably be in this form: Ea res agatur, cujus non est longi temporis possessio; and this prescription or exception (for the terms may be used indifferently, as it was only in the early times of the construction of the formula that such a defence was really placed at the beginning of the intentio), if found to be true in fact, made the possessor quite secure.

This prescription, however, had not exactly the same effect as usucapion. In the first place, it did not make the person owner

possessio was granted to a person who had been forcibly ejected from his possession. Whenever a person possessed a thing as a matter of fact, with the intention of treating it as if he was the owner, that is, as if it belonged to him, the possessor had a right to the interdicts that protected his possession. But it was only when the possession was bona fide and ex justa causa that the operation of usucapion would transmute his possession into ownership: that is, the possessor must have commenced his possession, thinking he had a real right to possess, and have acquired it by a recognised legal method of acquiring property. A possessio which was commenced under these circumstances was changed into dominium by lapse of time, and the time required, as fixed by the law of the Twelve Tables, was two years if the thing possessed was an immovable, and one year if it was a moveable. The operation of usucapion was of the greatest importance in the system of Roman law. Things that being res mancipi ought to have been conveyed by mancipation, but had been conveyed without the necessary ceremony, were not legally passed in ownership to the person to whom they were nominally conveyed. But the very short time requisite for the operation of usucapion quickly changed the possession into dominium, and thus ended the separation of the legal and beneficial interests. And, generally, when the prætor gave the possession of property where he could not by strict law give the ownership, that is, when he exercised his equitable jurisdiction, the operation of usucapion soon converted the possessor bonorum into the full legal dominus.

In order that the ownership of a thing should be acquired by usucapion, it was of course necessary that the thing itself should be susceptible of being held in dominio. There was no ownership possible, for instance, in the case of the solum provinciale, and, therefore, no usucapion. The emperor or the people were owners of the soil, and the actual occupier of land in the provinces could not be the owner; he could only be protected in the possession of it; and the prætors protected his possession against the claim of any one asserting himself to be the rightful possessor, by permitting the possessor, when he had held the land for ten years, if he and the claimant had during that time inhabited the same province (inter presentes), or when he had held it for twenty years, if they had not (inter absentes), to repel the action by an exception, which, as being placed at the beginning of the intentio, was termed a prescriptio (see Introd. sec. 104), and would probably be in this form: Ea res agatur, cujus non est longi temporis possessio; and this prescription or exception (for the terms may be used indifferently, as it was only in the early times of the construction of the formula that such a defence was really placed at the beginning of the intentio), if found to be true in fact, made the possessor quite secure.

This prescription, however, had not exactly the same effect as usucapion. In the first place, it did not make the person owner of the immoveable, for nothing could do that with respect to the solum provinciale. Secondly, if an action was brought by the real owner, the usucapion was not interrupted until judgment had been given against the possessor (D. xli. 4. 2. 21); whereas, if an action was brought against the possessor of an immoveable in the solum provinciale, the præscriptio longi temporis was of no avail unless the time required had expired before the proceeding had reached that stage termed the litis contestatio. (See Introd. sec. 105.) Lastly, the effect of the præscriptio longi temporis was in one way more favourable to the possessor than that of usucapion; for the person who acquired a thing by usucapion acquired it with all its liabilities and charges; whereas the præscriptio longi temporis was a good plea to the action of a person who claimed to have a right over the thing, as, for instance, a right of servitude or mortgage, which he had not asserted while the time was running, so that the possessor who could use this plea had the thing he possessed quite free from any liability or charge anterior to the commencement of his possession. (D. xli. 3. 44. 5; D. xlv. 3. 12.)

In the time of Justinian all difference between the solum Italicum and the solum provinciale was done away. The text furnishes us with a brief statement of the change made in the effect of possession. Under Justinian possession during three years (called, however, usucapion in this case—see paragr. 12 of this Title) gave the ownership of moveables; possession during ten years if the parties were present, or twenty if they were absent, gave the ownership of immoveables. Thus the length of possession no longer afforded merely a means of repelling an action, but conferred the dominium, although the word præscriptio was used to express the process. (See Tit. 9. 5 of this Book.)

1. Sed aliquando etiamsi maxime quis bona fide rem possederit, non tamen illi usucapio ullo tempore procedit, veluti si quis liberum hominem vel rem sacram vel religiosam vel servum fugitivum possideat.

1. Sometimes, however, although the thing is possessed with perfect good faith, yet usucapion does not operate by any length of time; as, for instance, when the possession is of a free person, a thing sacred or religious, or a fugitive slave.

GAI. ii. 45. 48.

The Institutes now proceed to speak of the exceptions to the rule of acquisition by use. These exceptions arise from two sources: either the thing which we have possessed is in its nature incapable of being acquired by use, or there is something in the mode in which it has come into our possession which prevents length of possession having its ordinary effect.

As a general rule, no incorporeal thing could be acquired by usucapion, incorporales res traditionem et usucapionem non recipere manifestum est (D. xli. 1. 43); but see as to servitudes Tit. 3. 4 note, and as to inheritances note to paragr. 10 of this Title.

The fugitive slave could not be acquired by use, because of the immoveable, for nothing could do that with respect to the solum provinciale. Secondly, if an action was brought by the real owner, the usucapion was not interrupted until judgment had been given against the possessor (D. xli. 4. 2. 21); whereas, if an action was brought against the possessor of an immoveable in the solum provinciale, the præscriptio longi temporis was of no avail unless the time required had expired before the proceeding had reached that stage termed the litis contestatio. (See Introd. sec. 105.) Lastly, the effect of the præscriptio longi temporis was in one way more favourable to the possessor than that of usucapion; for the person who acquired a thing by usucapion acquired it with all its liabilities and charges; whereas the præscriptio longi temporis was a good plea to the action of a person who claimed to have a right over the thing, as, for instance, a right of servitude or mortgage, which he had not asserted while the time was running, so that the possessor who could use this plea had the thing he possessed quite free from any liability or charge anterior to the commencement of his possession. (D. xli. 3. 44. 5; D. xlv. 3. 12.)

In the time of Justinian all difference between the solum Italicum and the solum provinciale was done away. The text furnishes us with a brief statement of the change made in the effect of possession. Under Justinian possession during three years (called, however, usucapion in this case—see paragr. 12 of this Title) gave the ownership of moveables; possession during ten years if the parties were present, or twenty if they were absent, gave the ownership of immoveables. Thus the length of possession no longer afforded merely a means of repelling an action, but conferred the dominium, although the word præscriptio was used to express the process. (See Tit. 9. 5 of this Book.)

1. Sed aliquando etiamsi maxime quis bona fide rem possederit, non tamen illi usucapio ullo tempore procedit, veluti si quis liberum hominem vel rem sacram vel religiosam vel servum fugitivum possideat.

1. Sometimes, however, although the thing is possessed with perfect good faith, yet usucapion does not operate by any length of time; as, for instance, when the possession is of a free person, a thing sacred or religious, or a fugitive slave.

GAI. ii. 45. 48.

The Institutes now proceed to speak of the exceptions to the rule of acquisition by use. These exceptions arise from two sources: either the thing which we have possessed is in its nature incapable of being acquired by use, or there is something in the mode in which it has come into our possession which prevents length of possession having its ordinary effect.

As a general rule, no incorporeal thing could be acquired by usucapion, incorporales res traditionem et usucapionem non recipere manifestum est (D. xli. 1. 43); but see as to servitudes Tit. 3. 4 note, and as to inheritances note to paragr. 10 of this Title.

The fugitive slave could not be acquired by use, because he was considered to have robbed his master of his interest in him by his flight, sui furtum facere intellegitur. (D. xlvii. 2. 60.)

2. Furtivæ quoque res et quæ vi possessæ sunt, nec si prædicto longo tempore bona fide possessæ fuerint, usucapi possunt: nam furtivarum rerum lex duodecim tabularum et lex Atinia inhibet usucapionem, vi possessarum lex Julia et Plautia.

2. Things stolen, or seized by violence, cannot be acquired by use, although they have been possessed bona fide during the length of time above prescribed; for usucapion is prevented as to things stolen, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and by the lex Atinia; as to things seized by violence, by the lex Julia et Plautia.

GAI. ii. 45; D. xli. 3. 4. 6.

The lex Atinia was a plebiscitum named after its proposer Atinius Labeo, 557 A.U.C. The lex Plautia, proposed by M. Plautius, was passed 665 A.U.C. We know nothing of the lex Julia here mentioned, except that its name makes it probable that it was passed in the time of Augustus; it may possibly be the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata referred to in Book iv. Tit. 18. 8.

3. Quod autem dictum est furtivarum et vi possessarum rerum usucapionem per legem prohibitam esse, non eo pertinet, ut ne ipse fur quive per vim possidet, usucapere possit: nam his alia ratione usucapio non competit, quia scilicet mala fide possident: sed ne ullus alius, quamvis ab eis bona fide emerit vel ex alia causa acceperit, usucapiendi jus habeat. Unde in rebus mobilibus non facile procedit, ut bonæ fidei possessori usucapio competat. Nam qui alienam rem vendidit vel ex alia causa tradidit, furtum ejus committit.

3. When, however, it is said that the usucapion of things stolen or seized by violence is prohibited by these laws, it is not meant that the thief himself, or he who possesses himself of the thing by violence, is unable to acquire the property by use, for another reason prevents them, namely, that their possession is mala fide; but that no one else, although he has in good faith purchased, or taken in any way from them, is able to acquire the property by use. Whence, as to moveables, it does not often happen that a bona fide possessor gains the property in them by use. For whenever any one has sold, or made over on any other title, a thing belonging to another, he commits a theft of it.

GAI. ii. 49, 50.

In the case of moveables everything sold or delivered over by a person who knew himself not to be the owner was considered stolen, and therefore could not be acquired by use; and it could not often happen that a person who was not the real owner could sell or deliver a moveable, thinking himself to be the owner.

4. Sed tamen id aliquando aliter se habet. Nam si heres, rem defuncto commodatam aut locatam vel apud eum depositam existimans hereditariam esse, bona fide accipienti vendiderit aut donaverit aut dotis nomine dederit, quin is, qui acceperit, usucapere possit, dubium non est, quippe

4. Sometimes, however, it is otherwise; for, if an heir, supposing a thing lent or let to the deceased, or deposited with him, to be a part of the inheritance, sells or gives it as a gift or dos to a person who receives it bona fide, there is no doubt that the person receiving it may acquire the property in it by

The Retinuum furti concerned indefinitely attached to the... until it came back into the hands of the owner or could be

he was considered to have robbed his master of his interest in him by his flight, sui furtum facere intellegitur. (D. xlvii. 2. 60.)

2. Furtivæ quoque res et quæ vi possessæ sunt, nec si prædicto longo tempore bona fide possessæ fuerint, usucapi possunt: nam furtivarum rerum lex duodecim tabularum et lex Atinia inhibet usucapionem, vi possessarum lex Julia et Plautia.

2. Things stolen, or seized by violence, cannot be acquired by use, although they have been possessed bona fide during the length of time above prescribed; for usucapion is prevented as to things stolen, by the law of the Twelve Tables, and by the lex Atinia; as to things seized by violence, by the lex Julia et Plautia.

GAI. ii. 45; D. xli. 3. 4. 6.

The lex Atinia was a plebiscitum named after its proposer Atinius Labeo, 557 A.U.C. The lex Plautia, proposed by M. Plautius, was passed 665 A.U.C. We know nothing of the lex Julia here mentioned, except that its name makes it probable that it was passed in the time of Augustus; it may possibly be the lex Julia de vi publica seu privata referred to in Book iv. Tit. 18. 8.

3. Quod autem dictum est furtivarum et vi possessarum rerum usucapionem per legem prohibitam esse, non eo pertinet, ut ne ipse fur quive per vim possidet, usucapere possit: nam his alia ratione usucapio non competit, quia scilicet mala fide possident: sed ne ullus alius, quamvis ab eis bona fide emerit vel ex alia causa acceperit, usucapiendi jus habeat. Unde in rebus mobilibus non facile procedit, ut bonæ fidei possessori usucapio competat. Nam qui alienam rem vendidit vel ex alia causa tradidit, furtum ejus committit.

3. When, however, it is said that the usucapion of things stolen or seized by violence is prohibited by these laws, it is not meant that the thief himself, or he who possesses himself of the thing by violence, is unable to acquire the property by use, for another reason prevents them, namely, that their possession is mala fide; but that no one else, although he has in good faith purchased, or taken in any way from them, is able to acquire the property by use. Whence, as to moveables, it does not often happen that a bona fide possessor gains the property in them by use. For whenever any one has sold, or made over on any other title, a thing belonging to another, he commits a theft of it.

GAI. ii. 49, 50.

In the case of moveables everything sold or delivered over by a person who knew himself not to be the owner was considered stolen, and therefore could not be acquired by use; and it could not often happen that a person who was not the real owner could sell or deliver a moveable, thinking himself to be the owner.

4. Sed tamen id aliquando aliter se habet. Nam si heres, rem defuncto commodatam aut locatam vel apud eum depositam existimans hereditariam esse, bona fide accipienti vendiderit aut donaverit aut dotis nomine dederit, quin is, qui acceperit, usucapere possit, dubium non est, quippe

4. Sometimes, however, it is otherwise; for, if an heir, supposing a thing lent or let to the deceased, or deposited with him, to be a part of the inheritance, sells or gives it as a gift or dos to a person who receives it bona fide, there is no doubt that the person receiving it may acquire the property in it by

The Rescriptum furti is concerned indefinitely attached to the law of the Twelve Tables, but it is not the same as the law of the Twelve Tables.

ea res in furti vitium non ceciderit, cum utique heres, qui bona fide tamquam suam alienaverit, furtum non committit.

use; for the thing is not tainted with the vice of theft, as the heir who has bona fide alienated it as his own, has certainly not been guilty of a theft.

GAL. ii. 50.

5. Item si is, ad quem ancillæ ususfructus pertinet, partum suum esse credens vendiderit aut donaverit, furtum non committit: furtum enim sine affectu furandi non committitur.

5. So if the usufructuary of a female slave sells or gives away her child, believing it to be his property, he does not commit theft; for theft is not committed without the intention of thieving.

GAL. ii. 50.

In such a case the usufructuary would make a legal mistake, but would not act with a criminal intention. (Tit. 1. 37.)

6. Aliis quoque modis accidere potest, ut quis sine vitio furti rem alienam ad aliquem transferat et efficiat, ut a possessore usucapiatur.

6. It may also happen in various other ways, that a man may transfer a thing belonging to another without the vice of theft tainting the thing, so that the possessor acquires the property in it by use.

GAL. ii. 50.

As, for instance, if a person who was not heir thought that he was, and sold a thing which was part of the inheritance (D. xli. 3. 36. 1); or if a person took possession of a thing which he believed the owner had intended to abandon (D. xli. 7. 4).

7. Quod autem ad eas res, quæ solo continentur, expeditius procedit: ut si quis loci vacantis possessionem propter absentiam aut negligentiam domini, aut quia sine successore decesserit, sine vi nanciscatur. Qui quamvis ipse mala fide possidet, quia intellegit, se alienum fundum occupasse, tamen, si alii bona fide accipienti tradiderit, poterit ei longa possessione res adquiri, quia neque furtivum neque vi possessum accepit; abolita est enim quorundam veterum sententia existimantium, etiam fundi locive furtum fieri, et eorum, qui res soli possident, principalibus constitutionibus prospicitur, ne cui longa et indubitata possessio auferri debeat.

7. But as to things appertaining to the soil, usucapion operates more readily; as if a person without violence takes possession of a place vacant by the absence or negligence of the owner, or by his having died without a successor; for, although his possession is mala fide, since he knows that he has seized on land not belonging to him, yet if he transfers it to a person who receives it bona fide, this person will acquire the property in it by long possession, as the thing he receives has neither been stolen nor seized by violence. The opinion of the ancients, who thought that there could be a theft of a piece of land or a place, is now abandoned, and there are imperial constitutions which provide that no possessor of an immoveable shall be deprived of a long and undoubted possession.

GAL. ii. 51; C. vii. 33. 1, 2.

If things immoveable could have been stolen, as was the opinion of Sabinus (AUL. GELL. xi. 18), the acquisition of immoveables by length of possession would have been as difficult as ea res in furti vitium non ceciderit, cum utique heres, qui bona fide tamquam suam alienaverit, furtum non committit.

use; for the thing is not tainted with the vice of theft, as the heir who has bona fide alienated it as his own, has certainly not been guilty of a theft.

GAL. ii. 50.

5. Item si is, ad quem ancillæ ususfructus pertinet, partum suum esse credens vendiderit aut donaverit, furtum non committit: furtum enim sine affectu furandi non committitur.

5. So if the usufructuary of a female slave sells or gives away her child, believing it to be his property, he does not commit theft; for theft is not committed without the intention of thieving.

GAL. ii. 50.

In such a case the usufructuary would make a legal mistake, but would not act with a criminal intention. (Tit. 1. 37.)

6. Aliis quoque modis accidere potest, ut quis sine vitio furti rem alienam ad aliquem transferat et efficiat, ut a possessore usucapiatur.

6. It may also happen in various other ways, that a man may transfer a thing belonging to another without the vice of theft tainting the thing, so that the possessor acquires the property in it by use.

GAL. ii. 50.

As, for instance, if a person who was not heir thought that he was, and sold a thing which was part of the inheritance (D. xli. 3. 36. 1); or if a person took possession of a thing which he believed the owner had intended to abandon (D. xli. 7. 4).

7. Quod autem ad eas res, quæ solo continentur, expeditius procedit: ut si quis loci vacantis possessionem propter absentiam aut negligentiam domini, aut quia sine successore decesserit, sine vi nanciscatur. Qui quamvis ipse mala fide possidet, quia intellegit, se alienum fundum occupasse, tamen, si alii bona fide accipienti tradiderit, poterit ei longa possessione res adquiri, quia neque furtivum neque vi possessum accepit; abolita est enim quorundam veterum sententia existimantium, etiam fundi locive furtum fieri, et eorum, qui res soli possident, principalibus constitutionibus prospicitur, ne cui longa et indubitata possessio auferri debeat.

7. But as to things appertaining to the soil, usucapion operates more readily; as if a person without violence takes possession of a place vacant by the absence or negligence of the owner, or by his having died without a successor; for, although his possession is mala fide, since he knows that he has seized on land not belonging to him, yet if he transfers it to a person who receives it bona fide, this person will acquire the property in it by long possession, as the thing he receives has neither been stolen nor seized by violence. The opinion of the ancients, who thought that there could be a theft of a piece of land or a place, is now abandoned, and there are imperial constitutions which provide that no possessor of an immoveable shall be deprived of a long and undoubted possession.

GAL. ii. 51; C. vii. 33. 1, 2.

If things immoveable could have been stolen, as was the opinion of Sabinus (AUL. GELL. xi. 18), the acquisition of immoveables by length of possession would have been as difficult as that of moveables; but as the bona fides of the actual possessor cured the mala fides of the first person who began the possession, it might very well happen that the property in immoveables should be gained in this way. By Novel 119 (cap. 7), A.D. 542, Justinian altered this, and only allowed the title by possession during ten or twenty years where the true owner was aware of his right, and of the transfer to the bona fide possessor; otherwise the right of ownership was not gained until after a possession of thirty years.

8. Aliquando etiam furtiva vel vi possessa res usucapi potest: veluti si in domini potestatem reversa fuerit; tunc enim, vitio rei purgato, procedit ejus usucapio.

8. Sometimes even a thing stolen or possessed by violence may be acquired by use; for instance, if it has come back into the power of its owner, for then, the taint being purged, the acquisition by use may take place.

D. xli. 3. 4. 6.

In order that a thing once stolen should, after again falling under the power of its owner, be capable of being acquired by a bona fide possessor, it was necessary that the owner of the thing should recover it as a thing belonging to himself. If he purchased it not knowing that it belonged to him, the vice or taint of theft was not purged. (D. xli. 3. 4. 12.)

9. Res fisci nostri usucapi non potest. Sed Papinianus scripsit, bonis vacantibus fisco nondum nuntiatis, bona fide emptorem sibi traditam rem ex his bonis usucapere posse: et ita divus Pius et divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

9. Things belonging to our fiscus cannot be acquired by use. But Papinian has given his opinion that if, before bona vacantia have been reported to the fiscus, a bona fide purchaser receives any of them, he can acquire the property in them by use. And the Emperor Antoninus Pius, and the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, have issued rescripts in accordance with this opinion.

D. xli. 3. 18.

Bona vacantia was the term used to express the property of persons who died without successors. These goods belonged to the fiscus on being reported by the officers of the treasury (D. xlix. 14. 1. 1), but up to that time they could be acquired by usucapion.

10. Novissime sciendum est, rem talem esse debere, ut in se non habeat vitium, ut a bona fide emptore usucapi possit vel qui ex alia justa causa possidet.

10. Lastly, it is to be observed that a thing must be such as to have no taint of vice in itself, in order that the bona fide purchaser or person who possesses it under any other legal title may acquire it by use.

D. xli. 3. 24.

The word 'vice,' as used here with reference to acquisition by use, includes every obstacle that prevented a thing being of a kind to be acquired by length of possession. The first requisite

no vice

that of moveables; but as the bona fides of the actual possessor cured the mala fides of the first person who began the possession, it might very well happen that the property in immoveables should be gained in this way. By Novel 119 (cap. 7), A.D. 542, Justinian altered this, and only allowed the title by possession during ten or twenty years where the true owner was aware of his right, and of the transfer to the bona fide possessor; otherwise the right of ownership was not gained until after a possession of thirty years.

8. Aliquando etiam furtiva vel vi possessa res usucapi potest: veluti si in domini potestatem reversa fuerit; tunc enim, vitio rei purgato, procedit ejus usucapio.

8. Sometimes even a thing stolen or possessed by violence may be acquired by use; for instance, if it has come back into the power of its owner, for then, the taint being purged, the acquisition by use may take place.

D. xli. 3. 4. 6.

In order that a thing once stolen should, after again falling under the power of its owner, be capable of being acquired by a bona fide possessor, it was necessary that the owner of the thing should recover it as a thing belonging to himself. If he purchased it not knowing that it belonged to him, the vice or taint of theft was not purged. (D. xli. 3. 4. 12.)

9. Res fisci nostri usucapi non potest. Sed Papinianus scripsit, bonis vacantibus fisco nondum nuntiatis, bona fide emptorem sibi traditam rem ex his bonis usucapere posse: et ita divus Pius et divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

9. Things belonging to our fiscus cannot be acquired by use. But Papinian has given his opinion that if, before bona vacantia have been reported to the fiscus, a bona fide purchaser receives any of them, he can acquire the property in them by use. And the Emperor Antoninus Pius, and the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, have issued rescripts in accordance with this opinion.

D. xli. 3. 18.

Bona vacantia was the term used to express the property of persons who died without successors. These goods belonged to the fiscus on being reported by the officers of the treasury (D. xlix. 14. 1. 1), but up to that time they could be acquired by usucapion.

10. Novissime sciendum est, rem talem esse debere, ut in se non habeat vitium, ut a bona fide emptore usucapi possit vel qui ex alia justa causa possidet.

10. Lastly, it is to be observed that a thing must be such as to have no taint of vice in itself, in order that the bona fide purchaser or person who possesses it under any other legal title may acquire it by use.

D. xli. 3. 24.

The word 'vice,' as used here with reference to acquisition by use, includes every obstacle that prevented a thing being of a kind to be acquired by length of possession. The first requisite of civil possession, of possession, that is, capable of ripening into ownership by usucapion, was that the thing possessed should not have any vice in it, should not be of a kind which could not be acquired by usucapion. To the instances of such things given above in paragraphs 1, 2, and 9, may be added things forming part of a dos, unless the term of usucapion had begun to run before the marriage. (D. xxiii. 5. 16; C. v. 12. 30.) Secondly, it was necessary that the thing should be possessed ex justa causa. By this it was meant that it must have come into the power of the possessor by a means, such as sale or gift, which was recognised by law as a good foundation for the transfer of ownership. It might have so come, and yet no title be acquired to the ownership, except by usucapion: the person who transferred it might not have been the real owner; or the person who received it might not have had a right to do so.

no vice

The Digest (xli. 2. 3. 21; xli. 4. et seq.) gives a long series of Titles in which the several justæ causæ of possession are examined separately, and the different characters in which a person possessed are treated of. Thus, a person might possess pro emptore, as having bought the thing; pro donato, as having received it as a gift; pro dote, as having received it as a dos; pro soluto, as the payment of a debt; pro derelicto, as having taken it when abandoned by its owner. In any of these cases the person who sold, gave, or abandoned the thing, might not have been the real owner, and then the possessor could only acquire the property in the thing by use. Or again, he might possess pro legato, and then if he was not the person to whom the legacy had really been left, or if the legacy had been revoked, he might acquire by use the property in the thing. In this case it was not the testator's not being the proprietor that made the possessor not the true owner, but it was the latter's having no right to have the possession of the thing. Again, he might possess a thing pro suo, a general term specially employed to denote the possession of fructus gathered bonæ fide, or that of res nullius, such as wild animals. If he took possession of an animal, naturally wild, which had been tamed, and possessed it pro suo, he did not at once acquire the property in it, because it was not of a nature, since it had ceased to be wild, to be acquired by mere possession, but he became the owner by use. (D. xli. 10. 1, 2; D. xli. 2. 3. 21.)

Thirdly, it was necessary that there should be bona fides; the possessor must be quite ignorant of that which there was faulty in the manner he had gained possession. No ignorance of a leading principle of law, such as that a person below the age of puberty could not alienate his goods (D. xxii. 6. 4; D. xli. 3. 31. pr.), nor any wilful ignorance of facts, would be permitted as the commencement of usucapion. (D. xxii. 6. 6.) But if a person was only ignorant of a fact, of which it was excusable he should be ignorant, as that a vendor was under full age, his possession was bona fide. (D. xli. 4. 2. 15.) If the property of a pupil or minor had been

of civil possession, of possession, that is, capable of ripening into ownership by usucapion, was that the thing possessed should not have any vice in it, should not be of a kind which could not be acquired by usucapion. To the instances of such things given above in paragraphs 1, 2, and 9, may be added things forming part of a dos, unless the term of usucapion had begun to run before the marriage. (D. xxiii. 5. 16; C. v. 12. 30.) Secondly, it was necessary that the thing should be possessed ex justa causa. By this it was meant that it must have come into the power of the possessor by a means, such as sale or gift, which was recognised by law as a good foundation for the transfer of ownership. It might have so come, and yet no title be acquired to the ownership, except by usucapion: the person who transferred it might not have been the real owner; or the person who received it might not have had a right to do so.

The Digest (xli. 2. 3. 21; xli. 4. et seq.) gives a long series of Titles in which the several justæ causæ of possession are examined separately, and the different characters in which a person possessed are treated of. Thus, a person might possess pro emptore, as having bought the thing; pro donato, as having received it as a gift; pro dote, as having received it as a dos; pro soluto, as the payment of a debt; pro derelicto, as having taken it when abandoned by its owner. In any of these cases the person who sold, gave, or abandoned the thing, might not have been the real owner, and then the possessor could only acquire the property in the thing by use. Or again, he might possess pro legato, and then if he was not the person to whom the legacy had really been left, or if the legacy had been revoked, he might acquire by use the property in the thing. In this case it was not the testator's not being the proprietor that made the possessor not the true owner, but it was the latter's having no right to have the possession of the thing. Again, he might possess a thing pro suo, a general term specially employed to denote the possession of fructus gathered bonæ fide, or that of res nullius, such as wild animals. If he took possession of an animal, naturally wild, which had been tamed, and possessed it pro suo, he did not at once acquire the property in it, because it was not of a nature, since it had ceased to be wild, to be acquired by mere possession, but he became the owner by use. (D. xli. 10. 1, 2; D. xli. 2. 3. 21.)

Thirdly, it was necessary that there should be bona fides; the possessor must be quite ignorant of that which there was faulty in the manner he had gained possession. No ignorance of a leading principle of law, such as that a person below the age of puberty could not alienate his goods (D. xxii. 6. 4; D. xli. 3. 31. pr.), nor any wilful ignorance of facts, would be permitted as the commencement of usucapion. (D. xxii. 6. 6.) But if a person was only ignorant of a fact, of which it was excusable he should be ignorant, as that a vendor was under full age, his possession was bona fide. (D. xli. 4. 2. 15.) If the property of a pupil or minor had been gained by another person by usucapio, the prætor would allow the usucapion to be rescinded on good reason being shown, but the mere fact that the usucaptor had been mistaken as to the age was not a sufficient reason. In the case of sale it was necessary that this bona fides should exist at the moment of the contract being made, and also at that of its being performed (D. xli. 3. 48), and in every case it was necessary it should exist at the commencement of possession. But after the possession was once commenced bona fide, a subsequent knowledge of the real facts did not vitiate the possession. Gaius notices three exceptional cases where a mala fide possessor might acquire by usucapion. Inheritances at one time, though incorporeal things, could be acquired by usucapion, although it was afterwards held that only the component parts could be so acquired; and as the Twelve Tables had said that things of the soil should be acquired in two years, and other things (ceteras res) in one, and the inheritance was not a thing of the soil, it was held that the inheritance or any part could be acquired in a year—the reason being, says Gaius, that the law wished to hurry heirs to enter on inheritances in order that the sacred rites might be performed, and creditors satisfied; so that if a man held anything, even land, forming part of an inheritance, for one year only, he acquired it by usucapion, although he knew it was part of the inheritance, and he was thus acting mala fide. (GAI. ii. 52–58.) But this kind of usucapion was made ineffectual in the time of Hadrian. (GAI. ii. 57.) Secondly, if a thing was given over by one man to another to hold for him fiducie causa, was, e.g., deposited with him or pledged to him, the original owner, if he got possession of the thing, could reacquire it by usucapion in a year, even if it was an immoveable (GAI. ii. 59); but if it was pledged the new possession could not thus operate if it had been obtained by the request of the original owner. (GAI. ii. 60.) Thirdly, the owner of a thing mortgaged to the state and sold for non-payment of the mortgage debt could reacquire it by usucapion against the prædicator or purchaser from the state; but if it was an immoveable two years' possession was necessary. (GAI. ii. 61.)

11. Error autem falsæ causæ usucapionem non parit. Veluti si quis, cum non emerit, emissee existimans possideat: vel cum ei donatum non fuerat, quasi ex donatione possideat.

11. But if a mistake is made as to the title of possession, and it is wrongly supposed to be just, there is no usucapion. As, for instance, if any one possesses in the belief that he has bought, when he has not bought, or that he has received a gift, when no gift has really been made to him.

D. xli. 3. 27.

Supposing a person who thought that he had acquired ex justa causa had not, supposing, for instance, he thought a person intended to give him a thing who did not, or if he had received a thing in payment of a debt, while really no debt was recognised, gained by another person by usucapio, the prætor would allow the usucapion to be rescinded on good reason being shown, but the mere fact that the usucaptor had been mistaken as to the age was not a sufficient reason. In the case of sale it was necessary that this bona fides should exist at the moment of the contract being made, and also at that of its being performed (D. xli. 3. 48), and in every case it was necessary it should exist at the commencement of possession. But after the possession was once commenced bona fide, a subsequent knowledge of the real facts did not vitiate the possession. Gaius notices three exceptional cases where a mala fide possessor might acquire by usucapion. Inheritances at one time, though incorporeal things, could be acquired by usucapion, although it was afterwards held that only the component parts could be so acquired; and as the Twelve Tables had said that things of the soil should be acquired in two years, and other things (ceteras res) in one, and the inheritance was not a thing of the soil, it was held that the inheritance or any part could be acquired in a year—the reason being, says Gaius, that the law wished to hurry heirs to enter on inheritances in order that the sacred rites might be performed, and creditors satisfied; so that if a man held anything, even land, forming part of an inheritance, for one year only, he acquired it by usucapion, although he knew it was part of the inheritance, and he was thus acting mala fide. (GAI. ii. 52–58.) But this kind of usucapion was made ineffectual in the time of Hadrian. (GAI. ii. 57.) Secondly, if a thing was given over by one man to another to hold for him fiducie causa, was, e.g., deposited with him or pledged to him, the original owner, if he got possession of the thing, could reacquire it by usucapion in a year, even if it was an immoveable (GAI. ii. 59); but if it was pledged the new possession could not thus operate if it had been obtained by the request of the original owner. (GAI. ii. 60.) Thirdly, the owner of a thing mortgaged to the state and sold for non-payment of the mortgage debt could reacquire it by usucapion against the prædicator or purchaser from the state; but if it was an immoveable two years' possession was necessary. (GAI. ii. 61.)

11. Error autem falsæ causæ usucapionem non parit. Veluti si quis, cum non emerit, emissee existimans possideat: vel cum ei donatum non fuerat, quasi ex donatione possideat.

11. But if a mistake is made as to the title of possession, and it is wrongly supposed to be just, there is no usucapion. As, for instance, if any one possesses in the belief that he has bought, when he has not bought, or that he has received a gift, when no gift has really been made to him.

D. xli. 3. 27.

Supposing a person who thought that he had acquired ex justa causa had not, supposing, for instance, he thought a person intended to give him a thing who did not, or if he had received a thing in payment of a debt, while really no debt was recognised, the question naturally suggested itself whether the imperfection in the possession could be cured by bona fides, that is, an honest belief that the causa was justa, that a gift had been made, or that a debt was recognised. The question had been much debated by the jurists, and Justinian here decides it by declaring that the imperfection could not be so cured, and that if the possessor had been mistaken in this respect, length of possession would not profit him. But this doctrine is not consistent with that of the Digest, which treats a plausible error (an error into which a man might naturally and reasonably have fallen with regard to the causa) as permitting usucapion to take place. We learn, for example, from the Digest, that where it was with respect to an act of some one through whom the possessor believed his title to have been gained, and whom he reasonably believed to have been acting for him as his procurator, that the mistake was made, the possessor could acquire by use, although this person might not have acted as the possessor supposed. (D. xli. 4. 11.)

12. Diutina possessio, quæ prod-esse cœperat defuncto, et heredi et bonorum possessori continuatur, licet
ipse sciat, prædium alienum: quodsi ille initium justum non habuit, he-redi et bonorum possessori, licet
ignoranti, possessio non prodest.
Quod nostra constitutio similiter et in usucapionibus observari constituit, ut tempora continuentur.

12. Long possession, which has begun to reckon in favour of the deceased, is continued in favour of the heir or bonorum possessor, although he may know that the immoveable belongs to another person; but if the deceased commenced his possession mala fide,
the possession does not profit the heir or bonorum possessor, although ignorant of this. And our constitution has enacted the same with respect to usu-cations, so that the times of possession by different persons may be reckoned as running through.

D. xli. 4. 2. 19; D. xliv. 3. 11; C. vii. 31.

Persons who possessed pro herede or pro possessore, that is, as bonorum possessores, did not themselves begin a new usucapion, but continued the persona of the deceased, and were placed in the same position with reference to anything which he had possessed, as if he had himself continued to possess it. If, for example, the deceased had possessed the thing pro emptore or pro donato, the heres or bonorum possessor continued to possess it in the same way, and added to the time of his possession the time during which the deceased had possessed it.

Similiter in usucapionibus, i.e. the continuation of possession by the heir or bonorum possessor shall apply to the usucapion of moveables by three years' possession.

13. Inter venditorem quoque et emptorem conjungi tempora, divi
Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

13. Between the buyer and the seller, too, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by rescript that their several times of possession shall be reckoned together.

D. xli. 4. 2. 20.

the question naturally suggested itself whether the imperfection in the possession could be cured by bona fides, that is, an honest belief that the causa was justa, that a gift had been made, or that a debt was recognised. The question had been much debated by the jurists, and Justinian here decides it by declaring that the imperfection could not be so cured, and that if the possessor had been mistaken in this respect, length of possession would not profit him. But this doctrine is not consistent with that of the Digest, which treats a plausible error (an error into which a man might naturally and reasonably have fallen with regard to the causa) as permitting usucapion to take place. We learn, for example, from the Digest, that where it was with respect to an act of some one through whom the possessor believed his title to have been gained, and whom he reasonably believed to have been acting for him as his procurator, that the mistake was made, the possessor could acquire by use, although this person might not have acted as the possessor supposed. (D. xli. 4. 11.)

12. Diutina possessio, quæ prod-esse cœperat defuncto, et heredi et bonorum possessori continuatur, licet
ipse sciat, prædium alienum: quodsi ille initium justum non habuit, he-redi et bonorum possessori, licet
ignoranti, possessio non prodest.
Quod nostra constitutio similiter et
in usucapionibus observari consti-
tuit, ut tempora continuentur.

12. Long possession, which has begun to reckon in favour of the deceased, is continued in favour of the heir
or bonorum possessor, although he may know that the immoveable belongs to another person; but if the deceased
commenced his possession mala fide,
the possession does not profit the heir
or bonorum possessor, although ignorant of this. And our constitution has enacted the same with respect to usu-cations, so that the times of possession
by different persons may be reckoned
as running through.

D. xli. 4. 2. 19; D. xliv. 3. 11; C. vii. 31.

Persons who possessed pro herede or pro possessore, that is, as bonorum possessores, did not themselves begin a new usucapion, but continued the persona of the deceased, and were placed in the same position with reference to anything which he had possessed, as if he had himself continued to possess it. If, for example, the deceased had possessed the thing pro emptore or pro donato, the heres or bonorum possessor continued to possess it in the same way, and added to the time of his possession the time during which the deceased had possessed it.

Similiter in usucapionibus, i.e. the continuation of possession by the heir or bonorum possessor shall apply to the usucapion of moveables by three years' possession.

13. Inter venditorem quoque et emptorem conjungi tempora, divi
Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt.

13. Between the buyer and the seller, too, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by rescript that their several times of possession shall be reckoned together.

D. xli. 4. 2. 20.

Persons who were merely successors of others in holding particular things by sale, gift, legacy, &c., did not of course continue the possession, for they did not continue the person, of their predecessor. But if both the possession of their predecessor, and their own, were such as to give rise to usucapion, the times of the two possessions were added together. If there was something to prevent this in the possession of their predecessors, their own possession was the first commencement of the usucapion.

The interruption of usucapion was termed usurpatio. (D. xli. 3. 2.) It might take place in various ways. The thing itself might be taken away from the possessor, or, if it was an immoveable, he might be expelled from it (D. xli. 3. 5); or it might become impossible, from physical causes, such as an inroad of the sea, to occupy it (D. xli. 2. 3. 17); or, again, the possessor might fall into the power of the enemy, and he would not be reinstated in his possession by postliminium, for possession was a fact, and as he had ceased to possess, as a matter of fact, he could only begin a new possession by again possessing the thing (D. xlix. 15. 12. 2); or the interruption might be what was termed civil, that is, be produced by an action to contest the right, and with respect to this Justinian (C. vii. 33. 10) made the time of the first raising of the controversy (mota controversia) the period of interruption, instead of the litis contestatio (see Introd. sec. 105), which had no place in the civil process of his time.

There was also a prescription or possession, termed longissimi temporis. If there was a possession for thirty years, or, in the case of ecclesiastical property, or hypothecated property in possession of the debtor, for forty years, whatever vitiū or obstacle there might be to the acquisition by use, for instance, theft, violence, absence of justa causa, or mala fides, the possessor could repel actions brought to claim the thing. (C. vii. 39; Nov. 117.)

14. Edicto divi Marci cavetur, eum, qui a fisco rem alienam emit, si post venditionem quinquennium præterierit, posse dominum rei per exceptionem repellere. Constitutio autem divæ memoriæ Zenonis bene prospexit his, qui a fisco per venditionem vel donationem vel alium titulum aliquid accipiunt, ut ipsi quidem securi statim fiant et victores existant, sive convenientur sive experiantur: adversus sacratissimum autem ærarium usque ad quadriennium liceat intendere his, qui pro dominio vel hypotheca earum rerum, quæ alienatæ sunt, putaverint sibi quasdam competere actiones. Nostra autem divina constitutio, quam nuper promulgavimus, etiam de his, qui a nostra vel venerabilis Augustæ

14. It is provided by an edict of the Emperor Marcus, that a person who has purchased from the fiscus a thing belonging to another person, may repel the owner of the thing by an exception, if five years have elapsed since the sale. But a constitution of Zeno of sacred memory has completely protected those who receive anything from the fiscus by sale, gift, or any other title, by providing that they themselves are to be at once secure, and made certain of success, whether they sue or are themselves sued, in an action. While they who think that they have a ground of action as owners or mortgagees of the things alienated, may bring an action against the sacred treasury within four years. An imperial constitution, which we ourselves

Persons who were merely successors of others in holding particular things by sale, gift, legacy, &c., did not of course continue the possession, for they did not continue the person, of their predecessor. But if both the possession of their predecessor, and their own, were such as to give rise to usucapion, the times of the two possessions were added together. If there was something to prevent this in the possession of their predecessors, their own possession was the first commencement of the usucapion.

The interruption of usucapion was termed usurpatio. (D. xli. 3. 2.) It might take place in various ways. The thing itself might be taken away from the possessor, or, if it was an immovable, he might be expelled from it (D. xli. 3. 5); or it might become impossible, from physical causes, such as an inroad of the sea, to occupy it (D. xli. 2. 3. 17); or, again, the possessor might fall into the power of the enemy, and he would not be reinstated in his possession by postliminium, for possession was a fact, and as he had ceased to possess, as a matter of fact, he could only begin a new possession by again possessing the thing (D. xlix. 15. 12. 2); or the interruption might be what was termed civil, that is, be produced by an action to contest the right, and with respect to this Justinian (C. vii. 33. 10) made the time of the first raising of the controversy (mota controversia) the period of interruption, instead of the litis contestatio (see Introd. sec. 105), which had no place in the civil process of his time.

There was also a prescription or possession, termed longissimi temporis. If there was a possession for thirty years, or, in the case of ecclesiastical property, or hypothecated property in possession of the debtor, for forty years, whatever vitium or obstacle there might be to the acquisition by use, for instance, theft, violence, absence of justa causa, or mala fides, the possessor could repel actions brought to claim the thing. (C. vii. 39; Nov. 117.)

14. Edicto divi Marci cavetur, eum, qui a fisco rem alienam emit, si post venditionem quinquennium praterierit, posse dominum rei per exceptionem repellere. Constitutio autem divæ memoriæ Zenonis bene prospexit his, qui a fisco per venditionem vel donationem vel alium titulum aliquid accipiunt, ut ipsi quidem securi statim fiant et victores existant, sive convenientur sive experiantur: adversus sacratissimum autem ærarium usque ad quadriennium liceat intendere his, qui pro dominio vel hypotheca earum rerum, quæ alienatæ sunt, putaverint sibi quasdam competere actiones. Nostra autem divina constitutio, quam nuper promulgavimus, etiam de his, qui a nostra vel venerabilis Augustæ

14. It is provided by an edict of the Emperor Marcus, that a person who has purchased from the fiscus a thing belonging to another person, may repel the owner of the thing by an exception, if five years have elapsed since the sale. But a constitution of Zeno of sacred memory has completely protected those who receive anything from the fiscus by sale, gift, or any other title, by providing that they themselves are to be at once secure, and made certain of success, whether they sue or are themselves sued, in an action. While they who think that they have a ground of action as owners or mortgagees of the things alienated, may bring an action against the sacred treasury within four years. An imperial constitution, which we ourselves

domo aliquid acceperint, hæc statuit, quæ in fiscalibus alienationibus præfata Zenoniana constitutione continentur.

have recently published, extends to those who have received as a gift anything from our palace, or that of the empress, the provisions of the constitution of Zeno relative to the alienations of the fiscus.

C. vii. 37.

As Theophilus points out, the privilege really conceded by the constitution of Marcus Aurelius was, that no possession, if the thing had been received from the fiscus, should be attacked after five years had elapsed, however otherwise open to attack. If not otherwise open to attack, the time of usucapion, being so much shorter than five years, would, previously to the changes of Justinian, have given the property before the time fixed by the constitution had arrived.

TIT. VII. DE DONATIONIBUS.

Est etiam aliud genus acquisitionis, donatio. Donationum autem duo genera sunt: mortis causa et non mortis causa.

There is, again, another mode of acquiring property, donation, of which there are two kinds, donation mortis causa, and donation not mortis causa.

D. I. 16. 67. 1.

The phrase dono dare was appropriated in Roman law to the mode of transferring property by gift; dare signifying that the whole property in the thing was passed by delivery, and dono expressing the motive from which the delivery was made. (See Vat. Fragm. 275. 281. 283.) Viewed strictly, gift is not a peculiar mode of acquisition, but an acquisition by delivery with a particular motive for the transfer. Possibly it was on account of the solemnities with which, under Justinian, gifts had to be made that the authors of the Institutes treat gift as a separate mode of acquisition.

1. Mortis causa donatio est, quæ propter mortis fit suspicionem, cum quis ita donat, ut si quid humanitus ei contigisset, haberet is, qui accepit: sin autem supervixisset, qui donavit, reciperet, vel si eum donationis penituisset, aut prior decesserit is, cui donatum sit. Hæ mortis causa donationes ad exemplum legatorum redactæ sunt per omnia. Nam cum prudentibus ambiguum fuerat, utrum donationis ad legati instar eam obtinere oporteret, et utriusque causæ quædam habebat insignia et alii ad aliud genus eam retrahebant, a nobis constitutum est, ut per omnia fere

1. A donation mortis causa is that which is made to meet the case of death, as when anything is given upon condition that, if any fatal accident befalls the donor, the person to whom it is given shall have it as his own; but if the donor should survive, or if he should repent of having made the gift, or if the person to whom it has been given should die before the donor, then the donor shall receive back the thing given. These donations mortis causa are now placed, in all respects, on the footing of legacies. It was much doubted by the jurists whether they ought to be considered as a gift or as a domo aliquid acceperint, hæc statuit, quæ in fiscalibus alienationibus præfata Zenoniana constitutione continentur.

have recently published, extends to those who have received as a gift anything from our palace, or that of the empress, the provisions of the constitution of Zeno relative to the alienations of the fiscus.

C. vii. 37.

As Theophilus points out, the privilege really conceded by the constitution of Marcus Aurelius was, that no possession, if the thing had been received from the fiscus, should be attacked after five years had elapsed, however otherwise open to attack. If not otherwise open to attack, the time of usucapion, being so much shorter than five years, would, previously to the changes of Justinian, have given the property before the time fixed by the constitution had arrived.

TIT. VII. DE DONATIONIBUS.

Est etiam aliud genus acquisitionis, donatio. Donationum autem duo genera sunt: mortis causa et non mortis causa.

There is, again, another mode of acquiring property, donation, of which there are two kinds, donation mortis causa, and donation not mortis causa.

D. I. 16. 67. 1.

The phrase dono dare was appropriated in Roman law to the mode of transferring property by gift; dare signifying that the whole property in the thing was passed by delivery, and dono expressing the motive from which the delivery was made. (See Vat. Fragm. 275. 281. 283.) Viewed strictly, gift is not a peculiar mode of acquisition, but an acquisition by delivery with a particular motive for the transfer. Possibly it was on account of the solemnities with which, under Justinian, gifts had to be made that the authors of the Institutes treat gift as a separate mode of acquisition.

1. Mortis causa donatio est, quæ propter mortis fit suspicionem, cum quis ita donat, ut si quid humanitus ei contigisset, haberet is, qui accepit: sin autem supervixisset, qui donavit, reciperet, vel si eum donationis penituisset, aut prior decesserit is, cui donatum sit. Hæ mortis causa donationes ad exemplum legatorum redactæ sunt per omnia. Nam cum prudentibus ambiguum fuerat, utrum donationis an legati instar eam obtinere oporteret, et utriusque causæ quedam habebat insignia et alii ad aliud genus eam retrahebant, a nobis constitutum est, ut per omnia fere

1. A donation mortis causa is that which is made to meet the case of death, as when anything is given upon condition that, if any fatal accident befalls the donor, the person to whom it is given shall have it as his own; but if the donor should survive, or if he should repent of having made the gift, or if the person to whom it has been given should die before the donor, then the donor shall receive back the thing given. These donations mortis causa are now placed, in all respects, on the footing of legacies. It was much doubted by the jurists whether they ought to be considered as a gift or as a legatis connumeretur : et sic procedat, quemadmodum eam nostra formavit constitutio. Et in summa mortis causa donatio est, cum magis se quis velit habere, quam eum, cui donatur, magisque eum, cui donat, quam heredem suum. Sic et apud Homerum Telemachus donat Pírao :

Πείραι' (οὐ γάρ τ' ἴδμεν, ὅπως ἔσται τάδε ἔργα)·

Εἰ κεν ἐμέ μνηστῆρες ἀγήμερος ἐν μεγάρουσι

Ἀάβηρ κτείναντες, πατρώια πάντα δάσωνται,

Αὐτὸν ἔχοντά σε βούλομ' ἐπαυρέμεν, ἢ τινα τῶνδε·

Εἰ δέ κ' ἐγὼ τοῦτοιςι φόνον καὶ κῆρα φυνεύσω,

Δῆ τότε μοι χαίροντι φέρεω πρὸς δώματα χαίρων.

legacy, partaking as they did in some respects of the nature of both; and some were of opinion that they belonged to the one head, and others that they belonged to the other. We have decided by a constitution that they shall be in almost every respect reckoned amongst legacies, and shall be made in accordance with the forms our constitution provides. In short, it is a donation mortis causa, when the donor wishes that the thing given should belong to himself rather than to the person to whom he gives it, and to that person rather than to his own heir. It is thus that, in Homer, Telemachus gives to Píraeus :—

‘Píraeus, for we know not how these things shall be, if the proud suitors shall secretly slay me in the palace, and shall divide the goods of my father, I would that thou thyself shouldst have and enjoy these things rather than that any of those men should; but if I shall plant slaughter and death amongst those men, then indeed bear these things to my home, and joying give them to me in my joy.’

D. xxxix. 6. 35. 2, 4; D. xxxix. 6. 37. pr.; C. viii. 57. 4.

There are two essential conditions of a donatio mortis causa :
 1. It must be made with the view of meeting the case of death; and
 2. it must be made to take effect only if death occurs, and so as to be revocable at any time previous, and to fail if the recipient died before the giver. The donor might, at his pleasure, alter the character of the gift, making it irrevocable; but then the gift was regarded as, and had the same legal consequences as, an ordinary donatio. (D. xxxix. 6. 27.)

It might be made conditional upon death in two ways. The donor might say, ‘I hand you over my horse, but the gift is only to be complete if I die in this enterprise;’ or he might say, ‘I give you my horse, if I survive this enterprise you are to give it me back.’ In the latter method, the delivery of the thing is made at once, subject to a conditional redelivery; in the former the delivery is made conditional. (D. xxxix. 6. 2, 29.) The donation might also be sometimes made conditional upon the death of a third person, as if a father promised to give to his daughter-in-law in case of the death of his son. (D. xxxix. 6. 11.) All who could make a testament could make a valid donatio mortis causa; and all who could receive under a testament could accept one. (D. xxxix. 6. 9 and 15.) Every kind of thing could be given in this way. (D. xxxix. 6. 18. 2.) Justinian, in the constitution referred to in the text, required that a donatio mortis causa should be made in the presence of five witnesses. (C. viii. 57. 4.)

If the gift was made in the first of the two ways above men-

legatis connumeretur : et sic procedat, quemadmodum eam nostra formavit constitutio. Et in summa mortis causa donatio est, cum magis se quis velit habere, quam eum, cui donatur, magisque eum, cui donat, quam heredem suum. Sic et apud Homerum Telemachus donat Piræo :

Πείραι' (οὐ γάρ τ' ἴδμεν, ὅπως ἔσται τάδε ἔργα)·

Εἴ κεν ἐμέ μνηστῆρες ἀγήνορες ἐν μεγάρουσι

Δάδῃ κτείναντες, πατρώια πάντα δάσωνται,

Αὐτὸν ἔχοντά σε βούλομ' ἐπαυρέμεν, ἢ τινα τῶνδε·

Εἰ δέ κ' ἐγὼ τούτοισι φόνον καὶ κῆρα φυνεύσω,

Δῇ τότε μοι χαίροντι φέρειν πρὸς δώματα χαίρων.

legacy, partaking as they did in some respects of the nature of both; and some were of opinion that they belonged to the one head, and others that they belonged to the other. We have decided by a constitution that they shall be in almost every respect reckoned amongst legacies, and shall be made in accordance with the forms our constitution provides. In short, it is a donation mortis causa, when the donor wishes that the thing given should belong to himself rather than to the person to whom he gives it, and to that person rather than to his own heir. It is thus that, in Homer, Telemachus gives to Piræus :—

‘Piræus, for we know not how these things shall be, if the proud suitors shall secretly slay me in the palace, and shall divide the goods of my father, I would that thou thyself shouldst have and enjoy these things rather than that any of those men should; but if I shall plant slaughter and death amongst those men, then indeed bear these things to my home, and joying give them to me in my joy.’

D. xxxix. 6. 35. 2, 4; D. xxxix. 6. 37. pr.; C. viii. 57. 4.

There are two essential conditions of a donatio mortis causa :
 1. It must be made with the view of meeting the case of death; and
 2. it must be made to take effect only if death occurs, and so as to be revocable at any time previous, and to fail if the recipient died before the giver. The donor might, at his pleasure, alter the character of the gift, making it irrevocable; but then the gift was regarded as, and had the same legal consequences as, an ordinary donatio. (D. xxxix. 6. 27.)

It might be made conditional upon death in two ways. The donor might say, ‘I hand you over my horse, but the gift is only to be complete if I die in this enterprise;’ or he might say, ‘I give you my horse, if I survive this enterprise you are to give it me back.’ In the latter method, the delivery of the thing is made at once, subject to a conditional redelivery; in the former the delivery is made conditional. (D. xxxix. 6. 2, 29.) The donation might also be sometimes made conditional upon the death of a third person, as if a father promised to give to his daughter-in-law in case of the death of his son. (D. xxxix. 6. 11.) All who could make a testament could make a valid donatio mortis causa; and all who could receive under a testament could accept one. (D. xxxix. 6. 9 and 15.) Every kind of thing could be given in this way. (D. xxxix. 6. 18. 2.) Justinian, in the constitution referred to in the text, required that a donatio mortis causa should be made in the presence of five witnesses. (C. viii. 57. 4.)

If the gift was made in the first of the two ways above mentioned, although there was delivery, yet the thing was only acquired on the death of the donor, and the donor not having ceased to be dominus could therefore, if he revoked the gift, bring a real action to reclaim the thing handed over. If the gift was made in the second way, the whole property passed at once by the tradition to the recipient; and as, in the older and stricter law, the dominium passed absolutely when it passed at all, the property in the thing could not revert to the donor merely by the condition having been accomplished. He would only have a personal action against the recipient to compel him to give the value of the thing if he did not choose to give back the thing itself. The later jurists seem, however, to consider that the dominium reverted ipso jure, and that the donor could bring a real action for the thing itself. (D. xxxix. 6. 29.)

If the donor was insolvent at the time of his death, this was considered as an implied revocation of the gift. (D. xxxix. 6. 17.)

Ad exemplum legatorum redactæ sunt per omnia . . . per omnia fere legatis connumeretur—the latter is the more correct expression; gifts mortis causa were not exactly on the footing of legacies. For (1) they had complete effect immediately on the death of the donor, whereas legacies, to take effect, required that the heir should first enter on the inheritance (D. xxxix. 6. 29.) (2) The rules as to capacity of taking were the same in both cases, but regard was had to the capacity to receive of the person to whom the gift was made, only at the time of the death, and not, as in the case of legacies, also at the time of the disposition. (D. xxxix. 6. 22.) (3) A filiusfamilias, who could not before Justinian give anything but his peculium castrense by testament, could, with his father's permission, make a donatio mortis causa of other things. (D. xxxix. 6. 25. 1.) (4) A peregrinus could make a mortis causa donatio, though he could not give a legacy. (D. xxxix. 6. 25.) There was one remarkable mode in which they were placed on the footing of legacies. By a constitution of Severus the heir was permitted to retain as large a portion (one fourth) of the gift as he could of a legacy by the lex Falcidia. (See C. viii. 57. 2.)

The lines quoted in the text are from Odyssey xvii. 78.

2. Aliæ autem donationes sunt, quæ sine ulla mortis cogitatione fiunt, quas inter vivos appellamus. Quæ omnino non comparantur legatis: quæ si fuerint perfectæ, temere revocari non possunt. Perficiuntur autem, cum donator suam voluntatem scriptis aut sine scriptis manifestaverit: et ad exemplum venditionis nostra constitutio eas etiam in se habere necessitatem traditionis voluit, ut, et si non tradantur, habeant plenissimum et perfectum robur et traditionis necessitas incumbat donatori. Et cum retro principum dispositiones insinuari eas

2. The other kind of donations are those which are made without any consideration of death, and are called donations inter vivos. They cannot, in any respect, be compared to legacies, and if completed cannot be revoked at pleasure. (They are completed when the donor has manifested his intention, whether by writing or not.) Our constitution has declared that, after the example of sales, they shall involve the necessity of tradition; but so that even if there be no tradition they shall be completely effectual, and place the donor under the necessity of making tradition. Previous imperial tioned, although there was delivery, yet the thing was only acquired on the death of the donor, and the donor not having ceased to be dominus could therefore, if he revoked the gift, bring a real action to reclaim the thing handed over. If the gift was made in the second way, the whole property passed at once by the tradition to the recipient; and as, in the older and stricter law, the dominium passed absolutely when it passed at all, the property in the thing could not revert to the donor merely by the condition having been accomplished. He would only have a personal action against the recipient to compel him to give the value of the thing if he did not choose to give back the thing itself. The later jurists seem, however, to consider that the dominium reverted ipso jure, and that the donor could bring a real action for the thing itself. (D. xxxix. 6. 29.)

If the donor was insolvent at the time of his death, this was considered as an implied revocation of the gift. (D. xxxix. 6. 17.)

Ad exemplum legatorum redactæ sunt per omnia . . . per omnia fere legatis connumeretur—the latter is the more correct expression; gifts mortis causa were not exactly on the footing of legacies. For (1) they had complete effect immediately on the death of the donor, whereas legacies, to take effect, required that the heir should first enter on the inheritance. (D. xxxix. 6. 29.) (2) The rules as to capacity of taking were the same in both cases, but regard was had to the capacity to receive of the person to whom the gift was made, only at the time of the death, and not, as in the case of legacies, also at the time of the disposition. (D. xxxix. 6. 22.) (3) A filiusfamilias, who could not before Justinian give anything but his peculium castrense by testament, could, with his father's permission, make a donatio mortis causa of other things. (D. xxxix. 6. 25. 1.) (4) A peregrinus could make a mortis causa donatio, though he could not give a legacy. (D. xxxix. 6. 25.) There was one remarkable mode in which they were placed on the footing of legacies. By a constitution of Severus the heir was permitted to retain as large a portion (one fourth) of the gift as he could of a legacy by the lex Falcidia. (See C. viii. 57. 2.)

The lines quoted in the text are from Odyssey xvii. 78.

2. Aliæ autem donationes sunt, quæ sine ulla mortis cogitatione fiunt, quas inter vivos appellamus. Quæ omnino non comparantur legatis: quæ si fuerint perfectæ, temere revocari non possunt. Perficiuntur autem, cum donator suam voluntatem scriptis aut sine scriptis manifestaverit: et ad exemplum venditionis nostra constitutio eas etiam in se habere necessitatem traditionis voluit, ut, et si non tradantur, habeant plenissimum et perfectum robur et traditionis necessitas incumbat donatori. Et cum retro principum dispositiones insinuari eas

2. The other kind of donations are those which are made without any consideration of death, and are called donations inter vivos. They cannot, in any respect, be compared to legacies, and if completed cannot be revoked at pleasure. (They are completed when the donor has manifested his intention, whether by writing or not.) Our constitution has declared that, after the example of sales, they shall involve the necessity of tradition; but so that even if there be no tradition they shall be completely effectual, and place the donor under the necessity of making tradition. Previous imperial actis intervenientibus volebant, si majores ducentorum fuerant solidorum, nostra constitutio et quantitatem usque ad quingentos solidos ampliavit, quam stare et sine insinuatione statuit, et quasdam donationes invenit, quæ penitus insinuationem fieri minime desiderant, sed in se plenissimam habent firmitatem. Alia insuper multa ad uberiorem exitum donationum invenimus, quæ omnia ex nostris constitutionibus, quas super his posuimus, colligenda sunt. Sciendum tamen est, quod, etsi plenissimæ sint donationes, tamen si ingrati existant homines, in quos beneficium collatum est, donatoribus per nostram constitutionem licentiam præstavimus certis ex causis eas revocare, ne, qui suas res in alios contulerunt, ab his quandam patiantur injuriam vel jacturam, secundum enumeratos in nostra constitutione modos.

constitutions have enacted that they should be registered by public deeds, if exceeding two hundred solidi, but our constitution has raised the limit to five hundred solidi, so that for a gift up to this sum registration is not necessary. We have also marked out certain donations which need no registration at all, but are completely valid of themselves. We have, too, made many other new enactments, in order to extend and secure the effect of donations, all which may be collected from the constitutions we have promulgated on this subject. It must, however, be observed, that however absolutely a donation may be given, yet, if the object of the donor's bounty prove ungrateful, it is permitted by our constitution, in certain specified cases, to revoke the donation; so that they who have given their property to others should not suffer from them injuries or losses of such a kind as those enumerated in our constitution.

C. viii. 54. 35. 5; C. viii. 54. 34. pr. 3, 4; C. viii. 54. 36. pr. 2 and 3;
C. viii. 56. 10.

A thing given was, if a res Mancipi, given by mancipation, or in jure cessio, and, if a res nec Mancipi, by tradition. But a mere agreement to give gratuitously (pactum) was not in the old law binding on the person who agreed to give, and, to make a promise to give binding, it was necessary that the agreement should assume the form of a stipulation. (See Introd. sec. 83.)

The lex Cincia, 550 A.U.C., introduced several new rules into the law respecting gifts, prohibiting gifts beyond a certain amount, excepting to near relatives, but did not make a mere agreement to give in any degree valid. The first step taken in this direction was by Antoninus Pius, who declared that in gifts inter parentes et liberos a mere agreement, if perfectly clear in its terms, should be binding. (Cod. Theod. viii. 12. 4.) Constantine required that the agreement should be reduced to writing and registered, and that the property should be handed over in the presence of witnesses. (Cod. Theod. viii. 12. 1, 3.) And Justinian (C. viii. 54. 35. 5) made the agreement binding, whether reduced to writing or not; but it is to be observed that he provided, not that the property should pass by the agreement, but that the donor should be bound thereby to make tradition of the thing. So that the property in the thing was acquired by tradition, and not by donation, as a distinct mode of acquisition.

Donations not registered were only void for the sum by which they exceeded the amount fixed by law. (C. viii. 54. 34. 1.) Those valid without registration at all were such as donations made by, or to, the emperor to redeem captives, or to rebuild edifices destroyed by fire. (C. viii. 54. 36.)

actis intervenientibus volebant, si majores ducentorum fuerant solidorum, nostra constitutio et quantitatem usque ad quingentos solidos ampliavit, quam stare et sine insinuatione statuit, et quasdam donationes invenit, quæ penitus insinuationem fieri minime desiderant, sed in se plenissimam habent firmitatem. Alia insuper multa ad uberiorem exitum donationum invenimus, quæ omnia ex nostris constitutionibus, quas super his posuimus, colligenda sunt. Sciendum tamen est, quod, etsi plenissimæ sint donationes, tamen si ingrati existant homines, in quos beneficium collatum est, donatoribus per nostram constitutionem licentiam præstavimus certis ex causis eas revocare, ne, qui suas res in alios contulerunt, ab his quandam patiantur injuriam vel jacturam, secundum enumeratos in nostra constitutione modos.

constitutions have enacted that they should be registered by public deeds, if exceeding two hundred solidi, but our constitution has raised the limit to five hundred solidi, so that for a gift up to this sum registration is not necessary. We have also marked out certain donations which need no registration at all, but are completely valid of themselves. We have, too, made many other new enactments, in order to extend and secure the effect of donations, all which may be collected from the constitutions we have promulgated on this subject. It must, however, be observed, that however absolutely a donation may be given, yet, if the object of the donor's bounty prove ungrateful, it is permitted by our constitution, in certain specified cases, to revoke the donation; so that they who have given their property to others should not suffer from them injuries or losses of such a kind as those enumerated in our constitution.

C. viii. 54. 35. 5; C. viii. 54. 34. pr. 3, 4; C. viii. 54. 36. pr. 2 and 3;
C. viii. 56. 10.

A thing given was, if a res Mancipi, given by mancipation, or in jure cessio, and, if a res nec Mancipi, by tradition. But a mere agreement to give gratuitously (pactum) was not in the old law binding on the person who agreed to give, and, to make a promise to give binding, it was necessary that the agreement should assume the form of a stipulation. (See Introd. sec. 83.)

The lex Cincia, 550 A.U.C., introduced several new rules into the law respecting gifts, prohibiting gifts beyond a certain amount, excepting to near relatives, but did not make a mere agreement to give in any degree valid. The first step taken in this direction was by Antoninus Pius, who declared that in gifts inter parentes et liberos a mere agreement, if perfectly clear in its terms, should be binding. (Cod. Theod. viii. 12. 4.) Constantine required that the agreement should be reduced to writing and registered, and that the property should be handed over in the presence of witnesses. (Cod. Theod. viii. 12. 1, 3.) And Justinian (C. viii. 54. 35. 5) made the agreement binding, whether reduced to writing or not; but it is to be observed that he provided, not that the property should pass by the agreement, but that the donor should be bound thereby to make tradition of the thing. So that the property in the thing was acquired by tradition, and not by donation, as a distinct mode of acquisition.

Donations not registered were only void for the sum by which they exceeded the amount fixed by law. (C. viii. 54. 34. 1.) Those valid without registration at all were such as donations made by, or to, the emperor to redeem captives, or to rebuild edifices destroyed by fire. (C. viii. 54. 36.)

Gifts inter vivos were revocable in certain cases specified in the Code (viii. 56. 10), as, for instance, when the person benefited seriously injured, or attempted to injure, the person or property of the donor, or failed to fulfil the conditions of the gift. Revocation in such cases was personal to the donor and to the receiver, and could not be exacted by the heirs of the one, or against the heirs of the other.

3. Est et aliud genus inter vivos donationum, quod veteribus quidem prudentibus penitus erat incognitum, postea autem a junioribus divis principibus introductum est, quod ante nuptias vocabatur et tacitam in se conditionem habebat, ut tunc ratum esset, cum matrimonium fuerit insecutum: ideoque ante nuptias appellabatur, quod ante matrimonium efficiebatur et nunquam post nuptias celebratas talis donatio procedebat. Sed primus quidem divus Justinus, pater noster, cum augeri dotes et post nuptias fuerat permissum, si quid tale evenit, etiam ante nuptias donationem augeri et constante matrimonio sua constitutione permisit: sed tamen nomen inconveniens remanebat, cum ante nuptias quidem vocabatur, post nuptias autem tale accipiebat incrementum. Sed nos plenissimo fini tradere sanctiones cupientes et consequentia nomina rebus esse studentes, constituimus, ut tales donationes non augeantur tantum, sed et constante matrimonio initium accipiant et non ante nuptias, sed propter nuptias vocentur et dotibus in hoc exsequuntur, ut, quemadmodum dotes et constante matrimonio non solum augentur, sed etiam fiunt, ita et istæ donationes, quæ propter nuptias introductæ sunt, non solum antecedant matrimonium, sed etiam eo contracto et augeantur et constituantur.

3. There is another kind of donation inter vivos entirely unknown to the ancient lawyers, and subsequently introduced by the more recent emperors. It was termed the donatio ante nuptias, and was made under a tacit condition that it should only take effect when the marriage had followed on it. Hence it was called ante nuptias, because it preceded the marriage, and never took place after its celebration; but as it was permitted that dotes should be increased even after marriage, the Emperor Justin, our father, was the first to permit, by his constitution, that in case the dos was increased, the donation ante nuptias might be increased also, even during the marriage; but the donation still retained what was thus an improper name, and was called ante nuptias, while this increase was made to it after marriage. Wishing, therefore, to perfect the law on the subject, and to make names appropriate to things, we have enacted that such donations may not only be increased, but may also be first made during marriage, and that they shall be termed, not ante nuptias, but propter nuptias, and that they shall be placed on the footing of dotes, so far that, as dotes may be not only increased but first made during marriage, so donations propter nuptias may not only precede marriage, but, even after the tie of marriage has been formed, may be increased or made.

C. v. 3. 19, 20.

When the wife passed in manum viri, all that she had belonged to her husband; when she did not, all her property belonged exclusively to herself, and gifts between husband and wife, with a few exceptions (ULP. Reg. vii. 1), were strictly prohibited by law. But, as a provision for the expenses of marriage, the dos was contributed before or after marriage (and sometimes increased afterwards) by the wife or by a paternal ascendant or some one else for her. In case the dos was contributed by a paternal ascendant (dos profectitia), it could, on the termination of the marriage by the

Gifts inter vivos were revocable in certain cases specified in the Code (viii. 56. 10), as, for instance, when the person benefited seriously injured, or attempted to injure, the person or property of the donor, or failed to fulfil the conditions of the gift. Revocation in such cases was personal to the donor and to the receiver, and could not be exacted by the heirs of the one, or against the heirs of the other.

3. Est et aliud genus inter vivos donationum, quod veteribus quidem prudentibus penitus erat incognitum, postea autem a junioribus divis principibus introductum est, quod ante nuptias vocabatur et tacitam in se conditionem habebat, ut tunc ratum esset, cum matrimonium fuerit insecutum: ideoque ante nuptias appellabatur, quod ante matrimonium efficiebatur et nunquam post nuptias celebratas talis donatio procedebat. Sed primus quidem divus Justinus, pater noster, cum augeri dotes et post nuptias fuerat permissum, si quid tale evenit, etiam ante nuptias donationem augeri et constante matrimonio sua constitutione permisit: sed tamen nomen inconveniens remanebat, cum ante nuptias quidem vocabatur, post nuptias autem tale accipiebat incrementum. Sed nos plenissimo fini tradere sanctiones cupientes et consequentia nomina rebus esse studentes, constituimus, ut tales donationes non augeantur tantum, sed et constante matrimonio initium accipiant et non ante nuptias, sed propter nuptias vocentur et dotibus in hoc exsequuntur, ut, quemadmodum dotes et constante matrimonio non solum augentur, sed etiam fiunt, ita et istæ donationes, quæ propter nuptias introductæ sunt, non solum antecedant matrimonium, sed etiam eo contracto et augeantur et constituantur.

3. There is another kind of donation inter vivos entirely unknown to the ancient lawyers, and subsequently introduced by the more recent emperors. It was termed the donatio ante nuptias, and was made under a tacit condition that it should only take effect when the marriage had followed on it. Hence it was called ante nuptias, because it preceded the marriage, and never took place after its celebration; but as it was permitted that dotes should be increased even after marriage, the Emperor Justin, our father, was the first to permit, by his constitution, that in case the dos was increased, the donation ante nuptias might be increased also, even during the marriage; but the donation still retained what was thus an improper name, and was called ante nuptias, while this increase was made to it after marriage. Wishing, therefore, to perfect the law on the subject, and to make names appropriate to things, we have enacted that such donations may not only be increased, but may also be first made during marriage, and that they shall be termed, not ante nuptias, but propter nuptias, and that they shall be placed on the footing of dotes, so far that, as dotes may be not only increased but first made during marriage, so donations propter nuptias may not only precede marriage, but, even after the tie of marriage has been formed, may be increased or made.

C. v. 3. 19, 20.

When the wife passed in manum viri, all that she had belonged to her husband; when she did not, all her property belonged exclusively to herself, and gifts between husband and wife, with a few exceptions (ULP. Reg. vii. 1), were strictly prohibited by law. But, as a provision for the expenses of marriage, the dos was contributed before or after marriage (and sometimes increased afterwards) by the wife or by a paternal ascendant or some one else for her. In case the dos was contributed by a paternal ascendant (dos profectitia), it could, on the termination of the marriage by the death of the wife, be reclaimed from the husband by the donor, but not by his heirs. If it was given for her benefit by any one else than such an ascendant (dos adventitia), it could not be reclaimed by the donor or his heirs unless there had been a special agreement that it should be reclaimable, in which case it was termed dos receptitia (D. xxiii. 3. 5; ULP. Reg. 6. 5); but Justinian enacted that the dos adventitia should go to the heirs of the wife unless a special agreement to the contrary had been made. (C. v. 13. 1. 6, 13.) Thus under Justinian the surviving husband in every case lost the dos. If the wife survived the husband, and was sui juris, the dos, however derived, belonged to her, unless a provision to the contrary had been made by the donor. If she was still in the power of her father, she and he had to join in claiming it. (D. xxiv. 3. 2. 1.) If the dos consisted of things that could be replaced by others of the same kind (res fungibiles) (D. xxiii. 3. 42), the things given belonged in full property to the husband, and he had to return like things to the same amount within three years (altered to one year by Justinian, Cod. v. 13. 1. 7) after the dissolution of the marriage. (ULP. Reg. 6. 8.) If the dos consisted of things which could not thus be replaced, such as land or houses, the husband was nominally the owner and managed the property, but he could only take the annual proceeds, and he had to preserve the property intact and to restore it immediately on the dissolution of the marriage. He was prevented by the lex Julia de adulteriis et de fundo dotali, passed in the time of Augustus, from alienating immoveable property in Italy forming part of the dos without the consent of the wife, or mortgaging it even with her consent; and Justinian, as we shall see in the introductory paragraph of the next Title, forbade the mortgaging or alienation of immoveables, wherever situated, forming part of the dos, even with the wife's consent. As to the expenses of the husband in his management, see note to Book iv. Tit. 6. 37.

If the marriage was terminated not by death but divorce, the general rule was that the husband had to restore the dos just as he would have had to do in case of the wife's death; but if the wife was divorced for misconduct, or divorced her husband without reason given, the husband was allowed to retain at first a part and in later times the whole of the dos, having, however, only a life interest in it, if there were children. (C. v. 12. 24; C. Th. iii. 16. 2.)

The donatio ante nuptias, of which we first hear in a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. v. 17. 8. 4), which speaks of it as recognised by law, was a gift on the part of the husband as an equivalent to the dos. It was the property of the wife, but managed by the husband, and could not be alienated even with her consent. Justinian provided (Nov. 97. 1) that the wife, if survivor, should receive an equal value from the donatio propter nuptias with that which the husband, if survivor, would have received from the dos, the actual amount reserved for the survivor being matter of agreement between the parties. By a constitution previous to death of the wife, be reclaimed from the husband by the donor, but not by his heirs. If it was given for her benefit by any one else than such an ascendant (dos adventitia), it could not be reclaimed by the donor or his heirs unless there had been a special agreement that it should be reclaimable, in which case it was termed dos receptitia (D. xxiii. 3. 5; ULP. Reg. 6. 5); but Justinian enacted that the dos adventitia should go to the heirs of the wife unless a special agreement to the contrary had been made. (C. v. 13. 1. 6, 13.) Thus under Justinian the surviving husband in every case lost the dos. If the wife survived the husband, and was sui juris, the dos, however derived, belonged to her, unless a provision to the contrary had been made by the donor. If she was still in the power of her father, she and he had to join in claiming it. (D. xxiv. 3. 2. 1.) If the dos consisted of things that could be replaced by others of the same kind (res fungibiles) (D. xxiii. 3. 42), the things given belonged in full property to the husband, and he had to return like things to the same amount within three years (altered to one year by Justinian, Cod. v. 13. 1. 7) after the dissolution of the marriage. (ULP. Reg. 6. 8.) If the dos consisted of things which could not thus be replaced, such as land or houses, the husband was nominally the owner and managed the property, but he could only take the annual proceeds, and he had to preserve the property intact and to restore it immediately on the dissolution of the marriage. He was prevented by the lex Julia de adulteriis et de fundo dotali, passed in the time of Augustus, from alienating immoveable property in Italy forming part of the dos without the consent of the wife, or mortgaging it even with her consent; and Justinian, as we shall see in the introductory paragraph of the next Title, forbade the mortgaging or alienation of immoveables, wherever situated, forming part of the dos, even with the wife's consent. As to the expenses of the husband in his management, see note to Book iv. Tit. 6. 37.

If the marriage was terminated not by death but divorce, the general rule was that the husband had to restore the dos just as he would have had to do in case of the wife's death; but if the wife was divorced for misconduct, or divorced her husband without reason given, the husband was allowed to retain at first a part and in later times the whole of the dos, having, however, only a life interest in it, if there were children. (C. v. 12. 24; C. Th. iii. 16. 2.)

The donatio ante nuptias, of which we first hear in a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. v. 17. 8. 4), which speaks of it as recognised by law, was a gift on the part of the husband as an equivalent to the dos. It was the property of the wife, but managed by the husband, and could not be alienated even with her consent. Justinian provided (Nov. 97. 1) that the wife, if survivor, should receive an equal value from the donatio propter nuptias with that which the husband, if survivor, would have received from the dos, the actual amount reserved for the survivor being matter of agreement between the parties. By a constitution previous to Justinian (C. v. 14. 9), the wife had, if survivor, the same fraction of the donatio as her husband would have had of the dos. Justinian substituted an equality of value for an equality of proportion.

Justinus, the predecessor of Justinian, was his uncle and adoptive father.

4. Erat olim et alius modus civilis acquisitionis per jus adrescendi, quod est tale: si communem servum habens aliquis cum Titio, sokus libertatem ei imposuit vel vindicta vel testamento, eo casu pars ejus amittebatur et socio adrescat. Sed cum pessimum fuerat exemplo, et libertate servum defrandari et ex ea humanioribus quidem dominis damnum inferri, severioribus autem lucrum adrescere: hoc quasi invidiæ plenum pio remedio per nostram constitutionem mederi necessarium duximus et invenimus viam, per quam et manumissor et socius ejus et qui libertatem accepit, nostro fruuntur beneficio, libertate cum effectu procedente (cujus favore et antiquos legislatores multa et contra communes regulas statuisse manifestissimum est) et eo, qui eam imposuit, suæ liberalitatis stabilitate gaudente et socio indemni conservato pretiumque servi secundum partem domini, quod nos definivimus, accipiente.

4. There was formerly another mode of acquiring property by the civil law, namely, that of accretion; as, if any one,
having a slave in common with Titius, had himself alone enfranchised him, either by vindicta or by testament, his share in that slave was lost, and accrued to the joint owner. But, as it was an example of very bad tendency, that both the slave should be defrauded of his freedom, and that the more humane master should suffer loss, while the more severe master profited, we have thought it advisable to apply by our constitution a gracious remedy to what seemed so odious, and have devised means by which the manumitter, and the co-proprietor, and the freed slave may be all benefited. Freedom, to favour which ancient legislators have often most obviously violated the ordinary rules of law, shall be really gained by the slave; he who has given this freedom, shall have the delight of seeing it maintained; and his co-proprietor shall be indemnified by receiving a price for the slave, proportioned to his interest in him, according to the rates fixed in our constitution.

C. vii. 7. 1. 5.

A man could not be partly free, partly a slave. If, then, a slave was enfranchised by one co-proprietor, was he a slave or free?
The old law, as the text informs us, pronounced him the former. If the enfranchisement, however, was such that, according to the rules given in Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3, the enfranchised slave would have become only a Latinus Junianus or a dediticius, the enfranchisement had no effect at all, and the slave remained the slave, as before, of both.
But if the enfranchisement had been such that he would have been a Roman citizen, the interest of the master who manumitted him accrued to the other proprietors. (PAUL. Sent. iv. 12. 1.)

The scale of prices referred to in the concluding words of the text is given in the Code. (vii. 7. 1. 5.)

TIT. VIII. QUIBUS ALIENARE LICET VEL NON.

Accidit aliquando, ut qui dominus sit, alienare non possit et contra qui dominus non sit, alienandæ rei

Sometimes it happens that he who is owner of a thing cannot alienate it, while, on the contrary, he who is not

I Husband could alienate his

Justinian (C. v. 14. 9), the wife had, if survivor, the same fraction of the donatio as her husband would have had of the dos. Justinian substituted an equality of value for an equality of proportion.

Justinus, the predecessor of Justinian, was his uncle and adoptive father.

4. Erat olim et alius modus civilis acquisitionis per jus adre-scendi, quod est tale: si communem servum habens aliquis cum Titio, solus libertatem ei imposuit vel vindicta vel testamento, eo casu pars ejus amittebatur et socio adre-scebat. Sed cum pessimum fuerat exemplo, et libertate servum defraudari et ex ea humanioribus quidem dominis damnum inferri, severioribus autem lucrum adre-scere: hoc quasi invidiæ plenum pio remedio per nostram constitutionem mederi necessarium duximus et invenimus viam, per quam et manumissor et socius ejus et qui libertatem accepit, nostro fruantur beneficio, libertate cum effectu procedente (cujus favore et antiquos legislatores multa et contra communes regulas statuisse manifestissimum est) et eo, qui eam imposuit, suæ liberalitatis stabilitate gaudente et socio indemni conservato pretiumque servi secundum partem domini, quod nos definivimus, accipiente.

4. There was formerly another mode of acquiring property by the civil law, namely, that of accretion; as, if any one, having a slave in common with Titius, had himself alone enfranchised him, either by vindicta or by testament, his share in that slave was lost, and accrued to the joint owner. But, as it was an example of very bad tendency, that both the slave should be defrauded of his freedom, and that the more humane master should suffer loss, while the more severe master profited, we have thought it advisable to apply by our constitution a gracious remedy to what seemed so odious, and have devised means by which the manumitter, and the co-proprietor, and the freed slave may be all benefited. Freedom, to favour which ancient legislators have often most obviously violated the ordinary rules of law, shall be really gained by the slave; he who has given this freedom, shall have the delight of seeing it maintained; and his co-proprietor shall be indemnified by receiving a price for the slave, proportioned to his interest in him, according to the rates fixed in our constitution.

C. vii. 7. 1. 5.

A man could not be partly free, partly a slave. If, then, a slave was enfranchised by one co-proprietor, was he a slave or free? The old law, as the text informs us, pronounced him the former. If the enfranchisement, however, was such that, according to the rules given in Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3, the enfranchised slave would have become only a Latinus Junianus or a dediticius, the enfranchisement had no effect at all, and the slave remained the slave, as before, of both. But if the enfranchisement had been such that he would have been a Roman citizen, the interest of the master who manumitted him accrued to the other proprietors. (PAUL. Sent. iv. 12. 1.)

The scale of prices referred to in the concluding words of the text is given in the Code. (vii. 7. 1. 5.)

TIT. VIII. QUIBUS ALIENARE LICET VEL NON.

Accidit aliquando, ut qui dominus sit, alienare non possit et contra qui dominus non sit, alienandæ rei

Sometimes it happens that he who is owner of a thing cannot alienate it, while, on the contrary, he who is not

I Husband cannot alienate his potestatem habeat. Nam dotale prædium maritus invita muliere per legem Juliam prohibetur alienare, quamvis ipsius sit, dotis causa ei datum. Quod nos, legem Juliam corrigentes, in meliorem statum deduximus. Cum enim lex in soli tantummodo rebus locum habebat, quæ Italicæ fuerant, et alienationes inhibebat, quæ invita muliere fiebant, hypothecas autem earum etiam volente: utrisque remedium imposuimus, ut etiam in eas res, quæ in provinciali solo positæ sunt, interdicta fiat alienatio vel obligatio et neutrum eorum neque consentientibus mulieribus procedat, ne sexus muliebris fragilitas in perniciem substantiæ earum converteretur.

owner has the power of alienation. Thus, the husband is prohibited by the lex Julia from alienating immovables, which form part of the dos, against the wish of the wife, although these immovables, having been given him as a part of the dos, belong to him. We have amended the lex Julia and introduced a great improvement. This law only applied to Italian immovables, and it prohibited alienations made against the wishes of the wife, and mortgages made even with her consent. Wishing to amend the law on each of these points, we have declared that the prohibition of alienation or mortgage shall extend to immovables in the provinces, and that neither alienation nor mortgage shall be made even with the consent of the wife, lest the weakness of the female sex should be abused to the detriment of their fortunes.

GAI. ii. 62, 63; C. v. 13. 15.

The power of alienating belongs to the owner and to him only; and every owner can alienate the thing belonging to him. There are, however, exceptions to the rule, and these exceptions form the subject of this Title.

The subject of dotis has been already discussed in the note to paragr. 3 of the last Title.

Aug. 1. Contra autem creditor pignus ex pactione, quamvis ejus ea res non sit, alienare potest. Sed hoc forsitan ideo videtur fieri, quod voluntate debitoris intellegitur pignus alienare, qui ab initio contractus pactus est, ut liceret creditori pignus vendere, si pecunia non solvatur. Sed ne creditores jus suum persequi impedirentur neque debitores temere suarum rerum dominium amittere videantur, nostra constitutione consultum est et certus modus impositus est, per quem pignorum distractio possit procedere, cujus tenore utrique parti creditorum et debitorum satis abundeque provisum est.

1. On the other hand, a creditor may, according to agreement, alienate a pledge, although the thing is not his own property. But this alienation may perhaps be considered as taking place by the intention of the debtor, who in making the contract has agreed that the creditor might sell the thing pledged, if the debt was not paid. But that creditors might not be impeded in the pursuit of their rights, nor debtors seem too easily deprived of their property, a provision has been made by our constitution establishing a fixed method of procedure for the sale of pledges, by which the respective interests of the creditor and debtor have been fully secured.

GAI. ii. 64; C. viii. 34. 3. pr. et seq.

The power of a creditor to sell the thing pledged, forming an exception to the rule that none but the owner could alienate, was so necessary a part of his rights that it could not be taken from him even by express agreement; and an agreement ne vendere liceat had no other effect than to make it necessary for the creditor to give the debtor fuller notice of his intention to sell. (D. xiii. 7.

potestatem habeat. Nam dotale prædium maritus invita muliere per legem Juliam prohibetur alienare, quamvis ipsius sit, dotis causa ei datum. Quod nos, legem Juliam corrigentes, in meliorem statum deduximus. Cum enim lex in soli tantummodo rebus locum habebat, quæ Italicæ fuerant, et alienationes inhibebat, quæ invita muliere fiebant, hypothecas autem earum etiam volente: utrisque remedium imposuimus, ut etiam in eas res, quæ in provinciali solo positæ sunt, interdicta fiat alienatio vel obligatio et neutrum eorum neque consentientibus mulieribus procedat, ne sexus muliebris fragilitas in perniciem substantiæ earum converteretur.

owner has the power of alienation. Thus, the husband is prohibited by the lex Julia from alienating immovables, which form part of the dos, against the wish of the wife, although these immovables, having been given him as a part of the dos, belong to him. We have amended the lex Julia and introduced a great improvement. This law only applied to Italian immovables, and it prohibited alienations made against the wishes of the wife, and mortgages made even with her consent. Wishing to amend the law on each of these points, we have declared that the prohibition of alienation or mortgage shall extend to immovables in the provinces, and that neither alienation nor mortgage shall be made even with the consent of the wife, lest the weakness of the female sex should be abused to the detriment of their fortunes.

GAI. ii. 62, 63; C. v. 13. 15.

The power of alienating belongs to the owner and to him only; and every owner can alienate the thing belonging to him. There are, however, exceptions to the rule, and these exceptions form the subject of this Title.

The subject of dotes has been already discussed in the note to paragr. 3 of the last Title.

Aug. 1. Contra autem creditor pignus ex pactione, quamvis ejus ea res non sit, alienare potest. Sed hoc forsitan ideo videtur fieri, quod voluntate debitoris intellegitur pignus alienare, qui ab initio contractus pactus est, ut liceret creditori pignus vendere, si pecunia non solvatur. Sed ne creditores jus suum persequi impedirentur neque debitores temere suarum rerum dominium amittere viderant, nostra constitutione consultum est et certus modus impositus est, per quem pignorum distractio possit procedere, cujus tenore utrique parti creditorum et debitorum satis abundeque provisum est.

1. On the other hand, a creditor may, according to agreement, alienate a pledge, although the thing is not his own property. But this alienation may perhaps be considered as taking place by the intention of the debtor, who in making the contract has agreed that the creditor might sell the thing pledged, if the debt was not paid. But that creditors might not be impeded in the pursuit of their rights, nor debtors seem too easily deprived of their property, a provision has been made by our constitution establishing a fixed method of procedure for the sale of pledges, by which the respective interests of the creditor and debtor have been fully secured.

GAI. ii. 64; C. viii. 34. 3. pr. et seq.

The power of a creditor to sell the thing pledged, forming an exception to the rule that none but the owner could alienate, was so necessary a part of his rights that it could not be taken from him even by express agreement; and an agreement ne vendere liceat had no other effect than to make it necessary for the creditor to give the debtor fuller notice of his intention to sell. (D. xiii. 7.

4-6.) Justinian, by his constitution, permitted the parties to fix the time, and place, and manner of sale at their pleasure, and it was only if there was no special agreement that the regulations of his constitution were to take effect, the gist of which was that the thing might be sold after two years had elapsed from the time when the creditor gave the debtor notice to pay, and that after two more years the creditor, if no purchaser could be found, would on petition to the emperor be declared the owner, the debtor having a further period of two years within which he might redeem. (C. viii. 34. 3.)

Tutors and curators might, in certain cases, alienate the goods of their pupils and of those committed to their care; but, at any rate in the later times of law, they had to obtain the permission of a magistrate for the alienation of rural immoveables. (See C. v. 37. 22.)

2. Nunc admonendi sumus, neque pupillum neque pupillam ullam rem sine tutoris auctoritate alienare posse. Ideoque si mutuum pecuniam alicui sine tutoris auctoritate dederit, non contrahit obligationem, quia pecuniam non facit accipientis, ideoque vindicari nummi possunt, sicubi extant: sed si nummi, quos mutuos dedit, ab eo, qui accepit, bona fide consumpti sunt, condici possunt, si mala fide, ad exhibendum de his agi potest. At ex contrario omnes res pupillo et pupillæ sine tutoris auctoritate recte dari possunt. Ideoque si debitor pupillo solvat, necessaria est tutoris auctoritas: alioquin non liberabitur. Sed etiam hoc evidentissima ratione statutum est in constitutione, quam ad Cæsarenses advocatos ex suggestione Triboniani, viri eminentissimi, quæstoris sacri palatii nostri, promulgavimus, qua dispositum est, ita licere tutori vel curatoris debitorem pupillarem solvere, ut prius sententia judicialis sine omni damno celebrata hoc permittat. Quo subsecuto, si et iudex pronuntiaverit et debitor solverit, sequatur huiusmodi solutionem plenissima securitas. Sin autem aliter quam disposuimus solutio facta fuerit et pecuniam salvam habeat pupillus aut ex ea locupletior sit et adhuc eandem summam pecuniæ petat, per exceptionem doli mali summo verbi poterit: quodsi aut male consumpserit aut furto amiserit, nihil proderit debitori doli mali exceptio, sed nihilo minus damnabitur, quia temere sine tutoris au-

2. It must next be observed, that no pupil of either sex can alienate anything without the authority of a tutor. If, therefore, a pupil, without the tutor's authority, lends any one money, the pupil does not contract an obligation; for he does not make the money the property of the receiver, and the pieces of money may be claimed by vindication, if they still exist. But supposing these pieces which the pupil has lent are consumed by the borrower, then, if they are so bona fide, a personal action may be brought: if mala fide, an action ad exhibendum. On the contrary, the pupil of either sex may acquire anything whatsoever without the authority of the tutor; and therefore when a debtor pays a pupil, the debtor must have the authority of the tutor, or he does not free himself from the debt. And we have, for very obvious reasons, declared by a constitution, published to the advocates of Cæsarea on the suggestion of the very eminent Tribonian, quæstor of our sacred palace, that the debtor of a pupil may make payment to the tutor or curator, first receiving permission by the sentence of a judge, obtained free of all expenses; and if these forms are observed, a payment made according to the sentence of the judge will give the debtor the most complete security. But if payment is made not according to the mode we have sanctioned, the pupil who has the money still safe in his possession, or has been made richer by it, may, if he demands again the same sum, be repelled by an ex-

4-6.) Justinian, by his constitution, permitted the parties to fix the time, and place, and manner of sale at their pleasure, and it was only if there was no special agreement that the regulations of his constitution were to take effect, the gist of which was that the thing might be sold after two years had elapsed from the time when the creditor gave the debtor notice to pay, and that after two more years the creditor, if no purchaser could be found, would on petition to the emperor be declared the owner, the debtor having a further period of two years within which he might redeem. (C. viii. 34. 3.)

Tutors and curators might, in certain cases, alienate the goods of their pupils and of those committed to their care; but, at any rate in the later times of law, they had to obtain the permission of a magistrate for the alienation of rural immoveables. (See C. v. 37. 22.)

2. Nunc admonendi sumus, neque pupillum neque pupillam ullam rem sine tutoris auctoritate alienare posse. Ideoque si mutuam pecuniam alicui sine tutoris auctoritate dederit, non contrahit obligationem, quia pecuniam non facit accipientis, ideoque vindicari nummi possunt, sicubi extant; sed si nummi, quos mutuos dedit, ab eo, qui accepit, bona fide consumpti sunt, condici possunt, si mala fide, ad exhibendum de his agi potest. At ex contrario omnes res pupillo et pupillæ sine tutoris auctoritate recte dari possunt. Ideoque si debitor pupillo solvat, necessaria est tutoris auctoritas: alioquin non liberabitur. Sed etiam hoc evidentissima ratione statutum est in constitutione, quam ad Cæsarenses advocatos ex suggestione Triboniani, viri eminentissimi, quæstoris sacri palatii nostri, promulgavimus, qua dispositum est, ita licere tutori vel curatori debitorem pupillarem solvere, ut prius sententia judicialis sine omni damno celebrata hoc permittat. Quo subsecuto, si et iudex pronuntiaverit et debitor solverit, sequatur hujusmodi solutionem plenissima securitas. Sin autem aliter quam disposuimus solutio facta fuerit et pecuniam salvam habeat pupillus aut ex ea locupletior sit et adhuc eandem summam pecuniæ petat, per exceptionem doli mali summonveri poterit: quodsi aut male consumpserit aut furto amiserit, nihil proderit debitori doli mali exceptio, sed nihilo minus damnabitur, quia temere sine tutoris au-

2. It must next be observed, that no pupil of either sex can alienate anything without the authority of a tutor. If, therefore, a pupil, without the tutor's authority, lends any one money, the pupil does not contract an obligation; for he does not make the money the property of the receiver, and the pieces of money may be claimed by vindication, if they still exist. But supposing these pieces which the pupil has lent are consumed by the borrower, then, if they are so bona fide, a personal action may be brought: if mala fide, an action ad exhibendum. On the contrary, the pupil of either sex may acquire anything whatsoever without the authority of the tutor; and therefore when a debtor pays a pupil, the debtor must have the authority of the tutor, or he does not free himself from the debt. And we have, for very obvious reasons, declared by a constitution, published to the advocates of Cæsarea on the suggestion of the very eminent Tribonian, quæstor of our sacred palace, that the debtor of a pupil may make payment to the tutor or curator, first receiving permission by the sentence of a judge, obtained free of all expenses; and if these forms are observed, a payment made according to the sentence of the judge will give the debtor the most complete security. But if payment is made not according to the mode we have sanctioned, the pupil who has the money still safe in his possession, or has been made richer by it, may, if he demands again the same sum, be repelled by an exception of dolus malus. But if he has spent the money uselessly, or lost it by theft, the debtor cannot profit by the exception of dolus malus, and he will be condemned to pay over again, because he has paid in a rash manner, without the authority of the tutor, and has not conformed to our rules. On the other hand, pupils of either sex cannot pay without the authority of the tutor, because that which they pay does not thereby become the property of the person who receives it, as they are incapable of alienating anything without the authority of the tutor.

toritate et non secundum nostram dispositionem solverit. Sed ex diverso pupilli vel pupillæ solvere sine tutore auctore non possunt, quia id, quod solvunt, non fit accipientis, cum scilicet nullius rei alienatio eis sine tutoris auctoritate concessa est.

GAI. ii. 80. 82-84; C. v. 37. 25; D. xlv. 3. 14. 8.

The pupil might make his condition better, but not worse. (See Bk. i. Tit. 21.) He could not transfer the property in anything belonging to him, but he could acquire the property in anything transferred to him. Three illustrations of this doctrine are given.

1. The pupil could not lend anything under the contract called mutuum, the essence of which was that the thing lent became the property of the borrower, who bound himself to give back a thing of equal value. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 14. pr.) If the pupil attempted to lend a thing in this way, the thing lent could be recovered by vindication, if it was possible that the actual thing should be restored; if not, its value could be recovered by a personal action (condictio) against the borrower; or if the borrower had been guilty of mala fides, an actio ad exhibendum would lie, that is, the borrower was called upon to produce the thing borrowed; and on his being found unable to do so, he was condemned to pay not only the value of the thing, but damages to compensate for the injury inflicted.

2. If the pupil was a debtor and paid without authorisation money to a creditor, he could not transfer the property in the pieces of money paid, and had a real action to get them back, if the creditor still had them; if not, the pupil had the same remedies as just stated in regard to a mutuum, except that if he brought a condictio against a creditor, who had bona fide spent the money, and the creditor could claim the same amount of money for the debt due to him, the Roman jurists considered that instead of these cross actions the debt of the pupil ought to be considered to be extinguished.

3. If the debtor made a payment to the pupil without the authorisation of the tutor, that which he paid became the property of the pupil; and as the pupil could not make his condition worse, he could not extinguish debts due to him; and thus the debt was still owing, although the pupil retained what was paid him. The debtor might still be sued for what he owed, and he could only repel the action by a plea of dolus malus to the extent to which toritate et non secundum nostram dispositionem solverit. Sed ex diverso pupilli vel pupillæ solvere sine tutore auctore non possunt, quia id, quod solvunt, non fit accipientis, cum scilicet nullius rei alienatio eis sine tutoris auctoritate concessa est.

ception of dolus malus. But if he has spent the money uselessly, or lost it by theft, the debtor cannot profit by the exception of dolus malus, and he will be condemned to pay over again, because he has paid in a rash manner, without the authority of the tutor, and has not conformed to our rules. On the other hand, pupils of either sex cannot pay without the authority of the tutor, because that which they pay does not thereby become the property of the person who receives it, as they are incapable of alienating anything without the authority of the tutor.

GAI. ii. 80. 82-84; C. v. 37. 25; D. xlv. 3. 14. 8.

The pupil might make his condition better, but not worse. (See Bk. i. Tit. 21.) He could not transfer the property in anything belonging to him, but he could acquire the property in anything transferred to him. Three illustrations of this doctrine are given.

1. The pupil could not lend anything under the contract called mutuum, the essence of which was that the thing lent became the property of the borrower, who bound himself to give back a thing of equal value. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 14. pr.) If the pupil attempted to lend a thing in this way, the thing lent could be recovered by vindication, if it was possible that the actual thing should be restored; if not, its value could be recovered by a personal action (condictio) against the borrower; or if the borrower had been guilty of mala fides, an actio ad exhibendum would lie, that is, the borrower was called upon to produce the thing borrowed; and on his being found unable to do so, he was condemned to pay not only the value of the thing, but damages to compensate for the injury inflicted.

2. If the pupil was a debtor and paid without authorisation money to a creditor, he could not transfer the property in the pieces of money paid, and had a real action to get them back, if the creditor still had them; if not, the pupil had the same remedies as just stated in regard to a mutuum, except that if he brought a condictio against a creditor, who had bona fide spent the money, and the creditor could claim the same amount of money for the debt due to him, the Roman jurists considered that instead of these cross actions the debt of the pupil ought to be considered to be extinguished.

3. If the debtor made a payment to the pupil without the authorisation of the tutor, that which he paid became the property of the pupil; and as the pupil could not make his condition worse, he could not extinguish debts due to him; and thus the debt was still owing, although the pupil retained what was paid him. The debtor might still be sued for what he owed, and he could only repel the action by a plea of dolus malus to the extent to which the pupil then had the money paid in hand, so that if the pupil had spent it, all the debtor would have to pay over again. (GAI. ii. 84.) If the tutor authorised the payment, the debt was extinguished; but still the creditor was not quite safe; the pupil had a right to receive from the tutor the money paid; and if he could not obtain it from him, the prætor would, under certain circumstances, grant a restitutio in integrum (see note on introductory paragraph of Bk. i. Tit. 23), and the creditor might then be obliged to pay over again, in order that the pupil might be kept free from all loss. It was to guard against this that Justinian, in the constitution alluded to in the text, provided a means whereby the creditor should have plenissima securitas.

TIT. IX. PER QUAS PERSONAS NOBIS ADQUIRITUR.

Adquiritur nobis non solum per nosmet ipsos, sed etiam per eos, quos in potestate habemus: item per eos servos, in quibus ususfructum habemus: item per homines liberos et servos alienos, quos bona fide possidemus. De quibus singulis diligentius dispiciamus.

We acquire not only by ourselves, but also by those whom we have in our power; also by slaves, of whom we have the usufruct; and by those freemen and slaves belonging to others whom we possess bona fide. Let us examine separately these different cases.

GAI. ii. 86.

The rule of law was, that no one could acquire through another person; but if persons in the power of another acquired anything, that which they acquired became, by the mere force of their position, the property of the person in whose power they were; and thus the rule may be, perhaps, more accurately expressed by saying that nothing could be acquired per extraneam personam, i.e. through a person who was not in the familia of the acquirer.

1. Igitur liberi vestri utriusque sexus, quos in potestate habetis, olim quidem, quidquid ad eos pervenerat (exceptis videlicet castrensi-bus pecuniis), hoc parentibus suis adquirebant sine ulla distinctione: et hoc ita parentum fiebat, ut esset eis licentia, quod per unum vel unam eorum adquisitum est, alii filio vel extraneo donare vel vendere vel quocumque modo voluerant, applicare. Quod nobis inhumanum visum est et generali constitutione emissa et liberis pepercimus et patribus debitum reservavimus. Sancitum etenim a nobis est, ut, si quid ex re patris ei obveniat, hoc secundum antiquam observationem totum parenti adquirat (quæ enim invidia est, quod ex patris occasione

1. Formerly, all that your children under your power of either sex acquired, excepting castrensia pecunia, was without distinction acquired for the benefit of their ascendants; so much so, that the paterfamilias who had thus acquired anything through one of his children, could give or sell, or transfer it in any way he pleased to another child or to a stranger. This appeared to us very harsh, and by a general constitution we have relieved the children, and yet reserved for the ascendants all that was due to them. We have declared that all which the filiusfamilias obtains by means of the fortune of the father, shall, according to the old law, be acquired entirely for the father's benefit: for what hardship is there in that which comes from the pupil then had the money paid in hand, so that if the pupil had spent it, all the debtor would have to pay over again. (GAI. ii. 84.) If the tutor authorised the payment, the debt was extinguished; but still the creditor was not quite safe; the pupil had a right to receive from the tutor the money paid; and if he could not obtain it from him, the prætor would, under certain circumstances, grant a restitutio in integrum (see note on introductory paragraph of Bk. i. Tit. 23), and the creditor might then be obliged to pay over again, in order that the pupil might be kept free from all loss. It was to guard against this that Justinian, in the constitution alluded to in the text, provided a means whereby the creditor should have plenissima securitas.

TIT. IX. PER QUAS PERSONAS NOBIS ADQUIRITUR.

Adquiritur nobis non solum per nosmet ipsos, sed etiam per eos, quos in potestate habemus: item per eos servos, in quibus usumfructum habemus: item per homines liberos et servos alienos, quos bona fide possidemus. De quibus singulis diligentius dispiciamus.

We acquire not only by ourselves, but also by those whom we have in our power; also by slaves, of whom we have the usufruct; and by those freemen and slaves belonging to others whom we possess bona fide. Let us examine separately these different cases.

GAI. ii. 86.

The rule of law was, that no one could acquire through another person; but if persons in the power of another acquired anything, that which they acquired became, by the mere force of their position, the property of the person in whose power they were; and thus the rule may be, perhaps, more accurately expressed by saying that nothing could be acquired per extraneam personam, i.e. through a person who was not in the familia of the acquirer.

1. Igitur liberi vestri utriusque sexus, quos in potestate habetis, olim quidem, quidquid ad eos pervenerat (exceptis videlicet castrensibus pecuniis), hoc parentibus suis adquirebant sine ulla distinctione: et hoc ita parentum fiebat, ut esset eis licentia, quod per unum vel unam eorum adquisitum est, alii filio vel extraneo donare vel vendere vel quocumque modo voluerant, applicare. Quod nobis inhumanum visum est et generali constitutione emissa et liberis pepercimus et patribus debitum reservavimus. Sancitum etenim a nobis est, ut, si quid ex re patris ei obveniat, hoc secundum antiquam observationem totum parenti adquirat (quæ enim invidia est, quod ex patris occasione profectum est, hoc ad eum reverti?) : quod autem ex alia causa sibi filiusfamilias adquisivit, hujus usumfructum quidem patri adquirat, dominium autem apud eum remaneat, ne, quod ei suis laboribus vel prospera fortuna accessit, hoc in alium perveniens, luctuosum ei procedat.

1. Formerly, all that your children under your power of either sex acquired, excepting castrensia pecunia, was without distinction acquired for the benefit of their ascendants; so much so, that the paterfamilias who had thus acquired anything through one of his children, could give or sell, or transfer it in any way he pleased to another child or to a stranger. This appeared to us very harsh, and by a general constitution we have relieved the children, and yet reserved for the ascendants all that was due to them. We have declared that all which the filiusfamilias obtains by means of the fortune of the father, shall, according to the old law, be acquired entirely for the father's benefit: for what hardship is there in that which comes from the father returning to him? But of everything that the filiusfamilias acquires in any other way, he shall acquire the usufruct for the father, but the son shall retain the ownership, so that the son may not have the mortification of seeing that becoming the property of another, which he himself has gained by his labour or good fortune.

GAI. ii. 87; C. vi. 61. 6.

The filiusfamilias could not, in the strict law of Rome, have any property of his own. Sometimes, however, the father permitted the son to have what was called a peculium, that is, a certain amount of property placed under his exclusive control. This peculium remained in law the property of the father, but the son had the disposition and management of it by his father's permission, and as long as it remained in the son's possession it was, as far as regarded third persons, exactly like property really belonging to the son only, that is, they could sue and recover from him to the extent of his peculium. (See Tit. 12. pr. of this Book.) In the early times of the Empire a filiusfamilias came to have, under the name of castrense peculium, property quite independent of his father. This castrense peculium consisted of all that was given to a son when setting out upon military service, or acquired while that service lasted. (D. xlix. 17. 1.) This belonged to the son as completely as if he had been sui juris, and he had full power of disposing of it either during his lifetime or by testament. Filiifamilias in castrensi peculio vice patrumfamiliarum funguntur. (D. xiv. 6. 2.) If, however, he did not choose to exercise his power of disposing of it by testament, his father took it at his death, not as succeeding to it ab intestato, but as the claimant of a peculium. (See Tit. 12. pr.) A further benefit was extended to the filiusfamilias by the institution of the quasi-castrense peculium, a privilege given to certain civil functionaries, corresponding to that given by the castrense peculium to soldiers. Constantine, by a constitution (C. xii. 31), placed on the footing of the castrense peculium things which a filiusfamilias, who was an officer of the palace, received from the emperor or gained by his own economy. The same advantage was subsequently extended to many other functionaries, as well as to advocates and certain ecclesiastical dignitaries. The quasi-castrense peculium must have existed in the time of Ulpian (D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 6; xxxix. 5. 7. 6), unless the passages in the Digest in which he alludes to it are interpolated, but under what form it then existed we do not know. In one respect it slightly differed from the castrense peculium; for the power of disposing of it by testament did not always accompany it, but was only given to the more privileged classes of those who were allowed to have such a peculium. Justinian, however, altered this, and gave the power profectum est, hoc ad eum reverti?) : quod autem ex alia causa sibi filiusfamilias adquisivit, hujus usumfructum quidem patri adquirat, dominium autem apud eum remaneat, ne, quod ei suis laboribus vel prospera fortuna accessit, hoc in alium perveniens, luctuosum ei procedat.

the father returning to him? But of everything that the filiusfamilias acquires in any other way, he shall acquire the usufruct for the father, but the son shall retain the ownership, so that the son may not have the mortification of seeing that becoming the property of another, which he himself has gained by his labour or good fortune.

GAI. ii. 87; C. vi. 61. 6.

The filiusfamilias could not, in the strict law of Rome, have any property of his own. Sometimes, however, the father permitted the son to have what was called a peculium, that is, a certain amount of property placed under his exclusive control. This peculium remained in law the property of the father, but the son had the disposition and management of it by his father's permission, and as long as it remained in the son's possession it was, as far as regarded third persons, exactly like property really belonging to the son only, that is, they could sue and recover from him to the extent of his peculium. (See Tit. 12. pr. of this Book.) In the early times of the Empire a filiusfamilias came to have, under the name of castrense peculium, property quite independent of his father. This castrense peculium consisted of all that was given to a son when setting out upon military service, or acquired while that service lasted. (D. xlix. 17. 1.) This belonged to the son as completely as if he had been sui juris, and he had full power of disposing of it either during his lifetime or by testament. Filiifamilias in castrensi peculio vice patrumfamiliarum funguntur. (D. xiv. 6. 2.) If, however, he did not choose to exercise his power of disposing of it by testament, his father took it at his death, not as succeeding to it ab intestato, but as the claimant of a peculium. (See Tit. 12. pr.) A further benefit was extended to the filiusfamilias by the institution of the quasi-castrense peculium, a privilege given to certain civil functionaries, corresponding to that given by the castrense peculium to soldiers. Constantine, by a constitution (C. xii. 31), placed on the footing of the castrense peculium things which a filiusfamilias, who was an officer of the palace, received from the emperor or gained by his own economy. The same advantage was subsequently extended to many other functionaries, as well as to advocates and certain ecclesiastical dignitaries. The quasi-castrense peculium must have existed in the time of Ulpian (D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 6; xxxix. 5. 7. 6), unless the passages in the Digest in which he alludes to it are interpolated, but under what form it then existed we do not know. In one respect it slightly differed from the castrense peculium; for the power of disposing of it by testament did not always accompany it, but was only given to the more privileged classes of those who were allowed to have such a peculium. Justinian, however, altered this, and gave the power of disposing of it by testament to every one who had a quasi-castrense peculium. (See Tit. 11. 6.) Constantine also introduced another kind of peculium, termed the peculium adventitium. This consisted of everything received by a filiusfamilias from his mother at her death, whether by testament or not. (C. vi. 60. 1.) Subsequent emperors included in it all received by succession or as a gift inter vivos from maternal ascendants (C. vi. 60. 2), or by one of two married persons from the other (C. vi. 61. 1); and Justinian, as we learn from the text, included under the peculium adventitium all that came to the son from any other source than from the father himself. The father had the usufruct of the peculium adventitium, and it was only the ownership that was held by the son. The peculium which came to the son as part of the father's property, and which continued to belong to the father, has been termed by commentators profectitium, because it comes (proficiscitur) from the father.

The peculium in the time of Justinian, therefore, if profectitium, belonged to the father; in all other cases it belonged to the son; but the father had the usufruct of the peculium adventitium, while the son had as full power over the castrense or quasi-castrense peculium as if he had been sui juris.

2. Hocque a nobis dispositum est et in ea specie, ubi parens emancipando liberum ex rebus, quæ acquisitionem effugiunt, sibi partem tertiam retinere, si voluerat, licentiam ex anterioribus constitutionibus habebat, quasi pro pretio quodammodo emancipationis, et inhumanum quiddam accidebat, ut filius rerum suarum ex hac emancipatione dominio pro parte defraudetur et, quod honoris ei ex emancipatione additum est, quod sui juris effectus est, hoc per rerum diminutionem decrescat. Ideoque statuimus, ut parens pro tertia bonorum parte dominii, quam retinere poterat, dimidiam non dominii rerum, sed ususfructus retineat: ita etenim et res intactæ apud filium remanebunt et pater ampliore summa fruetur, pro tertia dimidia potiturus.

2. We have also made some regulations with respect to the power which under former constitutions a father had, when emancipating his children, of deducting a third part from the things over which he had no right of acquisition, as if this was the price of the emancipation. It seemed very hard that the son should thus be deprived by emancipation of a third part of his property, and that what he gained in honour by being emancipated, as being thus made sui juris, should be impaired by a diminution of his property. We have therefore enacted that the father, instead of retaining a third as owner, shall retain half not as owner but as usufructuary. Thus the ownership in the whole will remain with the son unimpaired, while the father will enjoy the benefits of a larger portion, the half, namely, instead of the third.

C. vi. 61. 6. 3.

The usufruct of the father over things, the ownership of which, as part of the peculium adventitium, belonged to the son, would be lost by emancipation. It was as an equivalent for this that the property in one-third of these things was given to the father on emancipation. Justinian substitutes the usufruct of one-half for the ownership of one-third.

3. Item vobis adquiritur, quod servi vestri ex traditione nanciscun-

3. So, too, all that your slaves acquire by tradition, or stipulation, or all that had been taken in

of disposing of it by testament to every one who had a quasi-castrense peculium. (See Tit. 11. 6.) Constantine also introduced another kind of peculium, termed the peculium adventitium. This consisted of everything received by a filiusfamilias from his mother at her death, whether by testament or not. (C. vi. 60. 1.) Subsequent emperors included in it all received by succession or as a gift inter vivos from maternal ascendants (C. vi. 60. 2), or by one of two married persons from the other (C. vi. 61. 1); and Justinian, as we learn from the text, included under the peculium adventitium all that came to the son from any other source than from the father himself. The father had the usufruct of the peculium adventitium, and it was only the ownership that was held by the son. The peculium which came to the son as part of the father's property, and which continued to belong to the father, has been termed by commentators profectitium, because it comes (proficiscitur) from the father.

The peculium in the time of Justinian, therefore, if profectitium, belonged to the father; in all other cases it belonged to the son; but the father had the usufruct of the peculium adventitium, while the son had as full power over the castrense or quasi-castrense peculium as if he had been sui juris.

2. Hocque a nobis dispositum est et in ea specie, ubi parens emancipando liberum ex rebus, quæ acquisitionem effugiunt, sibi partem tertiam retinere, si voluerat, licentiam ex anterioribus constitutionibus habebat, quasi pro pretio quodammodo emancipationis, et inhumanum quiddam accidebat, ut filius rerum suarum ex hac emancipatione dominio pro parte defraudetur et, quod honoris ei ex emancipatione additum est, quod sui juris effectus est, hoc per rerum diminutionem decrescat. Ideoque statuimus, ut parens pro tertia bonorum parte dominii, quam retinere poterat, dimidiam non dominii rerum, sed ususfructus retineat: ita etenim et res intactæ apud filium remanebunt et pater ampliore summa fruetur, pro tertia dimidia potiturus.

2. We have also made some regulations with respect to the power which under former constitutions a father had, when emancipating his children, of deducting a third part from the things over which he had no right of acquisition, as if this was the price of the emancipation. It seemed very hard that the son should thus be deprived by emancipation of a third part of his property, and that what he gained in honour by being emancipated, as being thus made sui juris, should be impaired by a diminution of his property. We have therefore enacted that the father, instead of retaining a third as owner, shall retain half not as owner but as usufructuary. Thus the ownership in the whole will remain with the son unimpaired, while the father will enjoy the benefits of a larger portion, the half, namely, instead of the third.

C. vi. 61. 6. 3.

The usufruct of the father over things, the ownership of which, as part of the peculium adventitium, belonged to the son, would be lost by emancipation. It was as an equivalent for this that the property in one-third of these things was given to the father on emancipation. Justinian substitutes the usufruct of one-half for the ownership of one-third.

3. Item vobis adquiritur, quod servi vestri ex traditione nanciscun-

3. So, too, all that your slaves acquire by tradition, or stipulation, or all that had been taken in

tur, sive quid stipulentur vel ex qua-libet alia causa adquirunt. Hoc enim vobis et ignorantibus et invitis obvenit. Ipse enim servus, qui in potestate alterius est, nihil suum habere potest. Sed si heres insti-tutus sit, non alias nisi jussu vestro hereditatem adire potest: et si jumentibus vobis adierit, vobis here-ditas acquiritur, perinde ac si vos ipsi heredes instituti essetis. Et convenienter scilicet legatum per eos vobis acquiritur. Non solum autem proprietates per eos, quos in potestate habetis, acquiritur vobis,
sed etiam possessio: cujuscumque
enim rei possessionem adepti fuerint, id vos possidere videmini. Unde
etiam per eos usucapio vel longi temporis possessio vobis accedit.

in any other way, is acquired for you ;
and that even without your knowledge and against your wishes. For the slave being in the power of another cannot himself have anything as his own. And if he is instituted heir, he cannot enter on the inheritance except by your direction. And if he enters by your direction, you acquire the inheritance exactly as if you had yourselves been instituted heirs. Legacies, again, are equally acquired for you by your slaves. And it is not only the ownership which is acquired for you by those whom you have in your power, but also the possession. Everything of which they have obtained possession you are considered to possess, and consequently usucapion or possession longi temporis operates for you through them.

GAI. ii. 87. 89.

P All that the slave had belonged to his master; and this rule was subject to no exceptions such as those introduced for the benefit of the filiusfamilias. The slave's peculium was always at the disposition of his master, and it made no difference what was the mode in which he acquired: he acquired it for his master even though his master had not consented or even known of the acquisition. Therefore, if the slave received anything in pursuance of a stipulation (sive quid stipulentur), he acquired it for his master, although he could not bind his master by promising anything to a person who stipulated for anything from him. The slave could not make his master's condition worse; and as an inheritance might be more onerous than lucrative, for the debts of the deceased, which the heir was bound to pay, might exceed the value of his property, a slave was not permitted to accept an inheritance, except by his master's express command. A legacy, on the other hand, could not be otherwise than advantageous, and therefore a legacy given to a slave immediately belonged to his master. There was a minor difference between the institution of a slave as heir, and a gift to him of a legacy, which deserves mention. The right to a legacy dated from the death of the deceased; the right to an inheritance dated from the time of entering on an inheritance. The slave, therefore, acquired a legacy for the benefit of the master to whom he belonged at the time when the deceased died; but a slave instituted heir, acquired for the master to whom he belonged at the time of entering on the inheritance. If, therefore, the slave changed masters or became free between these times, he acquired a legacy for his former master, but took an inheritance for his new master, or, if free, for himself.

The physical fact of possession might be accomplished through

tur, sive quid stipulentur vel ex qua-libet alia causa adquirunt. Hoc enim vobis et ignorantibus et invitis obvenit. Ipse enim servus, qui in potestate alterius est, nihil suum
habere potest. Sed si heres insti-tutus sit, non alias nisi jussu vestro
hereditatem adire potest: et si
jumentibus vobis adierit, vobis here-
ditas acquiritur, perinde ac si vos ipsi heredes instituti essetis. Et convenienter scilicet legatum per eos vobis acquiritur. Non solum autem proprietates per eos, quos in potestate habetis, acquiritur vobis,
sed etiam possessio: cujuscumque
enim rei possessionem adepti fuerint,
id vos possidere videmini. Unde
etiam per eos usucapio vel longi
temporis possessio vobis accedit.

in any other way, is acquired for you ;
and that even without your knowledge
and against your wishes. For the slave being in the power of another cannot himself have anything as his own. And if he is instituted heir, he cannot enter on the inheritance except by your direction. And if he enters by your direction, you acquire the inheritance exactly as if you had yourselves been instituted heirs. Legacies, again, are equally acquired for you by your slaves. And it is not only the ownership which is acquired for you
by those whom you have in your power, but also the possession. Everything of which they have obtained possession you are considered to possess, and consequently usucapion or possession longi temporis operates for you through them.

GAL. ii. 87. 89.

P All that the slave had belonged to his master; and this rule was subject to no exceptions such as those introduced for the benefit of the filiusfamilias. The slave's peculium was always at the disposition of his master, and it made no difference what was the mode in which he acquired: he acquired it for his master even though his master had not consented or even known of the acquisition. Therefore, if the slave received anything in pursuance of a stipulation (sive quid stipulentur), he acquired it for his master, although he could not bind his master by promising anything to a person who stipulated for anything from him. The slave could not make his master's condition worse; and as an inheritance might be more onerous than lucrative, for the debts of the deceased, which the heir was bound to pay, might exceed the value of his property, a slave was not permitted to accept an inheritance, except by his master's express command. A legacy, on the other hand, could not be otherwise than advantageous, and therefore a legacy given to a slave immediately belonged to his master. There was a minor difference between the institution of a slave as heir, and a gift to him of a legacy, which deserves mention. The right to a legacy dated from the death of the deceased; the right to an inheritance dated from the time of entering on an inheritance. The slave, therefore, acquired a legacy for the benefit of the master to whom he belonged at the time when the deceased died; but a slave instituted heir, acquired for the master to whom he belonged at the time of entering on the inheritance. If, therefore, the slave changed masters or became free between these times, he acquired a legacy for his former master, but took an inheritance for his new master, or, if free, for himself.

The physical fact of possession might be accomplished through a slave, but not the intention, which was requisite for legal possession. It was necessary that the master should have the intention of treating the thing possessed by the slave as if he himself was the owner. Animo nostro, says Paul, corpore etiam alieno, possidemus. (D. xli. 2. 3. 12.) The master could not, therefore, acquire through the slave legal possession, as opposed to mere detention, without his knowledge and consent, as he could acquire ownership; except, indeed, when the slave possessed a thing as part of his peculium, for then the permission to have a peculium was considered as indicating a general intention on the part of the master applying to, and completing, legal possession in everything acquired as part of the peculium. (D. xli. 2. 1. 5.)

All that is said here of the slave may, with the necessary exceptions as to the peculia castrensia, quasi-castrensia, and adventitia, be said of the filiusfamilias, who equally stipulated for his father's benefit, could not make his father's position worse, took inheritances only under his father's direction, received legacies for his father's benefit, and possessed physically, but needed his father's animus possidendi.

4. De his autem servis, in quibus tantum usumfructum habetis, ita placuit, ut, quidquid ex re vestra vel ex operibus suis adquirant, id vobis adiciatur, quod vero extra eas causas persecuti sunt, id ad dominum proprietatis pertineat. Itaque si is servus heres institutus sit legatumve quid ei aut donatum fuerit, non usufructuario, sed domino proprietatis adquiritur. Idem placet et de eo, qui a vobis bona fide possidetur, sive is liber sit sive alienus servus; quod enim placuit de usufructuario, idem placet et de bona fide possessore. Itaque quod extra duas istas causas adquiritur, id vel ad ipsum pertinet, si liber est, vel ad dominum, si servus est. Sed bonæ fidei possessor cum usuceperit servum, quia eo modo dominus fit, ex omnibus causis per eum sibi adquirere potest: fructuarius vero usucapere non potest, primum quia non possidet, sed habet jus utendifruendi, deinde quia scit, servum alienum esse. Non solum autem proprietates per eos servos, in quibus usumfructum habetis vel quos bona fide possidetis, vel per liberam personam, quæ bona fide vobis servit, adquiritur vobis, sed etiam possessio: loquimur autem in utriusque persona secundum definitionem, quam proxime exposuimus, id est si quam possessionem ex re vestra vel ex operibus suis adepti fuerint.

4. As to slaves of whom you have only the usufruct, it has been decided that whatever they acquire by means of anything belonging to you, or by their own labour, shall belong to you; but that all they acquire from any other source shall belong to the owner. So if a slave is made heir, or anything is given him as a legacy or gift, it is the owner, not the usufructuary, who receives the benefit of the acquisition. It is the same with regard to any one whom you possess bona fide, whether a freeman or the slave of another person (for the rule with regard to the usufructuary holds good with regard to the bona fide possessor); and so everything the person possessed acquires, except from one of the two sources above mentioned, belongs to himself if he is a freeman, and to his master if he is a slave. When the bona fide possessor has gained the property in the slave by usucapion, he, of course, becomes the owner, and all that the slave acquires is acquired for him. But the usufructuary cannot acquire a slave by use: first, because he has not the possession, but only the right of usufruct; and secondly, because he knows that the slave belongs to another. It is not only the ownership that is acquired for you by the slaves of whom you have the usufruct, or whom you possess bona fide, or by a free person whom you employ as your slave bona fide; you acquire also the

a slave, but not the intention, which was requisite for legal possession. It was necessary that the master should have the intention of treating the thing possessed by the slave as if he himself was the owner. Animo nostro, says Paul, corpore etiam alieno, possidemus. (D. xli. 2. 3. 12.) The master could not, therefore, acquire through the slave legal possession, as opposed to mere detention, without his knowledge and consent, as he could acquire ownership; except, indeed, when the slave possessed a thing as part of his peculium, for then the permission to have a peculium was considered as indicating a general intention on the part of the master applying to, and completing, legal possession in everything acquired as part of the peculium. (D. xli. 2. 1. 5.)

All that is said here of the slave may, with the necessary exceptions as to the peculia castrensia, quasi-castrensia, and adventitia, be said of the filiusfamilias, who equally stipulated for his father's benefit, could not make his father's position worse, took inheritances only under his father's direction, received legacies for his father's benefit, and possessed physically, but needed his father's animus possidendi.

4. De his autem servis, in quibus tantum usufructum habetis, ita placuit, ut, quicquid ex re vestra vel ex operibus suis adquirant, id vobis adiciatur, quod vero extra eas causas persecuti sunt, id ad dominum proprietatis pertineat. Itaque si is servus heres institutus sit legatumve quid ei aut donatum fuerit, non usufructuario, sed domino proprietatis acquiritur. Idem placet et de eo, qui a vobis bona fide possidetur, sive is liber sit sive alienus servus; quod enim placuit de usufructuario, idem placet et de bona fide possessore. Itaque quod extra duas istas causas acquiritur, id vel ad ipsum pertinet, si liber est, vel ad dominum, si servus est. Sed bonæ fidei possessor cum usuceperit servum, quia eo modo dominus fit, ex omnibus causis per eum sibi adquirere potest: fructuarius vero usucapere non potest, primum quia non possidet, sed habet jus utendifruendi, deinde quia scit, servum alienum esse. Non solum autem proprietates per eos servos, in quibus usufructum habetis vel quos bona fide possidetis, vel per liberam personam, quæ bona fide vobis servit, acquiritur vobis, sed etiam possessio: loquimur autem in utriusque persona secundum definitionem, quam proxime exposuimus, id est si quam possessionem ex re vestra vel ex operibus suis adepti fuerint.

4. As to slaves of whom you have only the usufruct, it has been decided that whatever they acquire by means of anything belonging to you, or by their own labour, shall belong to you; but that all they acquire from any other source shall belong to the owner. So if a slave is made heir, or anything is given him as a legacy or gift, it is the owner, not the usufructuary, who receives the benefit of the acquisition. It is the same with regard to any one whom you possess bona fide, whether a freeman or the slave of another person (for the rule with regard to the usufructuary holds good with regard to the bona fide possessor); and so everything the person possessed acquires, except from one of the two sources above mentioned, belongs to himself if he is a freeman, and to his master if he is a slave. When the bona fide possessor has gained the property in the slave by usucapion, he, of course, becomes the owner, and all that the slave acquires is acquired for him. But the usufructuary cannot acquire a slave by use: first, because he has not the possession, but only the right of usufruct; and secondly, because he knows that the slave belongs to another. It is not only the ownership that is acquired for you by the slaves of whom you have the usufruct, or whom you possess bona fide, or by a free person whom you employ as your slave bona fide; you acquire also the possession. But in saying this we must be understood, with regard to both slaves and freemen, to adhere to the distinction laid down previously, and to refer only to the possession they have obtained by means of something belonging to you, or by their own labour.

GAL. ii. 91-94.

The usufructuary was entitled to the fruits of the slave, that is, to his services, and to the profits derived from letting out his services to others; but what the slave acquired by stipulation, gift, legacy, or similar means, was no part of the fruits, and therefore did not belong to the usufructuary. If the means of acquisition were derived from the usufructuary, as, for instance, if the slave acquired by parting with any of the produce, then the case would be different.

What is true of the usufructuary is true also of a bona fide possessor either of the slave of another, or of a person in fact free, but honestly believed to be a slave. And the bona fide possessor has the advantage over the usufructuary pointed out in the text, that as he has the possession, which no usufructuary can have, for no usufructuary intends to treat the thing as if he were the owner, this possession may, if continued long enough, give the rights of usucapion over a moveable, or of possessio longi temporis over an immoveable.

5. Ex his itaque apparet, per liberos homines, quos neque vestro juri subjectos habetis neque bona fide possidetis, item per alienos servos, in quibus neque usumfructum habetis neque justam possessionem, nulla ex causa vobis adquiri posse. Et hoc est, quod dicitur, per extraneam personam nihil adquiri posse: excepto eo, quod per liberam personam veluti per procuratorem placet non solum scientibus, sed etiam ignorantibus vobis adquiri possessionem secundum divi Severi constitutionem et per hanc possessionem etiam dominium, si dominus fuit, qui tradidit, vel per usucapionem aut longi temporis prescriptionem, si dominus non sit.

5. Hence it appears that you cannot acquire by means of free persons, not in your power, or possessed by you bona fide; nor by the slave of another, of whom you have neither the usufruct nor the lawful possession. And this is meant, when it is said, that nothing can be acquired by means of a stranger; except, indeed, that according to the constitution of the Emperor Severus, possession may be acquired for you by a free person, as by a procurator, not only with, but even without, your knowledge; and by this possession you acquire the property, if it was the owner who delivered the thing, or by usucapion, or prescription longi temporis, if it was not.

GAL. ii. 95; C. iv. 27. 1; D. xli. 1. 20. 2; C. vii. 32. 1.

The rule of the older law was that no person could be represented per extraneam personam, i.e. by a person who was not under his power, in any of those acts which were regulated by the civil law. Thus, no one could acquire the ownership of a thing for another; if he received anything, as, for instance, by mancipation or in jure cessio, although he received it expressly for another, still this other person did not thereby acquire the property in the thing. But a mere natural fact such as that of possession possession. But in saying this we must be understood, with regard to both slaves and freemen, to adhere to the distinction laid down previously, and to refer only to the possession they have obtained by means of something belonging to you, or by their own labour.

GAL. ii. 91-94.

The usufructuary was entitled to the fruits of the slave, that is, to his services, and to the profits derived from letting out his services to others; but what the slave acquired by stipulation, gift, legacy, or similar means, was no part of the fruits, and therefore did not belong to the usufructuary. If the means of acquisition were derived from the usufructuary, as, for instance, if the slave acquired by parting with any of the produce, then the case would be different.

What is true of the usufructuary is true also of a bona fide possessor either of the slave of another, or of a person in fact free, but honestly believed to be a slave. And the bona fide possessor has the advantage over the usufructuary pointed out in the text, that as he has the possession, which no usufructuary can have, for no usufructuary intends to treat the thing as if he were the owner, this possession may, if continued long enough, give the rights of usucapion over a moveable, or of possessio longi temporis over an immoveable.

5. Ex his itaque apparet, per liberos homines, quos neque vestro juri subjectos habetis neque bona fide possidetis, item per alienos servos, in quibus neque usumfructum habetis neque justam possessionem, nulla ex causa vobis adquiri posse. Et hoc est, quod dicitur, per extraneam personam nihil adquiri posse: excepto eo, quod per liberam personam veluti per procuratorem placet non solum scientibus, sed etiam ignorantibus vobis adquiri possessionem secundum divi Severi constitutionem et per hanc possessionem etiam dominium, si dominus fuit, qui tradidit, vel per usucapionem aut longi temporis præscriptionem, si dominus non sit.

5. Hence it appears that you cannot acquire by means of free persons, not in your power, or possessed by you bona fide; nor by the slave of another, of whom you have neither the usufruct nor the lawful possession. And this is meant, when it is said, that nothing can be acquired by means of a stranger; except, indeed, that according to the constitution of the Emperor Severus, possession may be acquired for you by a free person, as by a procurator, not only with, but even without, your knowledge; and by this possession you acquire the property, if it was the owner who delivered the thing, or by usucapion or prescription longi temporis, if it was not.

GAL. ii. 95; C. iv. 27. 1; D. xli. 1. 20. 2; C. vii. 32. 1.

The rule of the older law was that no person could be represented per extraneam personam, i.e. by a person who was not under his power, in any of those acts which were regulated by the civil law. Thus, no one could acquire the ownership of a thing for another; if he received anything, as, for instance, by mancipation or in jure cessio, although he received it expressly for another, still this other person did not thereby acquire the property in the thing. But a mere natural fact such as that of possession could take place for the benefit of one person through another person, if the person for whose benefit the thing was possessed had but the intention of profiting by it, and then this possession might lead through usucapion to ownership. If, however, a person was charged with the management of the affairs of another, he could exercise an intention of possessing for the benefit of the person for whom he acted, which a mere stranger could not; and thus it was possible non solum scientibus sed etiam ignorantibus, i.e. for persons who did not know even of the fact of possession, to acquire legal possession through an agent. But, though the text would be likely to mislead us, we learn from a constitution of Severus and Antoninus (C. vii. 32. 1), which does not appear to have made any great change in the law, that usucapion did not commence until the person, for whose benefit the thing was possessed, knew of the possession. If the procurator received possession from a person who was the owner, then it was not a question of getting ownership by usucapion, and the ownership immediately passed to the person for whom the procurator was acting, even though this person did not know of what was done. Si procurator rem mihi emerit ex mandato meo eique sit tradita meo nomine, dominium mihi, id est proprietas, adquiritur etiam ignorantibus. (D. xli. 1. 13.)

6. Hactenus tantisper admonuisse sufficiat, quemadmodum singulæ res adquiruntur: nam legatorum jus, quo et ipso singulæ res vobis adquiruntur, item fideicommissorum, ubi singulæ res vobis relinquuntur, opportunius inferiori loco referemus. Videamus itaque nunc, quibus modis per universitatem res vobis adquiruntur. Si cui ergo heredes facti sitis sive ejus bonorum possessionem petieritis vel si quem adrogaveritis vel si ejus bona libertatum conservandarum causa vobis addicta fuerint, ejus res omnes ad vos transeunt. Ac prius de hereditatibus dispiciamus. Quarum duplex condicio est: nam vel ex testamento vel ab intestato ad vos pertinent. Et prius est, ut de his dispiciamus, quæ vobis ex testamento obveniunt. Quæ in re necessarium est, initio de ordinandis testamentis exponere.

6. What we have said respecting the modes of the acquisition of particular things, may suffice for the present. For we shall speak more conveniently hereafter of the law of legacies, by which also you acquire property in particular things, and of fideicommissa, by which particular things are left to you. Let us now speak of the modes of acquiring per universitatem. If you are made heir, or claim possession of the goods of any one, or arrogate any one, or goods are adjudged to you in order to preserve the liberty of slaves, in these cases all that belonged to such person passes to you. First let us treat of inheritances, which may be divided into two kinds, according as they come to you by testament or ab intestato. We will begin with those which come to you by testament; and for this it is necessary in the first place to explain the formalities requisite in making testaments.

GAL. II. 97-100.

We now pass to the acquisition of a universitas rerum, to the cases in which one man succeeded to the persona of another, and acquired in a mass all his goods and all his rights and duties. (See Introd. sec. 74.)

could take place for the benefit of one person through another person, if the person for whose benefit the thing was possessed had but the intention of profiting by it, and then this possession might lead through usucapion to ownership. If, however, a person was charged with the management of the affairs of another, he could exercise an intention of possessing for the benefit of the person for whom he acted, which a mere stranger could not; and thus it was possible non solum scientibus sed etiam ignorantibus, i.e. for persons who did not know even of the fact of possession, to acquire legal possession through an agent. But, though the text would be likely to mislead us, we learn from a constitution of Severus and Antoninus (C. vii. 32. 1), which does not appear to have made any great change in the law, that usucapion did not commence until the person, for whose benefit the thing was possessed, knew of the possession. If the procurator received possession from a person who was the owner, then it was not a question of getting ownership by usucapion, and the ownership immediately passed to the person for whom the procurator was acting, even though this person did not know of what was done. Si procurator rem mihi emerit ex mandato meo eique sit tradita meo nomine, dominium mihi, id est proprietas, adquiritur etiam ignorantibus. (D. xli. 1. 13.)

6. Hactenus tantisper admonuisse sufficiat, quemadmodum singulæ res adquiruntur: nam legatorum jus, quo et ipso singulæ res vobis adquiruntur, item fideicommissorum, ubi singulæ res vobis relinquuntur, opportunius inferiori loco referemus. Videamus itaque nunc, quibus modis per universitatem res vobis adquiruntur. Si cui ergo heredes facti sitis sive ejus bonorum possessionem petieritis vel si quem adrogaveritis vel si ejus bona libertatum conservandarum causa vobis addicta fuerint, ejus res omnes ad vos transeunt. Ac prius de hereditatibus dispiciamus. Quarum duplex condicio est: nam vel ex testamento vel ab intestato ad vos pertinent. Et prius est, ut de his dispiciamus, quæ vobis ex testamento obveniunt. Quæ in re necessarium est, initio de ordinandis testamentis exponere.

6. What we have said respecting the modes of the acquisition of particular things, may suffice for the present. For we shall speak more conveniently hereafter of the law of legacies, by which also you acquire property in particular things, and of fideicommissa, by which particular things are left to you. Let us now speak of the modes of acquiring per universitatem. If you are made heir, or claim possession of the goods of any one, or arrogate any one, or goods are adjudged to you in order to preserve the liberty of slaves, in these cases all that belonged to such person passes to you. First let us treat of inheritances, which may be divided into two kinds, according as they come to you by testament or ab intestato. We will begin with those which come to you by testament; and for this it is necessary in the first place to explain the formalities requisite in making testaments.

GAL. II. 97-100.

We now pass to the acquisition of a universitas rerum, to the cases in which one man succeeded to the persona of another, and acquired in a mass all his goods and all his rights and duties. (See Introd. sec. 74.)

TIT. X. DE TESTAMENTIS ORDINANDIS.

Testamentum ex eo appellatur,
quod testatio mentis est.

The word testament is derived from testatio mentis; it testifies the determination of the mind.

D. xxviii. 1. 1.

With respect to this derivation it is scarcely necessary to say that -mentum is merely a termination, and not derived from mens. Ulpian (Reg. 20. 1) gives as a definition of a testament, mentis nostrae justa contestatio, in id solemniter facta, ut post mortem nostram valeat; and Modestinus (D. xxviii. 1. 1) gives volutatis nostrae justa sententia de eo quod quis post mortem suam fieri vult; the word justa implying in each, that, in order to be valid, the testament must be made in compliance with the forms of law.

Forms of Testaments.
1. calata comitiis a Procinctum, per aem et libram
Procinctum, per aem et libram

1. Sed ut nihil antiquitatis penitus ignoretur, sciendum est, olim quidem duo genera testamentorum in usu fuisse, quorum altero in pace et in otio utebantur, quod calatis comitiis appellabatur, altero, cum in praelium exhuri essent, quod procinctum dicebatur. Accessit deinde tertium genus testamentorum, quod dicebatur per aem et libram, scilicet quia per emancipationem, id est imaginariam quandam venditionem, agebatur, quinque testibus et libripense, civibus Romanis puberibus, presentibus et eo, qui familiae emptor dicebatur. Sed illa quidem priora duo genera testamentorum ex veteribus temporibus in desuetudinem abierunt: quod vero per aem et libram fiebat, licet diutius permansit, attamen partim et hoc in usu esse desiit.

1. That nothing belonging to antiquity may be altogether unknown, it is necessary to observe, that formerly there were two kinds of testaments in use: the one was employed in times of peace, and was named calatis comitiis; the other was employed at the moment of setting out to battle, and was termed procinctum. A third species was afterwards added, called per aem et libram, being effected by mancipation, that is, an imaginary sale in the presence of five witnesses and the libripens, all citizens of Rome, above the age of puberty, together with him who was called the emptor familiae. The two former kinds of testaments fell into disuse even in ancient times; and that made per aem et libram also, although it has continued longer in practice, has now in part ceased to be made use of.

GAI. II. 101-104.

When the head of a family died, the law in ancient times determined on whom his persona, that is, the aggregate of his political and social rights and duties, should devolve. But we cannot say that there was any definite period of Roman history when a man could not make a will. Originally, as we learn from the text, which is borrowed from Gaius, testaments were made in the comitia calata, or in procinctu. By calata comitia is meant the comitia curiata summoned (calata) for the despatch of what we may term private business. This took place twice a year. We do not know how far it was open to any one at the meeting to oppose a testament, or whether the comitia merely registered the testaments declared in their presence. Subsequently the mode of making testaments per aem et libram, that is, by a fictitious sale, was introduced, and both this mode and that of declaration before the comitia curiata

TIT. X. DE TESTAMENTIS ORDINANDIS.

Testamentum ex eo appellatur,
quod testatio mentis est.

The word testament is derived from testatio mentis; it testifies the determination of the mind.

D. xxviii. 1. 1.

With respect to this derivation it is scarcely necessary to say that -mentum is merely a termination, and not derived from mens. Ulpian (Reg. 20. 1.) gives as a definition of a testament, mentis nostrae justa contestatio, in id solemniter facta, ut post mortem nostram valeat; and Modestinus (D. xxviii. 1. 1.) gives voluntatis nostrae justa sententia de eo quod quis post mortem suam fieri vult; the word justa implying in each, that, in order to be valid, the testament must be made in compliance with the forms of law.

Forms of Testament, in Latin Comitia a Procinctus, per æs et libram, et de liberis
in antiquis testibus

1. Sed ut nihil antiquitatis penitus ignoretur, sciendum est, olim quidem duo genera testamentorum in usu fuisse, quorum altero in pace et in otio utebantur, quod calatis comitiis appellabatur, altero, cum in prelium exituri essent, quod procinctum dicebatur. Accessit deinde tertium genus testamentorum, quod dicebatur per æs et libram, scilicet quia per emancipationem, id est imaginariam quandam venditionem, agebatur, quinque testibus et libripende, civibus Romanis puberibus, presentibus et eo, qui familiæ emptor dicebatur. Sed illa quidem priora duo genera testamentorum ex veteribus temporibus in desuetudinem abierunt: quod vero per æs et libram fiebat, licet diutius permansit, attamen partim et hoc in usu esse desiit.

1. That nothing belonging to antiquity may be altogether unknown, it is necessary to observe, that formerly there were two kinds of testaments in use: the one was employed in times of peace, and was named calatis comitiis; the other was employed at the moment of setting out to battle, and was termed procinctum. A third species was afterwards added, called per æs et libram, being effected by mancipation, that is, an imaginary sale in the presence of five witnesses and the libripens, all citizens of Rome, above the age of puberty, together with him who was called the emptor familiæ. The two former kinds of testaments fell into disuse even in ancient times; and that made per æs et libram also, although it has continued longer in practice, has now in part ceased to be made use of.

GAII. II. 101-104.

A When the head of a family died, the law in ancient times determined on whom his persona, that is, the aggregate of his political and social rights and duties, should devolve. But we cannot say that there was any definite period of Roman history when a man could not make a will. Originally, as we learn from the text, which is borrowed from Gaius, testaments were made in the comitia calata, or in procinctu. By calata comitia is meant the comitia curiata summoned (calata) for the despatch of what we may term private business. This took place twice a year. We do not know how far it was open to any one at the meeting to oppose a testament, or whether the comitia merely registered the testaments declared in their presence. Subsequently the mode of making testaments per æs et libram, that is, by a fictitious sale, was introduced, and both this mode and that of declaration before the comitia curiata were used indifferently, nor is there any evidence to show that the one form was considered more appropriate to the patres than the other. Only members of the patrician gentes sat in the comitia curiata, but that is no reason why the plebeians should not have come before these comitia to declare their testaments. The Twelve Tables declared uti legassit super pecunia tutelave suae rei, ita jus esto, that is, every one's testamentary dispositions should be carried into effect, and the necessity for the provision may have arisen from some kind of tampering on the part of members of the comitia with the testaments of plebeians.

Procinctus properly means an army in marching and fighting order. Procinctus est expeditus et armatus exercitus (GAI. ii. 101). The testament is said to be procinctum, but properly it ought to be in procinctu factum. Cicero speaks (de Or. i. 53) of the testament in procinctu as then in use, and describes it as made sine libra et tabulis, that is, without the forms usual in the testamentum per aes et libram.

In the testamentum per aes et libram, the hereditas was sold by mancipatio to the purchaser. Originally the testator sold the inheritance to the person who was really to be the heir. The purchaser, as Gaius expresses it, heredis locum obtinebat, and the testator instructed him how he wished his property to be disposed of after his death. But as the sale was irrevocable, a testator might be very glad to escape from proclaiming an heir whose position he could not afterwards affect. The object was attained by selling the inheritance to a third person; and the familiae emptor came to be thus a mere stranger, who was only appointed dictis gratia, to go through the form of sale. (GAI. ii. 103.) The process of selling to this fictitious stranger is given at length in Gaius (ii. 104). The testator, having written out his will, summoned five witnesses, and a balance-holder (libripens), and then gave by mancipatio his inheritance to the purchaser. The purchaser, on receiving it, instead of using the ordinary form, pronounced these words, Familiam pecuniamque tuam endo mandatela tutela custodelaque mea recipio eaque quo tu jure testamentum facere secundum legem publicum hoc aere (or, as some added, aeneaque libra) esto mihi empti; he then, after striking the scale with it, gave the piece of copper to the testator as the price of the inheritance. The testator then produced the tablets on which his testament was written, and said, Haec ita, ut in his tabulis cerisque scripta sunt, ita do, ita lego, ita testor; itaque vos, Quirites, testimonium mihi perhibetote. This announcement of his wishes was termed nuncupatio. Nuncupare est palam nominare. (GAI. ib.) The term is properly applicable to the oral statement; but the expression of the testator's wishes was really considered as always made orally, as the announcement that the written documents contained a declaration of the testator's wishes was taken as a compendious mode of stating what those wishes were. (GAI. ib.)

were used indifferently, nor is there any evidence to show that the one form was considered more appropriate to the patres than the other. Only members of the patrician gentes sat in the comitia curiata, but that is no reason why the plebeians should not have come before these comitia to declare their testaments. The Twelve Tables declared uti legassit super pecunia tutelave suae rei, ita jus esto, that is, every one's testamentary dispositions should be carried into effect, and the necessity for the provision may have arisen from some kind of tampering on the part of members of the comitia with the testaments of plebeians.

Procinctus properly means an army in marching and fighting order. Procinctus est expeditus et armatus exercitus (GAI. ii. 101). The testament is said to be procinctum, but properly it ought to be in procinctu factum. Cicero speaks (de Or. i. 53) of the testament in procinctu as then in use, and describes it as made sine libra et tabulis, that is, without the forms usual in the testamentum per aes et libram.

In the testamentum per aes et libram, the hereditas was sold by mancipatio to the purchaser. Originally the testator sold the inheritance to the person who was really to be the heir. The purchaser, as Gaius expresses it, heredis locum obtinebat, and the testator instructed him how he wished his property to be disposed of after his death. But as the sale was irrevocable, a testator might be very glad to escape from proclaiming an heir whose position he could not afterwards affect. The object was attained by selling the inheritance to a third person; and the familiae emptor came to be thus a mere stranger, who was only appointed dictis gratia, to go through the form of sale. (GAI. ii. 103.) The process of selling to this fictitious stranger is given at length in Gaius (ii. 104). The testator, having written out his will, summoned five witnesses, and a balance-holder (libripens), and then gave by mancipatio his inheritance to the purchaser. The purchaser, on receiving it, instead of using the ordinary form, pronounced these words, Familiam pecuniamque tuam endo mandatela tutela custodelaque mea recipio eaque quo tu jure testamentum facere secundum legem publicum hoc aere (or, as some added, aeneaque libra) esto mihi empti; he then, after striking the scale with it, gave the piece of copper to the testator as the price of the inheritance. The testator then produced the tablets on which his testament was written, and said, Haec ita, ut in his tabulis cerisque scripta sunt, ita do, ita lego, ita testor; itaque vos, Quirites, testimonium mihi perhibetote. This announcement of his wishes was termed nuncupatio. Nuncupare est palam nominare. (GAI. ib.) The term is properly applicable to the oral statement; but the expression of the testator's wishes was really considered as always made orally, as the announcement that the written documents contained a declaration of the testator's wishes was taken as a compendious mode of stating what those wishes were. (GAI. ib.)

The concluding words of the paragraph, partim et hoc in usu esse desiit, refer to the change above mentioned from a sale to the real heir to a sale to a stranger. The sale became a mere matter of form, and the testament was that which the testator wrote. When the mode of making testaments by the calata comitia fell into disuse we do not know, but probably at an early time of the Republic. The imperial constitutions (see next Title) gave all soldiers the power of making a testament without observing the usual forms, and the testaments of soldiers under the Empire were valid, not as being made in procinctu, that is, by virtue of the army being regarded as an assembly of citizens, but by the power which was given to each soldier of making an informal testament. In what way they gave greater liberty to the soldier than the old power of making the will in procinctu we cannot say; but probably the making of the testament in procinctu was connected with the taking of the auspices, and thus was more liable to be declared informal.

2. Sed prædicta quidem nomina testamentorum ad jus civile referantur. Postea vero ex edicto prætoris alia forma faciendorum testamentorum introducta est: jure enim honorario nulla mancipatio desiderabatur, sed septem testium signa sufficiebant, cum jure civili signa testium non erant necessaria.

2. The kinds of testament which we have just mentioned belonged to the civil law, but afterwards another form of making testaments was introduced by the edict of the prætor. By the jus honorarium no sale was necessary, but the seals of seven witnesses were sufficient, whereas the seals of witnesses were not required by the civil law.

There was no necessity, as the text tells us, that a written will made in the old form per æs et libram should be sealed. After the prætorian form of making wills became usual, a senatus-consultum provided (as we learn from Paul, Sent. v. 25. 6) that a written testament should be made on tablets of wax. These tablets were held together at one margin with the wire, and in the opposite margin there was a perforation made through all the tablets, and through this was passed a triple linen thread, and then the tablets were covered with wax on the outside, and the witnesses placed their seal (that is, made a mark with their rings) on this external wax. It was also customary for them to write their names and to state whose will it was they had witnessed (D. xxviii. 1. 30), but this was not a necessary part of the form until made so by a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. vi. 23. 21.) This constitution also permitted a will to be made in a roll, which, if the testator wished to keep the terms secret, he might close and seal up, leaving the foot of the roll open, on which the witnesses were to put their seals and subscriptions. The testator was, under this constitution, to subscribe his name or get an eighth witness to subscribe it for him.

The prætor, as the text informs us, permitted an heir instituted in a testament to have the inheritance, even though the form of mancipation was not gone through. He could not,

The concluding words of the paragraph, partim et hoc in usu esse desiit, refer to the change above mentioned from a sale to the real heir to a sale to a stranger. The sale became a mere matter of form, and the testament was that which the testator wrote. When the mode of making testaments by the calata comitia fell into disuse we do not know, but probably at an early time of the Republic. The imperial constitutions (see next Title) gave all soldiers the power of making a testament without observing the usual forms, and the testaments of soldiers under the Empire were valid, not as being made in procinctu, that is, by virtue of the army being regarded as an assembly of citizens, but by the power which was given to each soldier of making an informal testament. In what way they gave greater liberty to the soldier than the old power of making the will in procinctu we cannot say; but probably the making of the testament in procinctu was connected with the taking of the auspices, and thus was more liable to be declared informal.

2. Sed prædicta quidem nomina testamentorum ad jus civile referantur. Postea vero ex edicto prætoris alia forma faciendorum testamentorum introducta est: jure enim honorario nulla mancipatio desiderabatur, sed septem testium signa sufficiebant, cum jure civili signa testium non erant necessaria.

2. The kinds of testament which we have just mentioned belonged to the civil law, but afterwards another form of making testaments was introduced by the edict of the prætor. By the jus honorarium no sale was necessary, but the seals of seven witnesses were sufficient, whereas the seals of witnesses were not required by the civil law.

There was no necessity, as the text tells us, that a written will made in the old form per æs et libram should be sealed. After the prætorian form of making wills became usual, a senatus-consultum provided (as we learn from Paul, Sent. v. 25. 6) that a written testament should be made on tablets of wax. These tablets were held together at one margin with the wire, and in the opposite margin there was a perforation made through all the tablets, and through this was passed a triple linen thread, and then the tablets were covered with wax on the outside, and the witnesses placed their seal (that is, made a mark with their rings) on this external wax. It was also customary for them to write their names and to state whose will it was they had witnessed (D. xxviii. 1. 30), but this was not a necessary part of the form until made so by a constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian (C. vi. 23. 21.) This constitution also permitted a will to be made in a roll, which, if the testator wished to keep the terms secret, he might close and seal up, leaving the foot of the roll open, on which the witnesses were to put their seals and subscriptions. The testator was, under this constitution, to subscribe his name or get an eighth witness to subscribe it for him.

The prætor, as the text informs us, permitted an heir instituted in a testament to have the inheritance, even though the form of mancipation was not gone through. He could not, indeed, make this person heir, for it was necessary that an heir should derive his rights exclusively from the civil law: but he gave him the bonorum possessio, that is, permitted him to enjoy exactly what he would have enjoyed if he had been properly constituted heir, and then usucapion soon made him Quiritarian owner. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 6.) The prætor, however, required that the testament in which he was instituted should have been made in the presence and attested by the seals of seven witnesses. This was really the number of witnesses which there would have been, had the form of mancipation been gone through, if the libripens and familie emptor were included. Thus the prætor, while dispensing with the mere form of mancipation, retained exactly the same check against fraud, which that form would have afforded. (See ULP. Reg. 28. 6.)

3. Sed cum paulatim tam ex usu hominum quam ex constitutionum emendationibus cœpit in unam consonantiam jus civile et prætorium jungi, constitutum est, ut uno eodemque tempore, quod jus civile quodammodo exigebat, septem testibus adhibitis et subscriptione testamentum, quod ex constitutionibus inventum est, et ex edicto prætoris signacula testamentis imponerentur: ut hoc jus tripartitum esse videatur, ut testes quidem et eorum præsentia uno contextu testamenti celebrandi gratia a jure civili descendant, subscriptiones autem testatoris et testamentum ex sacrarum constitutionum observatione adhibeantur, signacula autem et numerus testium ex edicto prætoris.

3. But when the progress of society and the imperial constitutions had produced a fusion of the civil and the prætorian law, it was established that the testament should be made at one and the same time (a point required to some extent by the civil law), in the presence of seven witnesses, and with the subscription of the witnesses (a formality introduced by the constitutions), and with their seals appended, according to the edict of the prætor. Thus what is now required seems to have had a triple origin. The witnesses, and their presence at one continuous time for the purpose of giving the testament the requisite formality, are derived from the civil law; the subscriptions of the testator and witnesses, from the imperial constitutions; and the seals of the witnesses and their number, from the edict of the prætor.

C. vi. 23. 21.

The different formalities requisite were to be gone through, one immediately following after another, so as to make the whole one transaction. Est autem uno contextu nullum actum alienum testamentum intermiscere (D. xxviii. 1. 21. 3).

It was, by the above-mentioned constitution, enacted in the reign of Valentinian the Third in the East, and of Theodosius the Second, his colleague, in the West, A.D. 439, that the new form of testament described in the text, and which received the name of testamentum tripartitum, was substituted for the ancient ones. But in the West the form per æs et libram was never quite superseded, and traces of it are to be found even in the middle ages.

4. Sed his omnibus ex nostra constitutione propter testamentorum sinceritatem, ut nulla fraus adhibea-

4. In addition to all these formalities we have enacted by our constitution, as a security for the genuineness

indeed, make this person heir, for it was necessary that an heir should derive his rights exclusively from the civil law: but he gave him the bonorum possessio, that is, permitted him to enjoy exactly what he would have enjoyed if he had been properly constituted heir, and then usucapion soon made him Quiritarian owner. (See Bk. ii. Tit. 6.) The prætor, however, required that the testament in which he was instituted should have been made in the presence and attested by the seals of seven witnesses. This was really the number of witnesses which there would have been, had the form of mancipation been gone through, if the libripens and familie emptor were included. Thus the prætor, while dispensing with the mere form of mancipation, retained exactly the same check against fraud, which that form would have afforded. (See ULP. Reg. 28. 6.)

3. Sed cum paulatim tam ex usu hominum quam ex constitutionum emendationibus cœpit in unam consonantiam jus civile et prætorium jungi, constitutum est, ut uno eodemque tempore, quod jus civile quodammodo exigebat, septem testibus adhibitis et subscriptione testium, quod ex constitutionibus inventum est, et ex edicto prætoris signacula testamentis imponerentur: ut hoc jus tripartitum esse videatur, ut testes quidem et eorum præsentia uno contextu testamenti celebrandi gratia a jure civili descendant, subscriptiones autem testatoris et testium ex sacrarum constitutionum observatione adhibeantur, signacula autem et numerus testium ex edicto prætoris.

3. But when the progress of society and the imperial constitutions had produced a fusion of the civil and the prætorian law, it was established that the testament should be made at one and the same time (a point required to some extent by the civil law), in the presence of seven witnesses, and with the subscription of the witnesses (a formality introduced by the constitutions), and with their seals appended, according to the edict of the prætor. Thus what is now required seems to have had a triple origin. The witnesses, and their presence at one continuous time for the purpose of giving the testament the requisite formality, are derived from the civil law; the subscriptions of the testator and witnesses, from the imperial constitutions; and the seals of the witnesses and their number, from the edict of the prætor.

C. vi. 23. 21.

The different formalities requisite were to be gone through, one immediately following after another, so as to make the whole one transaction. Est autem uno contextu nullum actum alienum testamenti intermiscere (D. xxviii. l. 21. 3).

It was, by the above-mentioned constitution, enacted in the reign of Valentinian the Third in the East, and of Theodosius the Second, his colleague, in the West, A.D. 439, that the new form of testament described in the text, and which received the name of testamentum tripartitum, was substituted for the ancient ones. But in the West the form per æs et libram was never quite superseded, and traces of it are to be found even in the middle ages.

4. Sed his omnibus ex nostra constitutione propter testamentorum sinceritatem, ut nulla fraus adhibea-

4. In addition to all these formalities we have enacted by our constitution, as a security for the genuineness tur, hoc additum est, ut per manum testatoris vel testium nomen heredis exprimat et omnia secundum illius constitutionis tenorem procedant.

of testaments, and to prevent fraud, that the name of the heir shall be written in the handwriting either of the testator or of the witnesses; and that everything shall be done according to the tenor of that constitution.

C. vi. 23. 29.

This additional formality, imposed by Justinian, was afterwards abolished by him. (Nov. 119. 9.)

5. Possunt autem testes omnes et uno anulo signare testamentum (quid enim, si septem anuli una sculptura fuerint?) secundum quod Pomponio visum est. Sed et alieno quoque anulo licet signare.

5. All the witnesses may, as Pomponius held, seal the testament with the same seal; for what if the engraving on all seven seals was the same? And a seal may be used belonging to another person.

D. xxviii. 1. 22. 2.

6. Testes autem adhiberi possunt ii, cum quibus testamenti factio est. Sed neque mulier neque impubes neque servus neque mutus neque surdus neque furiosus nec cui bonis interdictum est, nec is, quem leges jubent improbum intestabilemque esse, possunt in numero testium adhiberi.

6. Those persons can be witnesses with whom there is testamenti factio. But women, persons under the age of puberty, slaves, dumb persons, deaf persons, madmen, prodigals restrained from having their property in their power, and persons declared by law to be worthless and incompetent to witness, cannot be witnesses.

D. xxviii. 1. 20. 4, 7; D. xxviii. 1. 26.

When testaments were made per aes et libram, as no one could take part in the ceremony of mancipation who did not share in the jus Quiritium, no peregrinus, no one who had not the commercium, could be a witness to a testament. It was equally necessary that the seller, i.e. the testator, and the purchaser, that is (in the old form), the heir, should share in the jus Quiritium. And therefore no one who had not the commercium could take any part in the testamenti factio, the ceremony of making a testament, either as testator, heir, or witness; and this was expressed by saying that they were not persons with whom there was testamenti factio—not persons, that is, with whom any citizen could join in such a ceremony.

In the general language of Roman law testamenti factio thus came to mean the capacity (1) of making a will; (2) of taking under a will; (3) of being witness to a will.

To the list of persons who had not testamenti factio under the last of these heads, that is, who could not be witnesses to wills, given in this paragraph, we have to add, from paragraphs 9 and 10, persons in the power of the testator and the heir and persons belonging to the heir's family.

The subject of the incapacity to make a will is discussed in the 12th Title, and that of the incapacity to take under a will in the 14th Title; but that the subject of testamenti factio may be viewed as a whole, it may be convenient to give here a summary of the rules under these two heads.

tur, hoc additum est, ut per manum testatoris vel testium nomen heredis exprimaturs et omnia secundum illius constitutionis tenorem procedant.

of testaments, and to prevent fraud, that the name of the heir shall be written in the handwriting either of the testator or of the witnesses; and that everything shall be done according to the tenor of that constitution.

C. vi. 23. 29.

This additional formality, imposed by Justinian, was afterwards abolished by him. (Nov. 119. 9.)

5. Possunt autem testes omnes et uno anulo signare testamentum (quid enim, si septem anuli una sculptura fuerint?) secundum quod Pomponio visum est. Sed et alieno quoque anulo licet signare.

5. All the witnesses may, as Pomponius held, seal the testament with the same seal; for what if the engraving on all seven seals was the same? And a seal may be used belonging to another person.

D. xxviii. 1. 22. 2.

6. Testes autem adhiberi possunt ii, cum quibus testamenti factio est. Sed neque mulier neque impubes neque servus neque mutus neque surdus neque furiosus nec cui bonis interdictum est, nec is, quem leges jubent improbum intestabilemque esse, possunt in numero testium adhiberi.

6. Those persons can be witnesses with whom there is testamenti factio. But women, persons under the age of puberty, slaves, dumb persons, deaf persons, madmen, prodigals restrained from having their property in their power, and persons declared by law to be worthless and incompetent to witness, cannot be witnesses.

D. xxviii. 1. 20. 4, 7; D. xxviii. 1. 26.

When testaments were made per aes et libram, as no one could take part in the ceremony of mancipation who did not share in the jus Quiritium, no peregrinus, no one who had not the commercium, could be a witness to a testament. It was equally necessary that the seller, i.e. the testator, and the purchaser, that is (in the old form), the heir, should share in the jus Quiritium. And therefore no one who had not the commercium could take any part in the testamenti factio, the ceremony of making a testament, either as testator, heir, or witness; and this was expressed by saying that they were not persons with whom there was testamenti factio—not persons, that is, with whom any citizen could join in such a ceremony.

In the general language of Roman law testamenti factio thus came to mean the capacity (1) of making a will; (2) of taking under a will; (3) of being witness to a will.

To the list of persons who had not testamenti factio under the last of these heads, that is, who could not be witnesses to wills, given in this paragraph, we have to add, from paragraphs 9 and 10, persons in the power of the testator and the heir and persons belonging to the heir's family.

The subject of the incapacity to make a will is discussed in the 12th Title, and that of the incapacity to take under a will in the 14th Title; but that the subject of testamenti factio may be viewed as a whole, it may be convenient to give here a summary of the rules under these two heads.

1. Making a Will.—Slaves (except slaves belonging to the State who could leave half their peculium by will (ULP. Reg. 20. 17)) could not make a will. A person in captivity could not make a will (see Title 12. 5); nor could persons who had suffered the maxima or media capitis deminutio (D. xxviii. 1. 8. 1, 2, and 4); nor, so long as the law recognised this distinction of persons, could Latini Juniani, peregrini, or dediticii. (ULP. Reg. 20. 14, 15.) A dumb man and a deaf man, the former because he could not utter the words of the munus, the deaf man because he could not hear the words of the emptor familiae (ULP. Reg. 20. 13), could not make a will, but subsequently provisions were made for allowing the dumb, the deaf, and the blind to make wills under certain safeguards. (See Tit. 12. 3 and 4.) Women at the time of Justinian could make wills. But formerly they could only make a will per aes et libram, and with the consent of their tutor. (GAI. ii. 113.) Persons in manu or in potestate could not make wills except filiifamiliarum with regard to their peculium castrense or quasi-castrense. (See Tit. 12. pr.) Madmen, persons under puberty, and prodigals interdicted from the management of their affairs could not make wills (Tit. 12. 1 and 2), nor persons made intestabiles for a crime or those condemned for a libel ob carmen famosum (D. xxviii. 1. 18. 1), for spoliation repetundarum (D. xxii. 5. 15), or adultery (D. xxii. 5. 14).

The extent to which the incapacity to make a will applying to other persons was removed in favour of a soldier on service is discussed in Title 11.

2. Taking under a Will.—The capacity to take under a will was much wider than that of making a will; and when fideicommissa were instituted, many persons who could not be heirs or legatees took the benefit of a fideicommissum. (See Tit. 23.)

But (apart from fideicommissa) peregrini and Latini, unless the will was that of a soldier (GAI. ii. 110), and dediticii (ULP. Reg. 22. 2), could not take as heirs or legatees. Nor could women under the lex Voconia, 585 A.U.C. (GAI. ii. 274) if the fortune of the testator exceeded 100,000 sesterces. Nor any uncertain person, as an unborn child (Tit. 20. 26), or a corporate body (ULP. Reg. 22. 5), or any of the gods, except those in whose favour, as the Tarpeian Jupiter, an exception had been made by a senatusconsultum or a constitution. (ULP. Reg. 22. 6.) These disabilities had all ceased before, or were abolished by Justinian. (C. vi. 48. 1.) Under the lex Julia et Papia Poppaea (see note on Tit. 20. 8), until the restrictions imposed by it in this respect were abolished by Constantine (C. viii. 58. 1), unmarried persons (caelibes) could not take any part, and childless persons (orbi) could only take half of what was given them. There were still, however, some persons who under Justinian's legislation could not take, such as the children of persons convicted of treason (C. ix. 8. 5. 1); and apostates and heretics (C. i. 7. 3); and children of, and

1. Making a Will.—Slaves (except slaves belonging to the State who could leave half their peculium by will (ULP. Reg. 20. 17)) could not make a will. A person in captivity could not make a will (see Title 12. 5); nor could persons who had suffered the maxima or media capitis deminutio (D. xxviii. 1. 8. 1, 2, and 4); nor, so long as the law recognised this distinction of persons, could Latini Juniani, peregrini, or dediticii. (ULP. Reg. 20. 14, 15.) A dumb man and a deaf man, the former because he could not utter the words of the mancupatio, the deaf man because he could not hear the words of the emptor familie (ULP. Reg. 20. 13), could not make a will, but subsequently provisions were made for allowing the dumb, the deaf, and the blind to make wills under certain safeguards. (See Tit. 12. 3 and 4.) Women at the time of Justinian could make wills. But formerly they could only make a will per as et libram, and with the consent of their tutor. (GAI. ii. 113.) Persons in manu or in potestate could not make wills except filiifamiliarum with regard to their peculium castrense or quasi-castrense. (See Tit. 12. pr.) Madmen, persons under puberty, and prodigals interdicted from the management of their affairs could not make wills (Tit. 12. 1 and 2), nor persons made intestabiles for a crime or those condemned for a libel ob carmen famosum (D. xxviii. 1. 18. 1), for spoliation repetundarum (D. xxii. 5. 15), or adultery (D. xxii. 5. 14).

The extent to which the incapacity to make a will applying to other persons was removed in favour of a soldier on service is discussed in Title 11.

2. Taking under a Will.—The capacity to take under a will was much wider than that of making a will; and when fideicommissa were instituted, many persons who could not be heirs or legatees took the benefit of a fideicommissum. (See Tit. 23.)

But (apart from fideicommissa) peregrini and Latini, unless the will was that of a soldier (GAI. ii. 110), and dediticii (ULP. Reg. 22. 2), could not take as heirs or legatees. Nor could women under the lex Voconia, 585 A.U.C. (GAI. ii. 274) if the fortune of the testator exceeded 100,000 sesterces. Nor any uncertain person, as an unborn child (Tit. 20. 26), or a corporate body (ULP. Reg. 22. 5), or any of the gods, except those in whose favour, as the Tarpeian Jupiter, an exception had been made by a senatusconsultum or a constitution. (ULP. Reg. 22. 6.) These disabilities had all ceased before, or were abolished by Justinian. (C. vi. 48. 1.) Under the lex Julia et Papia Poppaea (see note on Tit. 20. 8), until the restrictions imposed by it in this respect were abolished by Constantine (C. viii. 58. 1), unmarried persons (cælibes) could not take any part, and childless persons (orbi) could only take half of what was given them. There were still, however, some persons who under Justinian's legislation could not take, such as the children of persons convicted of treason (C. ix. 8. 5. 1); and apostates and heretics (C. i. 7. 3); and children of, and parties to, prohibited marriages could not take under the will of the parents, or of the other party to the marriage (C. v. 9. 6). Until a late period of the Empire, natural children and their mother were excluded, but, as we learn from the 89th Novel (12. pr., 1, 2, 3), a constitution of the Emperors Valens, Valentinian, and Gratian permitted a twelfth of the testator's property to be given to the natural children and their mother where there were legitimate children, and a fourth where there were none, and the testator's parents were not alive; and Justinian extended this fourth to the whole inheritance, their legitima portio (see note on Tit. 18. 3) being reserved to the testator's ascendants, if any.

7. Sed cum aliquis ex testibus testamenti quidem faciendi tempore liber existimabatur, postea vero servus apparuit, tam divus Hadrianus Catonio Vero quam postea divi Severus et Antoninus rescipserunt, subvenire se ex sua liberalitate testamento, ut sic habeatur, atque si, ut oportet, factum esset, cum eo tempore, quo testamentum signaretur, omnium consensu hic testis liberorum loco fuerit nec quisquam esset, qui ei status questionem moveat.

7. A witness, who was thought to be free at the time of making the testament, was afterwards discovered to be a slave, and the Emperor Hadrian, in his rescript to Catonius Verus, and afterwards the Emperors Severus and Antoninus by rescript, declared, that they would aid such a defect in a testament, so that it should be considered as valid as if made quite regularly; since, at the time when the testament was sealed, this witness was commonly considered a free man, and there was no one who contested his status.

C. vi. 23. 1.

Regard was had only to what was the condition of witnesses at the time of signature, not at that of the death of the testator. (D. xxviii. 1. 22. 1.)

8. Pater nec non is, qui in potestate ejus est, item duo fratres, qui in ejusdem patris potestate sunt, utrique testes in unum testamentum fieri possunt: quia nihil nocet ex una domo plures testes alieno negotio adhiberi.

8. A father, and a son in his power, or two brothers under the power of the same father, may be witnesses to the same testament; for nothing prevents several persons of the same family being witnesses in a matter which only concerns a stranger.

No one of the same family with the testator or heir could be a witness to the testament, a family comprising, in this sense, the head and those under his power; for they had so intimate a connection with each other that they might be said to be witnesses for themselves, if they were witnesses for each other.

9. In testibus autem non debet esse, qui in potestate testatoris est. Sed si filiusfamilias de castrensi peculio post missionem faciat testamentum, nec pater ejus recte testis adhibetur nec is, qui in potestate ejusdem patris est: reprobatur enim in ea re domesticum testimonium.

9. But no person under power of the testator can be a witness. And if a filiusfamilias makes, after leaving the service, a testament disposing of his castrense peculium, neither his father, nor any one in the power of his father, can be a witness. For, in this case, the law does not allow of the testimony of a member of the same family.

parties to, prohibited marriages could not take under the will of the parents, or of the other party to the marriage (C. v. 9. 6). Until a late period of the Empire, natural children and their mother were excluded, but, as we learn from the 89th Novel (12. pr., 1, 2, 3), a constitution of the Emperors Valens, Valentinian, and Gratian permitted a twelfth of the testator's property to be given to the natural children and their mother where there were legitimate children, and a fourth where there were none, and the testator's parents were not alive; and Justinian extended this fourth to the whole inheritance, their legitima portio (see note on Tit. 18. 3) being reserved to the testator's ascendants, if any.

7. Sed cum aliquis ex testibus testamenti quidem faciendi tempore liber existimabatur, postea vero servus apparuit, tam divus Hadrianus Catonio Vero quam postea divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt, subvenire se ex sua liberalitate testamento, ut sic habeatur, atque si, ut oportet, factum esset, cum eo tempore, quo testamentum signaretur, omnium consensu hic testis liberorum loco fuerit nec quisquam esset, qui ei status questionem moveat.

7. A witness, who was thought to be free at the time of making the testament, was afterwards discovered to be a slave, and the Emperor Hadrian, in his rescript to Catonius Verus, and afterwards the Emperors Severus and Antoninus by rescript, declared, that they would aid such a defect in a testament, so that it should be considered as valid as if made quite regularly; since, at the time when the testament was sealed, this witness was commonly considered a free man, and there was no one who contested his status.

C. vi. 23. 1.

Regard was had only to what was the condition of witnesses at the time of signature, not at that of the death of the testator. (D. xxviii. 1. 22. 1.)

8. Pater nec non is, qui in potestate ejus est, item duo fratres, qui in ejusdem patris potestate sunt, utrique testes in unum testamentum fieri possunt: quia nihil nocet ex una domo plures testes alieno negotio adhiberi.

8. A father, and a son in his power, or two brothers under the power of the same father, may be witnesses to the same testament; for nothing prevents several persons of the same family being witnesses in a matter which only concerns a stranger.

No one of the same family with the testator or heir could be a witness to the testament, a family comprising, in this sense, the head and those under his power; for they had so intimate a connection with each other that they might be said to be witnesses for themselves, if they were witnesses for each other.

9. In testibus autem non debet esse, qui in potestate testatoris est. Sed si filiusfamilias de castrensi peculio post missionem faciat testamentum, nec pater ejus recte testis adhibetur nec is, qui in potestate ejusdem patris est: improbatum est enim in ea re domesticum testimonium.

9. But no person under power of the testator can be a witness. And if a filiusfamilias makes, after leaving the service, a testament disposing of his castrense peculium, neither his father, nor any one in the power of his father, can be a witness. For, in this case, the law does not allow of the testimony of a member of the same family.

This had been a point on which the jurists were disagreed. Justinian here follows the opinion of Gaius (ii. 106), rejecting that of Ulpian and Marcellus. (D. xxviii. 1. 20. 2.) The question could only arise respecting a testament made post missionem, as, if it was made during service, it would be entitled to the exemptions accorded to military testaments.

10. Sed neque heres scriptus neque is, qui in potestate ejus est, neque pater ejus, qui habet eum in potestate, neque fratres, qui in ejusdem patris potestate sunt, testes adhiberi possunt, quia totum hoc negotium, quod agitur testamenti ordinandi gratia, creditur hodie inter heredem et testatorem agi. Licet enim id olim jus tale valde conturbatum fuerat et veteres, qui familiae emptorem et eos, qui per potestatem ei coadunati fuerant, testamentariis testimoniis repellabant, heredi et his, qui conjuncti ei per potestatem fuerant, concedebant testimonia in testamentis prestare, licet hi, qui id permittebant, hoc jure minime abuti debere eos suadebant: tamen nos, eandem observationem corrigentes et, quod ab illis suasum est, in legis necessitatem transferentes, ad imitationem pristini familiae emptoris merito nec heredi, qui imaginem vetustissimi familiae emptoris optinet, nec aliis personis, quæ ei, ut dictum est, conjunctæ sunt, licentiam concedimus sibi quodammodo testimonia prestare: ideoque nec ejusmodi veterem constitutionem nostro codici inseri permisimus.

10. No person instituted heir, nor any one in subjection to him, nor his father, in whose power he is, nor his brothers under power of the same father, can be witnesses; for the whole business of making a testament is in the present day considered a transaction between the testator and the heir. But formerly there was great confusion on this point of law; for although the ancients would never admit the testimony of the familia emptor, nor of any one connected with him by the ties of patria potestas, yet they admitted that of the heir, and of persons connected with him by the ties of patria potestas, but, while permitting this, they exhorted them not to abuse their right. We have corrected this, making illegal what they endeavoured to prevent by persuasion. For, in imitation of the old law respecting the familia emptor, we, as is proper, refuse to permit the heir, who now represents the ancient familia emptor, or any of those connected with the heir by the tie of patria potestas, to be, so to speak, witnesses in their own behalf; and accordingly we have not suffered the constitutions of preceding emperors on the subject to be inserted in our code.

GAI. ii. 108.

When the heir had ceased to be the familia emptor, he was no party to the transaction, and therefore it was considered he could be a witness. Gaius (ii. 108) reprobates the custom, and Justinian here pronounces it illegal. Under his legislation, there being no longer any familia emptor, the whole transaction, to use the language of the ancient mode, was between the testator and the heir.

11. Legatariis autem et fideicommissariis, quia non juris successores sunt, et aliis personis eis conjunctis testimonium non denegamus, immo in quadam nostra constitutione et hoc specialiter concessimus, et multo magis his, qui in eorum potestate sunt, vel qui eos habent in potestate, hujusmodi licentiam damus.

11. But we do not refuse the testimony of legatees, or fideicommissarii, or of persons connected with them, because they do not succeed to the rights of the deceased. On the contrary, by one of our constitutions we have specially accorded to them the capacity of being witnesses; and we give it still more readily to persons in

This had been a point on which the jurists were disagreed. Justinian here follows the opinion of Gaius (ii. 106), rejecting that of Ulpian and Marcellus. (D. xxviii. 1. 20. 2.) The question could only arise respecting a testament made post missionem, as, if it was made during service, it would be entitled to the exemptions accorded to military testaments.

10. Sed neque heres scriptus neque is, qui in potestate ejus est, neque pater ejus, qui habet eum in potestate, neque fratres, qui in ejusdem patris potestate sunt, testes adhiberi possunt, quia totum hoc negotium, quod agitur testamenti ordinandi gratia, creditur hodie inter heredem et testatorem agi. Licet enim id olim jus tale valde conturbatum fuerat et veteres, qui familiae emptorem et eos, qui per potestatem ei coadunati fuerant, testamentariis testimoniis repellabant, heredi et his, qui conjuncti ei per potestatem fuerant, concedebant testimonia in testamentis præstare, licet hi, qui id permittebant, hoc jure minime abuti debere eos suadebant: tamen nos, eandem observationem corrigentes et, quod ab illis suatum est, in legis necessitatem transferentes, ad imitationem pristini familiae emptoris merito nec heredi, qui imaginem vetustissimi familiae emptoris optinet, nec aliis personis, quæ ei, ut dictum est, conjunctæ sunt, licentiam concedimus sibi quodammodo testimonia præstare: ideoque nec ejusmodi veterem constitutionem nostro codici inseri permisimus.

10. No person instituted heir, nor any one in subjection to him, nor his father, in whose power he is, nor his brothers under power of the same father, can be witnesses; for the whole business of making a testament is in the present day considered a transaction between the testator and the heir. But formerly there was great confusion on this point of law; for although the ancients would never admit the testimony of the familia emptor, nor of any one connected with him by the ties of patria potestas, yet they admitted that of the heir, and of persons connected with him by the ties of patria potestas, but, while permitting this, they exhorted them not to abuse their right. We have corrected this, making illegal what they endeavoured to prevent by persuasion. For, in imitation of the old law respecting the familia emptor, we, as is proper, refuse to permit the heir, who now represents the ancient familia emptor, or any of those connected with the heir by the tie of patria potestas, to be, so to speak, witnesses in their own behalf; and accordingly we have not suffered the constitutions of preceding emperors on the subject to be inserted in our code.

GAI. ii. 108.

When the heir had ceased to be the familia emptor, he was no party to the transaction, and therefore it was considered he could be a witness. Gaius (ii. 108) reprobates the custom, and Justinian here pronounces it illegal. Under his legislation, there being no longer any familia emptor, the whole transaction, to use the language of the ancient mode, was between the testator and the heir.

11. Legatariis autem et fideicommissariis, quia non juris successores sunt, et aliis personis eis conjunctis testimonium non denegamus, immo in quadam nostra constitutione et hoc specialiter concessimus, et multo magis his, qui in eorum potestate sunt, vel qui eos habent in potestate, hujusmodi licentiam damus.

11. But we do not refuse the testimony of legatees, or fideicommissarii, or of persons connected with them, because they do not succeed to the rights of the deceased. On the contrary, by one of our constitutions we have specially accorded to them the capacity of being witnesses; and we give it still more readily to persons in their power, and to those in whose power they are.

GAL. ii. 108.

It would appear that the objection of his being interested, which would make the heir an unfit witness, might also have been urged against the legatee: but the legatee was admitted as a witness on the technical ground of his not being the successor of the testator. The inheritance was not transmitted to him, and he was thus looked on as a stranger.

By the senatusconsultum Libonianum, passed in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 16, it was provided that if a man wrote a testament for another, everything which he wrote in his own favour should be null. He could not, therefore, make himself a tutor (D. xxvi. 2. 29), an heir, or a legatee. (D. xxxiv. 8. 1.)

12. Nihil autem interest, testamentum in tabulis an in chartis membranisque vel in alia materia fiat.

12. It is immaterial, whether a testament be written upon a tablet, upon paper, parchment, or any other substance.

D. xxxvii. 11. 1. pr.

13. Sed et unum testamentum pluribus codicibus conficere quis potest, secundum optinentem tamen observationem omnibus factis. Quod interdum et necessarium est, si quis navigaturus et secum ferre et domi relinquere iudiciorum suorum contestationem velit, vel propter alias innumerabiles causas, quæ humanis necessitatibus imminant.

13. Any person may execute any number of copies of the same testament, each, however being made with the prescribed forms. This may be sometimes necessary; as, for instance, when a man who is going a voyage is desirous to carry with him, and also to leave at home, a memorial of his last wishes; or for any other of the numberless reasons that may arise from the various necessities of mankind.

D. xxviii. 1. 24.

Each codex was an original testament, valid only if itself made with all the solemnities which would have been requisite had it been the only one.

14. Sed hæc quidem de testamentis, quæ in scriptis conficiuntur. Si quis autem voluerit sine scriptis ordinare jure civili testamentum, septem testibus adhibitis et sua voluntate coram eis nuncupata, sciat, hoc perfectissimum testamentum jure civili firmissimumque constitutum.

14. Thus much may suffice concerning written testaments. But if any one wishes to make a testament, valid by the civil law, without writing, let him know that, if, in the presence of seven witnesses, he verbally declares his wishes, this will be a testament perfectly valid according to the civil law, and firmly established.

C. vi. 11. 2.

Thus a testator under the legislation of Justinian might either make his testament according to the form described in paragraph 3, or orally before seven witnesses.

Sua voluntate nuncupata. The word nuncupatio was originally used to express the declaration of the testator's intentions, whether the testament was written or not; but later usage appropriated the term nuncupata to testaments where there was no written will, and where the testator declared his wishes orally.

their power, and to those in whose power they are.

GAL. ii. 108.

It would appear that the objection of his being interested, which would make the heir an unfit witness, might also have been urged against the legatee: but the legatee was admitted as a witness on the technical ground of his not being the successor of the testator. The inheritance was not transmitted to him, and he was thus looked on as a stranger.

By the senatusconsultum Libonianum, passed in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 16, it was provided that if a man wrote a testament for another, everything which he wrote in his own favour should be null. He could not, therefore, make himself a tutor (D. xxvi. 2. 29), an heir, or a legatee. (D. xxxiv. 8. 1.)

12. Nihil autem interest, testamentum in tabulis an in chartis membranisque vel in alia materia fiat.

12. It is immaterial, whether a testament be written upon a tablet, upon paper, parchment, or any other substance.

D. xxxvii. 11. 1. pr.

13. Sed et unum testamentum pluribus codicibus conficere quis potest, secundum optinentem tamen observationem omnibus factis. Quod interdum et necessarium est, si quis navigaturus et secum ferre et domi relinquere iudiciorum suorum constitutionem velit, vel propter alias innumerabiles causas, quæ humanis necessitatibus imminant.

13. Any person may execute any number of copies of the same testament, each, however being made with the prescribed forms. This may be sometimes necessary; as, for instance, when a man who is going a voyage is desirous to carry with him, and also to leave at home, a memorial of his last wishes; or for any other of the numberless reasons that may arise from the various necessities of mankind.

D. xxviii. 1. 24.

Each codex was an original testament, valid only if itself made with all the solemnities which would have been requisite had it been the only one.

14. Sed hæc quidem de testamentis, quæ in scriptis conficiuntur. Si quis autem voluerit sine scriptis ordinare jure civili testamentum, septem testibus adhibitis et sua voluntate coram eis nuncupata, sciat, hoc perfectissimum testamentum jure civili firmissimumque constitutum.

14. Thus much may suffice concerning written testaments. But if any one wishes to make a testament, valid by the civil law, without writing, let him know that, if, in the presence of seven witnesses, he verbally declares his wishes, this will be a testament perfectly valid according to the civil law, and firmly established.

C. vi. 11. 2.

Thus a testator under the legislation of Justinian might either make his testament according to the form described in paragraph 3, or orally before seven witnesses.

Sua voluntate nuncupata. The word nuncupatio was originally used to express the declaration of the testator's intentions, whether the testament was written or not; but later usage appropriated the term nuncupata to testaments where there was no written will, and where the testator declared his wishes orally.

TIT. XI. DE MILITARI TESTAMENTO.

Supra dicta diligens observatio in ordinandis testamentis militibus propter nimiam imperitiam constitutionibus principalibus remissa est. Nam quamvis hi neque legitimum numerum testium adhibuerint neque aliam testamentorum sollemnitatem observaverint, recte nihilo minus testantur, videlicet cum in expeditionibus occupati sunt: quod merito nostra constitutio induxit. Quoquo enim modo voluntas ejus suprema sive scripta inveniatur sive sine scriptura, valet testamentum ex voluntate ejus. Illis autem temporibus, per quæ citra expeditionum necessitatem in aliis locis vel in suis sedibus degunt, minime ad vindicandum tale privilegium adjuvantur: sed testari quidem, et si filii familias sunt, propter militiam conceduntur, jure tamen communi, ea observatione et in eorum testamentis adhibenda, quam et in testamentis paganorum proxime exposuimus.

The necessity for the observance of these formalities in the construction of testaments has been dispensed with by the imperial constitutions, in favour of military persons, on account of their excessive unskilfulness in such matters. For although they neither employ the legal number of witnesses, nor observe any other requisite formality, yet their testament is valid, but only if made while they are on actual service, a proviso introduced by our constitution with good reason. Thus, in whatever manner the wishes of a military person are expressed, whether in writing or not, the testament prevails by the mere force of his intention. But during the times when they are not on actual service, and live at their own homes, or elsewhere, they are not permitted to claim this privilege. A soldier, although a filius familias, gains from military service the power of making a testament; but he is bound by the rules of the ordinary law, and has to observe the same formalities as we explained above to be necessary for the testaments of civilians.

GAI. ii. 109; C. vi. 21. 17.

The privilege of making valid testaments, independent of any formality, was one given to soldiers, among many others of a similar kind, rather as a special favour to them than from any consideration for their nimia imperitia. It dates from the time of Julius Cæsar, who granted it as a temporary concession. It was made a general rule by Nerva, and confirmed by Trajan. If the testament of a soldier was written, no witness was necessary; but if not, it is doubtful whether one witness was sufficient to prove it; probably one witness sufficed, although the law, at any rate after the time of Constantine, required, as a general rule, that two witnesses at least should be produced in every case. (D. xxii. 5. 12; D. xlviii. 18. 17.) A soldier in the power of a father might make a testament disposing of his castrense, and, under Justinian, his quasi-castrense peculium. If he made it while on service, he need observe no formality in making the testament; if he did not make it while on service, he was bound to observe the usual formalities. (GAI. ii. 106.) The concluding words of the section are meant to express that it was by military service that the filius-familias gained the power of disposing at any time of his peculium castrense, but that this general right, unless the soldier was

TIT. XI. DE MILITARI TESTAMENTO.

Supra dicta diligens observatio in ordinandis testamentis militibus propter nimiam imperitiam constitutionibus principalibus remissa est. Nam quamvis hi neque legitimum numerum testium adhibuerint neque aliam testamentorum sollemnitatem observaverint, recte nihilo minus testantur, videlicet cum in expeditionibus occupati sunt: quod merito nostra constitutio induxit. Quoquo enim modo voluntas ejus suprema sive scripta inveniatur sive sine scriptura, valet testamentum ex voluntate ejus. Illis autem temporibus, per quæ citra expeditionum necessitatem in aliis locis vel in suis sedibus degunt, minime ad vindicandum tale privilegium adjuvantur: sed testari quidem, et si filii familias sunt, propter militiam conceduntur, jure tamen communi, ea observatione et in eorum testamentis adhibenda, quam et in testamentis paganorum proxime exposuimus.

The necessity for the observance of these formalities in the construction of testaments has been dispensed with by the imperial constitutions, in favour of military persons, on account of their excessive unskilfulness in such matters. For although they neither employ the legal number of witnesses, nor observe any other requisite formality, yet their testament is valid, but only if made while they are on actual service, a proviso introduced by our constitution with good reason. Thus, in whatever manner the wishes of a military person are expressed, whether in writing or not, the testament prevails by the mere force of his intention. But during the times when they are not on actual service, and live at their own homes, or elsewhere, they are not permitted to claim this privilege. A soldier, although a filius familias, gains from military service the power of making a testament; but he is bound by the rules of the ordinary law, and has to observe the same formalities as we explained above to be necessary for the testaments of civilians.

GAI. ii. 109; C. vi. 21. 17.

The privilege of making valid testaments, independent of any formality, was one given to soldiers, among many others of a similar kind, rather as a special favour to them than from any consideration for their nimia imperitia. It dates from the time of Julius Cæsar, who granted it as a temporary concession. It was made a general rule by Nerva, and confirmed by Trajan. If the testament of a soldier was written, no witness was necessary; but if not, it is doubtful whether one witness was sufficient to prove it; probably one witness sufficed, although the law, at any rate after the time of Constantine, required, as a general rule, that two witnesses at least should be produced in every case. (D. xxii. 5. 12; D. xlviii. 18. 17.) A soldier in the power of a father might make a testament disposing of his castrense, and, under Justinian, his quasi-castrense peculium. If he made it while on service, he need observe no formality in making the testament; if he did not make it while on service, he was bound to observe the usual formalities. (GAI. ii. 106.) The concluding words of the section are meant to express that it was by military service that the filius-familias gained the power of disposing at any time of his peculium castrense, but that this general right, unless the soldier was on service, had to be exercised with the observance of the usual forms. Whether before the time of Justinian the soldier could make a military testament when not serving on a campaign is doubtful.

1. Plane de militum testamentis divus Trajanus Statilio Severo ita rescripsit: 'Id privilegium, quod militantibus datum est, ut quoquo modo facta ab his testamenta rata sint, sic intellegi debet, ut utique prius constare debeat, testamentum factum esse, quod et sine scriptura a non militantibus quoque fieri potest. Is ergo miles, de cujus bonis apud te queritur, si convocatis ad hoc hominibus, ut voluntatem suam testaretur, ita locutus est, ut declararet, quem vellet sibi esse heredem et cui libertatem tribuere, potest videri sine scripto hoc modo esse testatus et voluntas ejus rata habenda est. Ceterum si, ut plerumque sermonibus fieri solet, dixit alicui: "ego te heredem facio" aut "tibi bona mea relinquo," non oportet hoc pro testamento observari. Nec ullorum magis interest quam ipsorum, quibus id privilegium datum est, ejusmodi exemplum non admitti: alioquin non difficulter post mortem alicujus militis testes existent, qui adfirmant, se audisse dicentem aliquem, relinquere se bona, cui visum sit, et per hoc judicia vera subvertentur.'

1. The Emperor Trajan wrote explicitly as follows, in a rescript to Statilius Severus, with respect to military testaments: 'The privilege, given to military persons, that their testaments, in whatever manner made, shall be valid, must be understood as meaning that it must first be clear that a testament has been made (a testament may be made without writing even by persons not on military service). If, then, it appears that the soldier, concerning whose goods the action before you is now brought, did, in the presence of witnesses, called expressly for the purpose, declare who he wished should be his heir, and to what slave he wished to give freedom, he shall be considered to have made in this way a testament without writing, and effect shall be given to his wishes. But if, as is often the case in the course of conversation, he said to some one, "I appoint you my heir," or, "I leave you all my estate," such words must not be regarded as a testament. No one is more interested than those to whom this privilege has been given that such a precedent should not be admitted; otherwise it would not be difficult to procure witnesses who, after the death of a soldier, would affirm that they had heard him bequeath his goods to whomsoever they pleased to name; and thus the real intentions of soldiers might be defeated.'

D. xxix. 1. 24.

Convocatis ad hoc hominibus. There was no necessary ceremony of calling witnesses. If there was but proof of what the soldier's wishes were, and that he had declared them while on service, that was enough.

2. Quin immo et mutus et surdus miles testamentum facere potest.

2. A soldier, though dumb and deaf, may make a testament.

D. xxix. 1. 4.

It might happen, as Theophilus suggests, that a soldier, incapacitated for actual service by becoming deaf or dumb, might yet not have received his missio causaria (discharge for an accidental reason). A testament made by him in the interval between his

on service, had to be exercised with the observance of the usual forms. Whether before the time of Justinian the soldier could make a military testament when not serving on a campaign is doubtful.

1. Plane de militum testamentis divus Trajanus Statilio Severo ita rescripsit: 'Id privilegium, quod militantibus datum est, ut quoquo modo facta ab his testamenta rata sint, sic intellegi debet, ut utique prius constare debeat, testamentum factum esse, quod et sine scriptura a non militantibus quoque fieri potest. Is ergo miles, de cujus bonis apud te queritur, si convocatis ad hoc hominibus, ut voluntatem suam testaretur, ita locutus est, ut declararet, quem vellet sibi esse heredem et cui libertatem tribuere, potest videri sine scripto hoc modo esse testatus et voluntas ejus rata habenda est. Ceterum si, ut plerumque sermonibus fieri solet, dixit alicui: "ego te heredem facio" aut "tibi bona mea relinquo," non oportet hoc pro testamento observari. Nec ullorum magis interest quam ipsorum, quibus id privilegium datum est, ejusmodi exemplum non admitti: alioquin non difficulter post mortem alicujus militis testes existent, qui adfirmant, se audisse dicentem aliquem, relinquere se bona, cui visum sit, et per hoc judicia vera subvertentur.'

1. The Emperor Trajan wrote explicitly as follows, in a rescript to Statilius Severus, with respect to military testaments: 'The privilege, given to military persons, that their testaments, in whatever manner made, shall be valid, must be understood as meaning that it must first be clear that a testament has been made (a testament may be made without writing even by persons not on military service). If, then, it appears that the soldier, concerning whose goods the action before you is now brought, did, in the presence of witnesses, called expressly for the purpose, declare who he wished should be his heir, and to what slave he wished to give freedom, he shall be considered to have made in this way a testament without writing, and effect shall be given to his wishes. But if, as is often the case in the course of conversation, he said to some one, "I appoint you my heir," or, "I leave you all my estate," such words must not be regarded as a testament. No one is more interested than those to whom this privilege has been given that such a precedent should not be admitted; otherwise it would not be difficult to procure witnesses who, after the death of a soldier, would affirm that they had heard him bequeath his goods to whomsoever they pleased to name; and thus the real intentions of soldiers might be defeated.'

D. xxix. 1. 24.

Convocatis ad hoc hominibus. There was no necessary ceremony of calling witnesses. If there was but proof of what the soldier's wishes were, and that he had declared them while on service, that was enough.

2. Quin immo et mutus et surdus miles testamentum facere potest.

2. A soldier, though dumb and deaf, may make a testament.

D. xxix. 1. 4.

It might happen, as Theophilus suggests, that a soldier, incapacitated for actual service by becoming deaf or dumb, might yet not have received his missio causaria (discharge for an accidental reason). A testament made by him in the interval between his loss of capacity and his discharge would be considered entitled to all the privileges of a military testament.

3. Sed haecenus hoc illis a principalibus constitutionibus conceditur, quatenus militant et in castris degunt: post missionem vero veterani vel extra castra si faciant adhuc militantes testamentum, communi omnium civium Romanorum jure facere debent. Et quod in castris fecerint testamentum non communi jure, sed quomodo voluerint, post missionem intra annum tantum valebit. Quid igitur, si intra annum quidem decesserit, condicio autem heredi adscripta post annum extiterit? An quasi militis testamentum valeat? Et placet, valere quasi militis.

3. This privilege is only granted by the imperial constitutions to military men, as long as they are on service, and live in the camp. Therefore, veterans after their discharge, or soldiers not in the camp, can only make their testaments by observing the forms required of all Roman citizens. And if a testament is made in the camp, and the solemnities of the law are not observed, it will continue valid only for one year after discharge from the army. Suppose, therefore, a soldier should die within a year after his discharge, but the condition imposed on the heir should not be accomplished until after the year, would his testament be valid, as being in effect the testament of a soldier? We answer, it would be so valid.

D. xxix. 1. 38.

A soldier enjoyed the privilege of making a military testament while his name was inscribed on the list of the army (in numeris), and it continued valid for a year after his name had been taken off, but this only provided he was not discharged ignominie causa. (D. xxix. 1. 38. 1.) The doubt as to the validity of a military testament, containing a condition under the circumstances mentioned in the text, arose from the doctrine of Roman law that, when the institution of the heir was conditional, the operation of the testament dated from the accomplishment of the condition, not from the death of the testator. If, therefore, the soldier died within a year after he had quitted the service, but the condition was not accomplished until the year was expired, the testament did not, strictly speaking, take effect within the year; and therefore Justinian removes a difficulty which a rigorous adherence to the letter of the law suggested.

4. Sed et si quis ante militiam non jure fecit testamentum et miles factus et in expeditione degens resignavit illud et quaedam adiecit sive detraxit vel alias manifesta est militis voluntas hoc valere volentis, dicendum est, valere testamentum quasi ex nova militis voluntate.

4. If a man, before becoming a soldier, has made his testament irregularly, and afterwards, while on service, opens it, and adds something or strikes something out, or in any other way makes his wish manifest that this testament should be valid, it must be pronounced to be so, as being, in effect, a new testament made by a soldier.

D. xxix. 1. 20. 1.

If the soldier manifested his intention of adhering to the dispositions of his old testament, this was as much a fresh expression of his wishes as if he had made a new testament. If he was

loss of capacity and his discharge would be considered entitled to all the privileges of a military testament.

3. Sed haecenus hoc illis a principibus constitutionibus conceditur, quatenus militant et in castris degunt: post missionem vero veterani vel extra castra si faciant adhuc militantes testamentum, communi omnium civium Romanorum jure facere debent. Et quod in castris fecerint testamentum non communi jure, sed quomodo voluerint, post missionem intra annum tantum valebit. Quid igitur, si intra annum quidem decesserit, condicio autem heredi adscripta post annum extiterit? An quasi militis testamentum valeat? Et placet, valere quasi militis.

3. This privilege is only granted by the imperial constitutions to military men, as long as they are on service, and live in the camp. Therefore, veterans after their discharge, or soldiers not in the camp, can only make their testaments by observing the forms required of all Roman citizens. And if a testament is made in the camp, and the solemnities of the law are not observed, it will continue valid only for one year after discharge from the army. Suppose, therefore, a soldier should die within a year after his discharge, but the condition imposed on the heir should not be accomplished until after the year, would his testament be valid, as being in effect the testament of a soldier? We answer, it would be so valid.

D. xxix. 1. 38.

A soldier enjoyed the privilege of making a military testament while his name was inscribed on the list of the army (in numeris), and it continued valid for a year after his name had been taken off, but this only provided he was not discharged ignominie causa. (D. xxix. 1. 38. 1.) The doubt as to the validity of a military testament, containing a condition under the circumstances mentioned in the text, arose from the doctrine of Roman law that, when the institution of the heir was conditional, the operation of the testament dated from the accomplishment of the condition, not from the death of the testator. If, therefore, the soldier died within a year after he had quitted the service, but the condition was not accomplished until the year was expired, the testament did not, strictly speaking, take effect within the year; and therefore Justinian removes a difficulty which a rigorous adherence to the letter of the law suggested.

4. Sed et si quis ante militiam non jure fecit testamentum et miles factus et in expeditione degens resignavit illud et quaedam adiecit sive detraxit vel alias manifesta est militis voluntas hoc valere volentis, dicendum est, valere testamentum quasi ex nova militis voluntate.

4. If a man, before becoming a soldier, has made his testament irregularly, and afterwards, while on service, opens it, and adds something or strikes something out, or in any other way makes his wish manifest that this testament should be valid, it must be pronounced to be so, as being, in effect, a new testament made by a soldier.

D. xxix. 1. 20. 1.

If the soldier manifested his intention of adhering to the dispositions of his old testament, this was as much a fresh expression of his wishes as if he had made a new testament. If he was altogether silent on the subject, an informal testament made before his becoming a soldier was not valid, as it was necessary that there should be a positive declaration made while he was on service of his wish to make his testament valid as a military one.

5. Denique et si in adrogationem datus fuerit miles vel filiusfamilias emancipatus est, testamentum ejus quasi militis ex nova voluntate valet nec videtur capitis deminutione irritum fieri.

5. Further, if a soldier is given in arrogation, or, being a filiusfamilias, is emancipated, his testament is valid as though by a new expression of the wishes of a soldier; and is not considered as invalidated by the capitis deminutio he has undergone.

D. xxix. 1. 22, 23.

By the law of Rome every testament became void, irritum, by the testator, after its execution, suffering any of the three kinds of capitis deminutio. With soldiers it was otherwise; their testament was not invalidated by undergoing either of the two greater kinds of deminutio, if it was merely for an infraction of military law that they were condemned to a punishment involving either of these kinds of alteration of status. (D. xxviii. 3. 6. 6.) Nor was it ever invalidated by their undergoing the third and least kind. The will of the soldier was supposed to be exercised so as to declare his wish that the old testament should be valid (quasi ex nova militis voluntate); and in this case, it does not appear that any positive declaration of such a wish was necessary. His testament, made previous to his change of status, was effectual, to the fullest extent it could be, in the new position he occupied. The military testament made by a paterfamilias respecting his property became, after arrogation, an effectual disposition of his castrense peculium; and one made by a filiusfamilias respecting his castrense peculium became, after emancipation, an effectual disposition of all his property.

6. Sciendum tamen est, quod ad exemplum castrensis peculii tam anteriores leges quam principales constitutiones quibusdam quasi castrensia dederunt peculia, atque eorum quibusdam permissum erat etiam in potestate degentibus testari. Quod nostra constitutio latius extendens, permisit omnibus in his tantummodo peculiis testari quidem, sed jure communi: cujus constitutionis tenore perspecto licentia est nihil eorum, quæ ad præfatum jus pertinent, ignorare.

6. We may here observe, that, in imitation of the castrense peculium, both old laws and imperial constitutions have permitted certain persons to have a quasi-castrense peculium, and some of these persons have been permitted to dispose of this peculium by testament, although they were in the power of another. Our constitution has extended this permission to all, in regard, that is, to these kinds of peculium, but their testaments must be made with the ordinary formalities. By reading this constitution any one may learn all that relates to the privilege we have mentioned.

C. vi. 22. 12.

We must not suppose, from the expression anteriores leges, that the peculium quasi-castrense belongs to a time of law when altogether silent on the subject, an informal testament made before his becoming a soldier was not valid, as it was necessary that there should be a positive declaration made while he was on service of his wish to make his testament valid as a military one.

5. Denique et si in adrogationem datus fuerit miles vel filiusfamilias emancipatus est, testamentum ejus quasi militis ex nova voluntate valet nec videtur capitis deminutione irritum fieri.

5. Further, if a soldier is given in arrogation, or, being a filiusfamilias, is emancipated, his testament is valid as though by a new expression of the wishes of a soldier; and is not considered as invalidated by the capitis deminutio he has undergone.

D. xxix. 1. 22, 23.

By the law of Rome every testament became void, irritum, by the testator, after its execution, suffering any of the three kinds of capitis deminutio. With soldiers it was otherwise; their testament was not invalidated by undergoing either of the two greater kinds of deminutio, if it was merely for an infraction of military law that they were condemned to a punishment involving either of these kinds of alteration of status. (D. xxviii. 3. 6. 6.) Nor was it ever invalidated by their undergoing the third and least kind. The will of the soldier was supposed to be exercised so as to declare his wish that the old testament should be valid (quasi ex nova militis voluntate); and in this case, it does not appear that any positive declaration of such a wish was necessary. His testament, made previous to his change of status, was effectual, to the fullest extent it could be, in the new position he occupied. The military testament made by a paterfamilias respecting his property became, after arrogation, an effectual disposition of his castrense peculium; and one made by a filiusfamilias respecting his castrense peculium became, after emancipation, an effectual disposition of all his property.

6. Sciendum tamen est, quod ad exemplum castrensis peculii tam anteriores leges quam principales constitutiones quibusdam quasi castrensis dederunt peculia, atque eorum quibusdam permissum erat etiam in potestate degentibus testari. Quod nostra constitutio latius extendens, permisit omnibus in his tantummodo peculiis testari quidem, sed jure communi: cujus constitutionis tenore perspecto licentia est nihil eorum, quæ ad præfatum jus pertinent, ignorare.

6. We may here observe, that, in imitation of the castrense peculium, both old laws and imperial constitutions have permitted certain persons to have a quasi-castrense peculium, and some of these persons have been permitted to dispose of this peculium by testament, although they were in the power of another. Our constitution has extended this permission to all, in regard, that is, to these kinds of peculium, but their testaments must be made with the ordinary formalities. By reading this constitution any one may learn all that relates to the privilege we have mentioned.

C. vi. 22. 12.

We must not suppose, from the expression anteriores leges, that the peculium quasi-castrense belongs to a time of law when text says, they had even in the lifetime of the parent had a kind of ownership.

As the text informs us, the prætor interposed to prevent its being in every case obligatory on the suus heres to accept the inheritance; he was only treated as an heir if he intermeddled with the inheritance; and until he had in some way shown his intention of doing so, the prætor refused to permit any action to be brought against him as suus heres by the creditors of the deceased. The beneficium abstinendi, as this power of abstaining was termed, differed from the beneficium separationis, accorded to slaves, by no express demand being necessary, as it always existed in the absence of express intention to accept the inheritance, and also by its being a protection to the suus heres against all actions whatever brought against him in his capacity of heir, while the slave was liable to the amount of the property of the deceased.

The suus heres who had availed himself of this privilege did not thereby cease to be heir. He could afterwards within three years accept the inheritance if the goods were not sold by the creditors. (D. xxviii. 8. 8; C. vi. 31. 6.)

The suus heres might thus, under the prætorian system, abstain from taking the inheritance; but, until his position was changed by Justinian (as noticed in the sixth paragraph), if he entered he took upon himself all the burdens of the inheritance. He had to satisfy the creditors of the deceased, whether the inheritance sufficed or not, and to pay legatees and discharge fideicommissa (with the deduction of the Falcidian fourth) so far as the inheritance was sufficient. If there was more than one heir, each co-heir was, under the law of the Twelve Tables, regarded as answerable for the same proportion of the debts as he took of the inheritance. (D. xxxi. 1. 33; C. iii. 36. 6.)

3. Ceteri, qui testatoris juri subiecti non sunt, extranei heredes appellantur. Itaque liberi quoque nostri, qui in potestate nostra non sunt, heredes a nobis instituti, extranei heredes videntur. Qua de causa et qui heredes a matre instituuntur, eodem numero sunt, quia feminae in potestate liberos non habent. Servus quoque a domino heres institutus et post testamentum factum ab eo manumissus eodem numero habetur.

3. All those who are not subject to the power of the testator are termed extranei heredes: thus, children, not within our power, whom we institute heirs, are accordingly extranei heredes. So, too, are children instituted heirs by their mother, for a woman has not her children under her power. A slave also, whom his master has instituted heir and manumitted after the testament has been made, is considered a heres extraneus.

GAI. II. 161.

4. In extraneis heredibus illud observatur, ut sit cum eis testamenti factio, sive ipsi heredes instituantur, sive hi, qui in potestate eorum sunt. Et id duobus temporibus inspicitur, testamenti quidem facti, ut constite-

4. As to extranei heredes, the rule is that there must be testamenti factio with them, whether they are instituted heirs themselves, or whether those under their power are instituted. And this is required at two several text says, they had even in the lifetime of the parent had a kind of ownership.

Testamentum factio with them

As the text informs us, the prætor interposed to prevent its being in every case obligatory on the suus heres to accept the inheritance; he was only treated as an heir if he intermeddled with the inheritance; and until he had in some way shown his intention of doing so, the prætor refused to permit any action to be brought against him as suus heres by the creditors of the deceased. The beneficium abstinendi, as this power of abstaining was termed, differed from the beneficium separationis, accorded to slaves, by no express demand being necessary, as it always existed in the absence of express intention to accept the inheritance, and also by its being a protection to the suus heres against all actions whatever brought against him in his capacity of heir, while the slave was liable to the amount of the property of the deceased.

The suus heres who had availed himself of this privilege did not thereby cease to be heir. He could afterwards within three years accept the inheritance if the goods were not sold by the creditors. (D. xxviii. 8. 8; C. vi. 31. 6.)

The suus heres might thus, under the prætorian system, abstain from taking the inheritance; but, until his position was changed by Justinian (as noticed in the sixth paragraph), if he entered he took upon himself all the burdens of the inheritance. He had to satisfy the creditors of the deceased, whether the inheritance sufficed or not, and to pay legatees and discharge fideicommissa (with the deduction of the Falcidian fourth) so far as the inheritance was sufficient. If there was more than one heir, each co-heir was, under the law of the Twelve Tables, regarded as answerable for the same proportion of the debts as he took of the inheritance. (D. xxxi. 1. 33; C. iii. 36. 6.)

3. Ceteri, qui testatoris juri subiecti non sunt, extranei heredes appellantur. Itaque liberi quoque nostri, qui in potestate nostra non sunt, heredes a nobis instituti, extranei heredes videntur. Qua de causa et qui heredes a matre instituuntur, eodem numero sunt, quia feminae in potestate liberos non habent. Servus quoque a domino heres institutus et post testamentum factum ab eo manumissus eodem numero habetur.

3. All those who are not subject to the power of the testator are termed extranei heredes: thus, children, not within our power, whom we institute heirs, are accordingly extranei heredes. So, too, are children instituted heirs by their mother, for a woman has not her children under her power. A slave also, whom his master has instituted heir and manumitted after the testament has been made, is considered a heres extraneus.

GAI. ii. 161.

4. In extraneis heredibus illud observatur, ut sit cum eis testamenti factio, sive ipsi heredes instituantur, sive hi, qui in potestate eorum sunt. Et id duobus temporibus inspicitur, testamenti quidem facti, ut constite-

4. As to extranei heredes, the rule is that there must be testamenti factio with them, whether they are instituted heirs themselves, or whether those under their power are instituted. And this is required at two several

Testamentum
factio
them

rit institutio, mortis vero testatoris, ut effectum habeat. Hoc amplius et cum adit hereditatem, esse debet cum eo testamenti factio, sive pure sive sub conditione heres institutus sit: nam jus heredis eo vel maxime tempore inspicendum est, quo adquirit hereditatem. Medio autem tempore inter factum testamentum et mortem testatoris vel condicionem institutionis existentem mutatio juris heredi non nocet, quia, ut diximus, tria tempora inspicere debent. Testamenti autem factionem non solum is habere videtur, qui testamentum facere potest, sed etiam qui ex alieno testamento vel ipse capere potest vel alii adquirere, licet non potest facere testamentum. Et ideo et furiosus et mutus et postumus et infans et filiusfamilias et servus alienus testamenti factionem habere dicuntur: licet enim testamentum facere non possunt, attamen ex testamento vel sibi vel alii adquirere possunt.

times: at the making of the testament, that the institution may be valid, and at the testator's death, that it may take effect. Further, at the time of entering upon the inheritance, testamenti factio ought still to exist with the heir, whether he is instituted simply or conditionally; for his capacity as heir is principally regarded at the time of acquiring the inheritance. But in the interval between the making of the testament and the death of the testator, or the accomplishment of the condition of the institution, the heir will not be prejudiced by change of status; because it is the three points of time which we have noted that are to be regarded. Not only is a man who can make a testament said to have testamenti factio, but also any person who under the testament of another can take for himself, or acquire for another, although he cannot himself make a testament; and therefore insane and dumb persons, posthumous children, infants, sons in power, and slaves belonging to others, are said to have testamenti factio. For although they cannot make a testament, yet they can acquire by testament either for themselves or others.

D. xxviii. 5. 49. 1; D. xxviii. 1. 16. 1.

The necessity for the heir having testamenti factio at the time of the making of the testament proceeded from the ancient mode of making testaments. When, in the calata comitia, the testator orally announced who it was on whom he wished his legal existence, his persona, to devolve after his death, the person designated could not have accepted the devolution unless he had been in the enjoyment of those rights of citizenship implied in the testamenti factio; and when testaments were made per aes et libram, it was equally necessary that the purchaser, that is, the heir, should have those rights of citizenship which would enable him to go through a sale by mancipation.

Vel condicionem. The point of time to be looked to is not that when the testator died, but that when the rights of the heir accrued. If the testament was made pure, they accrued the moment the testator died; if made sub condicione, on the accomplishment of the condition.

It will be observed that the text says that it was immaterial whether the heir preserved his testamenti factio between the two periods of the making the testament and the accruing of his rights; if he lost it between the two later epochs, viz. the accruing of his rights and the entrance on the inheritance, he could not take,

rit institutio, mortis vero testatoris, ut effectum habeat. Hoc amplius et cum adit hereditatem, esse debet cum eo testamenti factio, sive pure sive sub conditione heres institutus sit; nam jus heredis eo vel maxime tempore inspiciendum est, quo adquirit hereditatem. Medio autem tempore inter factum testamentum et mortem testatoris vel condicionem institutionis existentem mutatio juris heredi non nocet, quia, ut diximus, tria tempora inspicere debent. Testamenti autem factionem non solum is habere videtur, qui testamentum facere potest, sed etiam qui ex alieno testamento vel ipse capere potest vel alii adquirere, licet non potest facere testamentum. Et ideo et furiosus et mutus et postumus et infans et filiusfamilias et servus alienus testamenti factionem habere dicuntur: licet enim testamentum facere non possunt, attamen ex testamento vel sibi vel alii adquirere possunt.

times: at the making of the testament, that the institution may be valid, and at the testator's death, that it may take effect. Further, at the time of entering upon the inheritance, testamenti factio ought still to exist with the heir, whether he is instituted simply or conditionally; for his capacity as heir is principally regarded at the time of acquiring the inheritance. But in the interval between the making of the testament and the death of the testator, or the accomplishment of the condition of the institution, the heir will not be prejudiced by change of status; because it is the three points of time which we have noted that are to be regarded. Not only is a man who can make a testament said to have testamenti factio, but also any person who under the testament of another can take for himself, or acquire for another, although he cannot himself make a testament; and therefore insane and dumb persons, posthumous children, infants, sons in power, and slaves belonging to others, are said to have testamenti factio. For although they cannot make a testament, yet they can acquire by testament either for themselves or others.

D. xxviii. 5. 49. 1; D. xxviii. 1. 16. 1.

The necessity for the heir having testamenti factio at the time of the making of the testament proceeded from the ancient mode of making testaments. When, in the calata comitia, the testator orally announced who it was on whom he wished his legal existence, his persona, to devolve after his death, the person designated could not have accepted the devolution unless he had been in the enjoyment of those rights of citizenship implied in the testamenti factio; and when testaments were made per aes et librum, it was equally necessary that the purchaser, that is, the heir, should have those rights of citizenship which would enable him to go through a sale by mancipation.

Vel condicionem. The point of time to be looked to is not that when the testator died, but that when the rights of the heir accrued. If the testament was made pure, they accrued the moment the testator died; if made sub condicione, on the accomplishment of the condition.

It will be observed that the text says that it was immaterial whether the heir preserved his testamenti factio between the two periods of the making the testament and the accruing of his rights; if he lost it between the two later epochs, viz. the accruing of his rights and the entrance on the inheritance, he could not take,

and it would not avail him that he had recovered it at the time of entering on the inheritance. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. 5.)

The classes mentioned in the concluding portion of this paragraph might have the rights of citizenship, and only be accidentally prevented from exercising those rights.

5. Extraneis autem hereditibus deliberandi potestas est de adeunda hereditate vel non adeunda. Sed sive is, cui abstinendi potestas est, immiscuerit se bonis hereditariis, sive extraneus, cui de adeunda hereditate deliberare licet, adierit, postea relinquendæ hereditatis facultatem non habet, nisi minor sit annis viginti quinque: nam hujus ætatis hominibus sicut in ceteris omnibus causis deceptis, ita et si temere damnosam hereditatem susceperint, prætor succurrit.

5. Extranei heredes may deliberate whether they will enter upon the inheritance or not. But, if one, who has the liberty of abstaining, intermeddles with the property of the inheritance, or an extraneus heres, who is permitted to deliberate, enters on the inheritance, it will not afterwards be in his power to renounce the inheritance, unless he shall be under twenty-five years; for the prætor, as in all other cases he relieves persons of this age who have been deceived, so too he does when they have rashly taken upon themselves a burdensome inheritance.

GAI. II. 162, 163.

There was no fixed time within which it was necessary that the heir should decide whether to accept or reject the inheritance, excepting when the testator fixed the time himself by what was termed cretio. (See note to paragr. 7.) Those who were interested in his making a decision could compel him by action to do so, and the prætor then, if he wished, allowed him time to deliberate, never less than one hundred days. Justinian enacted that the time given should not exceed nine months, or, as a special favour from the emperor, a year. If he did not decide within the appointed time, he was taken to have rejected the inheritance, if the action to compel a decision was brought by substituted heirs or a heres ab intestato; to have accepted it, if the action was brought by legatees or creditors. If he died before the expiration of the time, and within a year of the first commencement of his right to enter on the inheritance, his heir could, during the unexpired remainder of the time, decide in his place. (C. vi. 30. 19.)

The mode by which the prætor interfered for the protection of minors was called restitutio in integrum. (See note on Bk. i. Tit. 23. pr.)

6. Sciendum tamen est, divum Hadrianum etiam majori viginti quinque annis veniam dedisse, cum post aditam hereditatem grande æs alienum, quod aditæ hereditatis tempore latebat, emersisset. Sed hoc divus quidem Hadrianus speciali beneficio cuidam præstitit; divus autem Gordianus postea in militibus tantummodo hoc extendit: sed nostra benevolentia commune omni-

6. The Emperor Hadrian, however, once gave permission to a person above twenty-five years to relinquish an inheritance, when it appeared to be encumbered with a great debt, which was unknown at the time that he entered on the inheritance. But this was granted as a special favour to a particular person. The Emperor Gordian afterwards extended privilege, but only to soldiers.

and it would not avail him that he had recovered it at the time of entering on the inheritance. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. 5.)

The classes mentioned in the concluding portion of this paragraph might have the rights of citizenship, and only be accidentally prevented from exercising those rights.

5. Extraneis autem hereditibus deliberandi potestas est de adeunda hereditate vel non adeunda. Sed sive is, cui abstinendi potestas est, immiscuerit se bonis hereditariis, sive extraneus, cui de adeunda hereditate deliberare licet, adierit, postea relinquendæ hereditatis facultatem non habet, nisi minor sit annis viginti quinque: nam hujus ætatis hominibus sicut in ceteris omnibus causis deceptis, ita et si temere damnosam hereditatem susceperint, prætor succurrit.

5. Extranei heredes may deliberate whether they will enter upon the inheritance or not. But, if one, who has the liberty of abstaining, intermeddles with the property of the inheritance, or an extraneus heres, who is permitted to deliberate, enters on the inheritance, it will not afterwards be in his power to renounce the inheritance, unless he shall be under twenty-five years; for the prætor, as in all other cases he relieves persons of this age who have been deceived, so too he does when they have rashly taken upon themselves a burdensome inheritance.

GAI. II. 162, 163.

There was no fixed time within which it was necessary that the heir should decide whether to accept or reject the inheritance, excepting when the testator fixed the time himself by what was termed cretio. (See note to paragr. 7.) Those who were interested in his making a decision could compel him by action to do so, and the prætor then, if he wished, allowed him time to deliberate, never less than one hundred days. Justinian enacted that the time given should not exceed nine months, or, as a special favour from the emperor, a year. If he did not decide within the appointed time, he was taken to have rejected the inheritance, if the action to compel a decision was brought by substituted heirs or a heres ab intestato; to have accepted it, if the action was brought by legatees or creditors. If he died before the expiration of the time, and within a year of the first commencement of his right to enter on the inheritance, his heir could, during the unexpired remainder of the time, decide in his place. (C. vi. 30. 19.)

The mode by which the prætor interfered for the protection of minors was called restitutio in integrum. (See note on Bk. i. Tit. 23. pr.)

6. Sciendum tamen est, divum Hadrianum etiam majori viginti quinque annis veniam dedisse, cum post aditam hereditatem grande æs alienum, quod aditæ hereditatis tempore latebat, emersisset. Sed hoc divus quidem Hadrianus speciali beneficio cuidam præstitit; divus autem Gordianus postea in militibus tantummodo hoc extendit: sed nostra benevolentia commune omni-

6. The Emperor Hadrian, however, once gave permission to a person above twenty-five years to relinquish an inheritance, when it appeared to be encumbered with a great debt, which was unknown at the time that he entered on the inheritance. But this was granted as a special favour to a particular person. The Emperor Gordian afterwards extended privilege, but only to soldiers.

bus subjectis imperio nostro hoc præstavit beneficium et constitutionem tam æquissimam quam nobilem scripsit, cujus tenorem si observaverint homines, licet eis adire hereditatem et in tantum teneri, in quantum valere bona hereditatis contingit, ut ex hac causa neque deliberationis auxilium eis fiat necessarium, nisi omnia observatione nostræ constitutionis et deliberandum existimaverint et sese veteri gravamini aditionis supponere maluerint.

we in our goodness have rendered this benefit common to all our subjects, having dictated a constitution as just as it is illustrious, by which, if heirs will attend to its provisions, they may enter upon their inheritance, and not be liable beyond the value of the goods; so that they need not have recourse to deliberation, unless, neglecting to conform to our constitution, they prefer to deliberate and submit themselves to the liabilities attending the entering on the inheritance under the old law.

GAL. ii. 163; C. vi. 30. 22.

Commentators have termed the privilege referred to here the beneficium inventarii. Within thirty days after the heir became acquainted with his rights, an inventory of the property might be begun, which was to be finished within ninety days from the same time. This inventory was to be made in presence of a tabellio, or public notary, and of any parties interested who might wish to be present, or else of three witnesses.

If the heir chose to avail himself of this privilege, he entirely separated the estate of the testator from his own; he could deduct anything that might be owing to him from it, and had to pay to it anything he might owe. He first paid the expenses of the funeral and of the inventory, and then all the creditors in the order in which they sent in their claims. If there was any surplus, he took it; if any deficiency, he was not liable. (C. vi. 30. 22.)

Justinian, by this sweeping change, entirely altered the position of the heir. He was no longer the representative of the deceased, bound to see that the debts of the deceased were paid. His estate and that of the testator were now distinct. He merely distributed the property which the deceased left, and if the deceased owed him anything he was entitled to pay himself as a creditor. Justinian did not, indeed, enact that every heir should hold this new character, but he took away the Falcidian fourth from an heir who did not make an inventory, and left him to pay not only the debts, but the legacies, even if the estate was insufficient for the purpose, so that heirs had every possible motive to accept the new position opened to them. (Nov. 1. 2. 2.)

7. Item extraneus heres, testamento institutus aut ab intestato ad legitimam hereditatem vocatus, potest aut pro herede gerendo vel etiam nuda voluntate suscipiendæ hereditatis heres fieri. Pro herede autem gerere quis videtur, si rebus hereditariis tamquam heres utatur vel vendendo res hereditarias aut prædia colendo locandove et quoquo modo, si voluntatem suam declaret vel re vel verbis de aedeunda

7. An extraneus heres, instituted heir by testament, or called by law to a legal succession ab intestato, may become heir, either by doing some act as heir or even by the mere wish to accept the inheritance. And a man acts as heir if he treats any of the goods of the inheritance as his own, by selling any part, or by cultivating the ground, or letting it, or in any other way declares, either by act or word, his intention to enter on the in-

bus subjectis imperio nostro hoc præstavit beneficium et constitutionem tam æquissimam quam nobilem scripsit, cujus tenorem si observaverint homines, licet eis adire hereditatem et in tantum teneri, in quantum valere bona hereditatis contingit, ut ex hac causa neque deliberationis auxilium eis fiat necessarium, nisi omissa observatione nostræ constitutionis et deliberandum existimaverint et sese veteri gravamini additionis supponere maluerint.

we in our goodness have rendered this benefit common to all our subjects, having dictated a constitution as just as it is illustrious, by which, if heirs will attend to its provisions, they may enter upon their inheritance, and not be liable beyond the value of the goods; so that they need not have recourse to deliberation, unless, neglecting to conform to our constitution, they prefer to deliberate and submit themselves to the liabilities attending the entering on the inheritance under the old law.

GAI. ii. 168; C. vi. 30. 22.

Commentators have termed the privilege referred to here the beneficium inventarii. Within thirty days after the heir became acquainted with his rights, an inventory of the property might be begun, which was to be finished within ninety days from the same time. This inventory was to be made in presence of a tabellio, or public notary, and of any parties interested who might wish to be present, or else of three witnesses.

If the heir chose to avail himself of this privilege, he entirely separated the estate of the testator from his own; he could deduct anything that might be owing to him from it, and had to pay to it anything he might owe. He first paid the expenses of the funeral and of the inventory, and then all the creditors in the order in which they sent in their claims. If there was any surplus, he took it; if any deficiency, he was not liable. (C. vi. 30. 22.)

Justinian, by this sweeping change, entirely altered the position of the heir. He was no longer the representative of the deceased, bound to see that the debts of the deceased were paid. His estate and that of the testator were now distinct. He merely distributed the property which the deceased left, and if the deceased owed him anything he was entitled to pay himself as a creditor. Justinian did not, indeed, enact that every heir should hold this new character, but he took away the Falcidian fourth from an heir who did not make an inventory, and left him to pay not only the debts, but the legacies, even if the estate was insufficient for the purpose, so that heirs had every possible motive to accept the new position opened to them. (Nov. 1. 2. 2.)

7. Item extraneus heres, testamento institutus aut ab intestato ab legitimam hereditatem vocatus, potest aut pro herede gerendo vel etiam nuda voluntate suscipiendæ hereditatis heres fieri. Pro herede autem gerere quis videtur, si rebus hereditariis tamquam heres utatur vel vendendo res hereditarias aut prædia colendo locandove et quoquo modo, si voluntatem suam declaret vel re vel verbis de adeunda

7. An extraneus heres, instituted heir by testament, or called by law to a legal succession ab intestato, may become heir, either by doing some act as heir or even by the mere wish to accept the inheritance. And a man acts as heir if he treats any of the goods of the inheritance as his own, by selling any part, or by cultivating the ground, or letting it, or in any other way declares, either by act or word, his intention to enter on the inextraneus heres one heir by mere wish doing some act

I II
III

hereditate, dummodo sciat, eum, in cuius bonis pro herede gerit, testato intestatoque obuisse et se ei heredem esse. Pro herede enim gerere est pro domino gerere: veteres enim heredes pro dominis appellabant. Sicut autem nuda voluntate extraneus heres fit, ita et contraria destinatione statim ab hereditate repellitur. Eum, qui mutus vel surdus natus est vel postea factus, nihil prohibet pro herede gerere et adquirere sibi hereditatem, si tamen intellegit, quod agitur.

heritance, provided only that he knows that the person, with respect to whose estate he acts as heir, is dead, testate or intestate, and that he himself is the heir; for to act as heir is to act as proprietor; as the ancients frequently used the term heir to denote the proprietor. But as an extraneus heres may become heir by a mere intention, so, on the contrary, by a contrary intention, he is at once barred from the inheritance. Nothing prevents a person who was born deaf or dumb, or subsequently became so, from acting as heir, and acquiring for himself the inheritance, if only he knows what is done.

GAI. ii. 166, 167, 169; D. xxix. 2. 5.

Besides the two modes here mentioned of ascertaining the entrance of the extraneus heres on the inheritance, namely, forming an intention to do so, and doing some act as heir, there was a mode, abolished by a constitution of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius (A.D. 407), called cretio. Cretio appellata est, quia cernere est quasi decernere et constituere. (GAI. ii. 164.) The testator himself, in his will, fixed the time within which the heir was to decide whether he would accept the inheritance. The form ran thus: Titius heres esto cernitoque in diebus centum proximis quibus scieris poterisque. If the words quibus scieris poterisque were inserted, the time ran from the period when the heir became acquainted with his rights, and could avail himself of them; this was called the cretio vulgaris. If they were omitted, the time ran from the period when the rights accrued to him; this was called the cretio continua, because the time ran on continuously whether the heir knew of his rights or not. The heir could alter his decision at any time within the limited period. His decision was expressed, when made, by forms more solemn than when the aditio was made by a simple declaration of intention. (Vide GAI. in loc. cit. ULP. Reg. xxii. 27 et seq.)

3 Forma
cretio

Adcre herede

Forma
of the cretio

The heir was said adire hereditatem whenever he in any way entered on the inheritance, whether by doing some act as heir (pro herede gerere) or by the mere intention to be heir (nuda voluntate). Of course this intention would be manifested in some way or other; but it was the formation, not the expression, of the intention that constituted the entrance on the inheritance. Properly speaking, one person could not enter on an inheritance for another; but there were necessarily exceptions, such as that a tutor might accept an inheritance in behalf of his infant pupil. No one could enter on part of the inheritance, nor could he enter conditionally, or for a certain time. Directly he did enter, he was, under the law before Justinian, clothed with the persona of the deceased, whom he represented as if he had succeeded immediately on his death. (D. xxix. 2. 54.)

1 one person could not enter the inheritance for another
But a tutor could.
2 no one could enter on part of the inheritance nor conditionally or for a certain time hereditate, dummodo sciat, eum, in cuius bonis pro herede gerit, testato intestatove obiisse et se ei heredem esse. Pro herede enim gerere est pro domino gerere: veteres enim heredes pro dominis appellabant. Sicut autem nuda voluntate extraneus heres fit, ita et contraria destinatione statim ab hereditate repellitur. Eum, qui mutus vel surdus natus est vel postea factus, nihil prohibet pro herede gerere et adquirere sibi hereditatem, si tamen intellegit, quod agitur.

heritance, provided only that he knows that the person, with respect to whose estate he acts as heir, is dead, testate or intestate, and that he himself is the heir; for to act as heir is to act as proprietor; as the ancients frequently used the term heir to denote the proprietor. But as an extraneus heres may become heir by a mere intention, so, on the contrary, by a contrary intention, he is at once barred from the inheritance. Nothing prevents a person who was born deaf or dumb, or subsequently became so, from acting as heir, and acquiring for himself the inheritance, if only he knows what is done.

GAI. ii. 166, 167, 169; D. xxix. 2. 5.

Besides the two modes here mentioned of ascertaining the entrance of the extraneus heres on the inheritance, namely, forming an intention to do so, and doing some act as heir, there was a mode, abolished by a constitution of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius (A.D. 407), called cretio. Cretio appellata est, quia cernere est quasi decernere et constituere. (GAI. ii. 164.) The testator himself, in his will, fixed the time within which the heir was to decide whether he would accept the inheritance. The form ran thus: Titius heres esto cernitoque in diebus centum proximis quibus scieris poterisque. If the words quibus scieris poterisque were inserted, the time ran from the period when the heir became acquainted with his rights, and could avail himself of them; this was called the cretio vulgaris. If they were omitted, the time ran from the period when the rights accrued to him; this was called the cretio continua, because the time ran on continuously whether the heir knew of his rights or not. The heir could alter his decision at any time within the limited period. His decision was expressed, when made, by forms more solemn than when the aditio was made by a simple declaration of intention. (Vide GAI. in loc. cit. ULP. Reg. xxii. 27 et seq.)

3 Forma
cre-

cretio

Adore hunde

Forma
of the cretio

The heir was said adire hereditatem whenever he in any way entered on the inheritance, whether by doing some act as heir (pro herede gerere) or by the mere intention to be heir (nuda voluntate). Of course this intention would be manifested in some way or other; but it was the formation, not the expression, of the intention that constituted the entrance on the inheritance. Properly speaking, one person could not enter on an inheritance for another; but there were necessarily exceptions, such as that a tutor might accept an inheritance in behalf of his infant pupil. No one could enter on part of the inheritance, nor could he enter conditionally, or for a certain time. Directly he did enter, he was, under the law before Justinian, clothed with the persona of the deceased, whom he represented as if he had succeeded immediately on his death. (D. xxix. 2. 54.)

1 one person could not enter inheritance for another

But a tutor could

2 no one could enter on part of inheritance nor conditionally or for a certain time

TIT. XX. DE LEGATIS.

Post hæc videamus de legatis. Quæ pars juris extra propositam quidem materiam videtur: nam loquimur de his juris figuris, quibus per universitatem res nobis adquiruntur. Sed cum omnino de testamentis deque heredibus, qui testamento instituuntur, locuti sumus, non sine causa sequenti loco potest hæc juris materia tractari.

We will now proceed to treat of legacies. This part of the law may not seem to fall within our present subject, namely, the discussion of those methods by which things are acquired per universitatem; but, as we have already spoken of all points concerning testaments and testamentary heirs, we may not improperly pass to the subject of legacies.

GAI. ii. 191.

A legacy, being a mode by which the property in one or more particular things is acquired, ought not, properly, to be discussed in the part of the Institutes devoted to the discussion of the modes of acquiring a universitas rerum.

In Roman law a legacy was that part of the inheritance which the heir is enjoined to pay or give over to a third person—Legatum quod legis modo, id est imperative, testamento relinquitur. (ULP. Reg. 24. 1.) Without an heir there could be no legacy; and therefore, if no instituted heir entered on the inheritance, the gift of the legacy was useless. The term was never applied, as in English law, to a direct bequest.

1. Legatum itaque est donatio quædam a defuncto relicta.

1. A legacy is a kind of gift left by a deceased person.

D. xxxi. 36.

2. Sed olim quidem erant legatorum genera quattuor: per vindicationem, per damnationem, sinendi modo, per præceptionem: et certa quædam verba cuique generi legatorum adsignata erant, per quæ singula genera legatorum significabantur. Sed ex constitutionibus divorum principum sollemnitas hujusmodi verborum penitus sublata est. Nostra autem constitutio, quam cum magna fecimus lucubratione, defunctorum voluntates validiores esse cupientes et non verbis sed voluntatibus eorum faventes, disposuit, ut omnibus legatis una sit natura et, quibuscumque verbis aliquid derelictum sit, liceat legatariis id persequi non solum per actiones personales, sed etiam per in rem et per hypothecariam: cujus constitutionis perpensum modum ex ipsius tenore perfectissime accipere possibile est.

2. Formerly, there were four kinds of legacies, namely, per vindicationem, per damnationem, sinendi modo, and per præceptionem. There was a certain form of words proper to each of these, by which they were distinguished one from another. But these solemn forms have been wholly suppressed by imperial constitutions. We also, desirous of giving respect to the wishes of deceased persons, and regarding their intentions more than their words, have, by a constitution composed with great study, enacted that the nature of all legacies shall be the same, and that legatees, whatever may be the words employed in the testament, may sue for what is left them, not only by a personal, but by a real, or an hypothecary action. The well-weighed scheme of this constitution may be easily seen by a perusal of its dispositions.

GAI. ii. 192-223; C. vi. 37. 21; C. vi. 43. 1.

TIT. XX. DE LEGATIS.

Post hæc videamus de legatis. Quæ pars juris extra propositam quidem materiam videtur: nam loquimur de his juris figuris, quibus per universitatem res nobis adquiruntur. Sed cum omnino de testamentis deque heredibus, qui testamento instituuntur, locuti sumus, non sine causa sequenti loco potest hæc juris materia tractari.

We will now proceed to treat of legacies. This part of the law may not seem to fall within our present subject, namely, the discussion of those methods by which things are acquired per universitatem; but, as we have already spoken of all points concerning testaments and testamentary heirs, we may not improperly pass to the subject of legacies.

GAL. ii. 191.

A legacy, being a mode by which the property in one or more particular things is acquired, ought not, properly, to be discussed in the part of the Institutes devoted to the discussion of the modes of acquiring a universitas rerum.

In Roman law a legacy was that part of the inheritance which the heir is enjoined to pay or give over to a third person—Legatum quod legis modo, id est imperative, testamento relinquitur. (ULP. Reg. 24. 1.) Without an heir there could be no legacy; and therefore, if no instituted heir entered on the inheritance, the gift of the legacy was useless. The term was never applied, as in English law, to a direct bequest.

1. Legatum itaque est donatio quædam a defuncto relicta.

1. A legacy is a kind of gift left by a deceased person.

D. xxxi. 36.

2. Sed olim quidem erant legatorum genera quattuor: per vindicationem, per damnationem, sinendi modo, per præceptionem: et certa quædam verba cuique generi legatorum adsignata erant, per quæ singula genera legatorum significabantur. Sed ex constitutionibus divorum principum sollemnitas hujusmodi verborum penitus sublata est. Nostra autem constitutio, quam cum magna fecimus lucubratione, defunctorum voluntates validiores esse cupientes et non verbis sed voluntatibus eorum faventes, disposuit, ut omnibus legatis una sit natura et, quibuscumque verbis aliquid derelictum sit, liceat legatariis id persequi non solum per actiones personales, sed etiam per in rem et per hypothecariam: cujus constitutionis perpensum modum ex ipsius tenore perfectissime accipere possibile est.

2. Formerly, there were four kinds of legacies, namely, per vindicationem, per damnationem, sinendi modo, and per præceptionem. There was a certain form of words proper to each of these, by which they were distinguished one from another. But these solemn forms have been wholly suppressed by imperial constitutions. We also, desirous of giving respect to the wishes of deceased persons, and regarding their intentions more than their words, have, by a constitution composed with great study, enacted that the nature of all legacies shall be the same, and that legatees, whatever may be the words employed in the testament, may sue for what is left them, not only by a personal, but by a real, or an hypothecary action. The well-weighed scheme of this constitution may be easily seen by a perusal of its dispositions.

GAL. ii. 192-223; C. vi. 37. 21; C. vi. 43. 1.

Per vindicationem. The formula in this species of legacy ran thus: 'Hominem Stichum do lego;' or 'do;' or 'capito sumito, sibi habeto.' The legacy was said to be per vindicationem, because, immediately on the heir entering on the inheritance, the subject of the legacy became the property of the legatee ex jure Quiritium, who could accordingly claim it by vindicatio. The testator could only give, in this way, things of which he had the dominium ex jure Quiritium, both at the time of making the testament and of his death; excepting that such dominium at the time of death alone was sufficient when the subject of the legacy was anything appreciable by weight, number, or measure, as wine, oil, money, &c. (GAI. ii. 193-200.)

Per damnationem. The formula ran thus: 'Heres meus damnas esto dare;' or 'Dato, facito, heredem meum dare jubeo.' The legatee did not, by this legacy, become proprietor of the subject of the legacy; but he had a personal action against the heir to compel him to give (dare), to procure (præstare), or to do (facere), that which the terms of the legacy directed. Anything could be given by this legacy that could become the subject of an obligation, whether the property of the testator, the heir, or any one else. The rights it gave were, therefore, said to be the optimum jus legati (ULP. Reg. 24. 11). (GAI. ii. 200-208.)

Sinendi modo. The formula of this kind of legacy was: 'Heres meus damnas esto sinere Lucium Titium sumere illam rem sibi que habere.' (ULP. Reg. xxiv. 5.) The heir is to allow the legatee to take the thing given. This form, then, was applicable to anything that belonged to the testator or to the heir, but not to anything belonging to a third person. The legatee did not become the owner of the thing given until he took possession. If the heir refused to allow the legatee to take possession, the legatee might compel him to do so by the personal action termed 'Quicquid heredem ex testamento dare facere oportet.' (GAI. ii. 209-215.)

Per præceptionem. The formula ran: 'Lucius Titius illam rem præcipito' (i.e. take beforehand). The proper application of this form was to a gift, made to one already instituted co-heir, of some part of the inheritance which he was to take as legatee before receiving his share as heir. The heir could enforce his claim to this something beyond his share by the action termed judicium familie erciscundæ, i.e. for having the inheritance portioned out by a judge, who assigned the thing given by the legacy to the heir as legatee. It was only by a mistake in language that this form was applied to a gift to a person not an heir, and to a gift of something not forming part of the inheritance; but a gift made in this form to a person not heir was not void; for the senatusconsultum Neronianum, about A.D. 60, made every such legacy valid as a legacy per damnationem. Gaius mentions that the Proculians attempted to get over the difficulty where the word præcipito was used to give a legacy to a person not heir, by reading 'præcipito' as 'capito;' and this construction was apparently confirmed by a constitution of Hadrian. (GAI. ii. 216-222.)

Per vindicationem. The formula in this species of legacy ran thus: 'Hominem Stichum do lego,' or 'do;' or 'capito sumito, sibi habeto.' The legacy was said to be per vindicationem, because, immediately on the heir entering on the inheritance, the subject of the legacy became the property of the legatee ex jure Quiritium, who could accordingly claim it by vindicatio. The testator could only give, in this way, things of which he had the dominium ex jure Quiritium, both at the time of making the testament and of his death; excepting that such dominium at the time of death alone was sufficient when the subject of the legacy was anything appreciable by weight, number, or measure, as wine, oil, money, &c. (GAI. ii. 193-200.)

Per damnationem. The formula ran thus: 'Heres meus damnas esto dare;' or 'Dato, facito, heredem meum dare jubeo.' The legatee did not, by this legacy, become proprietor of the subject of the legacy; but he had a personal action against the heir to compel him to give (dare), to procure (præstare), or to do (facere), that which the terms of the legacy directed. Anything could be given by this legacy that could become the subject of an obligation, whether the property of the testator, the heir, or any one else. The rights it gave were, therefore, said to be the optimum jus legati (ULP. Reg. 24. 11). (GAI. ii. 200-208.)

Sinendi modo. The formula of this kind of legacy was: 'Heres meus damnas esto sinere Lucium Titium sumere illam rem sibi que habere.' (ULP. Reg. xxiv. 5.) The heir is to allow the legatee to take the thing given. This form, then, was applicable to anything that belonged to the testator or to the heir, but not to anything belonging to a third person. The legatee did not become the owner of the thing given until he took possession. If the heir refused to allow the legatee to take possession, the legatee might compel him to do so by the personal action termed 'Quicquid heredem ex testamento dare facere oportet.' (GAI. ii. 209-215.)

Per præceptionem. The formula ran: 'Lucius Titius illam rem præcipito' (i.e. take beforehand). The proper application of this form was to a gift, made to one already instituted co-heir, of some part of the inheritance which he was to take as legatee before receiving his share as heir. The heir could enforce his claim to this something beyond his share by the action termed judicium familie eriscundæ, i.e. for having the inheritance portioned out by a judge, who assigned the thing given by the legacy to the heir as legatee. It was only by a mistake in language that this form was applied to a gift to a person not an heir, and to a gift of something not forming part of the inheritance; but a gift made in this form to a person not heir was not void; for the senatusconsultum Neronianum, about A.D. 60, made every such legacy valid as a legacy per damnationem. Gaius mentions that the Proculians attempted to get over the difficulty where the word præcipito was used to give a legacy to a person not heir, by reading 'præcipito' as 'capito;' and this construction was apparently confirmed by a constitution of Hadrian. (GAI. ii. 216-222.)

Under the imperial legislation the value attached to these formulae was gradually lessened. By the senatusconsultum Neronianum it was enacted that any legacy given in a form of words not suited to the gift intended should be as valid as one given in the form most favourable to the legatee; 'ut quod minus aptis verbis legatum est perinde sit ac si optimo jure legatum esset.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 11; GAI. ii. 197. 218.) The formulae remained, but a mistake in their use could no longer injure the legatee; and in every case the legacy, however expressed, had the effect of a legacy given per damnationem. In A.D. 342 a constitution of Constantius and Constans abolished the use of formulae in all legal acts. (C. ii. 58. 1.) The division of legacies still theoretically remained, but the appropriate formulae were no longer in use. Finally Justinian, as we see in the text, enacted that all legacies should be of the same nature, and that the legatee might enforce the legacy by personal, real, or hypothecary actions, according to the nature of the gift.

3. Sed non usque ad eam constitutionem standum esse existimavimus. Cum enim antiquitatem invenimus legata quidem stricte concludentem, fideicommissis autem, quæ ex voluntate magis descendebant defunctorum, pinguiorem naturam indulgentem, necessarium esse duximus omnia legata fideicommissis exæquare, ut nulla sit inter eâ differentia, sed quod deest legatis, hoc repleatur ex natura fideicommissorum et, si quid amplius est in legatis, per hoc crescat fideicommissi natura. Sed ne in primis legum cunabulis permixte de his exponendo studiosis adolescentibus quandam introducamus difficultatem, operæ pretium esse duximus, interim separatim prius de legatis et postea de fideicommissis tractare, ut natura utriusque juris cognita, facile possint permixtionem eorum eruditi suptilioribus auribus accipere.

3: We have not, however, judged it expedient to confine ourselves within the limits of this constitution; for, observing that the ancients confined legacies within strict rules, but accorded a greater latitude to fideicommissa as arising more immediately from the wishes of the deceased, we have thought it necessary to make all legacies equal to fideicommissa, so that no difference may remain between them. Whatever is wanting to legacies they will borrow from fideicommissa, and communicate to them any superiority they themselves may have. But, that we may not raise difficulties, and perplex the minds of young persons at their entrance upon the study of the law, by explaining these two subjects jointly, we have thought it worth while to treat separately, first of legacies and then of fideicommissa, that, the nature of each being known, the student, thus prepared, may understand them with keener appreciation when mixed up the one with the other.

C. vi. 43. 2.

All that remained, after the changes noticed in the text, to distinguish legacies from fideicommissa, was the general character of the expressions used. If they were imperative, the gift was a legacy: if they assumed the form of a request, and were given precativè, they were fideicommissa. If a gift was in form imperative, but it was not valid as a legacy, it was valid as a fideicommissum. If such a gift could be valid as a legacy, it was of course regarded as a legacy, and not as a fideicommissum.

Under the imperial legislation the value attached to these formulae was gradually lessened. By the senatusconsultum Neronianum it was enacted that any legacy given in a form of words not suited to the gift intended should be as valid as one given in the form most favourable to the legatee; 'ut quod minus aptis verbis legatum est perinde sit ac si optimo jure legatum esset.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 11; GAI. ii. 197. 218.) The formulae remained, but a mistake in their use could no longer injure the legatee; and in every case the legacy, however expressed, had the effect of a legacy given per damnationem. In A.D. 342 a constitution of Constantius and Constans abolished the use of formulae in all legal acts. (C. ii. 58. 1.) The division of legacies still theoretically remained, but the appropriate formulae were no longer in use. Finally Justinian, as we see in the text, enacted that all legacies should be of the same nature, and that the legatee might enforce the legacy by personal, real, or hypothecary actions, according to the nature of the gift.

3. Sed non usque ad eam constitutionem standum esse existimavimus. Cum enim antiquitatem invenimus legata quidem stricte concludentem, fideicommissis autem, quæ ex voluntate magis descendebant defunctorum, pinguiorem naturam indulgentem, necessarium esse duximus omnia legata fideicommissis exæquare, ut nulla sit inter eâ differentia, sed quod deest legatis, hoc repleatur ex natura fideicommissorum et, si quid amplius est in legatis, per hoc crescat fideicommissi natura. Sed ne in primis legum cunabulis permixte de his exponendo studiosis adulescentibus quandam introducamus difficultatem, operæ pretium esse duximus, interim separatim prius de legatis et postea de fideicommissis tractare, ut natura utriusque juris cognita, facile possint permixtionem eorum eruditi suptilioribus auribus accipere.

3: We have not, however, judged it expedient to confine ourselves within the limits of this constitution; for, observing that the ancients confined legacies within strict rules, but accorded a greater latitude to fideicommissa as arising more immediately from the wishes of the deceased, we have thought it necessary to make all legacies equal to fideicommissa, so that no difference may remain between them. Whatever is wanting to legacies they will borrow from fideicommissa, and communicate to them any superiority they themselves may have. But, that we may not raise difficulties, and perplex the minds of young persons at their entrance upon the study of the law, by explaining these two subjects jointly, we have thought it worth while to treat separately, first of legacies and then of fideicommissa, that, the nature of each being known, the student, thus prepared, may understand them with keener appreciation when mixed up the one with the other.

C. vi. 43. 2.

All that remained, after the changes noticed in the text, to distinguish legacies from fideicommissa, was the general character of the expressions used. If they were imperative, the gift was a legacy: if they assumed the form of a request, and were given precative, they were fideicommissa. If a gift was in form imperative, but it was not valid as a legacy, it was valid as a fideicommissum. If such a gift could be valid as a legacy, it was of course regarded as a legacy, and not as a fideicommissum.

leges were really made. It is even doubtful, as we have said before, whether the passages in which it is mentioned by Ulpian, the only writer before Constantine who is supposed to refer to it, are genuine. (See note on Tit. 9. 1.)

Eorum quibusdam. The right of disposing by testament of the quasi-castrense peculium had, before Justinian, been granted only to certain privileged classes, such as consuls and presidents of provinces, among those who were permitted to hold this kind of peculium. Justinian granted it to all. (C. iii. 28. 37; C. vi. 22. 12.)

It is to be observed, that soldiers had other testamentary privileges besides those mentioned in the text. They could institute as heirs persons who were generally incapacitated, such as those who had been deportati, or who were peregrini. (GAL. ii. 110.) They were not obliged formally to disinherit their children, if they knew that they had any (C. vi. 21. 9), their testament was not set aside as inofficious (C. iii. 28. 9), they could give more than three-fourths of their property in legacies (C. vi. 21. 12), they could die partly testate and partly intestate (D. xxix. 1. 6), and could dispose of the inheritance by codicils (D. xxix. 1. 36. pr.). The succeeding Title will show how much they thus differed from ordinary citizens. X O X

A TIT. XII. QUIBUS NON EST PERMISSUM TESTAMENTA FACERE.

A Non tamen omnibus licet facere testamentum. Statim enim hi, qui alieno juri subjecti sunt, testamenti faciendi jus non habent, adeo quidem ut, quamvis parentes eis permiserint, nihilo magis jure testari possint: exceptis his, quos antea enumeravimus et præcipue militibus, qui in potestate parentum sunt, quibus de eo, quod in castris adquisierint, permissum est ex constitutionibus principum testamentum facere. Quod quidem initio tantum militantibus datum est tam ex auctoritate divi Augusti quam Nervæ nec non optimi imperatoris Trajani; postea vero subscriptione divi Hadriani etiam dimissis militia, id est veteranis, concessum est. Itaque si quidem fecerint de castrensi peculio testamentum, pertinebit hoc ad eum, quem heredem reliquerint: si vero intestati decesserint, nullis liberis vel fratribus superstitibus, ad parentes eorum jure communi pertinebit. Ex hoc intellegere possumus, quod in castris adquisierit

The power of making a testament is not granted to every one. In the first place, persons in the power of others have not this right; so much so, that, although their ascendants give permission, still they cannot make a valid testament. We must except those whom we have already mentioned, and particularly filiifamiliarum who are soldiers, for the imperial constitutions have given them the power of bequeathing whatever they have acquired while on actual service. This permission was at first granted by the Emperors Augustus and Nerva, and the illustrious Emperor Trajan, to soldiers on service only; but afterwards it was extended by the Emperor Hadrian to veterans, that is, to soldiers who had received their discharge; and therefore, if a filiusfamilias disposes by testament of his castrense peculium, this peculium will belong to the person whom he makes his heir: but, if he dies intestate, without children or brothers, this peculium will then belong, according to the ordinary leges were really made. It is even doubtful, as we have said before, whether the passages in which it is mentioned by Ulpian, the only writer before Constantine who is supposed to refer to it, are genuine. (See note on Tit. 9. 1.)

Eorum quibusdam. The right of disposing by testament of the quasi-castrense peculium had, before Justinian, been granted only to certain privileged classes, such as consuls and presidents of provinces, among those who were permitted to hold this kind of peculium. Justinian granted it to all. (C. iii. 28. 37; C. vi. 22. 12.)

It is to be observed, that soldiers had other testamentary privileges besides those mentioned in the text. They could institute as heirs persons who were generally incapacitated, such as those who had been deportati, or who were peregrini. (GAI. ii. 110.) They were not obliged formally to disinherit their children, if they knew that they had any (C. vi. 21. 9), their testament was not set aside as inofficious (C. iii. 28. 9), they could give more than three-fourths of their property in legacies (C. vi. 21. 12), they could die partly testate and partly intestate (D. xxix. 1. 6), and could dispose of the inheritance by codicils (D. xxix. 1. 36. pr.). The succeeding Title will show how much they thus differed from ordinary citizens. XOX

A TIT. XII. QUIBUS NON EST PERMISSUM TESTAMENTA FACERE.

A Non tamen omnibus licet facere testamentum. Statim enim hi, qui alieno juri subjecti sunt, testamenti faciendi jus non habent, adeo quidem ut, quamvis parentes eis permiserint, nihilo magis jure testari possint: exceptis his, quos antea enumeravimus et præcipue militibus, qui in potestate parentum sunt, quibus de eo, quod in castris adquisierint, permissum est ex constitutionibus principum testamentum facere. Quod quidem initio tantum militantibus datum est tam ex auctoritate divi Augusti quam Nervæ nec non optimi imperatoris Trajani; postea vero subscriptione divi Hadriani etiam dimissis militia, id est veteranis, concessum est. Itaque si quidem fecerint de castrensi peculio testamentum, pertinebit hoc ad eum, quem heredem reliquerint: si vero intestati decesserint, nullis liberis vel fratribus superstitibus, ad parentes eorum jure communi pertinebit. Ex hoc intellegere possumus, quod in castris adquisierit

The power of making a testament is not granted to every one. In the first place, persons in the power of others have not this right; so much so, that, although their ascendants give permission, still they cannot make a valid testament. We must except those whom we have already mentioned, and particularly filii familiarum who are soldiers, for the imperial constitutions have given them the power of bequeathing whatever they have acquired while on actual service. This permission was at first granted by the Emperors Augustus and Nerva, and the illustrious Emperor Trajan, to soldiers on service only; but afterwards it was extended by the Emperor Hadrian to veterans, that is, to soldiers who had received their discharge; and therefore, if a filius familias disposes by testament of his castrense peculium, this peculium will belong to the person whom he makes his heir: but, if he dies intestate, without children or brothers, this peculium will then belong, according to the ordinary miles, qui in potestate patris est, neque ipsum patrem adimere posse neque patris creditores id vendere vel aliter inquietare neque, patre mortuo, cum fratribus esse commune, sed scilicet proprium ejus esse id, quod in castris adquisierit, quamquam jure civili omnium, qui in potestate parentum sunt, peculia perinde in bonis parentum computantur, acsi servorum peculia in bonis dominorum numerantur: exceptis videlicet his, quæ ex sacris constitutionibus et præcipue nostris propter diversas causas non adquiruntur. Præter hos igitur, qui castrense peculium vel quasi castrense habent, si quis alius filiusfamilias testamentum fecerit, inutile est, licet suæ potestatis factus decesserit.

law of the patria potestas, to the person in whose power he is, We may hence infer, that whatever a soldier, although under power, has acquired while on service, cannot be taken from him even by his father, nor can his father's creditors sell it, or otherwise disturb the son in his possession, nor is he bound to share it with brothers upon the death of his father, but it remains his sole property, although, by the civil law, the peculia of all those who are in the power of ascendants are reckoned among the goods of their ascendants, exactly as the peculium of a slave is reckoned among the goods of his master; those goods excepted, which by the constitutions of the emperors, and especially by our own, are prevented, for different reasons, from being so acquired. With the exception, therefore, of those who have a castrense or quasi-castrense peculium, if any other filiusfamilias makes a testament, it is useless, although he becomes sui juris before his death.

D. xxviii. 1. 6; D. xxix. 1. 1; C. vi. 61. 3. 4; C. vi. 59. 11; D. xlix. 17. 10; D. xxxvii. 6. 1. 15; D. xxviii. 1. 19.

The first thing, says Gaius (ii. 114), which we have to inquire, if we wish to know whether a testament is valid, is whether the person who made it had the testamenti factio, that is, in this instance, had the right to take the part of testator in the making of a testament. To be able to do this he must have the commercium; and further, he must be sui juris, or otherwise, as he could have no property, he could have nothing to dispose of by testament. Every Roman citizen who was sui juris had the right of making a testament, and if he was capable of exercising his right, and made a formal testament, this testament was valid.

As to the persons incapacitated to make a will, see note on Tit. 10. 6.

The filiusfamilias could have no property independently of his father, and he could not dispose of the property he might have if he became sui juris by outliving his father, because a future interest would not pass by mancipation. This was a part of the public law (testamenti factio non privati sed publici juris est, D. xxviii. 1. 3), and could not be waived by the mere consent of a private individual. It required express enactment to alter the law, and it was so far altered as to permit a filiusfamilias to dispose by testament of a castrense or quasi-castrense peculium. (See paragr. 6. of preceding Title.) If, however, the possessor of the peculium did not dispose of it by testament, the head of the family took it, previously to the time of Justinian, not as heir ab intestato, but as lawful claimant of a peculium. For the possessor, miles, qui in potestate patris est, neque ipsum patrem adimere posse neque patris creditores id vendere vel aliter inquietare neque, patre mortuo, cum fratribus esse commune, sed scilicet proprium ejus esse id, quod in castris adquisierit, quamquam jure civili omnium, qui in potestate parentum sunt, peculia perinde in bonis parentum computantur, acsi servorum peculia in bonis dominorum numerantur: exceptis videlicet his, quæ ex sacris constitutionibus et præcipue nostris propter diversas causas non adquiruntur. Præter hos igitur, qui castrense peculium vel quasi castrense habent, si quis alius filiusfamilias testamentum fecerit, inutile est, licet suæ potestatis factus decesserit.

law of the patria potestas, to the person in whose power he is, We may hence infer, that whatever a soldier, although under power, has acquired while on service, cannot be taken from him even by his father, nor can his father's creditors sell it, or otherwise disturb the son in his possession, nor is he bound to share it with brothers upon the death of his father, but it remains his sole property, although, by the civil law, the peculia of all those who are in the power of ascendants are reckoned among the goods of their ascendants, exactly as the peculium of a slave is reckoned among the goods of his master; those goods excepted, which by the constitutions of the emperors, and especially by our own, are prevented, for different reasons, from being so acquired. With the exception, therefore, of those who have a castrense or quasi-castrense peculium, if any other filiusfamilias makes a testament, it is useless, although he becomes sui juris before his death.

D. xxviii. 1. 6; D. xxix. 1. 1; C. vi. 61. 3. 4; C. vi. 59. 11; D. xlix. 17. 10; D. xxxvii. 6. 1. 15; D. xxviii. 1. 19.

The first thing, says Gaius (ii. 114), which we have to inquire, if we wish to know whether a testament is valid, is whether the person who made it had the testamenti factio, that is, in this instance, had the right to take the part of testator in the making of a testament. To be able to do this he must have the commercium; and further, he must be sui juris, or otherwise, as he could have no property, he could have nothing to dispose of by testament. Every Roman citizen who was sui juris had the right of making a testament, and if he was capable of exercising his right, and made a formal testament, this testament was valid.

As to the persons incapacitated to make a will, see note on Tit. 10. 6.

The filiusfamilias could have no property independently of his father, and he could not dispose of the property he might have if he became sui juris by outliving his father, because a future interest would not pass by mancipation. This was a part of the public law (testamenti factio non privati sed publici juris est, D. xxviii. 1. 3), and could not be waived by the mere consent of a private individual. It required express enactment to alter the law, and it was so far altered as to permit a filiusfamilias to dispose by testament of a castrense or quasi-castrense peculium. (See paragr. 6. of preceding Title.) If, however, the possessor of the peculium did not dispose of it by testament, the head of the family took it, previously to the time of Justinian, not as heir ab intestato, but as lawful claimant of a peculium. For the possessor, not having exercised the power the law gave him, was in the same position as if the law had never permitted such a disposition. Justinian deferred this claim of the head of the family, when the possessor of the peculium had left children or brothers. If he had not left any, the head of the family then took the peculium; whether in right of his headship, or as heir ab intestato, is a disputed point. We have, however, the authority of Theophilus in the paraphrase of this paragraph for supposing, that when Justinian in the text says he took it jure communi, it is meant that he took it by the right of patria potestas, and there seems no necessity for understanding the passage otherwise.

1. Præterea testamentum facere non possunt impuberes, quia nullum eorum animi judicium est; item furiosi, quia mente carent. Nec ad rem pertinet, si impubes postea pubes factus aut furiosus postea compos mentis factus fuerit et decesserit. Furiosi autem si per id tempus fecerint testamentum, quo furor eorum intermissus est, jure testati esse videntur, certe eo, quod ante furorem fecerint, testamento valente: nam neque testamenta recte facta neque aliud ullum negotium recte gestum postea furor interveniens peremit.

1. Persons, again, under the age of puberty cannot make a testament, because they have not the requisite judgment of mind, nor can madmen, for they are deprived of their senses. Nor does it make any difference that the former arrive at puberty, or the latter regain their senses, before they die. But if a madman makes a testament during a lucid interval, his testament is valid; and, of course, a testament which he has made before being seized with madness is valid, for subsequent madness can invalidate neither a previous testament duly made, nor any other previous act duly performed.

C. xxii. 22. 9; D. xxviii. 1. 20. 4.

In this and the succeeding paragraphs of this Title, instances are given of persons who have the right, but are not capable of exercising it. A testament made by a person incapable of exercising the right was not rendered valid by his subsequently becoming capable, nor one made by a person capable rendered invalid by his subsequently becoming incapable.

2. Item prodigus, cui bonorum suorum administratio interdicta est, testamentum facere non potest, sed id, quod ante fecerit, quam interdicio ei bonorum fiat, ratum est.

2. A prodigal also, who is interdicted from the management of his own affairs, cannot make a testament; but a testament made before such interdiction is valid.

D. xxviii. 1. 18.

3. Item mutus et surdus non semper facere testamentum possunt. Utique autem de eo surdo loquimur, qui omnino non exaudit, non qui tarde exaudit: nam et mutus is intellegitur, qui eloqui nihil potest, non qui tarde loquitur. Sæpe autem etiam litterati et eruditi homines variis casibus et audiendi et loquendi facultatem amittunt: unde nostra constitutio etiam his subvenit, ut certis casibus et modis secundum normam ejus possint testari aliaque

3. Again, a deaf or a dumb person is not always capable of making a testament: by deaf, we mean one who is so deaf as to be unable to hear at all, not one who hears with difficulty; and by dumb, we mean a person who cannot speak at all, not one who merely speaks with difficulty. For it often happens, that even learned and erudite men lose by various accidents the faculty of hearing and speaking. Our constitution, therefore, comes to their aid, and permits them, in certain cases, not having exercised the power the law gave him, was in the same position as if the law had never permitted such a disposition. Justinian deferred this claim of the head of the family, when the possessor of the peculium had left children or brothers. If he had not left any, the head of the family then took the peculium; whether in right of his headship, or as heir ab intestato, is a disputed point. We have, however, the authority of Theophilus in the paraphrase of this paragraph for supposing, that when Justinian in the text says he took it jure communis, it is meant that he took it by the right of patria potestas, and there seems no necessity for understanding the passage otherwise.

1. Præterea testamentum facere non possunt impuberes, quia nullum eorum animi judicium est; item furiosi, quia mente carent. Nec ad rem pertinet, si impubes postea pubes factus aut furiosus postea compos mentis factus fuerit et decesserit. Furiosi autem si per id tempus fecerint testamentum, quo furor eorum intermissus est, jure testati esse videntur, certe eo, quod ante furorem fecerint, testamento valente: nam neque testamenta recte facta neque aliud ullum negotium recte gestum postea furor interveniens peremit.

1. Persons, again, under the age of puberty cannot make a testament, because they have not the requisite judgment of mind, nor can madmen, for they are deprived of their senses. Nor does it make any difference that the former arrive at puberty, or the latter regain their senses, before they die. But if a madman makes a testament during a lucid interval, his testament is valid; and, of course, a testament which he has made before being seized with madness is valid, for subsequent madness can invalidate neither a previous testament duly made, nor any other previous act duly performed.

C. xxii. 22. 9; D. xxviii. 1. 20. 4.

In this and the succeeding paragraphs of this Title, instances are given of persons who have the right, but are not capable of exercising it. A testament made by a person incapable of exercising the right was not rendered valid by his subsequently becoming capable, nor one made by a person capable rendered invalid by his subsequently becoming incapable.

2. Item prodigus, cui bonorum suorum administratio interdicta est, testamentum facere non potest, sed id, quod ante fecerit, quam interdictioni ei bonorum fiat, ratum est.

2. A prodigal also, who is interdicted from the management of his own affairs, cannot make a testament; but a testament made before such interdiction is valid.

D. xxviii. 1. 18.

3. Item mutus et surdus non semper facere testamentum possunt. Utique autem de eo surdo loquimur, qui omnino non exaudit, non qui tarde exaudit: nam et mutus is intellegitur, qui eloqui nihil potest, non qui tarde loquitur. Sæpe autem etiam litterati et eruditi homines variis casibus et audiendi et loquendi facultatem amittunt: unde nostra constitutio etiam his subvenit, ut certis casibus et modis secundum normam ejus possint testari aliaque

3. Again, a deaf or a dumb person is not always capable of making a testament: by deaf, we mean one who is so deaf as to be unable to hear at all, not one who hears with difficulty; and by dumb, we mean a person who cannot speak at all, not one who merely speaks with difficulty. For it often happens, that even learned and erudite men lose by various accidents the faculty of hearing and speaking. Our constitution, therefore, comes to their aid, and permits them, in certain cases, facere, quæ eis permissa sunt. Sed si quis post testamentum factum valetudine aut quolibet alio casu mutus aut surdus esse cœperit, ratum nihilo minus ejus remanet testamentum.

and with certain forms, to make testaments, and do many other acts, according to the rules therein laid down. But if any one, after making his testament, becomes deaf or dumb by reason of ill health or any other accident, his testament remains valid notwithstanding.

C. vi. 22. 10 ; D. xxviii. 1. 6. 1.

The constitution referred to (C. vi. 22. 10) permits a testament to be made by any deaf or dumb person not physically incapable of making one, i.e. by any one not deaf and dumb from birth.

4. Cæcus autem non potest facere testamentum nisi per observationem, quam lex divi Justinii patris mei introduxit.

4. A blind man, again, cannot make a testament except by observing the forms which the law of the Emperor Justin, our father, has introduced.

C. vi. 22. 8.

Justin, besides the seven witnesses ordinarily necessary, required in the case of a testament made by a blind man, whether blind through illness or from birth, that a notary (tabularius) should be present, or else an eighth witness, if a notary could not be found, who should either write at the dictation of the blind man, or read aloud to him a testament previously prepared. (C. vi. 22. 8.) But in this Justin only regulated and did not originate the testaments of the blind; they seem to have been always allowed.

5. Ejus, qui apud hostes est, testamentum, quod ibi fecit, non valet, quamvis redierit: sed quod, dum in civitate fuerat, fecit, sive redierit, valet jure postliminii, sive illic decesserit, valet ex lege Cornelia.

5. The testament of a captive in the power of an enemy is not valid, if made during his captivity, even although he subsequently returns. But a testament made while he was still in his own state is valid, either by the jus postliminii, if he returns, or by the lex Cornelia, if he dies in captivity.

D. xlix. 15. 18.

A captive was incapacitated from performing, during his captivity, any act good in law; and thus, though his right to make a testament was not lost, but only suspended, he was incapable, while a captive, of exercising the right. But if he had exercised it before his captivity, the testament was valid, whether he returned to his country or not. If he did return, the right not having been lost, and having been once duly exercised, the testament was valid jure postliminii. If he did not return, but died in captivity, it was still valid, as he was supposed, by a fiction of law, to have died at the moment when he was made captive, and so before his captivity had begun. This fiction was introduced by a rather strained construction of the terms of the lex Cornelia de falsis (678 A.U.C.), which provided that the same penalty should attach to the forgery of a testament of a person dying in captivity facere, quæ eis permissa sunt. Sed si quis post testamentum factum valetudine aut quolibet alio casu mutus aut surdus esse cœperit, ratum nihilo minus ejus remanet testamentum.

and with certain forms, to make testaments, and do many other acts, according to the rules therein laid down. But if any one, after making his testament, becomes deaf or dumb by reason of ill health or any other accident, his testament remains valid notwithstanding.

C. vi. 22. 10 ; D. xxviii. 1. 6. 1.

The constitution referred to (C. vi. 22. 10) permits a testament to be made by any deaf or dumb person not physically incapable of making one, i.e. by any one not deaf and dumb from birth.

4. Cæcus autem non potest facere testamentum nisi per observationem, quam lex divi Justinii patris mei introduxit.

4. A blind man, again, cannot make a testament except by observing the forms which the law of the Emperor Justin, our father, has introduced.

C. vi. 22. 8.

Justin, besides the seven witnesses ordinarily necessary, required in the case of a testament made by a blind man, whether blind through illness or from birth, that a notary (tabularius) should be present, or else an eighth witness, if a notary could not be found, who should either write at the dictation of the blind man, or read aloud to him a testament previously prepared. (C. vi. 22. 8.) But in this Justin only regulated and did not originate the testaments of the blind; they seem to have been always allowed.

5. Ejus, qui apud hostes est, testamentum, quod ibi fecit, non valet, quamvis redierit: sed quod, dum in civitate fuerat, fecit, sive redierit, valet jure postliminii, sive illic decesserit, valet ex lege Cornelia.

5. The testament of a captive in the power of an enemy is not valid, if made during his captivity, even although he subsequently returns. But a testament made while he was still in his own state is valid, either by the jus postliminii, if he returns, or by the lex Cornelia, if he dies in captivity.

D. xlix. 15. 18.

A captive was incapacitated from performing, during his captivity, any act good in law; and thus, though his right to make a testament was not lost, but only suspended, he was incapable, while a captive, of exercising the right. But if he had exercised it before his captivity, the testament was valid, whether he returned to his country or not. If he did return, the right not having been lost, and having been once duly exercised, the testament was valid jure postliminii. If he did not return, but died in captivity, it was still valid, as he was supposed, by a fiction of law, to have died at the moment when he was made captive, and so before his captivity had begun. This fiction was introduced by a rather strained construction of the terms of the lex Cornelia de falsis (678 A.U.C.), which provided that the same penalty should attach to the forgery of a testament of a person dying in captivity as to that of a testament made by a person dying in his own country. It was argued that the law could never have intended to attach a penalty to the forgery of a testament which was invalid. If it was valid, it could only be so by treating it as if made by a person who had not died in captivity, and whose right was not suspended at the time of his death. For it was necessary that a person should have the right of making a testament, (not only at the time when he made it, but also at the moment of his death; but in this we must distinguish between the right to make a testament, and the capacity of exercising that right; for the loss of capacity to make a testament did not, as we have seen, affect a testament made by one capable at the time of making it. This favourable interpretation of the lex Cornelia (beneficium legis Corneliae) (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 8) was gradually extended, so as to embrace every branch of law, such as tutorship, heirship, &c., to which it could be made applicable. In omnibus partibus juris is qui reversus non est ab hostibus quasi tunc decessisse videtur cum captus est. (D. xlix. 15. 18.)

TIT. XIII. DE EXHEREDATIONE LIBERORUM.

Non tamen, ut omnimodo valeat testamentum, sufficit hæc observatio, quam supra exposuimus. Sed qui filium in potestate habet, debet curare, ut eum heredem instituat vel exheredem nominatim faciat: alioquin si eum silentio præterierit, inutiliter testabitur, adeo quidem ut, etsi vivo patre filius mortuus sit, nemo ex eo testamento heres existere possit, quia scilicet ab initio non constituitur testamentum. Sed non ita de filiabus vel aliis per virilem sexum descendentibus liberis utriusque sexus fuerat antiquitati observatum; sed si non fuerant heredes scripti scriptæve vel exheredati exheredatæve, testamentum quidem non infirmabatur, jus autem adreascendi eis ad certam portionem præstabitur. Sed nec nominatim eas personas exheredare parentibus necesse erat, sed licebat et inter ceteros hoc facere.

The observance of the rules already laid down is not, however, all that is required to make a testament altogether valid. A person who has a son in his power must take care either to institute him his heir, or to disinherit him by name, for if he passes him over in silence, his testament will be of no effect; so much so, that even if the son dies while the father is alive, yet no one can be heir under the testament, because it was void from the beginning. But the ancients did not observe this rule with regard to daughters, or to other descendants, through the male line, of either sex; for although these were neither instituted heirs nor disinherited, yet the testament was not invalidated, only they had a right of joining themselves with the instituted heirs so as to receive a specified portion of the inheritance. Ascendants were not obliged to disinherit them by name, but might include them in the term ceteri.

GAI. ii. 115. 123, 124. 127.

The power of making a testament was a derogation of the strict law regulating the devolution of the property of deceased persons. Of those whose claims a citizen sui juris was permitted thus to set aside, the first and most important class was that of what were called the sui heredes, that is, persons in the power of the testator, but becoming sui juris by the testator's death, whose 'own'

sui heredes
sui juris

as to that of a testament made by a person dying in his own country. It was argued that the law could never have intended to attach a penalty to the forgery of a testament which was invalid. If it was valid, it could only be so by treating it as if made by a person who had not died in captivity, and whose right was not suspended at the time of his death. For it was necessary that a person should have the right of making a testament, (not only at the time when he made it, but also at the moment of his death; but in this we must distinguish between the right to make a testament, and the capacity of exercising that right; for the loss of capacity to make a testament did not, as we have seen, affect a testament made by one capable at the time of making it. This favourable interpretation of the lex Cornelia (beneficium legis Corneliae) (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 8) was gradually extended, so as to embrace every branch of law, such as tutorship, heirship, &c., to which it could be made applicable. In omnibus partibus juris is qui reversus non est ab hostibus quasi tunc decessisse videtur cum captus est. (D. xlix. 15. 18.)

TIT. XIII. DE EXHEREDATIONE LIBERORUM.

Non tamen, ut omnimodo valeat testamentum, sufficit hæc observatio, quam supra exposuimus. Sed qui filium in potestate habet, debet curare, ut eum heredem instituat vel exheredem nominatim faciat: alioquin si eum silentio præterierit, inutiliter testabitur, adeo quidem ut, etsi vivo patre filius mortuus sit, nemo ex eo testamento heres existere possit, quia scilicet ab initio non constiterit testamentum. Sed non ita de filiabus vel aliis per virilem sexum descendentibus liberis utriusque sexus fuerat antiquitati observatum; sed si non fuerant heredes scripti scriptæve vel exheredati exheredatæve, testamentum quidem non infirmabatur, jus autem adreascendi eis ad certam portionem præstabatur. Sed nec nominatim eas personas exheredare parentibus necesse erat, sed licebat et inter ceteros hoc facere.

The observance of the rules already laid down is not, however, all that is required to make a testament altogether valid. A person who has a son in his power must take care either to institute him his heir, or to disinherit him by name, for if he passes him over in silence, his testament will be of no effect; so much so, that even if the son dies while the father is alive, yet no one can be heir under the testament, because it was void from the beginning. But the ancients did not observe this rule with regard to daughters, or to other descendants, through the male line, of either sex; for although these were neither instituted heirs nor disinherited, yet the testament was not invalidated, only they had a right of joining themselves with the instituted heirs so as to receive a specified portion of the inheritance. Ascendants were not obliged to disinherit them by name, but might include them in the term ceteri.

GAI. ii. 115. 123, 124. 127.

The power of making a testament was a derogation of the strict law regulating the devolution of the property of deceased persons. Of those whose claims a citizen sui juris was permitted thus to set aside, the first and most important class was that of what were called the sui heredes, that is, persons in the power of the testator, but becoming sui juris by the testator's death, whose 'own'

*Sui heredes
sui juris*

the inheritance was said to be in consequence of their position in the family. (See Introd. sec 77.) They were necessarily either children, natural or adoptive, of the testator, or his descendants in the male line, and their position in the testator's family, together with their claim to his property if he died intestate, was considered to entitle them to have an express declaration of his intention from a testator who wished to use his power of depriving them of the inheritance. We have already seen, in the case of the castrense peculium (Tit. 12. pr.), that when the law permitted an exception to a general rule of law, unless advantage was taken of the exception, the general rule prevailed. So here, unless the testator expressly took advantage of his power of disinheriting the sui heredes, the general rule that they succeeded to him prevailed. The law would not permit his intention to disinherit them to be inferred from his silence, thus drawing a distinction in their favour as compared with the other classes of persons who might inherit ab intestato.

In order, therefore, as the text informs us, to disinherit a son, it was necessary that he should be referred to by name, or in a special and unmistakable manner, as Titius filius meus exheres esto, or, in case of an only son, filius meus exheres esto. But daughters and the descendants of sons (those of daughters would not, of course, be members of the family at all) might be disinherited by the general clause ceteri exheredes sunt. Whenever a person existed at the time the will was made, to disinherit whom it was necessary to refer to him by name, but who was passed over altogether, the whole testament was entirely bad, and the testator was considered to die intestate. Nor was the testament made valid by this person ceasing to exist before the death of the testator, although this was a point not established in the time of Gaius (ii, 123). If a person existed at the time of making the testament, to disinherit whom it was only necessary the general clause should be employed, the testament which did not contain this was good, but the person, if the heir named and instituted in the testament was among the sui heredes, took a pars virilis of the inheritance, that is, was joined so as to make one more heir and one more equal sharer in the inheritance (jus accrescendi): if the heirs instituted were strangers, the person took one-half the inheritance. Scriptis heredibus ad crescunt, suis quidem heredibus in partem virilem, extraneis autem in partem dimidiam. (Ulp. Reg. 22. 17.)

1. Nominatim autem exheredari quis videtur, sive ita exheredetur 'Titius filius meus exheres esto,' sive ita 'filius meus exheres esto' non adjecto proprio nomine, scilicet si alius filius non extet. Postumi quoque liberi vel heredes institui debent vel exheredari. Et in eo par omnium condicio est, quod et

1. A child is disinherited by name, if the words used are 'Let Titius my son be disinherited,' or thus, 'Let my son be disinherited,' without the addition of a proper name, in case the testator has no other son. Posthumous children, too, must either be instituted heirs, or disinherited; and the condition of all such children is son's exheres into son of a exheres son & a other man

the inheritance was said to be in consequence of their position in the family. (See Introd. sec 77.) They were necessarily either children, natural or adoptive, of the testator, or his descendants in the male line, and their position in the testator's family, together with their claim to his property if he died intestate, was considered to entitle them to have an express declaration of his intention from a testator who wished to use his power of depriving them of the inheritance. We have already seen, in the case of the castrense peculium (Tit. 12. pr.), that when the law permitted an exception to a general rule of law, unless advantage was taken of the exception, the general rule prevailed. So here, unless the testator expressly took advantage of his power of disinheriting the sui heredes, the general rule that they succeeded to him prevailed. The law would not permit his intention to disinherit them to be inferred from his silence, thus drawing a distinction in their favour as compared with the other classes of persons who might inherit ab intestato.

In order, therefore, as the text informs us, to disinherit a son, it was necessary that he should be referred to by name, or in a special and unmistakable manner, as Titius filius meus exheres esto, or, in case of an only son, filius meus exheres esto. But daughters and the descendants of sons (those of daughters would not, of course, be members of the family at all) might be disinherited by the general clause ceteri exheredes sunt. Whenever a person existed at the time the will was made, to disinherit whom it was necessary to refer to him by name, but who was passed over altogether, the whole testament was entirely bad, and the testator was considered to die intestate. Nor was the testament made valid by this person ceasing to exist before the death of the testator, although this was a point not established in the time of Gaius (ii, 123). If a person existed at the time of making the testament, to disinherit whom it was only necessary the general clause should be employed, the testament which did not contain this was good, but the person, if the heir named and instituted in the testament was among the sui heredes, took a pars virilis of the inheritance, that is, was joined so as to make one more heir and one more equal sharer in the inheritance (jus accrescendi): if the heirs instituted were strangers, the person took one-half the inheritance. Scriptis heredibus ad crescant, suis quidem heredibus in partem virilem, extraneis autem in partem dimidiam. (Ulp. Reg. 22. 17.)

1. Nominatim autem exheredari quis videtur, sive ita exheredetur 'Titius filius meus exheres esto,' sive ita 'filius meus exheres esto' non adjecto proprio nomine, scilicet si alius filius non extet. Postumi quoque liberi vel heredes institui debent vel exheredari. Et in eo par omnium condicio est, quod et

1. A child is disinherited by name, if the words used are 'Let Titius my son be disinherited,' or thus, 'Let my son be disinherited,' without the addition of a proper name, in case the testator has no other son. Posthumous children, too, must either be instituted heirs, or disinherited; and the condition of all such children is son's exheres into son of a exheres son & a other man

in filio postumo et in quolibet ex ceteris liberis sive feminini sexus sive masculini præterito valet quidem testamentum, sed postea agnatione postumi sive postumæ rumpitur et ea ratione totum infirmatur: ideoque si mulier, ex qua postumus aut postuma sperabatur, abortum fecerit, nihil impedimento est scriptis heredibus ad hereditatem adeundam. Sed feminini quidem sexus personæ vel nominatim vel inter ceteros exheredari solebant, dum tamen, si inter ceteros exheredentur, aliquid eis legetur, ne videantur per oblivionem præteritæ esse, masculos vero postumos, id est filium et deinceps, placuit non aliter recte exheredari, nisi nominatim exheredentur, hoc scilicet modo: 'quicumque mihi filius genitus fuerit, exheres esto.'

equal in this, that if a posthumous son, or any posthumous descendant of either sex, is passed over, the testament is still valid; but, by the subsequent agnation of a posthumous child of either sex, its force is broken, and it becomes entirely void. And therefore, if a woman from whom a posthumous child is expected, should miscarry, there is nothing to hinder the instituted heirs from entering upon the inheritance. Posthumous females were usually disinherited either by name, or by using the general term ceteri. If, however, they are disinherited by using the general term, something must be left them as a legacy to show that they were not passed over through forgetfulness. But male posthumous children, i.e. sons, and other descendants, cannot be disinherited except by name, that is, in this form, 'Whatever son is hereafter born to me, let him be disinherited.'

D. xxviii. 2. 1, 2, 4 et seq.

In the strictness of the old civil law, a child born after the death of the testator (postumus) was incapable of being instituted. He had not, at the time of the testator's death, any certain existence: and the law said, Incerta persona heres institui non potest. (ULP. Reg. 22. 4.) But still it might be that the child, when born, was a suius heres of the testator; and as his agnatio would be considered in law to date from the time of conception, not birth, the testator would pass over one of his sui heredes if he omitted to include him or exclude him in the testament; although, if he had included him, the posthumous child could not have taken anything. In the course of time the law permitted the posthumous child, if a suius heres, to be instituted as an heir; but the civil law never permitted the posthumous child of a stranger, i.e. a child born after the death of the testator, to be instituted. The prætor, however, gave him bonorum possessio, and Justinian permitted such persons to be instituted. (Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.) And thus the institution of a posthumous suius heres having once been permitted, the next step was to consider it imperative on the testator, if he wished to exclude the posthumous child from a share in the inheritance, to do so in the case of a son by referring to him specially (nominatim does not, of course, here mean 'by name,' but by a phrase expressly referring to him, such as postumus exheres esto), and in the case of a daughter, or any descendant other than a son, by adopting the general clause of disinheritance, ceteri exheredes sunt, and also by giving the child some legacy, however trifling, in order to show that it was not by accident that the testator allowed this clause to embrace the case of a posthumous child.

The jurist Gallus Aquilius, who lived towards the end of the Republic, invented a form of institution by which the case was in filio postumo et in quolibet ex ceteris liberis sive feminini sexus sive masculini præterito valet quidem testamentum, sed postea agnatione postumi sive postumæ rum-pitur et ea ratione totum infirmatur: ideoque si mulier, ex qua postumus aut postuma sperabatur, abortum fecerit, nihil impedimento est scriptis heredibus ad hereditatem adeundam. Sed feminini quidem sexus personæ vel nominatim vel inter ceteros exheredari solebant, dum tamen, si inter ceteros exheredentur, aliquid eis legetur, ne videantur per oblivionem præteritæ esse, masculos vero postumos, id est filium et deinceps, placuit non aliter recte exheredari, nisi nominatim exheredentur, hoc scilicet modo: 'quicumque mihi filius genitus fuerit, exheres esto.'

equal in this, that if a posthumous son, or any posthumous descendant of either sex, is passed over, the testament is still valid; but, by the subsequent agnation of a posthumous child of either sex, its force is broken, and it becomes entirely void. And therefore, if a woman from whom a posthumous child is expected, should miscarry, there is nothing to hinder the instituted heirs from entering upon the inheritance. Posthumous females were usually disinherited either by name, or by using the general term ceteri. If, however, they are disinherited by using the general term, something must be left them as a legacy to show that they were not passed over through forgetfulness. But male posthumous children, i.e. sons, and other descendants, cannot be disinherited except by name, that is, in this form, 'Whatever son is hereafter born to me, let him be disinherited.'

D. xxviii. 2. 1, 2, 4 et seq.

In the strictness of the old civil law, a child born after the death of the testator (postumus) was incapable of being instituted. He had not, at the time of the testator's death, any certain existence: and the law said, Incerta persona heres institui non potest. (ULP. Reg. 22. 4.) But still it might be that the child, when born, was a suius heres of the testator; and as his agnatio would be considered in law to date from the time of conception, not birth, the testator would pass over one of his sui heredes if he omitted to include him or exclude him in the testament; although, if he had included him, the posthumous child could not have taken anything. In the course of time the law permitted the posthumous child, if a suius heres, to be instituted as an heir; but the civil law never permitted the posthumous child of a stranger, i.e. a child born after the death of the testator, to be instituted. The prætor, however, gave him bonorum possessio, and Justinian permitted such persons to be instituted. (Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.) And thus the institution of a posthumous suius heres having once been permitted, the next step was to consider it imperative on the testator, if he wished to exclude the posthumous child from a share in the inheritance, to do so in the case of a son by referring to him specially (nominatim does not, of course, here mean 'by name,' but by a phrase expressly referring to him, such as postumus exheres esto), and in the case of a daughter, or any descendant other than a son, by adopting the general clause of disinheritance, ceteri exheredes sunt, and also by giving the child some legacy, however trifling, in order to show that it was not by accident that the testator allowed this clause to embrace the case of a posthumous child.

The jurist Gallus Aquilius, who lived towards the end of the Republic, invented a form of institution by which the case was provided for of a son dying in the testator's lifetime, and then the testator dying, and then there being born a posthumous son of the son, who would, of course, be a suus heres of the testator. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. pr.)

2. Postumorum autem loco sunt et hi, qui in sui heredis locum succedendo quasi agnascendo fiunt parentibus sui heredes. Ut ecce si quis filium et ex eo nepotem neptemve in potestate habeat, quia filius gradu præcedit, is solus jura sui heredis habet, quamvis nepos quoque et neptis ex eo in eadem potestate sunt: sed si filius ejus vivo eo moriatur aut qualibet alia ratione exeat de potestate ejus, incipit nepos neptisve in ejus locum succedere et eo modo jura suorum heredum quasi agnatione nanciuntur. Ne ergo eo modo rumpatur ejus testamentum, sicut ipsum filium vel heredem instituere vel nominatim exheredare debet testator, ne non jure faciat testamentum, ita et nepotem neptemve ex filio necesse est ei vel heredem instituere vel exheredare, ne forte, vivo eo filio mortuo, succedendo in locum ejus nepos neptisve quasi agnatione rumpant testamentum. Idque lege Junia Velleia provisum est, in qua simul exheredationis modus ad similitudinem postumorum demonstratur.

2. Those ought also to be placed on the footing of posthumous children, who, succeeding in the place of a suus heres, become by quasi-agnation sui heredes of their ascendants. Thus, for instance, if any one has a son in his power, and by him a grandson or granddaughter, the son, being first in degree, has alone the rights of a suus heres, although the grandson or granddaughter by that son is under the same parental power. But, if the son should die in his father's lifetime, or should by any other means cease to be under his father's power, the grandson or granddaughter would succeed in his place, and would thus, by quasi-agnation, obtain the rights of a suus heres. In order, then, that the force of his testament may not be broken, the testator, who is, as we have said, obliged, in order to make an effectual testament, to institute his son as heir or to disinherit him by name, is equally obliged to institute as heir, or to disinherit, a grandson or granddaughter by that son, lest, if, during his lifetime, his son should die, and the grandson or granddaughter succeed in his place, the force of the testament may be broken by quasi-agnation. Provision has been made for this by the lex Junia Velleia, in which is given a mode of disinheriting in such a case like that of disinheriting posthumous children.

GAI. ii. 134.

A testament was made void, not only by the birth of a posthumous suus heres, but by any one coming into the position of a suus heres after the time when the testament was made. The testator might (under the ancient law) have subsequently married a wife in manu; an emancipated son might come again into his father's power; a captive son might return home; or the testator might adopt a person into his family. In all these cases, as well as in that mentioned in the text, the testament would be invalidated by a process which bore a close analogy to agnation, that is by these persons becoming, otherwise than by birth, the sui heredes of the testator, just as it would be by direct agnation, if a son was born to the testator after the date of the testament. The Lex Junia Velleia (GAI. ii. 134), passed in the time of Augustus (763 A.U.C.), provided (1st) that a testator might institute or exclude any one

provided for of a son dying in the testator's lifetime, and then the testator dying, and then there being born a posthumous son of the son, who would, of course, be a suus heres of the testator. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. pr.)

2. Postumorum autem loco sunt et hi, qui in sui heredis locum succedendo quasi adgnascendo fiunt parentibus sui heredes. Ut ecce si quis filium et ex eo nepotem neptemve in potestate habeat, quia filius gradu præcedit, is solus jura sui heredis habet, quamvis nepos quoque et neptis ex eo in eadem potestate sunt: sed si filius ejus vivo eo moriatur aut qualibet alia ratione exeat de potestate ejus, incipit nepos neptisve in ejus locum succedere et eo modo jura suorum heredum quasi adgnatione nanciſcuntur. Ne ergo eo modo rumpatur ejus testamentum, sicut ipsum filium vel heredem instituere vel nominatim exheredare debet testator, ne non jure faciat testamentum, ita et nepotem neptemve ex filio necesse est ei vel heredem instituere vel exheredare, ne forte, vivo eo filio mortuo, succedendo in locum ejus nepos neptisve quasi adgnatione rumpant testamentum. Idque lege Junia Velleia provisum est, in qua simul exheredationis modus ad similitudinem postumorum demonstratur.

2. Those ought also to be placed on the footing of posthumous children, who, succeeding in the place of a suus heres, become by quasi-agnation sui heredes of their ascendants. Thus, for instance, if any one has a son in his power, and by him a grandson or granddaughter, the son, being first in degree, has alone the rights of a suus heres, although the grandson or granddaughter by that son is under the same parental power. But, if the son should die in his father's lifetime, or should by any other means cease to be under his father's power, the grandson or granddaughter would succeed in his place, and would thus, by quasi-agnation, obtain the rights of a suus heres. In order, then, that the force of his testament may not be broken, the testator, who is, as we have said, obliged, in order to make an effectual testament, to institute his son as heir or to disinherit him by name, is equally obliged to institute as heir, or to disinherit, a grandson or granddaughter by that son, lest, if, during his lifetime, his son should die, and the grandson or granddaughter succeed in his place, the force of the testament may be broken by quasi-agnation. Provision has been made for this by the lex Junia Velleia, in which is given a mode of disinheriting in such a case like that of disinheriting posthumous children.

GAL. ii. 134.

A testament was made void, not only by the birth of a posthumous suus heres, but by any one coming into the position of a suus heres after the time when the testament was made. The testator might (under the ancient law) have subsequently married a wife in manu; an emancipated son might come again into his father's power; a captive son might return home; or the testator might adopt a person into his family. In all these cases, as well as in that mentioned in the text, the testament would be invalidated by a process which bore a close analogy to agnation, that is by these persons becoming, otherwise than by birth, the sui heredes of the testator, just as it would be by direct agnation, if a son was born to the testator after the date of the testament. The Lex Junia Velleia (GAL. ii. 134), passed in the time of Augustus (763 A.U.C.), provided (1st) that a testator might institute or exclude any one conceived before the date of the testament who should, after the date of the testament, be born his suus heres in his lifetime, thus giving a new signification to postumus (ULP. Reg. xxii. 19), and (2ndly) that he might exclude a grandchild, or other descendant, born before the date of the testament, who might, if the son of the testator died in the testator's lifetime, step into the place of his father, and become a suus heres during the testator's lifetime. Previously such a person could not have been excluded in his capacity of suus heres, for at the date of the testament he was not in that position, which he only attained subsequently. He could have been instituted before the lex Junia Velleia, for he was an existing person, and therefore not a persona incerta; but when he became a suus heres, as it was not in this character that he had been instituted, the testament would have been broken but for the lex Junia Velleia. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. 11 to end.) If persons, coming under the lex Junia Velleia, were excluded, the lex Junia required that, as in the case of posthumous sui heredes, the males should be excluded nominatim, and the females inter ceteros, but with a legacy. In the case of the testator having subsequently a child not conceived when the testament was made and born in the testator's lifetime, and in the cases of quasi-agnation mentioned above, no law helped the testator, and he had to make a new testament in order to die testate. Commentators term persons coming under the first head above mentioned postumi Velleiani, and persons coming under the second head quasi postumi Velleiani. (DEMANGEAT, i. 619.)

3. Emancipatos liberos jure civili neque heredes instituere neque exheredare necesse est, quia non sunt sui heredes. Sed prætor omnes tam feminini sexus quam masculini, si heredes non instituantur, exheredari jubet, virilis sexus nominatim, feminini vero et inter ceteros. Quodsi neque heredes instituti fuerint neque ita, ut diximus, exheredati, promittit prætor eis contra tabulas testamenti bonorum possessionem.

3. The civil law does not make it necessary either to institute emancipated children heirs, or to disinherit them in a testament; because they are not sui heredes. But the prætor orders, that all children, male or female, if they are not instituted heirs, shall be disinherited; the males by name, the females by name or under the general term ceteri: for if they have neither been instituted heirs, nor disinherited in manner before mentioned, the prætor gives them possession of goods contra tabulas.

GAI. ii. 135.

An emancipated child, passing out of the testator's family, ceased to be his suus heres. But though he thus lost all legal claim upon the testator's inheritance, yet he had gained no provision by being emancipated, and the prætor, therefore, came to his relief, and set aside the testament, if he had not been expressly excluded. He did not do this nominally, for the testament was legally good, but he did what amounted to the same thing; he divided the property equally among all as if the testator had died intestate, giving the children what was termed 'possession of the goods;' a possession said, in this case, to be contra tabulas, as it civil law: necessary to institute or disinherit them. Emancipated children. Prætor: not instituting must be disinherited. In manner before mentioned by "ceteri".

If neither the civil law nor the prætor's order is followed, the child is not an heir.

conceived before the date of the testament who should, after the date of the testament, be born his suus heres in his lifetime, thus giving a new signification to postumus (ULP. Reg. xxii. 19), and (2ndly) that he might exclude a grandchild, or other descendant, born before the date of the testament, who might, if the son of the testator died in the testator's lifetime, step into the place of his father, and become a suus heres during the testator's lifetime. Previously such a person could not have been excluded in his capacity of suus heres, for at the date of the testament he was not in that position, which he only attained subsequently. He could have been instituted before the lex Junia Velleia, for he was an existing person, and therefore not a persona incerta; but when he became a suus heres, as it was not in this character that he had been instituted, the testament would have been broken but for the lex Junia Velleia. (D. xxviii. 2. 29. 11 to end.) If persons, coming under the lex Junia Velleia, were excluded, the lex Junia required that, as in the case of posthumous sui heredes, the males should be excluded nominatim, and the females inter ceteros, but with a legacy. In the case of the testator having subsequently a child not conceived when the testament was made and born in the testator's lifetime, and in the cases of quasi-agnation mentioned above, no law helped the testator, and he had to make a new testament in order to die testate. Commentators term persons coming under the first head above mentioned postumi Velleiani, and persons coming under the second head quasi postumi Velleiani. (DEMANGEAT, i. 619.)

3. Emancipatos liberos jure civili neque heredes instituere neque exheredare necesse est, quia non sunt sui heredes. Sed prætor omnes tam feminini sexus quam masculini, si heredes non instituantur, exheredari jubet, virilis sexus nominatim, feminini vero et inter ceteros. Quodsi neque heredes instituti fuerint neque ita, ut diximus, exheredati, promittit prætor eis contra tabulas testamenti bonorum possessionem.

3. The civil law does not make it necessary either to institute emancipated children heirs, or to disinherit them in a testament; because they are not sui heredes. But the prætor orders, that all children, male or female, if they are not instituted heirs, shall be disinherited; the males by name, the females by name or under the general term ceteri: for if they have neither been instituted heirs, nor disinherited in manner before mentioned, the prætor gives them possession of goods contra tabulas.

GAI. ii. 135.

An emancipated child, passing out of the testator's family, ceased to be his suus heres. But though he thus lost all legal claim upon the testator's inheritance, yet he had gained no provision by being emancipated, and the prætor, therefore, came to his relief, and set aside the testament, if he had not been expressly excluded. He did not do this nominally, for the testament was legally good, but he did what amounted to the same thing; he divided the property equally among all as if the testator had died intestate, giving the children what was termed 'possession of the goods;' a possession said, in this case, to be contra tabulas, as it overthrew the provisions contained in the tablets of the testament. The emancipated son, however, had to bring into account the property he had acquired since emancipation, if the effect of his getting the testament set aside was injurious to the properly instituted suus heres. The properly instituted suus heres might, for example, have had only a quarter of the inheritance left him, and then he would gain, not lose, by the emancipated son getting the testament set aside and sharing the inheritance with him. (D. xxxvii. 4. 13.) An emancipated daughter might, under the prætorian system, be in a better position than an unemancipated, if both were passed over, and might in effect be in as good a position as the male suus heres who was passed over. For if the emancipated daughter was passed over, the testament would be overthrown altogether, and she would, if an only child, take all the property; whereas, if the unemancipated daughter was passed over, she could only take half at most. Antoninus (either Antoninus Pius or Marcus Aurelius) put them on an equality, by giving the emancipated only the share she would have had, had she not been emancipated. (GAI. ii. 125, 126.)

The old civil law permitted grandsons, not in the immediate power of the testator, to be disinherited by the general ceteri clause. The prætor required them to be disinherited nominatim. (GAI. ii. 129.) Further, whereas in the initiatory section we have been told that the testament was wholly void if a son passed over died in the lifetime of his father, and Gaius tells us that this was the opinion of the Sabinians, yet there are passages which seem to show that the prætors sometimes upheld a contrary rule. (D. xxxvii. 11. 2. pr.; D. xxviii. 3. 17.)

4. Adoptivi liberi quamdiu sunt in potestate patris adoptivi, ejusdem juris habentur, cujus sunt justis nuptiis quæsitæ: itaque heredes instituendi vel exheredandi sunt secundum ea, quæ de naturalibus exposuimus: emancipati vero a patre adoptivo neque jure civili neque quod ad edictum prætoris attinet, inter liberos numerantur. Qua ratione accidit, ut ex diverso quod ad naturalem parentem attinet, quamdiu quidem sint in adoptiva familia, extraneorum numero habeantur, ut eos neque heredes instituere neque exheredare necesse sit. Cum vero emancipati fuerint ab adoptivo patre, tunc incipiunt in ea causa esse, in qua futuri essent, si ab ipso naturali patre emancipati fuissent.

4. Adoptive children, while under the power of their adoptive father, are in the same legal position as children sprung from a legal marriage; and therefore they must either be instituted heirs or disinherited, according to the rules we have laid down respecting natural children. But neither by the civil nor the prætorian law are such children, if emancipated by their adoptive father, reckoned among his natural children. On this principle it is that, conversely, adoptive children, while in their adoptive family, are considered strangers to their natural father, who need not institute them heirs or disinherit them; but if they are emancipated by their adoptive father, they then begin to be in the same position in which they would have been if emancipated by their natural father.

GAI. ii. 136, 137.

If an adopted son was emancipated by his adoptive father, he would, under the old law, have no legal claim on the inheritance of his adoptive or his natural father. But the prætor came to his overthrew the provisions contained in the tablets of the testament. The emancipated son, however, had to bring into account the property he had acquired since emancipation, if the effect of his getting the testament set aside was injurious to the properly instituted suus heres. The properly instituted suus heres might, for example, have had only a quarter of the inheritance left him, and then he would gain, not lose, by the emancipated son getting the testament set aside and sharing the inheritance with him. (D. xxxvii. 4. 13.) An emancipated daughter might, under the prætorian system, be in a better position than an unemancipated, if both were passed over, and might in effect be in as good a position as the male suus heres who was passed over. For if the emancipated daughter was passed over, the testament would be overthrown altogether, and she would, if an only child, take all the property; whereas, if the unemancipated daughter was passed over, she could only take half at most. Antoninus (either Antoninus Pius or Marcus Aurelius) put them on an equality, by giving the emancipated only the share she would have had, had she not been emancipated. (GAI. ii. 125, 126.)

The old civil law permitted grandsons, not in the immediate power of the testator, to be disinherited by the general ceteri clause. The prætor required them to be disinherited nominatim. (GAI. ii. 129.) Further, whereas in the initiatory section we have been told that the testament was wholly void if a son passed over died in the lifetime of his father, and Gaius tells us that this was the opinion of the Sabinians, yet there are passages which seem to show that the prætors sometimes upheld a contrary rule. (D. xxxvii. 11. 2. pr.; D. xxviii. 3. 17.)

4. Adoptivi liberi quamdiu sunt in potestate patris adoptivi, ejusdem juris habentur, cujus sunt justis nuptiis quæsit: itaque heredes instituendi vel exheredandi sunt secundum ea, quæ de naturalibus exposuimus: emancipati vero a patre adoptivo neque jure civili neque quod ad edictum prætoris attinet, inter liberos numerantur. Qua ratione accidit, ut ex diverso quod ad naturalem parentem attinet, quamdiu quidem sint in adoptiva familia, extraneorum numero habeantur, ut eos neque heredes instituere neque exheredare necesse sit. Cum vero emancipati fuerint ab adoptivo patre, tunc incipiunt in ea causa esse, in qua futuri essent, si ab ipso naturali patre emancipati fuissent.

4. Adoptive children, while under the power of their adoptive father, are in the same legal position as children sprung from a legal marriage; and therefore they must either be instituted heirs or disinherited, according to the rules we have laid down respecting natural children. But neither by the civil nor the prætorian law are such children, if emancipated by their adoptive father, reckoned among his natural children. On this principle it is that, conversely, adoptive children, while in their adoptive family, are considered strangers to their natural father, who need not institute them heirs or disinherit them; but if they are emancipated by their adoptive father, they then begin to be in the same position in which they would have been if emancipated by their natural father.

GAI. ii. 136, 137.

If an adopted son was emancipated by his adoptive father, he would, under the old law, have no legal claim on the inheritance of his adoptive or his natural father. But the prætor came to his aid, and gave him 'possession of the goods' of his natural father, unless he was expressly excluded by his natural father's testament. On his adoptive father he would, after emancipation, in no case have any claim whatever, until Justinian altered the law in the manner referred to in the next paragraph.

5. Sed hæc vetustas introducebat. Nostra vero constitutio inter masculos et feminas in hoc jure nihil interesse existimans, quia utraque persona in hominum procreatione similiter naturæ officio fungitur et lege antiqua duodecim tabularum omnes similiter ad successiones ab intestato vocabantur, quod et prætores postea secuti esse videntur, ideo simplex ac simile jus et in filiis et in filiabus et in ceteris descendantibus per virilem sexum personis non solum natis, sed etiam postumis introduxit, ut omnes, sive sui sive emancipati sunt, aut heredes instituantur aut nominatim exheredentur et eundem habeant effectum circa testamenta parentum suorum infirmamanda et hereditatem auferendam, quem filii sui vel emancipati habent, sive jam nati sunt sive adhuc in utero constituti, postea nati sunt. Circa adoptivos autem certam induximus divisionem, quæ constitutione nostra, quam super adoptivis tulimus, continetur.

5. Such was the ancient law. But, thinking that no distinction can reasonably be made between the two sexes, inasmuch as they equally contribute to the procreation of the species, and because, by the ancient law of the Twelve Tables, all children were equally called to the succession ab intestato, which law the prætors seem afterwards to have followed, we have by our constitution made the law the same both as to sons and daughters, and also as to all other descendants in the male line, whether already born or posthumous; so that all children, whether they are sui heredes or emancipated, must either be instituted heirs or be disinherited by name; and their omission has the same effect in making void the testaments of their ascendants, and taking away the inheritance from the instituted heirs, as would be produced by the omission of sons who were sui heredes or emancipated, whether they have been already born, or having been already conceived are born afterwards. With respect to adoptive sons, however, we have established a distinction between them, which is set forth in our constitution on adoptive persons.

C. vi. 28. 4; C. viii. 47. 10. pr. and 1.

Under the legislation of Justinian a testament would be rendered invalid by the omission of any one male or female whom it was necessary either to institute or exclude, and every exclusion must be made nominatim. An adopted son, if adopted by a stranger, i.e. not an ascendant, lost none of his claims upon his natural father's property, but only had a claim upon that of his adoptive father, if the latter died intestate; for if the adoptive father made a testament, it was not necessary he should notice the adoptive son. But an adopted son, if adopted by an ascendant, either a maternal grandfather or an emancipated father (see Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2), stood in the position of a suus heres to the ascendant, and a testament made by such ascendant would be invalid in which he was passed over.

6. Sed si expeditione occupatus miles testamentum faciat et liberos suos jam natos vel postumos nominatim non exheredaverit, sed silentio præterierit, non ignorans, an aid, and gave him 'possession of the goods' of his natural father, unless he was expressly excluded by his natural father's testament. On his adoptive father he would, after emancipation, in no case have any claim whatever, until Justinian altered the law in the manner referred to in the next paragraph.

6. If a soldier on active service makes his testament, and neither disinherits his children already born, nor his posthumous children by name, but passes them over in silence, pro-

5. Sed hæc vetustas introducebat. Nostra vero constitutio inter masculos et feminas in hoc jure nihil interesse existimans, quia utraque persona in hominum procreatione similiter naturæ officio fungitur et lege antiqua duodecim tabularum omnes similiter ad successiones ab intestato vocabantur, quod et prætores postea secuti esse videntur, ideo simplex ac simile jus et in filiis et in filiabus et in ceteris descendantibus per virilem sexum personis non solum natis, sed etiam postumis introduxit, ut omnes, sive sui sive emancipati sunt, aut heredes instituantur aut nominatim exheredentur et eundem habeant effectum circa testamenta parentum suorum infirmanda et hereditatem auferendam, quem filii sui vel emancipati habent, sive jam nati sunt sive adhuc in utero constituti, postea nati sunt. Circa adoptivos autem certam induximus divisionem, quæ constitutione nostra, quam super adoptivis tulimus, continetur.

5. Such was the ancient law. But, thinking that no distinction can reasonably be made between the two sexes, inasmuch as they equally contribute to the procreation of the species, and because, by the ancient law of the Twelve Tables, all children were equally called to the succession ab intestato, which law the prætors seem afterwards to have followed, we have by our constitution made the law the same both as to sons and daughters, and also as to all other descendants in the male line, whether already born or posthumous; so that all children, whether they are sui heredes or emancipated, must either be instituted heirs or be disinherited by name; and their omission has the same effect in making void the testaments of their ascendants, and taking away the inheritance from the instituted heirs, as would be produced by the omission of sons who were sui heredes or emancipated, whether they have been already born, or having been already conceived are born afterwards. With respect to adoptive sons, however, we have established a distinction between them, which is set forth in our constitution on adoptive persons.

C. vi. 28. 4; C. viii. 47. 10. pr. and 1.

Under the legislation of Justinian a testament would be rendered invalid by the omission of any one male or female whom it was necessary either to institute or exclude, and every exclusion must be made nominatim. An adopted son, if adopted by a stranger, i.e. not an ascendant, lost none of his claims upon his natural father's property, but only had a claim upon that of his adoptive father, if the latter died intestate; for if the adoptive father made a testament, it was not necessary he should notice the adoptive son. But an adopted son, if adopted by an ascendant, either a maternal grandfather or an emancipated father (see Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2), stood in the position of a suus heres to the ascendant, and a testament made by such ascendant would be invalid in which he was passed over.

6. Sed si expeditione occupatus miles testamentum faciat et liberos suos jam natos vel postumos nominatim non exheredaverit, sed silentio præterierit, non ignorans, an

6. If a soldier on active service makes his testament, and neither disinherits his children already born, nor his posthumous children by name, but passes them over in silence, provided he is not ignorant whether he has children, it is provided by the constitutions of the emperors, that his silence shall be equivalent to dis-inheriting them by name.

habeat liberos, silentium ejus pro exheredatione nominatim facta valere constitutionibus principum cautum est.

C. vi. 21. 9; D. xxix. 1. 7.

7. Mater vel avus maternus necesse non habent liberos suos aut heredes instituere aut exheredare, sed possunt eos omittere. Nam silentium matris aut avi materni ceterorumque per matrem ascendentium tantum facit, quantum exheredatio patris. Neque enim matri filium filiamve neque avo materno nepotem neptemve ex filia, si eum eamve heredem non instituat, exheredare necesse est, sive de jure civili quæramus, sive de edicto prætoris, quo præteritis liberis contra tabulas bonorum possessionem promittit. Sed aliud eis adminiculum servatur, quod paulo post vobis manifestum fiet.

7. Neither a mother nor a maternal grandfather need either institute children as heirs, or disinherit them, but may pass them over in silence; for the silence of a mother or a maternal grandfather, or of any other ascendant on the mother's side, has the same effect as a father disinheriting them. For a mother is not obliged to disinherit her children, if she does not institute them her heirs; neither is a maternal grandfather under the necessity of instituting or of disinheriting his grandson or granddaughter by a daughter; whether we look to the civil law, or the edict of the prætor, by which he promises possession of goods contra tabulas to those children who have been passed over in silence. But children, in this case, have another remedy, which we will hereafter explain to you.

GAL. iii. 71.

The children could never be the sui heredes of their mother, for women never had any one in their power; nor could they be the sui heredes of a maternal ascendant, except by adoption, and the case of adoption is not spoken of here.

Aliud adminiculum. This refers to the action for setting aside the testament as inofficious, that is, made without proper regard for natural ties. (See Tit. 18.)

Institutione. Declaratio, who is to be heir.

TIT. XIV. DE HEREDIBUS INSTITUENDIS.

Heredes instituere permissum est tam liberos homines quam servos tam proprios quam alienos. Proprios autem olim quidem secundum plurium sententias non aliter quam cum libertate recte instituere licebat. Hodie vero etiam sine libertate ex nostra constitutione heredes eos instituere permissum est. Quod non per innovationem induximus, sed quoniam et æquius erat et Atilicino placuisse Paulus suis libris, quos tam ad Masurium Sabinum quam ad Plautium scripsit, refert. Proprius

A man may institute as his heirs either freemen or slaves, and either his own slaves or those of another. Formerly, according to the more received opinion, no one could properly institute his own slaves, unless he also freed them; but now, by our constitution, a testator may institute his slave without expressly enfranchising him. And we have introduced this rule, not as an innovation, but because it seemed equitable; and Paulus, in his writings on Masurius Sabinus and Plautius, informs us that this was the opinion habeat liberos, silentium ejus pro exheredatione nominatim facta valere constitutionibus principum cautum est.

vided he is not ignorant whether he has children, it is provided by the constitutions of the emperors, that his silence shall be equivalent to disinheriting them by name.

C. vi. 21. 9; D. xxix. 1. 7.

7. Mater vel avus maternus necesse non habent liberos suos aut heredes instituere aut exheredare, sed possunt eos omittere. Nam silentium matris aut avi materni ceterorumque per matrem ascendentium tantum facit, quantum exheredatio patris. Neque enim matri filium filiamve neque avo materno nepotem neptemve ex filia, si eum eamve heredem non instituat, exheredare necesse est, sive de jure civili quæramus, sive de edicto prætoris, quo præteritis liberis contra tabulas bonorum possessionem promittit. Sed aliud eis adminiculum servatur, quod paulo post vobis manifestum fiet.

7. Neither a mother nor a maternal grandfather need either institute children as heirs, or disinherit them, but may pass them over in silence; for the silence of a mother or a maternal grandfather, or of any other ascendant on the mother's side, has the same effect as a father disinheriting them. For a mother is not obliged to disinherit her children, if she does not institute them her heirs; neither is a maternal grandfather under the necessity of instituting or of disinheriting his grandson or granddaughter by a daughter; whether we look to the civil law, or the edict of the prætor, by which he promises possession of goods contra tabulas to those children who have been passed over in silence. But children, in this case, have another remedy, which we will hereafter explain to you.

GAL. iii. 71.

The children could never be the sui heredes of their mother, for women never had any one in their power; nor could they be the sui heredes of a maternal ascendant, except by adoption, and the case of adoption is not spoken of here.

Aliud adminiculum. This refers to the action for setting aside the testament as inofficious, that is, made without proper regard for natural ties. (See Tit. 18.)

Institutionem. Declaration who is to be heir

TIT. XIV. DE HEREDIBUS INSTITUENDIS.

Heredes instituere permissum est tam liberos homines quam servos tam proprios quam alienos. Proprios autem olim quidem secundum plurium sententias non aliter quam cum libertate recte instituere licebat. Hodie vero etiam sine libertate ex nostra constitutione heredes eos instituere permissum est. Quod non per innovationem induximus, sed quoniam et æquius erat et Atilicino placuisse Paulus suis libris, quos tam ad Masurium Sabinum quam ad Plautium scripsit, refert. Proprius

A man may institute as his heirs either freemen or slaves, and either his own slaves or those of another. Formerly, according to the more received opinion, no one could properly institute his own slaves, unless he also freed them; but now, by our constitution, a testator may institute his slave without expressly enfranchising him. And we have introduced this rule, not as an innovation, but because it seemed equitable; and Paulus, in his writings on Masurius Sabinus and Plautius, informs us that this was the opinion of Atilicinus. Among a testator's own slaves is included one in whom the testator has only a bare ownership, another having the usufruct. But there is a case, in which the institution of a slave by his mistress is void, although his liberty is expressly given to him, according to the provisions of a constitution of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, in these words: 'Reason demands that a slave, accused of adultery with his mistress, shall not be allowed, before sentence is pronounced, to be made free by the testament of the mistress who is alleged to be a partner in the crime. Whence it follows that if a mistress institutes such a slave as her heir, it is of no avail.' In the term, 'the slave of another,' is included a slave of whom the testator has the usufruct.

autem servus etiam is intellegitur, in quo nudam proprietatem testator habet, alio usumfructum habente. Est autem casus, in quo nec cum libertate utiliter servus a domina heres instituitur, ut constitutione divorum Severi et Antonini cavetur, cujus verba hæc sunt: 'Servum adulterio maculatum non jure testamento manumissum ante sententiam ab ea muliere videri, quæ rea fuerat ejusdem criminis postulata, rationis est: quare sequitur, ut in eundem a domina collata institutio nullius momenti habeatur.' Alienus servus etiam is intellegitur, in quo usumfructum testator habet.

GAI. ii. 185-187; C. vi. 27. 5; C. vii. 15. 1; D. xxviii. 5. 48. 2.

By institution is meant the declaration who is to be heir, that is, who is to carry on the legal existence, the persona, of the testator. And as, unless his existence was continued, there could be no thing or person from whom the testamentary dispositions could derive any force, or be of any efficacy, the institution was the all-important part of the testament. It was veluti caput atque fundamentum totius testamenti. All other dispositions were accessories to it, being only conditions or laws imposed upon the heir. In the older law a peculiar form of words was appropriated to the institution. 'Titius heres esto' was the recognised form. Even in the days of Gaius and Ulpian (GAI. ii. 116, 117; ULP. Reg. 21), such expressions as 'Titius heres sit,' 'Titium heredem esse jubeo,' terms of command, were considered right, and expressions such as 'Titium heredem esse volo,' 'heredem instituo,' 'heredem facio,' were considered wrong. And it was not till 339 A.D. that Constantine the Second permitted the institution to be made in any terms by which the meaning of the testator could be clearly ascertained. (C. vi. 23. 15.) Again, in the older law, as everything else in the testament derived its force from the institution, it was considered that the institution ought to be put at the head or top of the testament, and any legacy or other disposition placed before it was passed over, and had no effect. An exception was made in behalf of an appointment of a tutor (see Bk. i. Tit. 14. 3); and the clause in which the testator disinherited his sui heredes was naturally placed before that in which he instituted testamentary heirs. Justinian, as we shall see in Title 20. 34, enacted that, provided the institution appeared in some part of the testament, it should be immaterial in what part it might be placed.

autem servus etiam is intellegitur, in quo nudam proprietatem testator habet, alio usumfructum habente. Est autem casus, in quo nec cum libertate utiliter servus a domina heres instituitur, ut constitutione divorum Severi et Antonini cavetur, cujus verba hæc sunt: 'Servum adulterio maculatum non jure testamento manumissum ante sententiam ab ea muliere videri, quæ rea fuerat ejusdem criminis postulata, rationis est: quare sequitur, ut in eundem a domina collata institutio nullius momenti habeatur.' Alienus servus etiam is intellegitur, in quo usumfructum testator habet.

of Atilicinus. Among a testator's own slaves is included one in whom the testator has only a bare ownership, another having the usufruct. But there is a case, in which the institution of a slave by his mistress is void, although his liberty is expressly given to him, according to the provisions of a constitution of the Emperors Severus and Antoninus, in these words: 'Reason demands that a slave, accused of adultery with his mistress, shall not be allowed, before sentence is pronounced, to be made free by the testament of the mistress who is alleged to be a partner in the crime. Whence it follows that if a mistress institutes such a slave as her heir, it is of no avail.' In the term, 'the slave of another,' is included a slave of whom the testator has the usufruct.

GAI. ii. 185-187; C. vi. 27. 5; C. vii. 15. 1; D. xxviii. 5. 48. 2.

By institution is meant the declaration who is to be heir, that is, who is to carry on the legal existence, the persona, of the testator. And as, unless his existence was continued, there could be no thing or person from whom the testamentary dispositions could derive any force, or be of any efficacy, the institution was the all-important part of the testament. It was veluti caput atque fundamentum totius testamenti. All other dispositions were accessories to it, being only conditions or laws imposed upon the heir. In the older law a peculiar form of words was appropriated to the institution. 'Titius heres esto' was the recognised form. Even in the days of Gaius and Ulpian (GAI. ii. 116, 117; ULP. Reg. 21), such expressions as 'Titius heres sit,' 'Titium heredem esse jubeo,' terms of command, were considered right, and expressions such as 'Titium heredem esse volo,' 'heredem instituo,' 'heredem facio,' were considered wrong. And it was not till 339 A.D. that Constantine the Second permitted the institution to be made in any terms by which the meaning of the testator could be clearly ascertained. (C. vi. 23. 15.) Again, in the older law, as everything else in the testament derived its force from the institution, it was considered that the institution ought to be put at the head or top of the testament, and any legacy or other disposition placed before it was passed over, and had no effect. An exception was made in behalf of an appointment of a tutor (see Bk. i. Tit. 14. 3); and the clause in which the testator disinherited his sui heredes was naturally placed before that in which he instituted testamentary heirs. Justinian, as we shall see in Title 20. 34, enacted that, provided the institution appeared in some part of the testament, it should be immaterial in what part it might be placed.

Any one, as has been said above, might be instituted, and consequently take as heir, who had the rights of a citizen, or who, as it was technically termed, had the testamenti factio cum testatore, i.e. the power of joining with the testator in going through the ceremonies of the jus Quiritium. As to the different grounds of incapacity to take under a will, see note on Tit. 10. 6.

If a person instituted his own slave, this was held to give the slave his liberty by necessary implication. If he instituted the slave of another, the slave took the inheritance for his master's benefit, provided the master had the testamenti factio with the testator; but if he had not, the institution of the slave was void.

In the law before Justinian, enfranchisement by a person who had only a bare property in a slave, was not held to confer freedom, a proprietatis domino manumissus liber non fit, sed servus sine domino est. (Ulp. Reg. 1. 19.) Under Justinian the slave became free, and could acquire for himself, and could take as heir; but he was obliged to serve as slave to the usufructuary, during such time as the usufruct continued.

The slave accused of adultery with his mistress might be subjected, as all slaves might, to the torture, to extract evidence of his guilt. If he had been enfranchised, he would have escaped this, and thus the mistress who died before sentence was pronounced, as, for example, by suicide, might have defeated justice, as against the slave, unless she had been restrained from using her power of enfranchising him by her testament.

1. Servus autem a domino suo heres institutus, si quidem in eadem causa manserit, fit ex testamento liber heresque necessarius. Si vero a vivo testatore manumissus fuerit, suo arbitrio adire hereditatem potest, quia non fit necessarius, cum utrumque ex domini testamento non consequitur. Quodsi alienatus fuerit, jussu novi domini adire hereditatem debet et ea ratione per eum dominus fit heres: nam ipse alienatus neque liber neque heres esse potest, etiamsi cum libertate heres institutus fuerit: destituisse etenim a libertatis datione videtur dominus, qui eum alienavit. Alienus quoque servus heres institutus si in eadem causa duraverit, jussu domini adire hereditatem debet. Si vero alienatus fuerit aut vivo testatore aut post mortem ejus, antequam adeat, debet jussu novi domini adire. At si manumissus est vivo testatore vel mortuo, antequam adeat, suo arbitrio adire hereditatem potest.

1. A slave instituted heir by his master, if he remains in the same condition, becomes, by virtue of the testament, free and necessary heir. But, if his master has enfranchised him before dying, he may at his pleasure accept or refuse the inheritance, for he does not become a necessary heir, since he does not obtain both his liberty and the inheritance by the testament of his master. But, if he has been alienated, he must enter on the inheritance at the command of his new master, who thus through his slave becomes the heir of the testator. For a slave once alienated cannot gain his liberty or himself take an inheritance by virtue of the testament of the master who alienated him, although his freedom was expressly given by the testament; because a master who has alienated his slave, has shown that he has renounced the intention of enfranchising him. So, too, when the slave of another is appointed heir, if he remains in slavery, he must take the inheritance at his master's bidding; and, if the slave is alienated in the lifetime of the testator, or after his death, but before he

Any one, as has been said above, might be instituted, and consequently take as heir, who had the rights of a citizen, or who, as it was technically termed, had the testamenti factio cum testatore, i.e. the power of joining with the testator in going through the ceremonies of the jus Quiritium. As to the different grounds of incapacity to take under a will, see note on Tit. 10. 6.

If a person instituted his own slave, this was held to give the slave his liberty by necessary implication. If he instituted the slave of another, the slave took the inheritance for his master's benefit, provided the master had the testamenti factio with the testator; but if he had not, the institution of the slave was void.

In the law before Justinian, enfranchisement by a person who had only a bare property in a slave, was not held to confer freedom, a proprietatis domino manumissus liber non fit, sed servus sine domino est. (Ulp. Reg. 1. 19.) Under Justinian the slave became free, and could acquire for himself, and could take as heir; but he was obliged to serve as slave to the usufructuary, during such time as the usufruct continued.

The slave accused of adultery with his mistress might be subjected, as all slaves might, to the torture, to extract evidence of his guilt. If he had been enfranchised, he would have escaped this, and thus the mistress who died before sentence was pronounced, as, for example, by suicide, might have defeated justice, as against the slave, unless she had been restrained from using her power of enfranchising him by her testament.

1. Servus autem a domino suo heres institutus, si quidem in eadem causa manserit, fit ex testamento liber heresque necessarius. Si vero a vivo testatore manumissus fuerit, suo arbitrio adire hereditatem potest, quia non fit necessarius, cum utrumque ex domini testamento non consequitur. Quodsi alienatus fuerit, jussu novi domini adire hereditatem debet et ea ratione per eum dominus fit heres: nam ipse alienatus neque liber neque heres esse potest, etiamsi cum libertate heres institutus fuerit: destituisse etenim a libertatis datione videtur dominus, qui eum alienavit. Alienus quoque servus heres institutus si in eadem causa duraverit, jussu domini adire hereditatem debet. Si vero alienatus fuerit aut vivo testatore aut post mortem ejus, antequam adeat, debet jussu novi domini adire. At si manumissus est vivo testatore vel mortuo, antequam adeat, suo arbitrio adire hereditatem potest.

1. A slave instituted heir by his master, if he remains in the same condition, becomes, by virtue of the testament, free and necessary heir. But, if his master has enfranchised him before dying, he may at his pleasure accept or refuse the inheritance, for he does not become a necessary heir, since he does not obtain both his liberty and the inheritance by the testament of his master. But, if he has been alienated, he must enter on the inheritance at the command of his new master, who thus through his slave becomes the heir of the testator. For a slave once alienated cannot gain his liberty or himself take an inheritance by virtue of the testament of the master who alienated him, although his freedom was expressly given by the testament; because a master who has alienated his slave, has shown that he has renounced the intention of enfranchising him. So, too, when the slave of another is appointed heir, if he remains in slavery, he must take the inheritance at his master's bidding; and, if the slave is alienated in the lifetime of the testator, or after his death, but before he has actually taken the inheritance, it is at the command of his new master that he must accept it. But, if he is enfranchised during the lifetime of the testator, or after his death, and before he has accepted the inheritance, he may enter upon the inheritance or not, at his own option.

GAL. II. 188, 189.

It was necessary that the heir, as being the person who carried on the legal existence of the testator, should be possessed of civil rights. If, then, a slave of the testator was instituted, as it was in the power of the testator to make him free, and he had invested him with a character requiring freedom, this institution was considered to involve his freedom. The slave of any one else, if instituted, was only a channel by which his master, if possessed of civil rights, acquired the inheritance. (See Bk. i. Tit. 6. 1.) If a slave of the testator was instituted his heir, and remained his slave at the time of the testator's death, the slave, immediately upon the testator dying, became his heres necessarius, that is, became his heir without any option of refusing or taking the inheritance. But if it was given under any condition, and the condition failed, the institution then became invalid.

If the slave instituted did not belong to the testator at the time of the testator's death, his condition at the time of his taking on him the inheritance (aditio hereditatis) determined for whom the inheritance was acquired. If at that time he was a slave, he acquired it for the person who was then his master; if free, for himself.

Disposing of the slave to another revoked the gift of liberty, because this was considered as a legacy, a mere accessory to the inheritance, to revoke which anything was sufficient, which showed a change of intention on the part of the testator; but it did not revoke the institution, because this was the keystone of the testament, and could only be revoked by a new testament, or destruction of the old one.

2. Servus alienus post domini mortem recte heres instituitur, quia et cum hereditariis servis est testamenti factio: nondum enim adita hereditas personæ vicem sustinet, non heredis futuri, sed defuncti, cum et ejus, qui in utero est, servus recte heres instituitur.

2. The slave of another may be instituted heir even after the death of his master, as there is testamenti factio with slaves belonging to an inheritance; for an inheritance not yet entered on represents the person of the deceased, and not that of the future heir. So, too, the slave even of a child in the womb may be properly instituted heir.

D. xxviii. 5. 31. 1; D. xxviii. 5. 64.

After the death of a testator, and before the inheritance was entered on, the inheritance itself represented the person of the deceased, as it did that of an unborn child until the birth. A slave, during this interval, was said to belong to the inheritance, has actually taken the inheritance, it is at the command of his new master that he must accept it. But, if he is enfranchised during the lifetime of the testator, or after his death, and before he has accepted the inheritance, he may enter upon the inheritance or not, at his own option.

GAI. II. 188, 189.

It was necessary that the heir, as being the person who carried on the legal existence of the testator, should be possessed of civil rights. If, then, a slave of the testator was instituted, as it was in the power of the testator to make him free, and he had invested him with a character requiring freedom, this institution was considered to involve his freedom. The slave of any one else, if instituted, was only a channel by which his master, if possessed of civil rights, acquired the inheritance. (See Bk. i. Tit. 6. 1.) If a slave of the testator was instituted his heir, and remained his slave at the time of the testator's death, the slave, immediately upon the testator dying, became his heres necessarius, that is, became his heir without any option of refusing or taking the inheritance. But if it was given under any condition, and the condition failed, the institution then became invalid.

If the slave instituted did not belong to the testator at the time of the testator's death, his condition at the time of his taking on him the inheritance (aditio hereditatis) determined for whom the inheritance was acquired. If at that time he was a slave, he acquired it for the person who was then his master; if free, for himself.

Disposing of the slave to another revoked the gift of liberty, because this was considered as a legacy, a mere accessory to the inheritance, to revoke which anything was sufficient, which showed a change of intention on the part of the testator; but it did not revoke the institution, because this was the keystone of the testament, and could only be revoked by a new testament, or destruction of the old one.

2. Servus alienus post domini mortem recte heres instituitur, quia et cum hereditariis servis est testamenti factio: nondum enim adita hereditas personæ vicem sustinet, non heredis futuri, sed defuncti, cum et ejus, qui in utero est, servus recte heres instituitur.

2. The slave of another may be instituted heir even after the death of his master, as there is testamenti factio with slaves belonging to an inheritance; for an inheritance not yet entered on represents the person of the deceased, and not that of the future heir. So, too, the slave even of a child in the womb may be properly instituted heir.

D. xxviii. 5. 31. 1; D. xxviii. 5. 64.

After the death of a testator, and before the inheritance was entered on, the inheritance itself represented the person of the deceased, as it did that of an unborn child until the birth. A slave, during this interval, was said to belong to the inheritance, and if a testament was made by any one instituting as heir a slave belonging to the inheritance, the slave took the inheritance thus given him for the benefit of that inheritance to which he belonged. And that he should do so, it was not necessary that the person by whose testament he was instituted heir should have testamenti factio with the future heir, but it was only necessary that he should have it with the person to whose inheritance the slave belonged.

3. Servus plurium, cum quibus testamenti factio est, ab extraneo institutus heres, unicuique dominorum, cujus jussu adierit, pro portione domini acquirit hereditatem.

3. If a slave belonging to several masters, with all of whom there is testamenti factio, is instituted heir by a stranger, he acquires a proportion of the inheritance for each master by whose command he took it, corresponding to the several interests they each have in him.

D. xxix. 2. 67, 68.

If the slave was instituted heir by one of his masters, then, if this master expressly gave him his freedom, he became the heres necessarius of the master instituting him, and free; a due proportion of the price at which he was valued being paid to each of his other masters. But if his liberty was not expressly given him, the share which the testator had in him accrued proportionately to all those of his masters by whose orders he entered on the inheritance. (See Tit. 7. 4. of this Book.)

4. Et unum hominem et plures in infinitum, quot quis velit, heredes facere licet.

4. A testator may appoint one heir or several, the number being quite unrestricted.

5. Hereditas plerumque dividitur in duodecim uncias, quæ assis appellatione continentur. Habent autem et hæ partes propria nomina ab uncia usque ad assem, ut puta hæc: uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, deunx, as. Non autem utique duodecim uncias esse oportet. Nam tot uncia assen efficiunt, quot testator voluerit, et si unum tantum quis ex semisse verbi gratia heredem scripserit. totus as in semisse erit: neque enim idem ex parte testatus et ex parte intestatus decedere potest, nisi sit miles, cujus sola voluntas in testando spectatur. Et e contrario potest quis in quantascumque voluerit plurimas uncias suam hereditatem dividere.

5. An inheritance is generally divided into twelve ounces, comprehended together under the term of an as, and each of these parts, from the ounce to the as, has its peculiar name, viz. uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, deunx, as. But it is not necessary that there should be always twelve ounces, for an as may consist of as many ounces as the testator pleases. If, for example, a man names but one heir, and appoints him ex semisse, i.e. the heir of six parts, then these six parts will make up the whole as; for no one can die partly testate and partly intestate, except a soldier, whose intention in making his testament is alone regarded. Conversely, a testator may divide the inheritance into as many ounces more than twelve as he thinks proper.

D. xxvii. 5. 50. 2; D. xxviii. 5. 18. 1 et seq.; D. xxix. 1. 6.

In making a testament, where the testator wished to give different shares to his heirs, the singular system referred to in the

and if a testament was made by any one instituting as heir a slave belonging to the inheritance, the slave took the inheritance thus given him for the benefit of that inheritance to which he belonged. And that he should do so, it was not necessary that the person by whose testament he was instituted heir should have testamenti factio with the future heir, but it was only necessary that he should have it with the person to whose inheritance the slave belonged.

3. Servus plurium, cum quibus testamenti factio est, ab extraneo institutus heres, unicuique dominorum, ejus jussu adierit, pro portione domini acquirit hereditatem.

3. If a slave belonging to several masters, with all of whom there is testamenti factio, is instituted heir by a stranger, he acquires a proportion of the inheritance for each master by whose command he took it, corresponding to the several interests they each have in him.

D. xxix. 2. 67, 68.

If the slave was instituted heir by one of his masters, then, if this master expressly gave him his freedom, he became the heres necessarius of the master instituting him, and free; a due proportion of the price at which he was valued being paid to each of his other masters. But if his liberty was not expressly given him, the share which the testator had in him accrued proportionately to all those of his masters by whose orders he entered on the inheritance. (See Tit. 7. 4. of this Book.)

4. Et unum hominem et plures in infinitum, quot quis velit, heredes facere licet.

4. A testator may appoint one heir or several, the number being quite unrestricted.

5. Hereditas plerumque dividitur in duodecim uncias, quæ assis appellatione continentur. Habent autem et hæ partes propria nomina ab uncia usque ad assem, ut puta hæc: uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, deunx, as. Non autem utique duodecim uncias esse oportet. Nam tot uncia assen efficiunt, quot testator voluerit, et si unum tantum quis ex semisse verbi gratia heredem scripserit. totus as in semisse erit: neque enim idem ex parte testatus et ex parte intestatus decedere potest, nisi sit miles, cujus sola voluntas in testando spectatur. Et e contrario potest quis in quantascumque voluerit plurimas uncias suam hereditatem dividere.

5. An inheritance is generally divided into twelve ounces, comprehended together under the term of an as, and each of these parts, from the ounce to the as, has its peculiar name, viz. uncia, sextans, quadrans, triens, quincunx, semis, septunx, bes, dodrans, dextans, deunx, as. But it is not necessary that there should be always twelve ounces, for an as may consist of as many ounces as the testator pleases. If, for example, a man names but one heir, and appoints him ex semisse, i.e. the heir of six parts, then these six parts will make up the whole as; for no one can die partly testate and partly intestate, except a soldier, whose intention in making his testament is alone regarded. Conversely, a testator may divide the inheritance into as many ounces more than twelve as he thinks proper.

D. xxvii. 5. 50. 2; D. xxviii. 5. 18. 1 et seq.; D. xxix. 1. 6.

In making a testament, where the testator wished to give different shares to his heirs, the singular system referred to in the text was often adopted. The testator did not give a fifth, a fourth, &c., to each heir, but gave so many parts, e.g. five or four parts to one heir, and so many more to another. The number of parts given to each was added up, and the total formed the number of which these parts were taken to be a fraction. For instance, if a testator gave to A five parts, to B six, and to C two, the whole number amounting to thirteen, A took five-thirteenths, B six-thirteenths, and C two-thirteenths.

So far all was simple, but a greater complication was introduced by adopting, conjointly with this calculation of parts, a mode of reckoning derived from the familiar measure of the as, or pound weight, and its division into twelve ounces. The hereditas was considered to be represented by the as, and the parts by the ounces. But the testator had the power of determining how many ounces there should be in this imaginary pound. In the instance above given the as contains thirteen unciae. But supposing the testator assigned a certain number of parts to some of his heirs, and not to others, as, to A five parts, to B six parts, and then made C a co-heir, but without assigning him any number of parts, the law supposed the testator to have divided his pound into twelve ounces as the standard number, and gave the heir to whom no number of parts was assigned such a number as made up the as. In this instance, therefore, C would have one ounce or part. But if the whole number of parts expressly given exceeded twelve, then the testator was supposed to have been measuring out his inheritance by the double as (dupondius), and the heir to whom no express number was given took the number of parts wanting to make up twenty-four. If the parts expressly given exceeded twenty-four, then the tripondius, containing thirty-six ounces, was the measure, and so on. The testator never died only partly testate; for whatever he gave was taken to make up the whole inheritance. If his testament only disposed of a portion of his property in the way mentioned in the text, viz. by his only giving six ounces (semiss) to his heir, and his instituting only one heir, six was considered to be the number of ounces he wished to have in the as, and therefore he died testate as to all his property. If he did not use any expression referring to the parts of an as, but gave his heir specific things, having other property besides, what he did give was considered to represent what he did not give; as, for instance, if a man possessed large estates, and made A his heir, giving him one farm, and named no other heir, A took all his property: for this one farm was taken to be a description of the whole.

The as was thus divided: uncia, one ounce; sextans, one-sixth of an as, or two ounces; quadrans, one-fourth, or three ounces; triens, one-third, or four ounces; quincunx, five ounces; semiss, one-half, or six ounces; septunx, seven ounces; bes, contracted from bis triens, eight ounces; dodrans, contracted from de quadrans, the as minus a quadrans, nine ounces; den- text was often adopted. The testator did not give a fifth, a fourth, &c., to each heir, but gave so many parts, e.g. five or four parts to one heir, and so many more to another. The number of parts given to each was added up, and the total formed the number of which these parts were taken to be a fraction. For instance, if a testator gave to A five parts, to B six, and to C two, the whole number amounting to thirteen, A took five-thirteenths, B six-thirteenths, and C two-thirteenths.

So far all was simple, but a greater complication was introduced by adopting, conjointly with this calculation of parts, a mode of reckoning derived from the familiar measure of the as, or pound weight, and its division into twelve ounces. The hereditas was considered to be represented by the as, and the parts by the ounces. But the testator had the power of determining how many ounces there should be in this imaginary pound. In the instance above given the as contains thirteen unciae. But supposing the testator assigned a certain number of parts to some of his heirs, and not to others, as, to A five parts, to B six parts, and then made C a co-heir, but without assigning him any number of parts, the law supposed the testator to have divided his pound into twelve ounces as the standard number, and gave the heir to whom no number of parts was assigned such a number as made up the as. In this instance, therefore, C would have one ounce or part. But if the whole number of parts expressly given exceeded twelve, then the testator was supposed to have been measuring out his inheritance by the double as (dupondius), and the heir to whom no express number was given took the number of parts wanting to make up twenty-four. If the parts expressly given exceeded twenty-four, then the tripondius, containing thirty-six ounces, was the measure, and so on. The testator never died only partly testate; for whatever he gave was taken to make up the whole inheritance. If his testament only disposed of a portion of his property in the way mentioned in the text, viz. by his only giving six ounces (semiss) to his heir, and his instituting only one heir, six was considered to be the number of ounces he wished to have in the as, and therefore he died testate as to all his property. If he did not use any expression referring to the parts of an as, but gave his heir specific things, having other property besides, what he did give was considered to represent what he did not give; as, for instance, if a man possessed large estates, and made A his heir, giving him one farm, and named no other heir, A took all his property: for this one farm was taken to be a description of the whole.

The as was thus divided: uncia, one ounce; sextans, one-sixth of an as, or two ounces; quadrans, one-fourth, or three ounces; triens, one-third, or four ounces; quincunx, five ounces; semiss, one-half, or six ounces; septunx, seven ounces; bes, contracted from bis triens, eight ounces; dodrans, contracted from de quadrans, the as minus a quadrans, nine ounces; den- tans, contracted from de sextans, ten ounces; and deunæ, eleven ounces.

6. Si plures instituantur, ita demum partium distributio necessaria est, si nolit testator eos ex æquis partibus heredes esse: satis enim constat, nullis partibus nominatis, æquis ex partibus eos heredes esse. Partibus autem in quorundam personis expressis, si quis alius sine parte nominatus erit, si quidem aliqua pars assi deerit, ex ea parte heres fit, et si plures sine parte scripti sunt, omnes in eadem parte concurrent. Si vero totus as completus sit, in partem dimidiam vocantur et ille vel illi omnes in alteram dimidiam. Nec interest, primus an medius an novissimus sine parte scriptus sit: ea enim pars data intellegitur, quæ vacat.

6. If several heirs are appointed, it is not necessary that the testator should specify their several shares, unless he intends that they should not take in equal portions. For if no division is made, the heirs clearly take equal portions. But if the shares of some should be specified, and another be named heir without having any portion assigned him, he will take the fraction that may be wanting to make up the as. And if several are instituted heirs without having any portion assigned them, they will all divide this remaining fraction among them. But, if the whole as is given among those whose parts are specified, and there is then no fraction left, then they whose shares are not specified take one moiety, and he or they whose shares are specified the other moiety. It is immaterial whether the heir whose share is not specified holds the first, middle, or last place in the institution; it is always the part not specifically given that is considered to belong to him.

D. xxviii. 5. 9. 12; D. xxviii. 5. 17; D. xxviii. 5. 20.

From this paragraph we may add one more detail of the system pursued in calculating the parts of the inheritance. If the number of parts expressly given amounted exactly to twelve, and there was an heir instituted to whom no parts were given, the dupondius was taken as the standard, and this heir to whom no parts were given took twelve out of twenty-four.

7. Videamus, si pars aliqua vacet nec tamen quisquam sine parte heres institutus sit, quid juris sit? Veluti si tres ex quartis partibus heredes scripti sunt. Et constat, vacantem partem singulis tacite pro hereditaria parte accedere et perinde haberi, ac si ex tertiis partibus heredes scripti essent: et ex diverso si plus asse in portionibus sit, tacite singulis decrescere, ut, si verbi gratia quattuor ex tertiis partibus heredes scripti sint, perinde habeantur, ac si unusquisque ex quarta parte scriptus fuisset.

7. Let us inquire how we ought to decide in case a part remains unappropriated, and yet each heir has his portion assigned him: as, if three should be instituted and the inheritance divided into four parts. It is clear, in this case, that the undisposed part would be divided among them in proportion to the share given to each, and it would be exactly as if each had had a third part assigned him. And (conversely), if heirs are instituted with such portions as in the whole to exceed the as, then each heir must suffer a proportionate diminution; for example, if four are instituted, and the inheritance divided into three parts, this would be the same as if each of the written heirs had been given a fourth only.

D. xxviii. 5. 13. 2, et seq.

tans, contracted from de sextans, ten ounces; and deunæ, eleven ounces.

6. Si plures instituantur, ita demum partium distributio necessaria est, si nolit testator eos ex æquis partibus heredes esse: satis enim constat, nullis partibus nominatis, æquis ex partibus eos heredes esse. Partibus autem in quorundam personis expressis, si quis alius sine parte nominatus erit, si quidem aliqua pars assi deerit, ex ea parte heres fit, et si plures sine parte scripti sunt, omnes in eadem parte concurrunt. Si vero totus as completus sit, in partem dimidiam vocantur et ille vel illi omnes in alteram dimidiam. Nec interest, primus an medius an novissimus sine parte scriptus sit: ea enim pars data intellegitur, quæ vacat.

6. If several heirs are appointed, it is not necessary that the testator should specify their several shares, unless he intends that they should not take in equal portions. For if no division is made, the heirs clearly take equal portions. But if the shares of some should be specified, and another be named heir without having any portion assigned him, he will take the fraction that may be wanting to make up the as. And if several are instituted heirs without having any portion assigned them, they will all divide this remaining fraction among them. But, if the whole as is given among those whose parts are specified, and there is then no fraction left, then they whose shares are not specified take one moiety, and he or they whose shares are specified the other moiety. It is immaterial whether the heir whose share is not specified holds the first, middle, or last place in the institution; it is always the part not specifically given that is considered to belong to him.

D. xxviii. 5. 9. 12; D. xxviii. 5. 17; D. xxviii. 5. 20.

From this paragraph we may add one more detail of the system pursued in calculating the parts of the inheritance. If the number of parts expressly given amounted exactly to twelve, and there was an heir instituted to whom no parts were given, the dupondius was taken as the standard, and this heir to whom no parts were given took twelve out of twenty-four.

7. Videamus, si pars aliqua vacet nec tamen quisquam sine parte heres institutus sit, quid juris sit? Veluti si tres ex quartis partibus heredes scripti sunt. Et constat, vacantem partem singulis tacite pro hereditaria parte accedere et perinde haberi, ac si ex tertiis partibus heredes scripti essent: et ex diverso si plus asse in portionibus sit, tacite singulis decrescere, ut, si verbi gratia quattuor ex tertiis partibus heredes scripti sint, perinde habeantur, ac si unusquisque ex quarta parte scriptus fuisset.

7. Let us inquire how we ought to decide in case a part remains unappropriated, and yet each heir has his portion assigned him: as, if three should be instituted and the inheritance divided into four parts. It is clear, in this case, that the undisposed part would be divided among them in proportion to the share given to each, and it would be exactly as if each had had a third part assigned him. And (conversely), if heirs are instituted with such portions as in the whole to exceed the as, then each heir must suffer a proportionate diminution; for example, if four are instituted, and the inheritance divided into three parts, this would be the same as if each of the written heirs had been given a fourth only.

D. xxviii. 5. 13. 2, et seq.

8. Et si plures unciae quam duodecim distributae sunt, is, qui sine parte institutus est, quod dipondio deest, habebit: idemque erit, si dipondius expletus sit. Quae omnes partes ad assem postea revocantur, quamvis sint plurium unciarum.

8. If more than twelve ounces are bequeathed, then he who is instituted without any prescribed share shall have the amount wanting to complete the second as; and so, if all the parts of the second as are already bequeathed, he shall have the amount necessary to make up the third as. But all these parts are afterwards reduced to one single as, however great may be their number of ounces.

D. xxviii. 5. 18.

The concluding sentence of the section means, that though, for the sake of calculating the parts, we go beyond the as to the dipondius or tripondius, yet we must always consider the as as representing the inheritance. For example, to be quite correct, we must make 15-24ths into $7\frac{1}{2}$ -12ths, so that the portions of the inheritance may be expressed with reference to the twelve unciae of the as.

9. Heres et pure et sub conditione institui potest. Ex certo tempore aut ad certum tempus non potest, veluti 'post quinquennium quam moriar' vel 'ex kalendis illis' aut 'usque ad kalendas illas heres esto:' diemque adjectum pro supervacuo haberi placet et perinde esse, ac si pure heres institutus esset.

9. An heir may be instituted simply or conditionally, but not from or to any certain period; as 'after five years from my death,' or 'from the calends of such a month,' or 'until the calends of such a month.' The term thus added is considered a superfluity, and the institution is treated exactly as if unconditional.

D. xxviii. 5. 34.

The first part of this paragraph must be understood as referring to heirs other than sui heredes. If a suus heres, or at any rate if a jilius, was instituted sub conditione, unless the fulfilment of the condition was within his own power, the testament was null. (D. xxviii. 5. 4. pr.)

If the institution was conditional, all those rights which otherwise would date from the death of the testator, dated from the accomplishment of the condition. When the condition was accomplished, the heir entered on the inheritance, and then by this additio (not by the accomplishment of the condition) his rights were carried back to the time when the testator died. Heres quandoque adeundo hereditatem jam tunc a morte successisse defuncto intellegitur. (D. xxix. 2. 54.) Until the heir entered the inheritance was said jacere, to be in abeyance. But the rule that additio has a retrospective effect is qualified by another rule already mentioned, that an inheritance in abeyance represents the person of the deceased testator, not of the future heir. (See par. 2.)

There are two rules of Roman law, which deserve attention, as illustrating how completely succession was regarded as the transfer of the whole persona of the deceased. It was a rule of law that a person could not die partly testate and partly intestate; if his testament was valid at all, his heredes ab intestato were en-

8. Et si plures unciae quam duodecim distributae sunt, is, qui sine parte institutus est, quod dipondio deest, habebit: idemque erit, si dipondius expletus sit. Quae omnes partes ad assem postea revocantur, quamvis sint plurium unciarum.

8. If more than twelve ounces are bequeathed, then he who is instituted without any prescribed share shall have the amount wanting to complete the second as; and so, if all the parts of the second as are already bequeathed, he shall have the amount necessary to make up the third as. But all these parts are afterwards reduced to one single as, however great may be their number of ounces.

D. xxviii. 5. 18.

The concluding sentence of the section means, that though, for the sake of calculating the parts, we go beyond the as to the dipondius or tripondius, yet we must always consider the as as representing the inheritance. For example, to be quite correct, we must make 15-24ths into $7\frac{1}{2}$ -12ths, so that the portions of the inheritance may be expressed with reference to the twelve unciae of the as.

9. Heres et pure et sub conditione institui potest. Ex certo tempore aut ad certum tempus non potest, veluti 'post quinquennium quam moriar' vel 'ex kalendis illis' aut 'usque ad kalendas illas heres esto:' diemque adjectum pro supervacuo haberi placet et perinde esse, ac si pure heres institutus esset.

9. An heir may be instituted simply or conditionally, but not from or to any certain period; as 'after five years from my death,' or 'from the calends of such a month,' or 'until the calends of such a month.' The term thus added is considered a superfluity, and the institution is treated exactly as if unconditional.

D. xxviii. 5. 34.

The first part of this paragraph must be understood as referring to heirs other than sui heredes. If a suus heres, or at any rate if a filius, was instituted sub conditione, unless the fulfilment of the condition was within his own power, the testament was null. (D. xxviii. 5. 4. pr.)

If the institution was conditional, all those rights which otherwise would date from the death of the testator, dated from the accomplishment of the condition. When the condition was accomplished, the heir entered on the inheritance, and then by this aditio (not by the accomplishment of the condition) his rights were carried back to the time when the testator died. Heres quandoque adeundo hereditatem jam tunc a morte successisse defuncto intellegitur. (D. xxix. 2. 54.) Until the heir entered the inheritance was said jacere, to be in abeyance. But the rule that aditio has a retrospective effect is qualified by another rule already mentioned, that an inheritance in abeyance represents the person of the deceased testator, not of the future heir. (See par. 2.)

There are two rules of Roman law, which deserve attention, as illustrating how completely succession was regarded as the transfer of the whole persona of the deceased. It was a rule of law that a person could not die partly testate and partly intestate; if his testament was valid at all, his heredes ab intestato were en-tiely excluded. It was also a rule of law, that a person who once became heir, could not cease to be heir. Thus we have seen (par. 5) that if there was a single heir, and he was instituted for six ounces, he took the whole inheritance; for the testator could not die testate as to six ounces and intestate as to the remaining six. Again, if a person was instituted heir from a certain time, there would be no one but the heredes ab intestato to take in the meantime, and they must cease to be heirs when the time arrived; if the institution was to take effect only up to a certain time, the instituted heir would cease to be heir at the expiration of the time, and the heredes ab intestato would then take the inheritance. Such an institution would have offended against the second rule we have just mentioned, viz. that a person who had once been heir could not cease to be heir (D. xxviii. 5. 88), whence the adage semel heres semper heres; for in the first case the heredes ab intestato, in the second the instituted heir, would cease, at the end of a certain time, to be heir. But if the institution was conditional, the heredes ab intestato did not take until the condition was fulfilled, and were excluded by the possibility which existed at every moment of time that the testamentary heir would be able to enter on the inheritance by the condition being accomplished. (D. xxix. 2. 39.)

The text speaks of certum tempus; if the time only was uncertain, if the event was one that must happen at some time, as that B should die, but the time of its happening was, as in this case, uncertain, and the testator said, 'Let A be my heir from the date of B's death,' this would operate to make the institution conditional. Dies incertus conditionem in testamento facit. (D. xxxv. 1. 75.) It would be uncertain whether A would outlive B; but if, during A's lifetime, B died, which he might at any moment, the condition, viz. that A should outlive him, would be accomplished, and this possibility excluded the heredes ab intestato.

A soldier might make his testament ex certo tempore or ad certum tempus (D. xxix. 1. 41. pr.), and might die partly testate and partly intestate. (See par. 5.)

Inimpossibile condicio is impossible condition is not inserted man
the

10. Impossibilis condicio in institutionibus et legatis nec non in fideicommissis et libertatibus pro non scripto habetur.

10. An impossible condition in the institution of heirs, gift of legacies, creation of fideicommissa, and gifts of freedom, is considered as not inserted at all.

D. xxviii. 7. 1.

That the institution was regarded as unconditional instead of void, when the condition was one not allowed by law, must be ascribed to the anxiety of Romans not to die intestate, and the consequent favour with which the law regarded any means of treating a will as valid. An obligation containing an impossible condition would be void. (Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 11.)

Possibilis est quæ per rerum naturam admitti potest: impossibilis quæ non potest. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 2. 1.) But a thing

tiely excluded. It was also a rule of law, that a person who once became heir, could not cease to be heir. Thus we have seen (par. 5) that if there was a single heir, and he was instituted for six ounces, he took the whole inheritance; for the testator could not die testate as to six ounces and intestate as to the remaining six. Again, if a person was instituted heir from a certain time, there would be no one but the heredes ab intestato to take in the meantime, and they must cease to be heirs when the time arrived; if the institution was to take effect only up to a certain time, the instituted heir would cease to be heir at the expiration of the time, and the heredes ab intestato would then take the inheritance. Such an institution would have offended against the second rule we have just mentioned, viz. that a person who had once been heir could not cease to be heir (D. xxviii. 5. 88), whence the adage semel heres semper heres; for in the first case the heredes ab intestato, in the second the instituted heir, would cease, at the end of a certain time, to be heir. But if the institution was conditional, the heredes ab intestato did not take until the condition was fulfilled, and were excluded by the possibility which existed at every moment of time that the testamentary heir would be able to enter on the inheritance by the condition being accomplished. (D. xxix. 2. 39.)

The text speaks of certum tempus; if the time only was uncertain, if the event was one that must happen at some time, as that B should die, but the time of its happening was, as in this case, uncertain, and the testator said, 'Let A be my heir from the date of B's death,' this would operate to make the institution conditional. Dies incertus conditionem in testamento facit. (D. xxxv. 1. 75.) It would be uncertain whether A would outlive B; but if, during A's lifetime, B died, which he might at any moment, the condition, viz. that A should outlive him, would be accomplished, and this possibility excluded the heredes ab intestato.

A soldier might make his testament ex certo tempore or ad certum tempus (D. xxix. 1. 41. pr.), and might die partly testate and partly intestate. (See par. 5.)

In impossible conditionibus et legatis nec non in fideicommissis et libertatibus pro non scripto habetur.

10. Impossibilis condicio in institutionibus et legatis nec non in fideicommissis et libertatibus pro non scripto habetur.

10. An impossible condition in the institution of heirs, gift of legacies, creation of fideicommissa, and gifts of freedom, is considered as not inserted at all.

D. xxviii. 7. 1.

That the institution was regarded as unconditional instead of void, when the condition was one not allowed by law, must be ascribed to the anxiety of Romans not to die intestate, and the consequent favour with which the law regarded any means of treating a will as valid. An obligation containing an impossible condition would be void. (Bk. iii. Tit. 19. 11.)

Possibilis est quæ per rerum naturam admitti potest: impossibilis quæ non potest. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 2. 1.) But a thing contrary to law, or to boni mores, was considered as impossible as if it was impossible per rerum naturam. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 2; D. xxviii. 7. 14.)

11. Si plures condiciones institutioni adscriptæ sunt, si quidem conjunctim, ut puta 'si illud et illud factum erit,' omnibus parendum est: si separatim, veluti 'si illud aut illud factum erit,' cui libet obtemperare satis est.

11. When several conditions are attached to the institution, if they are placed in the conjunctive, as, 'if this thing and that thing are done,' all the conditions must be complied with. But, if the conditions are placed in the alternative, as, 'if this or that is done,' it will be sufficient to comply with any one.

D. xxviii. 7. 5.

12. Hi, quos numquam testator vidit, heredes institui possunt, veluti si fratris filios pereгри natos ignorans, qui essent, heredes instituerit: ignorantia enim testantis inutilem institutionem non facit.

12. A testator may institute persons his heirs whom he has never seen, as, his brother's sons, born in a foreign country, and unknown to him; for the want of this knowledge will not make the institution void.

C. vi. 24. 11.

TIT. XV. DE VULGARI SUBSTITUTIONE.

Potest autem quis in testamento suo plures gradus heredum facere, ut puta 'si ille heres non erit, ille heres esto:' et deinceps, in quantum velit, testator substituere potest et novissimo loco in subsidium vel servum necessarium heredem instituere.

A man by testament may appoint several degrees of heirs; as, for instance, 'if so and so will not be my heir, let so and so be my heir.' And so on through as many substitutions as he shall think proper. He may even, in the last place, and as an ultimate resource, institute a slave his necessary heir.

GAI. ii. 174; D. xxviii. 6. 36. pr.

Substitution was really a conditional institution. If A is not my heir, if, for instance, he dies before me, I appoint B. The extent to which substitution was carried, was owing to the importance attached to dying testate; and partly also, in the time of the emperors, to the wish to guard against the operation of the lex Julia et Papia, which created numerous causes of incapacity to take under a testament, and gave the shares of those instituted, but incapable of taking, as caduca, to those named in the testament who were married and had children, and, if there were no such persons, to the ærarium, or public treasury. As the effect of the lex Julia et Papia cannot be discussed without taking legacies into consideration, a detailed account of the two laws known by this name is deferred till we reach the 20th Title. By substitution, that which under these laws was a caducum went to the substituted heir, if qualified to take, and did not follow the course of devolution which these laws prescribed.

contrary to law, or to boni mores, was considered as impossible as if it was impossible per rerum naturam. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 4. 2; D. xxviii. 7. 14.)

11. Si plures condiciones institutioni adscriptæ sunt, si quidem conjunctim, ut puta 'si illud et illud factum erit,' omnibus parendum est: si separatim, veluti 'si illud aut illud factum erit,' cui libet obtemperare satis est.

11. When several conditions are attached to the institution, if they are placed in the conjunctive, as, 'if this thing and that thing are done,' all the conditions must be complied with. But, if the conditions are placed in the alternative, as, 'if this or that is done,' it will be sufficient to comply with any one.

D. xxviii. 7. 5.

12. Hi, quos numquam testator vidit, heredes institui possunt, veluti si fratris filios pereгри natos ignorans, qui essent, heredes instituerit: ignorantia enim testantis inutilem institutionem non facit.

12. A testator may institute persons his heirs whom he has never seen, as, his brother's sons, born in a foreign country, and unknown to him; for the want of this knowledge will not make the institution void.

C. vi. 24. 11.

TIT. XV. DE VULGARI SUBSTITUTIONE.

Potest autem quis in testamento suo plures gradus heredum facere, ut puta 'si ille heres non erit, ille heres esto:' et deinceps, in quantum velit, testator substituere potest et novissimo loco in subsidium vel servum necessarium heredem instituere.

A man by testament may appoint several degrees of heirs; as, for instance, 'if so and so will not be my heir, let so and so be my heir.' And so on through as many substitutions as he shall think proper. He may even, in the last place, and as an ultimate resource, institute a slave his necessary heir.

GAI. ii. 174; D. xxviii. 6. 36. pr.

Substitution was really a conditional institution. If A is not my heir, if, for instance, he dies before me, I appoint B. The extent to which substitution was carried, was owing to the importance attached to dying testate; and partly also, in the time of the emperors, to the wish to guard against the operation of the lex Julia et Papia, which created numerous causes of incapacity to take under a testament, and gave the shares of those instituted, but incapable of taking, as caduca, to those named in the testament who were married and had children, and, if there were no such persons, to the ærarium, or public treasury. As the effect of the lex Julia et Papia cannot be discussed without taking legacies into consideration, a detailed account of the two laws known by this name is deferred till we reach the 20th Title. By substitution, that which under these laws was a caducum went to the substituted heir, if qualified to take, and did not follow the course of devolution which these laws prescribed.

This kind of substitution is termed vulgaris, as opposed to substitutio pupillaris, the subject of the next Title.

1. Et plures in unius locum possunt substitui, vel unus in plurium, vel singuli singulis, vel invicem ipsi, qui heredes instituti sunt.

1. A testator may substitute several in the place of one, or one in the place of several, or one in the place of each one, or he may substitute the instituted heirs themselves reciprocally to one another.

GAL. ii. 175; D. xxviii. 6. 36. 1.

Three advantages which co-heirs gained by being substituted to each other are to be noticed: (1) If any one instituted heir died before the testator, or refused to take his share of the inheritance, his share was, in fact, undisposed of. But as the testator was always supposed to have disposed of his whole estate if he disposed of any part, this share was divided among all those who entered on the inheritance in proportions corresponding to the share given them by the will. Their claim to this was called the jus accrescendi. But a testator sometimes produced nearly the same effect as the law would have produced for him, by substituting the heirs who entered on the inheritance in the place of those who did not, thus preventing any share from becoming vacant. The effect was nearly the same, but not quite so. It was open to the substituted heirs to refuse the inheritance of this new part, which required to be expressly entered on: whereas, if instituted heirs once entered on the share given them by the testament, they could not decline accepting any further portion which devolved on them by the jus accrescendi. (D. xxix. 2. 35. pr.) (2) Surviving co-heirs might possibly gain by not having to share with the representatives of deceased heirs. The representatives of an instituted heir who died after entering on the inheritance received his portion of the share of a co-heir subsequently renouncing. But if the co-heirs were substituted to each other, then only those living at the time when the choice of entering on the vacant share was offered them, took by substitution (D. xxviii. 6. 23; D. xxviii. 5. 59. 7), the benefit of substitution, like that of institution, being personal; and the representatives of a co-heir who had died after entering, but before he had accepted the benefit of substitution, would lose what, under the jus accrescendi, would come to them. (D. xxviii. 6. 45. 1.) (3) The laws known under the joint name of the lex Julia et Papia Poppæa, had, while in force, given a further reason for this mode of mutually substituting the heirs to each other, as under their provisions some persons could take what was given them, but could not claim caduca. By substitution, an heir incapable of claiming a caducum under these laws might take it as substituted heir. For the mode in which these laws operated, see note on Tit. 20. 8.

It is easy to understand, that where there were more than two persons instituted, the devolution might not be the same by substitution and by the jus accrescendi. Supposing A, B, and C

318
 661
 1512
 The representative of a dead heir could not take the share of the co-heir who had died before he had accepted the benefit of substitution all heirs
 could claim Caduca
 D

This kind of substitution is termed vulgaris, as opposed to substitutio pupillaris, the subject of the next Title.

1. Et plures in unius locum possunt substitui, vel unus in plurimum, vel singuli singulis, vel invicem ipsi, qui heredes instituti sunt.

1. A testator may substitute several in the place of one, or one in the place of several, or one in the place of each one, or he may substitute the instituted heirs themselves reciprocally to one another.

GAL. ii. 175; D. xxviii. 6. 36. 1.

Three advantages which co-heirs gained by being substituted to each other are to be noticed: (1) If any one instituted heir died before the testator, or refused to take his share of the inheritance, his share was, in fact, undisposed of. But as the testator was always supposed to have disposed of his whole estate if he disposed of any part, this share was divided among all those who entered on the inheritance in proportions corresponding to the share given them by the will. Their claim to this was called the jus accrescendi. But a testator sometimes produced nearly the same effect as the law would have produced for him, by substituting the heirs who entered on the inheritance in the place of those who did not, thus preventing any share from becoming vacant. The effect was nearly the same, but not quite so. It was open to the substituted heirs to refuse the inheritance of this new part, which required to be expressly entered on: whereas, if instituted heirs once entered on the share given them by the testament, they could not decline accepting any further portion which devolved on them by the jus accrescendi. (D. xxix. 2. 35. pr.) (2) Surviving co-heirs might possibly gain by not having to share with the representatives of deceased heirs. The representatives of an instituted heir who died after entering on the inheritance received his portion of the share of a co-heir subsequently renouncing. But if the co-heirs were substituted to each other, then only those living at the time when the choice of entering on the vacant share was offered them, took by substitution (D. xxviii. 6. 23; D. xxviii. 5. 59. 7), the benefit of substitution, like that of institution, being personal; and the representatives of a co-heir who had died after entering, but before he had accepted the benefit of substitution, would lose what, under the jus accrescendi, would come to them. (D. xxviii. 6. 45. 1.) (3) The laws known under the joint name of the lex Julia et Papia Poppæa, had, while in force, given a further reason for this mode of mutually substituting the heirs to each other, as under their provisions some persons could take what was given them, but could not claim caduca. By substitution, an heir incapable of claiming a caducum under these laws might take it as substituted heir. For the mode in which these laws operated, see note on Tit. 20. 8.

It is easy to understand, that where there were more than two persons instituted, the devolution might not be the same by substitution and by the jus accrescendi. Supposing A, B, and C

318
661 1552
The representative of a dead heir who died after entering on the inheritance did not get the his share but the co-heirs
all heirs could claim
caduca
D

were all instituted heirs, and B substituted to A, and then D substituted to B; if A and B died, by B being substituted to A the shares of A and B would both go to D; but by the jus accrescendi (i.e. supposing B had not been substituted to A) the share of A would have been vacant, and would have been divided between D and C.

2. Et si ex disparibus partibus heredes scriptos invicem substituerit et nullam mentionem in substitutione habuerit partium, eas videtur partes in substitutione dedisse, quas in institutione expressit: et ita divus Pius rescripsit.

2. If a testator, having instituted several heirs with unequal shares, substitutes them reciprocally the one to the other, and makes no mention of the shares they are to have in the substitution, he is considered to have given the same shares in the substitution which he gave in the institution; thus the Emperor Antoninus decided by rescript.

C. vi. 26. 1.

If he chose, however, to specify the shares they were to take in that portion to which they were substituted, there was no necessity that they should be the same shares as those they were said to take by institution.

3. Sed si instituto heredi et coheredi suo substituto dato alius substitutus fuerit, divi Severus et Antoninus sine distinctione rescripserunt, ad utramque partem substitutum admitti.

3. If a co-heir is substituted to any instituted heir, and a third person to that co-heir, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have by rescript decided that this third person shall be admitted to the portions of both without distinction.

D. xxviii. 6. 41. pr.

A testator institutes two heirs, A and B. He substitutes B to A, and to B he substitutes C. Supposing neither A nor B takes the inheritance, C will take the part of each, utramque partem, and will take it without any distinction (sine distinctione) as to what was the order in which the testament was drawn up, or whether it is A or B that first dies or refuses or becomes incapable of taking the inheritance. How he would take the part of B is clear enough; but if B died or refused the inheritance before A, how would C take A's share? He did so by the rule substituto censetur substitutus instituto; the person substituted to the substitute is considered substituted to the instituted heir; C is substituted to B, who is substituted to A, and therefore C is, by what was termed a tacita substitutio, substituted to A, and takes his part.

4. Si servum alienum quis patremfamilias arbitratus, heredem scripserit et, si heres non esset, Mævium ei substituerit isque servus jussu domini adierit hereditatem, Mævius in partem admittitur. Illa enim verba 'si heres non erit' in

4. If a testator institutes the slave of another his heir, supposing him to be a paterfamilias, and, to provide for the case of this person not becoming his heir, substitutes Mævius in his place: then, if that slave should afterwards enter upon the inheritance at the com-

were all instituted heirs, and B substituted to A, and then D substituted to B; if A and B died, by B being substituted to A the shares of A and B would both go to D; but by the jus accrescendi (i.e. supposing B had not been substituted to A) the share of A would have been vacant, and would have been divided between D and C.

2. Et si ex disparibus partibus heredes scriptos invicem substituerit et nullam mentionem in substitutione habuerit partium, eas videtur partes in substitutione dedisse, quas in institutione expressit: et ita divus Pius rescripsit.

2. If a testator, having instituted several heirs with unequal shares, substitutes them reciprocally the one to the other, and makes no mention of the shares they are to have in the substitution, he is considered to have given the same shares in the substitution which he gave in the institution; thus the Emperor Antoninus decided by rescript.

C. vi. 26. 1.

If he chose, however, to specify the shares they were to take in that portion to which they were substituted, there was no necessity that they should be the same shares as those they were said to take by institution.

3. Sed si instituto heredi et coheredi suo substituto dato alius substitutus fuerit, divi Severus et Antoninus sine distinctione rescripserunt, ad utramque partem substitutum admitti.

3. If a co-heir is substituted to any instituted heir, and a third person to that co-heir, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have by rescript decided that this third person shall be admitted to the portions of both without distinction.

D. xxviii. 6. 41. pr.

A testator institutes two heirs, A and B. He substitutes B to A, and to B he substitutes C. Supposing neither A nor B takes the inheritance, C will take the part of each, utramque partem, and will take it without any distinction (sine distinctione) as to what was the order in which the testament was drawn up, or whether it is A or B that first dies or refuses or becomes incapable of taking the inheritance. How he would take the part of B is clear enough; but if B died or refused the inheritance before A, how would C take A's share? He did so by the rule substituto censetur substitutus instituto; the person substituted to the substitute is considered substituted to the instituted heir; C is substituted to B, who is substituted to A, and therefore C is, by what was termed a tacita substitutio, substituted to A, and takes his part.

4. Si servum alienum quis patremfamilias arbitratus, heredem scripserit et, si heres non esset, Mævium ei substituerit isque servus jussu domini adierit hereditatem, Mævius in partem admittitur. Illa enim verba 'si heres non erit' in

4. If a testator institutes the slave of another his heir, supposing him to be a paterfamilias, and, to provide for the case of this person not becoming his heir, substitutes Mævius in his place: then, if that slave should afterwards enter upon the inheritance at the com-eo quidem, quem alieno juri sub-jectum esse testator scit, sic acci-piuntur: si neque ipse heres erit neque alium heredem effecerit: in eo vero, quem patremfamilias esse arbitratur, illud significat: si hereditatem sibi eive, cujus juri postea subjectus esse cœperit, non acqui-sierit. Idque Tiberius Cæsar in persona Parthenii servi sui constituit.

mand of his master, the substituted person, Mævius, would be admitted to a part. For the words, 'if he does not become my heir,' in the case of a person whom the testator knew to be under the dominion of another, are taken to mean, if he neither becomes heir himself, nor causes another to be heir; but in the case of a person whom the testator supposed to be a pater-familias, the words mean, 'if the heir acquires the inheritance neither for himself nor for him to whose dominion he afterwards becomes subject.' This was decided by Tiberius Cæsar in the case of his own slave Parthenius.

D. xxviii. 5. 40, 41.

The pars which each took was one-half. (THEOPH. Par.)
That each should take half in such a case was a mere arbitrary regulation, formed on no principle of law, but only meeting, as was supposed, the equity of the case. It seemed hard that the master of the slave should lose all benefit from the institution, when the words of the testament gave him the whole inheritance, and hard that the instituted heir should take nothing when the master of the slave was profiting by a mistake of the testator.
Accordingly Tiberius decided that each should have half.

testament for child

TIT. XVI. DE PUPILLARI SUBSTITUTIONE.

liberis suis impuberibus, quos
in potestate quis habet, non solum
ita, ut supra diximus, substituere potest, id est ut, si heredes ei non extiterint, alius ei sit heres, sed eo amplius ut et, si heredes ei extite-rint et adhuc impuberes mortui fuerint, sit eis aliquis heres. Veluti si quis dicat hoc modo: 'Titius filius
meus heres mihi esto, si filius meus heres mihi non erit, sive heres erit et prius moriatur, quam in suam tutelam venerit (id est pubes factus sit), tunc Seius heres esto.' Quo casu si quidem non extiterit heres filius, tunc substitutus patri fit heres: si vero extiterit heres filius et ante pubertatem decesserit, ipsi filius fit heres substitutus. Nam moribus institutum est, ut, cum ejus ætatis sunt, in qua ipsi sibi testamentum facere non possunt, parentes
eis faciant.

A testator can substitute an heir in place of his children, under the age of puberty, and in his power, not only in the manner we have just mentioned, namely, by appointing some other person his heir in case
his children do not become his heirs,
but also, if they do become his heirs, but die under the age of puberty, he may substitute another heir; as, for example, if any one says, 'Let Titius, my son, be my heir, and, if he should not become my heir, or, becoming my heir, should die before he comes to be his own master, i.e. before he arrives at puberty, let Seius be my heir.' In this case, if the son does not become the heir, the substituted heir is heir to the father; but, if the son becomes heir, and then dies under the age of puberty, the substituted heir is then heir to the son. For custom has established that ascendants may make testaments for their children who are not of an age to make testaments for themselves.

eo quidem, quem alieno juri sub-
jectum esse testator scit, sic acci-piuntur: si neque ipse heres erit neque alium heredem effecerit: in eo vero, quem patremfamilias esse arbitratur, illud significant: si hereditatem sibi eive, cujus juri postea
subjectus esse cœperit, non acqui-sierit. Idque Tiberius Cæsar in persona Parthenii servi sui constituit.

mand of his master, the substituted
person, Mævius, would be admitted to a part. For the words, 'if he does not become my heir,' in the case of a person whom the testator knew to be under the dominion of another, are taken to mean, if he neither becomes heir himself, nor causes another to be heir; but in the case of a person whom the testator supposed to be a pater-familias, the words mean, 'if the heir acquires the inheritance neither for himself nor for him to whose dominion
he afterwards becomes subject.' This was decided by Tiberius Cæsar in the case of his own slave Parthenius.

D. xxviii. 5. 40, 41.

The pars which each took was one-half. (THEOPH. Par.)
That each should take half in such a case was a mere arbitrary regulation, formed on no principle of law, but only meeting, as was supposed, the equity of the case. It seemed hard that the master of the slave should lose all benefit from the institution, when the words of the testament gave him the whole inheritance, and hard that the instituted heir should take nothing when the master of the slave was profiting by a mistake of the testator.
Accordingly Tiberius decided that each should have half.

placement for child

TIT. XVI. DE PUPILLARI SUBSTITUTIONE.

after man appoints
under the son becomes heres is his son in his son Stent eman mother

Liberis suis impuberibus, quos
in potestate quis habet, non solum
ita, ut supra diximus, substituere potest, id est ut, si heredes ei non extiterint, alius ei sit heres, sed eo
amplius ut et, si heredes ei extite-rint et adhuc impuberes mortui fuerint, sit eis aliquis heres. Veluti si
quis dicat hoc modo: 'Titius filius
meus heres mihi esto, si filius meus
heres mihi non erit, sive heres erit
et prius moriatur, quam in suam
tutelam venerit (id est pubes factus sit), tunc Seius heres esto.' Quo casu si quidem non extiterit heres
filius, tunc substitutus patri fit
heres: si vero extiterit heres filius
et ante pubertatem decesserit, ipsi filio fit heres substitutus. Nam moribus institutum est, ut, cum ejus
ætatis sunt, in qua ipsi sibi testamentum facere non possunt, parentes
eis faciant.

A testator can substitute an heir
in place of his children, under the age of puberty, and in his power, not only in the manner we have just mentioned, namely, by appointing
some other person his heir in case
his children do not become his heirs,
but also, if they do become his heirs,
but die under the age of puberty, he may substitute another heir; as, for example, if any one says, 'Let Titius, my son, be my heir, and, if he should not become my heir, or, becoming my heir, should die before he comes to be his own master, i.e. before he arrives at puberty, let Seius be my heir.' In this case, if the son does not become the heir, the substituted heir is heir to the father; but, if the son becomes heir, and then dies under the age of puberty, the substituted
heir is then heir to the son. For custom has established that ascendants may make testaments for their children who are not of an age to make testaments for themselves.

A child under the age of puberty might be sui juris, and so have the legal right to make a testament; his status might be such as to give him the testamenti factio, but he would not have the power of exercising his right to make a testament, according to the distinction between a right and the power of availing oneself of the right, so often met with in Roman law. If this child, then, died before attaining fourteen years, he would necessarily die intestate, which in Roman eyes was so great a misfortune for any one, that the father of the child was permitted to make the child's testament, but only as a part of, and as accessory to, his own. The right to make a child's testament depended on the possession of the patria potestas, and could only be exercised with regard to those children who were in the father's power.

In the words si filius meus heres mihi non erit, sive heres erit et prius moriatur, we have an instance both of the vulgar and the pupillary substitution. It was long a vexed question among the jurists (Cic. de Orat. i. 39. 57), whether, if one only was expressed, the other was implied; whether, for instance, if the words si filius meus heres mihi non erit stood alone, and the child became heir but died under the age of puberty, the substituted heir would take as if he had been substituted by vulgar substitution. Marcus Aurelius terminated the doubt by deciding that each substitution implied the other (D. xxviii. 6. 4), so that, when the son was instituted heir, the person substituted to him by pupillary substitution was considered as substituted to him by vulgar substitution; and conversely, the person substituted by vulgar substitution was considered as substituted by pupillary substitution, unless, in either case, the testator had expressed a wish to the contrary.

1. Qua ratione excitati, etiam constitutionem in nostro posuimus codice, qua prospectum est, ut, si mente captos habeant filios vel nepotes vel pronepotes cujuscunque sexus vel gradus, liceat eis, etsi puberes sint, ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis certas personas substituere: sin autem resipuerint, eandem substitutionem infirmari, et hoc ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis, quæ, postquam pupillus adoleverit, infirmatur.

1. Guided by this principle, we have also inserted a constitution in our code, which provides that, if a man has children, grandchildren, or great-grandchildren, out of their right minds, of whatever sex or degree, he may, although they have attained the age of puberty, substitute certain persons as heirs in place of such children, on the analogy of pupillary substitution. But if they regain their reason, the substitution becomes void, on the analogy of pupillary substitution, which ceases to operate when the minor attains to puberty.

C. vi. 26. 9; D. xxviii. 6. 14.

This kind of substitution is termed by the commentators quasi-pupillaris or exemplaris, because made ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis. The power here given differs from that of making a child's testament in two points: (1) it could be made by any ascendant, whether paternal or maternal, and not only by the paterfamilias; and (2) the testator could not substitute any one

I child's legat made by a ascendant
II child's des or brother's be appointed

A child under the age of puberty might be sui juris, and so have the legal right to make a testament; his status might be such as to give him the testamenti factio, but he would not have the power of exercising his right to make a testament, according to the distinction between a right and the power of availing oneself of the right, so often met with in Roman law. If this child, then, died before attaining fourteen years, he would necessarily die intestate, which in Roman eyes was so great a misfortune for any one, that the father of the child was permitted to make the child's testament, but only as a part of, and as accessory to, his own. The right to make a child's testament depended on the possession of the patria potestas, and could only be exercised with regard to those children who were in the father's power.

In the words si filius meus heres mihi non erit, sive heres erit et prius moriatur, we have an instance both of the vulgar and the pupillary substitution. It was long a vexed question among the jurists (Cic. de Orat. i. 39. 57), whether, if one only was expressed, the other was implied; whether, for instance, if the words si filius meus heres mihi non erit stood alone, and the child became heir but died under the age of puberty, the substituted heir would take as if he had been substituted by vulgar substitution. Marcus Aurelius terminated the doubt by deciding that each substitution implied the other (D. xxviii. 6. 4), so that, when the son was instituted heir, the person substituted to him by pupillary substitution was considered as substituted to him by vulgar substitution; and conversely, the person substituted by vulgar substitution was considered as substituted by pupillary substitution, unless, in either case, the testator had expressed a wish to the contrary.

1. Qua ratione excitati, etiam constitutionem in nostro posuimus codice, qua prospectum est, ut, si mente captos habeant filios vel nepotes vel pronepotes cujuscunque sexus vel gradus, liceat eis, etsi puberes sint, ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis certas personas substituere: sin autem resipuerint, eandem substitutionem infirmari, et hoc ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis, quæ, postquam pupillus adoleverit, infirmatur.

1. Guided by this principle, we have also inserted a constitution in our code, which provides that, if a man has children, grandchildren, or great-grandchildren, out of their right minds, of whatever sex or degree, he may, although they have attained the age of puberty, substitute certain persons as heirs in place of such children, on the analogy of pupillary substitution. But if they regain their reason, the substitution becomes void, on the analogy of pupillary substitution, which ceases to operate when the minor attains to puberty.

C. vi. 26. 9; D. xxviii. 6. 14.

This kind of substitution is termed by the commentators quasi-pupillaris or exemplaris, because made ad exemplum pupillaris substitutionis. The power here given differs from that of making a child's testament in two points: (1) it could be made by any ascendant, whether paternal or maternal, and not only by the paterfamilias; and (2) the testator could not substitute any one

Appointing out of his children, his Substituted until they Sane.

*I child's legatee made by a ascendant
II child's son or brother's be appointed*

he pleased. He was obliged to appoint one among certain persons, viz. one of the descendants of the insane, and, if there was none, then one of his brothers. If he had no brother, the choice of the testator was then unrestrained. (C. vi. 26. 9.)

If for any other cause than insanity a descendant was incapable of making a testament, the emperor would, if he thought fit, give a licence to the head of the family to make a testament for him. (D. xxviii. 6. 43. pr.)

2. Igitur in pupillari substitutione secundum præfatum modum ordinata duo quodammodo sunt testamenta, alterum patris, alterum filii, tamquam si ipse filius sibi heredem instituisset: aut certe unum est testamentum duarum causarum, id est duarum hereditatum.

2. Therefore in a pupillary substitution, made in the way we have mentioned, there are in a manner two testaments, one of the father, the other of the son, as if the son had instituted an heir to himself; or at least there is one testament, dealing with two matters, that is, two inheritances.

GAI. ii. 180.

3. Sin autem quis ita formidolosus sit, ut timeret, ne filius ejus pupillus adhuc ex eo, quod palam substitutum accepit, post obitum ejus periculo insidiarum subiceretur: vulgarem quidem substitutionem palam facere et in primis testamenti partibus debet, illam autem substitutionem, per quam et si heres extiterit pupillus et intra pubertatem decesserit, substitutus vocatur, separatim in inferioribus partibus scribere eamque partem proprio lino propriæque cera consignare et in prioribus partibus testamenti cavere ne inferiores tabulæ vivo filio et adhuc impubere aperiantur. Illud palam est, non ideo minus valere substitutionem impuberis filii, quod in iisdem tabulis scripta sit, quibus sibi quisque heredem instituisset, quamvis hoc pupillo periculosum sit.

3. If a testator is so apprehensive as to fear lest, after his death, his son, being yet a pupil, should be exposed to the risk of having designs formed against him from another person being openly substituted to him, he ought to make openly a vulgar substitution and insert it in the first part of his testament; and to write the substitution, by which a substituted heir is called to the inheritance, if his son should become an heir and then die under the age of puberty, by itself, and in the lower part, which part ought to be separately tied up and sealed: and he ought also to insert a clause in the first part of his testament, forbidding the lower part to be opened while his son is alive and under the age of puberty. Of course a substitution to a son under the age of puberty is not less valid because written on the same tablet in which the testator has instituted him his heir, whatever danger it may involve to the pupil.

GAI. ii. 181.

4. Non solum autem heredibus institutis impuberibus liberis ita substituere parentes possunt, ut et si heredes eis extiterint et ante pubertatem mortui fuerint, sit eis heres is, quem ipsi voluerint, sed etiam exheredatis. Itaque eo casu si quid pupillo ex hereditatibus legatisve aut donationibus propinquorum atque amicorum acquisitum fuerit, id omne ad substitutum pertinet. Quæcumque diximus de substitutione impuberum liberorum vel heredum institutorum vel exhere-

4. Ascendants may not only substitute to their children under the age of puberty, so that if such children become their heirs, and die under the age of puberty, any one whom the testator pleases shall be made their heir, but they may also substitute to their disinherited children; and therefore, in such a case, whatever a disinherited child, within the age of puberty, may have acquired by succession, by legacies, or by gift from relations and friends, all becomes the property of the substituted heir. All he pleased. He was obliged to appoint one among certain persons, viz. one of the descendants of the insane, and, if there was none, then one of his brothers. If he had no brother, the choice of the testator was then unrestrained. (C. vi. 26. 9.)

If for any other cause than insanity a descendant was incapable of making a testament, the emperor would, if he thought fit, give a licence to the head of the family to make a testament for him. (D. xxviii. 6. 43. pr.)

2. Igitur in pupillari substitutione secundum præfatum modum ordinata duo quodammodo sunt testamenta, alterum patris, alterum filii, tamquam si ipse filius sibi heredem instituisset: aut certe unum est testamentum duarum causarum, id est duarum hereditatum.

2. Therefore in a pupillary substitution, made in the way we have mentioned, there are in a manner two testaments, one of the father, the other of the son, as if the son had instituted an heir to himself; or at least there is one testament, dealing with two matters, that is, two inheritances.

GAI. ii. 180.

3. Sin autem quis ita formidolosus sit, ut timeret, ne filius ejus pupillus adhuc ex eo, quod palam substitutum accepit, post obitum ejus periculo insidiarum subiceretur: vulgarem quidem substitutionem palam facere et in primis testamenti partibus debet, illam autem substitutionem, per quam et si heres extiterit pupillus et intra pubertatem decesserit, substitutus vocatur, separatim in inferioribus partibus scribere eamque partem proprio lino propriæque cera consignare et in priorè parte testamenti cavere ne inferiores tabulæ vivo filio et adhuc impubere aperiantur. Illud palam est, non ideo minus valere substitutionem impuberis filii, quod in iisdem tabulis scripta sit, quibus sibi quisque heredem instituisset, quamvis hoc pupillo periculosum sit.

3. If a testator is so apprehensive as to fear lest, after his death, his son, being yet a pupil, should be exposed to the risk of having designs formed against him from another person being openly substituted to him, he ought to make openly a vulgar substitution and insert it in the first part of his testament; and to write the substitution, by which a substituted heir is called to the inheritance, if his son should become an heir and then die under the age of puberty, by itself, and in the lower part, which part ought to be separately tied up and sealed: and he ought also to insert a clause in the first part of his testament, forbidding the lower part to be opened while his son is alive and under the age of puberty. Of course a substitution to a son under the age of puberty is not less valid because written on the same tablet in which the testator has instituted him his heir, whatever danger it may involve to the pupil.

GAI. ii. 181.

4. Non solum autem heredibus institutis impuberibus liberis ita substituere parentes possunt, ut et si heredes eis extiterint et ante pubertatem mortui fuerint, sit eis heres is, quem ipsi voluerint, sed etiam exheredatis. Itaque eo casu si quid pupillo ex hereditatibus legatisve aut donationibus propinquorum atque amicorum acquisitum fuerit, id omne ad substitutum pertinet. Quæcumque diximus de substitutione impuberum liberorum vel heredum institutorum vel exhere-

4. Ascendants may not only substitute to their children under the age of puberty, so that if such children become their heirs, and die under the age of puberty, any one whom the testator pleases shall be made their heir, but they may also substitute to their disinherited children; and therefore, in such a case, whatever a disinherited child, within the age of puberty, may have acquired by succession, by legacies, or by gift from relations and friends, all becomes the property of the substituted heir. All datorum, eadem etiam de postumis intellegimus.

we have said concerning the substitution of children under the age of puberty, whether instituted heirs, or disinherited, is applicable also to posthumous children.

GAI. II. 182, 188.

It was not because he instituted a child in his own testament that a paterfamilias could make the testament of that child, but because the child was in his power, and hence he could make the testaments even of children whom he disinherited. Grandchildren and other descendants could also be made subject to a pupillary substitution by their grandfather, if they were immediately in his power, that is, if their own father was dead or emancipated.

It was necessary that the child should be under the power of the father at the time of making the substitution, and also at that of the father's death. No testator could, therefore, substitute to an emancipated child. (D. xxviii. 6. 2. pr.) If, after the child became sui juris, he was arrogated, this vitiated the substitution; but the person who arrogated him was obliged to give security that if the child died under the age of puberty, he would give up to the substituted heir, or to the heredes legitimi if no one was substituted, all that would have come to the pupil if the substitution had remained valid. Pupillary substitution might also be made by the adoptive father; but it did not affect the property which the pupil had when arrogated. (See Bk. i. Tit. 11. 3.) It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to observe, that in every case of pupillary substitution save the last, the substituted heir took not only what the pupil received from the father, but all that the pupil would have had to dispose of by testament, if he had been capable of making a testament.

5. Liberis autem suis testamentum facere nemo potest, nisi et sibi faciat: nam pupillare testamentum pars et sequela est paterni testamenti, adeo ut, si patris testamentum non valeat, ne filii quidem valebit.

5. No one can make a testament for his children unless he also makes a testament for himself: for the pupillary testament is a part of, and accessory to, the testament of the parent, so much so, that if the testament of the father is not valid, neither is that of the son.

D. xxviii. 6. 2. 1.

The two testaments were generally contained in the same instrument; but a testator might, if he pleased, make his son's testament by a different instrument, or might even make it by verbal nuncupation, although his own testament was written.

6. Vel singulis autem liberis vel qui eorum novissimus impubes morietur, substitui potest. Singulis quidem, si neminem eorum intestato decedere voluit: novissimo, si jus legitimarum hereditatum integrum inter eos custodiri velit.

6. A testator may make a pupillary substitution to each of his children, or to him who shall die the last under the age of puberty; to each if he is unwilling that any of them should die intestate; to the last who shall die, if he wishes that the order of legal succession should be rigidly preserved among them.

D. xxviii. 6. 37.

child's share under father's at the time of substitution
II father's share the substituted heir an emancipated child

Children's testament is accessory to the father's

Pupillary substitution to each child or to him who dies last under age

datorum, eadem etiam de postumis intellegimus.

we have said concerning the substitution of children under the age of puberty, whether instituted heirs, or disinherited, is applicable also to posthumous children.

GAL. ii. 182, 188.

It was not because he instituted a child in his own testament that a paterfamilias could make the testament of that child, but because the child was in his power, and hence he could make the testaments even of children whom he disinherited. Grandchildren and other descendants could also be made subject to a pupillary substitution by their grandfather, if they were immediately in his power, that is, if their own father was dead or emancipated.

It was necessary that the child should be under the power of the father at the time of making the substitution, and also at that of the father's death. No testator could, therefore, substitute to an emancipated child. (D. xxviii. 6. 2. pr.) If, after the child became sui juris, he was arrogated, this vitiated the substitution; but the person who arrogated him was obliged to give security that if the child died under the age of puberty, he would give up to the substituted heir, or to the heredes legitimi if no one was substituted, all that would have come to the pupil if the substitution had remained valid. Pupillary substitution might also be made by the adoptive father; but it did not affect the property which the pupil had when arrogated. (See Bk. i. Tit. 11. 3.) It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to observe, that in every case of pupillary substitution save the last, the substituted heir took not only what the pupil received from the father, but all that the pupil would have had to dispose of by testament, if he had been capable of making a testament.

5. Liberis autem suis testamentum facere nemo potest, nisi et sibi faciat: nam pupillare testamentum pars et sequela est paterni testamenti, adeo ut, si patris testamentum non valeat, ne filii quidem valebit.

5. No one can make a testament for his children unless he also makes a testament for himself: for the pupillary testament is a part of, and accessory to, the testament of the parent, so much so, that if the testament of the father is not valid, neither is that of the son.

D. xxviii. 6. 2. 1.

The two testaments were generally contained in the same instrument; but a testator might, if he pleased, make his son's testament by a different instrument, or might even make it by verbal nuncupation, although his own testament was written.

6. Vel singulis autem liberis vel qui eorum novissimus impubes morietur, substitui potest. Singulis quidem, si neminem eorum intestato decedere voluit: novissimo, si jus legitimarum hereditatum integrum inter eos custodiri velit.

6. A testator may make a pupillary substitution to each of his children, or to him who shall die the last under the age of puberty; to each if he is unwilling that any of them should die intestate; to the last who shall die, if he wishes that the order of legal succession should be rigidly preserved among them.

D. xxviii. 6. 37.

child died under the age of puberty II father's death substituted heir

Children's testament given by father

Pupillary substitution to each child or to the last who dies under age

7. Substituitor autem impuberi aut nominatim, veluti 'Titius' aut generaliter 'quisquis mihi heres erit:' quibus verbis vocantur ex substitutione, impubere filio mortuo, qui et scripti sunt heredes et extiterunt, et pro qua parte heredes facti sunt.

7. A substitution may be made to a child under the age of puberty by name, as 'Let Titius succeed;' or generally, as, 'whoever shall be my heir.' By these latter words all are called to the inheritance by substitution, on the death of the son under the age of puberty, who have been instituted, and have become heirs to the father, and each in proportion to the share assigned to him as heir.

D. xxviii. 6. 8. 1.

Quisquis mihi heres erit, idem impuberi filio heres esto, is the full expression given in the Digest.

8. Masculo igitur usque ad quatuordecim annos substitui potest, feminae usque ad duodecim annos: et si hoc tempus excesserit, substitutio evanescit.

8. A substitution then may be made to males up to the age of fourteen, and to females up to that of twelve years: this age once passed, the substitution is at an end.

D. xxviii. 6. 14.

The father could not extend the time beyond fourteen years, but he could make it less; as, for example, si filius meus intra decimum annum decesserit.

The substitutio pupillaris would be at an end not only by the pupil attaining the age of puberty, but by his undergoing a capitis deminutio and not recovering his former status before the age of puberty, or dying before his father, as, in either of these cases, it would be impossible he should make a testament. Or, again, if no one entered on the father's inheritance, or the father's testament was in any way made inoperative, the testament of the son was void, because it was on the validity of the testament of the father that the validity of the testament of the son depended.

9. Extraneo vero vel filio puberi heredi instituto ita substituere nemo potest, ut, si heres extiterit et intra aliquod tempus decesserit, alius ei sit heres: sed hoc solum permisum est, ut eum per fideicommissum testator obliget, alii hereditatem ejus vel totam vel pro parte restituere: quod jus quale sit, suo loco trademus.

9. After having instituted a stranger or son of full age, a testator cannot then go on to substitute another heir to him, if he dies within a certain time. All that is allowed is, to oblige, by a fideicommissum, the person instituted to give up all or a part to a third person. What the law is on this point we will explain in its proper place.

GAL. ii. 184.

It is to be observed that, in a fideicommissum, the testator does not attempt to deal with the inheritance of another; he only regulates the transmission of his own, and nothing, therefore, passed by the fideicommissum, except what came to the person instituted from the testator.

Soldiers could make a testament for their children without having made their own, and could substitute, so far as the inheritance they gave went, to their children over puberty, to emancipated children and strangers. (D. xxviii. 6. 2. 1; D. xxviii. 6. 10. 5; D. xxviii. 6. 15; D. xxix. 1. 41. 4 and 5.)

7. Substituitur autem impuberi aut nominatim, veluti 'Titius' aut generaliter 'quisquis mihi heres erit:' quibus verbis vocantur ex substitutione, impubere filio mortuo, qui et scripti sunt heredes et extiterunt, et pro qua parte heredes facti sunt.

7. A substitution may be made to a child under the age of puberty by name, as 'Let Titius succeed;' or generally, as, 'whoever shall be my heir.' By these latter words all are called to the inheritance by substitution, on the death of the son under the age of puberty, who have been instituted, and have become heirs to the father, and each in proportion to the share assigned to him as heir.

D. xxviii. 6. 8. 1.

Quisquis mihi heres erit, idem impuberi filio heres esto, is the full expression given in the Digest.

8. Masculo igitur usque ad quatuordecim annos substitui potest, feminae usque ad duodecim annos: et si hoc tempus excesserit, substitutio evanescit.

8. A substitution then may be made to males up to the age of fourteen, and to females up to that of twelve years: this age once passed, the substitution is at an end.

D. xxviii. 6. 14.

The father could not extend the time beyond fourteen years, but he could make it less; as, for example, si filius meus intra decimum annum decesserit.

The substitutio pupillaris would be at an end not only by the pupil attaining the age of puberty, but by his undergoing a capitis deminutio and not recovering his former status before the age of puberty, or dying before his father, as, in either of these cases, it would be impossible he should make a testament. Or, again, if no one entered on the father's inheritance, or the father's testament was in any way made inoperative, the testament of the son was void, because it was on the validity of the testament of the father that the validity of the testament of the son depended.

9. Extraneo vero vel filio puberi heredi instituto ita substituere nemo potest, ut, si heres extiterit et intra aliquod tempus decesserit, alius ei sit heres: sed hoc solum permisum est, ut eum per fideicommissum testator obliget, alii hereditatem ejus vel totam vel pro parte restituere: quod jus quale sit, suo loco trademus.

9. After having instituted a stranger or son of full age, a testator cannot then go on to substitute another heir to him, if he dies within a certain time. All that is allowed is, to oblige, by a fideicommissum, the person instituted to give up all or a part to a third person. What the law is on this point we will explain in its proper place.

GAL. ii. 184.

It is to be observed that, in a fideicommissum, the testator does not attempt to deal with the inheritance of another; he only regulates the transmission of his own, and nothing, therefore, passed by the fideicommissum, except what came to the person instituted from the testator.

Soldiers could make a testament for their children without having made their own, and could substitute, so far as the inheritance they gave went, to their children over puberty, to emancipated children and strangers. (D. xxviii. 6. 2. 1; D. xxviii. 6. 10. 5; D. xxviii. 6. 15; D. xxix. 1. 41. 4 and 5.)

TIT. XVII. QUIBUS MODIS TESTAMENTA INFIRMANTUR.

Testamentum jure factum usque eo valet, donec rumpatur irritumve fiat.

A testament duly made remains valid until it is either revoked or rendered ineffectual.

✓ If something was originally wanting to the validity of the testament, if some formality was wanting, it was spoken of as being injustum, non jure factum, or imperfectum; and as nullius momenti, if a child was not properly disinherited. But it might be quite valid when made, and subsequently lose its effect; in such a case it was either rumpum, i.e. its force was broken, it was revoked, either by agnation or a suus heres, or by a subsequent testament; or it was irritum, rendered useless by the testator undergoing a change of status, or by no one entering, under it, on the inheritance. (D. xxviii. 3. 1.) In this last case it was specially said to be destitutum; but the general expression irritum was applied, as well as the more particular term destitutum, to a testament that had been abandoned.

We have no term nearer to rumpum than revoked; but it does not express it very accurately, as the rupture of the testament might be something quite independent of the testator's will, whereas revocation properly implies a voluntary act of the testator. We have hitherto, in order to keep up the metaphor, translated it, 'the force of the testament is broken;' but this paraphrase is too cumbrous to be retained when the expression occurs frequently.

1. Rumpitur autem testamentum, cum in eodem statu manente testatore ipsius testamenti jus vitatur. Si quis enim post factum testamentum adoptaverit sibi filium per imperatorem eum, qui sui juris est, aut per prætorem secundum nostram constitutionem eum, qui in potestate parentis fuerit, testamentum ejus rumpitur quasi agnatione sui heredis.

1. A testament is revoked when, the testator still remaining in the same status, the effect of the testament is destroyed; for if, after making his testament, he arrogates a person sui juris by license from the emperor, or if in the presence of the prætor, and by virtue of our constitution, he adopts a child under the power of his natural ascendant, then the testament is revoked by this quasi-agnation of a suus heres.

GAI. II. 138, et seq.

We have already seen how the rupture of the testament might be avoided by instituting or disinheriting posthumous children and quasi-postumi. (Tit. 13. 2.) But when a new suus heres came into the family by the civil agnation produced by adoption or arrogation, the stricter law of the time of Gaius pronounced that the testament was inevitably revoked. But in the times of the later jurists, if the new suus heres had been instituted by anticipation, the testament was considered as not revoked (D. xxviii. 2. 23),

TIT. XVII. QUIBUS MODIS TESTAMENTA INFIRMANTUR.

Testamentum jure factum usque eo valet, donec rumpatur irritumve fiat.

A testament duly made remains valid until it is either revoked or rendered ineffectual.

If something was originally wanting to the validity of the testament, if some formality was wanting, it was spoken of as being injustum, non jure factum, or imperfectum; and as nullius momenti, if a child was not properly disinherited. But it might be quite valid when made, and subsequently lose its effect; in such a case it was either rumpum, i.e. its force was broken, it was revoked, either by agnation or a suius heres, or by a subsequent testament; or it was irritum, rendered useless by the testator undergoing a change of status, or by no one entering, under it, on the inheritance. (D. xxviii. 3. 1.) In this last case it was specially said to be destitutum; but the general expression irritum was applied, as well as the more particular term destitutum, to a testament that had been abandoned.

We have no term nearer to rumpum than revoked; but it does not express it very accurately, as the rupture of the testament might be something quite independent of the testator's will, whereas revocation properly implies a voluntary act of the testator. We have hitherto, in order to keep up the metaphor, translated it, 'the force of the testament is broken;' but this paraphrase is too cumbrous to be retained when the expression occurs frequently.

1. Rumpitur autem testamentum, cum in eodem statu manente testatore ipsius testamenti jus vitatur. Si quis enim post factum testamentum adoptaverit sibi filium per imperatorem eum, qui sui juris est, aut per prætorem secundum nostram constitutionem eum, qui in potestate parentis fuerit, testamentum ejus rumpitur quasi agnatione sui heredis.

1. A testament is revoked when, the testator still remaining in the same status, the effect of the testament is destroyed; for if, after making his testament, he arrogates a person sui juris by license from the emperor, or if in the presence of the prætor, and by virtue of our constitution, he adopts a child under the power of his natural ascendant, then the testament is revoked by this quasi-agnation of a suius heres.

GAI. II. 138, et seq.

We have already seen how the rupture of the testament might be avoided by instituting or disinheriting posthumous children and quasi-postumi. (Tit. 13. 2.) But when a new suius heres came into the family by the civil agnation produced by adoption or arrogation, the stricter law of the time of Gaius pronounced that the testament was inevitably revoked. But in the times of the later jurists, if the new suius heres had been instituted by anticipation, the testament was considered as not revoked (D. xxviii. 2. 23), and it was only when he had been omitted or disinherited, that the rule making the testament of no effect was allowed to prevail. And Justinian seems here to countenance the opinion by omitting the word omnimodo, which Gaius adds to rumpitur.

2. Posteriore quoque testamento, quod jure perfectum est, superius rumpitur. Nec interest, an extiterit aliquis heres ex eo, an non extiterit: hoc enim solum spectatur, an aliquo casu existere poterit. Ideoque si quis aut noluerit heres esse, aut vivo testatore aut post mortem ejus, antequam hereditatem adiret, decesserit, aut condicione, sub qua heres institutus est, defectus sit, in his casibus paterfamilias intestatus moritur: nam et prius testamentum non valet, ruptum a posteriore, et posterius æque nullas vires habet, cum ex eo nemo heres extiterit.

2. A former testament is equally revoked by a subsequent one made as the law requires, nor does it signify whether under the new testament any one becomes heir or not; the only question is, whether there could have been an heir under it: therefore, if an instituted heir renounces, or dies, either during the life of the testator, or after the testator's death, but before entering upon the inheritance, or if his interest terminates by the failure of the condition under which he was instituted—in any of these cases the testator dies intestate; for the first testament is invalid, being revoked by the second, and the second is of as little force, as there is no heir under it.

GAI. II. 144.

If the heir instituted in a second testament would have taken as heres ab intestato, the second testament, although it might be not formally made (jure perfectum), was still held valid, as an expression of the last will of the deceased, who died intestate indeed, but whose wishes were binding on the heir. (D. xxviii. 3. 2; C. vi. 23. 21. 3.)

The two modes mentioned in the text by which a testament could be revoked are the agnation of a suus heres and the making a subsequent testament. But the testator could also revoke it by tearing or defacing it, or by signifying a wish to have it revoked before three witnesses; or if the testament had at the time of the testator's death been made ten years, it was enough to make it considered as revoked if the testator had signified, before three witnesses or by a deed, his wish that it should not remain in force. Theodosius had enacted that a testament should be always invalid after ten years had expired from the time of its being made. Justinian allowed testaments to remain valid, as a general rule, for any length of time, but retained the effect of the lapse of time if the testator had also signified, as above mentioned, his wish to have his testament revoked. (C. vi. 23. 27.)

When it is said that a subsequent testament to revoke a prior one must be regularly made, it must be understood that, in the case of soldiers, their privilege of making a testament in any way they pleased would permit them to revoke a prior testament by any testament that expressed their intentions.

3. Sed si quis, priore testamento jure perfecto, posterius æque jure fecerit, etiamsi ex certis rebus in eo

3. If any one, after having duly made a testament, makes another in an equally valid way, although the heir is

181 is destroyed

and it was only when he had been omitted or disinherited, that the rule making the testament of no effect was allowed to prevail. And Justinian seems here to countenance the opinion by omitting the word omnimodo, which Gaius adds to rumpitur.

2. Posteriore quoque testamento, quod jure perfectum est, superius rumpitur. Nec interest, an extiterit aliquis heres ex eo, an non extiterit: hoc enim solum spectatur, an aliquo casu existere potuerit. Ideoque si quis aut noluerit heres esse, aut vivo testatore aut post mortem ejus, antequam hereditatem adiret, decesserit, aut condicione, sub qua heres institutus est, defectus sit, in his casibus paterfamilias intestatus moritur: nam et prius testamentum non valet, ruptum a posteriore, et posterius æque nullas vires habet, cum ex eo nemo heres extiterit.

2. A former testament is equally revoked by a subsequent one made as the law requires, nor does it signify whether under the new testament any one becomes heir or not; the only question is, whether there could have been an heir under it: therefore, if an instituted heir renounces, or dies, either during the life of the testator, or after the testator's death, but before entering upon the inheritance, or if his interest terminates by the failure of the condition under which he was instituted—in any of these cases the testator dies intestate; for the first testament is invalid, being revoked by the second, and the second is of as little force, as there is no heir under it.

GAI. II. 144.

If the heir instituted in a second testament would have taken as heres ab intestato, the second testament, although it might be not formally made (jure perfectum), was still held valid, as an expression of the last will of the deceased, who died intestate indeed, but whose wishes were binding on the heir. (D. xxviii. 3. 2; C. vi. 23. 21. 3.)

The two modes mentioned in the text by which a testament could be revoked are the agnation of a suus heres and the making a subsequent testament. But the testator could also revoke it by tearing or defacing it, or by signifying a wish to have it revoked before three witnesses; or if the testament had at the time of the testator's death been made ten years, it was enough to make it considered as revoked if the testator had signified, before three witnesses or by a deed, his wish that it should not remain in force. Theodosius had enacted that a testament should be always invalid after ten years had expired from the time of its being made. Justinian allowed testaments to remain valid, as a general rule, for any length of time, but retained the effect of the lapse of time if the testator had also signified, as above mentioned, his wish to have his testament revoked. (C. vi. 23. 27.)

When it is said that a subsequent testament to revoke a prior one must be regularly made, it must be understood that, in the case of soldiers, their privilege of making a testament in any way they pleased would permit them to revoke a prior testament by any testament that expressed their intentions.

3. Sed si quis, priore testamento jure perfecto, posterius æque jure fecerit, etiamsi ex certis rebus in eo

3. If any one, after having duly made a testament, makes another in an equally valid way, although the heir is heredem instituerit, superius testamentum sublatum esse divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Cujus constitutionis inseri verba jussimus, cum aliud quoque præterea in ea constitutione expressum est. 'Imperatores Severus et Antoninus Cocceio Campano. Testamentum secundo loco factum, licet in eo certarum rerum heres scriptus sit, jure valere, perinde ac si rerum mentio facta non esset, sed teneri heredem scriptum, ut, contentus rebus sibi datis, aut suppleta quarta ex lege Falcidia, hereditatem restituat his, qui in priore testamento scripti fuerant, propter inserta verba secundo testamento, quibus, ut valeret prius testamentum, expressum est, dubitari non oportet.' Et ruptum quidem testamentum hoc modo efficitur.

181 is destroyed

instituted therein for certain particular things only, yet, as the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript, the first testament is considered to be thereby destroyed. We have ordered the words of this constitution to be here inserted, as it contains a further provision. 'The Emperors Severus and Antoninus to Cocceius Campanus: a second testament, although the heir named in it is instituted to particular things only, shall be as valid as if the things had not been specified, but unquestionably the heir instituted in the second testament must content himself either with the things given him, or with the fourth part, made up to him according to the lex Falcidia, and shall be bound to restore the rest of the inheritance to the heirs instituted in the first testament, on account of the words inserted in the second, by which it is declared, that effect shall be given to the first testament.' This, therefore, is a mode in which a testament is revoked.

D. xxxvi. 1. 29.

It was not the lex Falcidia, but the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, by which this fourth was in such a case given to the heir. (See Tit. 23. 5.)

If the heir was instituted for a part only, certæ res, he would by law be instituted for the whole, as no one could die partly testate; but if in the second testament it was expressed that the first should be valid, this would be the same as imposing a fideicommissum on the heir under the second testament, the terms of the fideicommissum being contained in the first testament.

4. Alio quoque modo testamenta jura facta infirmantur, veluti cum is, qui fecerit testamentum, capite deminutus sit. Quod quibus modis accidit, primo libro retulimus.

4. Testaments duly made are also invalidated in another way, viz. if the testator suffers a capitis deminutio. We have shown in the First Book under what circumstances this may happen.

GAL. ii. 145.

As it was from his civil status that a testator's power of making a testament proceeded, any change in this was held, except in the case of soldiers (Tit. 11. 5), to invalidate any exercise of the power made before the change.

5. Hoc autem casu irrita fieri testamenta dicuntur, cum alioquin et quæ rumpantur, irrita fiunt, et quæ statim ab initio non jure fiunt, irrita sunt: et ea, quæ jure facta sunt, postea propter capitis deminutionem irrita fiunt, possumus nihilo

5. In such a case testaments are said to become ineffectual, although those which are revoked, or which, from the beginning, were not legally valid, may equally well be termed ineffectual. We may also term those testaments revoked, which, being at

heredem instituerit, superius testamentum sublatum esse divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Cujus constitutionis inseri verba jussimus, cum aliud quoque præterea in ea constitutione expressum est. 'Imperatores Severus et Antoninus Cocceio Campano. Testamentum secundo loco factum, licet in eo certarum rerum heres scriptus sit, jure valere, perinde ac si rerum mentio facta non esset, sed teneri heredem scriptum, ut, contentus rebus sibi datis, aut suppleta quarta ex lege Falcidia, hereditatem restituat his, qui in priore testamento scripti fuerant, propter inserta verba secundo testamento, quibus, ut valeret prius testamentum, expressum est, dubitari non oportet.' Et ruptum quidem testamentum hoc modo efficitur.

instituted therein for certain particular things only, yet, as the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript, the first testament is considered to be thereby destroyed. We have ordered the words of this constitution to be here inserted, as it contains a further provision. 'The Emperors Severus and Antoninus to Cocceius Campanus: a second testament, although the heir named in it is instituted to particular things only, shall be as valid as if the things had not been specified, but unquestionably the heir instituted in the second testament must content himself either with the things given him, or with the fourth part, made up to him according to the lex Falcidia, and shall be bound to restore the rest of the inheritance to the heirs instituted in the first testament, on account of the words inserted in the second, by which it is declared, that effect shall be given to the first testament.' This, therefore, is a mode in which a testament is revoked.

D. xxxvi. 1. 29.

It was not the lex Falcidia, but the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, by which this fourth was in such a case given to the heir. (See Tit. 23. 5.)

If the heir was instituted for a part only, certain res, he would by law be instituted for the whole, as no one could die partly testate; but if in the second testament it was expressed that the first should be valid, this would be the same as imposing a fideicommissum on the heir under the second testament, the terms of the fideicommissum being contained in the first testament.

4. Alio quoque modo testamenta jure facta infirmantur, veluti cum is, qui fecerit testamentum, capite deminutus sit. Quod quibus modis accidit, primo libro rettulimus.

4. Testaments duly made are also invalidated in another way, viz. if the testator suffers a capitis deminutio. We have shown in the First Book under what circumstances this may happen.

GAL. ii. 145.

As it was from his civil status that a testator's power of making a testament proceeded, any change in this was held, except in the case of soldiers (Tit. 11. 5), to invalidate any exercise of the power made before the change.

5. Hoc autem casu irrita fieri testamenta dicuntur, cum alioquin et quæ rumpantur, irrita fiunt, et quæ statim ab initio non jure fiunt, irrita sunt: et ea, quæ jure facta sunt, postea propter capitis deminutionem irrita fiunt, possumus nihilo

5. In such a case testaments are said to become ineffectual, although those which are revoked, or which, from the beginning, were not legally valid, may equally well be termed ineffectual. We may also term those testaments revoked, which, being at first legally made, are afterwards rendered ineffectual by a capitis deminutio. But, as it is more convenient to distinguish by different terms each cause that invalidates a testament, some are said to be irregularly made, and others regularly made, to be revoked or rendered ineffectual.

minus rupta dicere. Sed quia sane commodius erat singulas causas singulis appellationibus distinguere, ideo quædam non jure facta dicuntur, quædam jure facta rumpi vel irrita fieri.

GAI. ii. 146.

Under irrita testamenta we must include those which the juriconsults termed destituta, i.e. abandoned, by no one entering on the inheritance.

6. Non tamen per omnia inutilia sunt ea testamenta, quæ ab initio jure facta propter capitis deminutionem irrita facta sunt. Nam si septem testium signis signata sunt, potest scriptus heres secundum tabulas testamenti bonorum possessionem agnoscere, si modo defunctus et civis Romanus et sue potestatis mortis tempore fuerit: nam si ideo irritum factum sit testamentum, quod civitatem vel etiam libertatem testator amisit, aut quia in adoptionem se dedit et mortis tempore in adoptivi patris potestate sit, non potest scriptus heres secundum tabulas bonorum possessionem petere.

6. But testaments at first validly made, and afterwards rendered ineffectual by a capitis deminutio, are not absolutely void: for if they have been attested by the seals of seven witnesses, the instituted heir can obtain possession of the goods according to the testament, provided that the testator was a Roman citizen, and was sui juris at the time of his death. For if a testament becomes ineffectual because the testator has lost the rights of a citizen or his liberty, or because he has given himself in adoption, and at the time of his death was under the power of his adoptive father, then the instituted heir cannot demand possession of the goods according to the terms of the testament.

GAI. ii. 147.

The meaning of the prætor giving the bonorum possessio secundum tabulas is, that he ordered that possession of the property should be given as the testator intended, though, by the rules of strict law, the testament in which he had expressed his intention was invalidated. The instance referred to in the text is that of a testator, after making his testament, suffering a capitis deminutio, but returning to his old status before dying. In such a case the prætor gave the bonorum possessio; but if the testator had been arrogated and then emancipated, he must (since the arrogation was his own act) have after his emancipation expressly declared his wish to abide by his testament made before arrogation (GAI. ii. 147), or the prætor would not give the bonorum possessio to the instituted heir. This, however, cannot have been necessary after Justinian enacted that a person arrogated retained the dominium of his property.

7. Ex eo autem solo non potest infirmari testamentum, quod postea testator id noluit valere: plusque adeo, etsi quis post factum prius testamentum posterius facere cœperit et aut mortalitate præventus, aut quia eum ejus rei pœnituit, id

7. A testament cannot be invalidated solely because the testator is afterwards unwilling that it should take effect; so much so that, if any one, after making one testament, begins another, and then, being prevented by death, or from having first legally made, are afterwards rendered ineffectual by a capitis deminutio. But, as it is more convenient to distinguish by different terms each cause that invalidates a testament, some are said to be irregularly made, and others regularly made, to be revoked or rendered ineffectual.

minus rupta dicere. Sed quia sane commodius erat singulas causas singulis appellationibus distinguere, ideo quædam non jure facta dicuntur, quædam jure facta rumpi vel irrita fieri.

GAI. ii. 146.

Under irrita testamenta we must include those which the juriconsults termed destituta, i.e. abandoned, by no one entering on the inheritance.

6. Non tamen per omnia inutilia sunt ea testamenta, quæ ab initio jure facta propter capitis deminutionem irrita facta sunt. Nam si septem testium signis signata sunt, potest scriptus heres secundum tabulas testamenti bonorum possessionem agnoscere, si modo defunctus et civis Romanus et sue potestatis mortis tempore fuerit: nam si ideo irritum factum sit testamentum, quod civitatem vel etiam libertatem testator amisit, aut quia in adoptionem se dedit et mortis tempore in adoptivi patris potestate sit, non potest scriptus heres secundum tabulas bonorum possessionem petere.

6. But testaments at first validly made, and afterwards rendered ineffectual by a capitis deminutio, are not absolutely void: for if they have been attested by the seals of seven witnesses, the instituted heir can obtain possession of the goods according to the testament, provided that the testator was a Roman citizen, and was sui juris at the time of his death. For if a testament becomes ineffectual because the testator has lost the rights of a citizen or his liberty, or because he has given himself in adoption, and at the time of his death was under the power of his adoptive father, then the instituted heir cannot demand possession of the goods according to the terms of the testament.

GAI. ii. 147.

The meaning of the prætor giving the bonorum possessio secundum tabulas is, that he ordered that possession of the property should be given as the testator intended, though, by the rules of strict law, the testament in which he had expressed his intention was invalidated. The instance referred to in the text is that of a testator, after making his testament, suffering a capitis deminutio, but returning to his old status before dying. In such a case the prætor gave the bonorum possessio; but if the testator had been arrogated and then emancipated, he must (since the arrogation was his own act) have after his emancipation expressly declared his wish to abide by his testament made before arrogation (GAI. ii. 147), or the prætor would not give the bonorum possessio to the instituted heir. This, however, cannot have been necessary after Justinian enacted that a person arrogated retained the dominium of his property.

7. Ex eo autem solo non potest infirmari testamentum, quod postea testator id noluit valere: plusque adeo, etsi quis post factum prius testamentum posterius facere cœperit et aut mortalitate præventus, aut quia eum ejus rei pœnituit, id

7. A testament cannot be invalidated solely because the testator is afterwards unwilling that it should take effect; so much so that, if any one, after making one testament, begins another, and then, being prevented by death, or from having non perfecisset, divi Pertinacis oratione cautum est, ne alias tabulæ priores jure factæ irritæ fiant, nisi sequentes jure ordinatæ et perfectæ fuerint. Nam imperfectum testamentum sine dubio nullum est.

changed his mind, does not complete it, it is decided in an address to the senate by the Emperor Pertinax, that the first testament shall not be made ineffectual, unless the subsequent one is regularly made and complete, for an imperfect testament is undoubtedly null.

C. vi. 23. 21. 5.

See note on paragraph 2.

8. Eadem oratione expressit, non admissurum se hereditatem ejus, qui litis causa principem heredem reliquerit, neque tabulas non legitime factas, in quibus ipse ob eam causam heres institutus erat, probaturum neque ex nuda voce heredis nomen admissurum neque ex ulla scriptura, cui juris auctoritas desit, aliquid adepturum. Secundum hæc divi quoque Severus et Antoninus sæpissime rescripserunt: 'Ecce enim,' inquit, 'legibus soluti sumus, atamen legibus vivimus.'

8. The emperor declared in the same address to the senate, that he would not accept the inheritance of any testator, who, on account of a suit, made the emperor his heir; that he would never make valid a testament legally deficient in form, if, in order to cover the deficiency, he himself was instituted heir; that he would not accept the title of heir, if he was instituted by mere word of mouth; and that he would never take anything by virtue of any writing wanting the authority of strict law. The Emperors Severus and Antoninus have also often issued rescripts to the same purpose: 'for although,' say they, 'we are freed from the tie of the laws, yet we live in obedience to them.'

D. xxxii. 23.

Testators occasionally made the emperor their heir, in order that their adversary in a lawsuit might have him to contend with.

An oratio was an address to the senate by the emperor, in which he explained to them what they were to enact; they then put his recommendations into the shape of a senatusconsultum.

TIT. XVIII. DE INOFFICIOSO TESTAMENTO.

Quia plerumque parentes sine causa liberos suos vel exheredant vel omittunt, inductum est, ut de inofficioso testamento agere possint liberi, qui queruntur, aut inique se exheredatos aut inique præteritos, hoc colore, quasi non sanæ mentis fuerunt, cum testamentum ordinarunt. Sed hoc dicitur, non quasi vere furiosus sit, sed recte quidem fecit testamentum, non autem ex officio pietatis; nam si vere furiosus est, nullum est testamentum.

Since ascendants often disinherit their children, or omit them in their testaments, without any cause, children who complain that they have been unjustly disinherited or omitted, have been permitted to bring the action de inofficioso testamento, on the supposition that their parents were not of sane mind when they made their testament. This does not mean that the testator was really insane, but that the testament, though regularly made, is inconsistent with the duty of affection he owed. For, if a testator is really insane at the time, his testament is null.

D. v. 2. 2, 3, 5.

non perfecisset, divi Pertinacis oratione cautum est, ne alias tabulæ priores jure factæ irritæ fiant, nisi sequentes jure ordinatæ et perfectæ fuerint. Nam imperfectum testamentum sine dubio nullum est.

changed his mind, does not complete it, it is decided in an address to the senate by the Emperor Pertinax, that the first testament shall not be made ineffectual, unless the subsequent one is regularly made and complete, for an imperfect testament is undoubtedly null.

C. vi. 23. 21. 5.

See note on paragraph 2.

8. Eadem oratione expressit, non admissurum se hereditatem ejus, qui litis causa principem heredem reliquerit, neque tabulas non legitime factas, in quibus ipse ob eam causam heres institutus erat, probaturum neque ex nuda voce heredis nomen admissurum neque ex ulla scriptura, cui juris auctoritas desit, aliquid adepturum. Secundum hæc divi quoque Severus et Antoninus sæpissime rescripserunt: 'Hæc enim,' inquiunt, 'legibus soluti sumus, at tamen legibus vivimus.'

8. The emperor declared in the same address to the senate, that he would not accept the inheritance of any testator, who, on account of a suit, made the emperor his heir; that he would never make valid a testament legally deficient in form, if, in order to cover the deficiency, he himself was instituted heir; that he would not accept the title of heir, if he was instituted by mere word of mouth; and that he would never take anything by virtue of any writing wanting the authority of strict law. The Emperors Severus and Antoninus have also often issued rescripts to the same purpose: 'for although,' say they, 'we are freed from the tie of the laws, yet we live in obedience to them.'

D. xxxii. 23.

Testators occasionally made the emperor their heir, in order that their adversary in a lawsuit might have him to contend with.

An oratio was an address to the senate by the emperor, in which he explained to them what they were to enact; they then put his recommendations into the shape of a senatusconsultum.

TIT. XVIII. DE INOFFICIOSO TESTAMENTO.

Quia plerumque parentes sine causa liberos suos vel exheredant vel omittunt, inductum est, ut de inofficioso testamento agere possint liberi, qui queruntur, aut inique se exheredatos aut inique præteritos, hoc colore, quasi non sanæ mentis fuerunt, cum testamentum ordinarent. Sed hoc dicitur, non quasi vere furiosus sit, sed recte quidem fecit testamentum, non autem ex officio pietatis; nam si vere furiosus est, nullum est testamentum.

Since ascendants often disinherit their children, or omit them in their testaments, without any cause, children who complain that they have been unjustly disinherited or omitted, have been permitted to bring the action de inofficioso testamento, on the supposition that their parents were not of sane mind when they made their testament. This does not mean that the testator was really insane, but that the testament, though regularly made, is inconsistent with the duty of affection he owed. For, if a testator is really insane at the time, his testament is null.

D. v. 2. 2, 3, 5.

As we may gather from the text, a testament was termed inofficiosum, which was at variance with the dictates of natural affection, and those duties of near relationship which were expressed by the term officium pietatis. A presumption seemed to arise that the persons very closely connected with the testator, if passed over, must have done something to merit the testator's disapprobation. They might therefore naturally desire to have their character (æstimatio) protected against this imputation, and they therefore applied to the prætor to set the testament aside. A testament regularly and validly made, but liable to the objection that it was inofficiosum, was liable to be set aside on the application of the children, or, if there were no children, on that of the ascendants, or, if there were no ascendants, on that of the brother or sister of the deceased, the claim of these last, however, only prevailing where the person instituted was turpis.

It is not known at what date the action de inofficioso testamento was first introduced. It is referred to by Cicero (In Verr. i. 42). It was brought before the centumviri, as were all actions concerning inheritances, and if they pronounced the testament 'inofficiosum,' all its dispositions were set aside, and the inheritance passed according to the succession ab intestato. (See Intro. sec. 77, 92.)

The power of bringing the action was, however, not confined entirely to those who were disinherited. Children omitted by the mother, and grandchildren omitted by the maternal grandfather, might bring it, as we have already seen. (Tit. 13. 7.)

The object of permitting the action was that those permitted to bring it on account of their strong claims on the testator should not be disinherited or omitted altogether without sufficient cause. If, therefore, they got in any way a fourth of what they would have received in a succession ab intestato, or were excluded for what the law considered a just cause (which Justinian afterwards required to be expressed in the testament, Nov. 115. 3), such as gross misconduct towards the testator, they could not bring this action.

1. Non tantum autem liberis permissum est parentum testamentum inofficiosum accusare, verum etiam parentibus liberorum. Soror autem et frater turpibus personis scriptis heredibus ex sacris constitutionibus prælati sunt: non ergo contra omnes heredes agere possunt. Ultra fratres et sorores cognati nullo modo aut agere possunt aut agentes vincere.

1. It is not children only who are allowed to attack the testaments of their ascendants as inofficious. Ascendants are also permitted to attack those of their children. The brothers and sisters of a testator, also, by the imperial constitutions, are preferred to infamous persons, if any such have been instituted heirs. Thus, then, they cannot bring such an action against any heir. Beyond brothers and sisters no cognate can bring or succeed in such an action at all.

C. iii. 28. 21, 27.

Before Justinian, brothers and sisters could only bring this action while the tie of agnation was in existence. He permitted them to bring it durante vel non agnatione (C. iii. 28. 27), and

As we may gather from the text, a testament was termed inofficiosum, which was at variance with the dictates of natural affection, and those duties of near relationship which were expressed by the term officium pietatis. A presumption seemed to arise that the persons very closely connected with the testator, if passed over, must have done something to merit the testator's disapprobation. They might therefore naturally desire to have their character (æstimatio) protected against this imputation, and they therefore applied to the prætor to set the testament aside. A testament regularly and validly made, but liable to the objection that it was inofficiosum, was liable to be set aside on the application of the children, or, if there were no children, on that of the ascendants, or, if there were no ascendants, on that of the brother or sister of the deceased, the claim of these last, however, only prevailing where the person instituted was turpis.

It is not known at what date the action de inofficioso testamento was first introduced. It is referred to by Cicero (In Verr. i. 42). It was brought before the centumviri, as were all actions concerning inheritances, and if they pronounced the testament 'inofficiosum,' all its dispositions were set aside, and the inheritance passed according to the succession ab intestato. (See Intro. sec. 77, 92.)

The power of bringing the action was, however, not confined entirely to those who were disinherited. Children omitted by the mother, and grandchildren omitted by the maternal grandfather, might bring it, as we have already seen. (Tit. 13. 7.)

The object of permitting the action was that those permitted to bring it on account of their strong claims on the testator should not be disinherited or omitted altogether without sufficient cause. If, therefore, they got in any way a fourth of what they would have received in a succession ab intestato, or were excluded for what the law considered a just cause (which Justinian afterwards required to be expressed in the testament, Nov. 115. 3), such as gross misconduct towards the testator, they could not bring this action.

1. Non tantum autem liberis permissum est parentum testamentum inofficiosum accusare, verum etiam parentibus liberorum. Soror autem et frater turpibus personis scriptis heredibus ex sacris constitutionibus prælati sunt: non ergo contra omnes heredes agere possunt. Ultra fratres et sorores cognati nullo modo aut agere possunt aut agentes vincere.

1. It is not children only who are allowed to attack the testaments of their ascendants as inofficious. Ascendants are also permitted to attack those of their children. The brothers and sisters of a testator, also, by the imperial constitutions, are preferred to infamous persons, if any such have been instituted heirs. Thus, then, they cannot bring such an action against any heir. Beyond brothers and sisters no cognate can bring or succeed in such an action at all.

C. iii. 28. 21, 27.

Before Justinian, brothers and sisters could only bring this action while the tie of agnation was in existence. He permitted them to bring it durante vel non agnatione (C. iii. 28. 27), and thus made it sufficient that they should be merely consanguinei, i.e. born of the same father. Subsequently, by the 118th Novel, uterine brothers or sisters were placed on the same footing as consanguinei.

2. Tam autem naturales liberi, quam secundum nostræ constitutionis divisionem adoptati ita demum de inofficioso testamento agere possunt, si nullo alio jure ad bona defuncti venire possunt. Nam qui alio jure veniunt ad totam hereditatem vel partem ejus, de inofficioso agere non possunt. Postumi quoque, qui nullo alio jure venire possunt, de inofficioso agere possunt.

2. But natural children, as well as adopted (the distinction between adopted children laid down in our constitution being always observed), can only attack the testament as inofficious, if they can obtain the effects of the deceased in no other way; for those who can obtain the whole or a part of the inheritance by any other means, cannot bring an action de inofficioso. Posthumous children, also, who are unable to recover their inheritance by any other method, are allowed to bring this action.

D. v. 2. 6. pr. and 8. 15.

Those adopted by strangers could not impugn the testament of the adoptive father, if they were disinherited or passed over, but those who were adopted by their ascendants could. This is the divisio here alluded to. (See Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2.)

The actio de inofficioso testamento was only a last resource open to those who had no other; a pupil, therefore, arrogated, and afterwards disinherited by the arrogator, could not bring this action, because he was entitled to the quarta Antonina (see Bk. i. Tit. 11. 3); nor, again, could an emancipated son, omitted in the testament of his father, because the prætor gave him possession of the goods contra tabulas. (See Tit. 13. 3.)

3. Sed hæc ita accipiendæ sunt, si nihil eis penitus a testatoribus testamento relictum est. Quod nostra constitutio ad verecundiam naturæ introduxit. Sin vero quantumque pars hereditatis vel res eis fuerit relicta, de inofficioso querela quiescente, id, quod eis deest, usque ad quartam legitimæ partis repletur, licet non fuerit adjectum, boni viri arbitratu debere eam repleri.

3. All this must be understood to take place only when nothing at all has been left them by the testament of the deceased: a provision introduced by our constitution, out of respect for the rights of nature. For, if the least part of the inheritance or any one single thing has been given them, they cannot bring an action de inofficioso testamento: but they must have made up to them one-fourth of what would have been their share, if the deceased had died intestate, supposing what is given does not amount to this fourth: and this, although the testator has not added to his gift any direction that this fourth is to be made up to them according to the estimate of a trustworthy person.

C. iii. 28. 30. pr. and 1.

A plebiscitum was passed in the year 714 A.U.C., called the lex Falcidia (Tit. 22), which provided that one clear fourth of the

thus made it sufficient that they should be merely consanguinei, i.e. born of the same father. Subsequently, by the 118th Novel, uterine brothers or sisters were placed on the same footing as consanguinei.

2. Tam autem naturales liberi, quam secundum nostræ constitutionis divisionem adoptati ita demum de inofficioso testamento agere possunt, si nullo alio jure ad bona defuncti venire possunt. Nam qui alio jure veniunt ad totam hereditatem vel partem ejus, de inofficioso agere non possunt. Postumi quoque, qui nullo alio jure venire possunt, de inofficioso agere possunt.

2. But natural children, as well as adopted (the distinction between adopted children laid down in our constitution being always observed), can only attack the testament as inofficious, if they can obtain the effects of the deceased in no other way; for those who can obtain the whole or a part of the inheritance by any other means, cannot bring an action de inofficioso. Posthumous children, also, who are unable to recover their inheritance by any other method, are allowed to bring this action.

D. v. 2. 6. pr. and 8. 15.

Those adopted by strangers could not impugn the testament of the adoptive father, if they were disinherited or passed over, but those who were adopted by their ascendants could. This is the divisio here alluded to. (See Bk. i. Tit. 11. 2.)

The actio de inofficioso testamento was only a last resource open to those who had no other; a pupil, therefore, arrogated, and afterwards disinherited by the arrogator, could not bring this action, because he was entitled to the quarta Antonina (see Bk. i. Tit. 11. 3); nor, again, could an emancipated son, omitted in the testament of his father, because the prætor gave him possession of the goods contra tabulas. (See Tit. 13. 3.)

3. Sed hæc ita accipiendæ sunt, si nihil eis penitus a testatoribus testamento relictum est. Quod nostra constitutio ad verecundiam naturæ introduxit. Sin vero quantacumque pars hereditatis vel res eis fuerit relicta, de inofficioso querela quiescente, id, quod eis deest, usque ad quartam legitimæ partis repletur, licet non fuerit adjectum, boni viri arbitratu debere eam repleri.

3. All this must be understood to take place only when nothing at all has been left them by the testament of the deceased: a provision introduced by our constitution, out of respect for the rights of nature. For, if the least part of the inheritance or any one single thing has been given them, they cannot bring an action de inofficioso testamento: but they must have made up to them one-fourth of what would have been their share, if the deceased had died intestate, supposing what is given does not amount to this fourth: and this, although the testator has not added to his gift any direction that this fourth is to be made up to them according to the estimate of a trustworthy person.

C. iii. 28. 30. pr. and 1.

A plebiscitum was passed in the year 714 A.U.C., called the lex Falcidia (Tit. 22), which provided that one clear fourth of the inheritance must remain to the heir, and that legacies could only affect three-fourths. Either from the analogy of this law, or by some express enactment, it was decided that every one who was near enough in blood to the testator to bring the action de inofficioso, might bring it, though mentioned in the testament, unless one-fourth was thereby given him of what he would have received in a succession ab intestato. This fourth part was spoken of under different names. Sometimes it was itself termed the Falcidia (solam eis Falcidiam debitæ successionis relinquunt, Cod. Theod. xvi. 7. 28). Sometimes it is spoken of as the portio legibus debita, or portio legitima (C. iii. 28. 28. 1), and commentators have called it simply the legitima. In the text, it will be seen, the term legitima pars is used to express the share the persons would have taken ab intestato.

Before the time of Justinian (Cod. Theod. ii. 19. 4), unless a testator either expressly gave this fourth, or gave a direction that such an additional share of the goods should be added to that actually given, as some trustworthy person, who should make an estimate of the value of all the goods of the deceased, should consider, would be necessary to make what was given equal to the fourth, the testament could be attacked and set aside as inofficious; but Justinian altered the law on this point, and enacted that if the testator gave anything at all, the action de inofficioso could not be brought, but only an action to obtain what was wanting to make up the fourth, while the testament itself remained valid. (C. iii. 28. 30. pr.) There were considerable differences between this action to make up what was wanting to the fourth part (actio in supplementum legitimæ) and that de inofficioso: the former was a personal action, there was no limit to the time in which it was to be brought, it was transmissible to the heirs of the person who could bring it, and it left the testament valid; the latter was a real action, was obliged to be brought within a certain time (see note to paragr. 7), could not be transmitted to the heirs, unless the person entitled to bring it had manifested an intention to do so, and if it was successfully brought, the testament was set aside.

4. Si tutor nomine pupilli, ejus tutelam gerebat, ex testamento patris sui legatum acceperit, cum nihil erat ipsi tutori relictum a patre suo, nihilo minus possit nomine suo de inofficioso patris testamento agere.

4. If a tutor accepts in the name of the pupil under his charge a legacy given in the testament of the tutor's own father, while nothing has been left to the tutor himself by his father's testament, he may nevertheless in his own name attack the testament of his father as inofficious.

D. v. 2. 10. 1.

To accept a legacy was to acquiesce in the validity of the testament; but it was reasonable that a tutor, who had an unavoidable duty to perform towards his pupil, should not be personally bound by an act done in his capacity as tutor.

inheritance must remain to the heir, and that legacies could only affect three-fourths. Either from the analogy of this law, or by some express enactment, it was decided that every one who was near enough in blood to the testator to bring the action de inofficioso, might bring it, though mentioned in the testament, unless one-fourth was thereby given him of what he would have received in a succession ab intestato. This fourth part was spoken of under different names. Sometimes it was itself termed the Falcidia (solum eis Falcidiam debitae successionis relinquant, Cod. Theod. xvi. 7. 28). Sometimes it is spoken of as the portio legibus debita, or portio legitima (C. iii. 28. 28. 1), and commentators have called it simply the legitima. In the text, it will be seen, the term legitima pars is used to express the share the persons would have taken ab intestato.

Before the time of Justinian (Cod. Theod. ii. 19. 4), unless a testator either expressly gave this fourth, or gave a direction that such an additional share of the goods should be added to that actually given, as some trustworthy person, who should make an estimate of the value of all the goods of the deceased, should consider, would be necessary to make what was given equal to the fourth, the testament could be attacked and set aside as inofficious; but Justinian altered the law on this point, and enacted that if the testator gave anything at all, the action de inofficioso could not be brought, but only an action to obtain what was wanting to make up the fourth, while the testament itself remained valid. (C. iii. 28. 30. pr.) There were considerable differences between this action to make up what was wanting to the fourth part (actio in supplementum legitimæ) and that de inofficioso: the former was a personal action, there was no limit to the time in which it was to be brought, it was transmissible to the heirs of the person who could bring it, and it left the testament valid; the latter was a real action, was obliged to be brought within a certain time (see note to paragr. 7), could not be transmitted to the heirs; unless the person entitled to bring it had manifested an intention to do so, and if it was successfully brought, the testament was set aside.

4. Si tutor nomine pupilli, ejus tutelam gerebat, ex testamento patris sui legatum acceperit, cum nihil erat ipsi tutori relictum a patre suo, nihilo minus possit nomine suo de inofficioso patris testamento agere.

4. If a tutor accepts in the name of the pupil under his charge a legacy given in the testament of the tutor's own father, while nothing has been left to the tutor himself by his father's testament, he may nevertheless in his own name attack the testament of his father as inofficious.

D. v. 2. 10. 1.

To accept a legacy was to acquiesce in the validity of the testament; but it was reasonable that a tutor, who had an unavoidable duty to perform towards his pupil, should not be personally bound by an act done in his capacity as tutor.

5. Sed et si e contrario pupilli nomine, cui nihil relictum fuerit, de inofficioso egerit et superatus est, ipse quod sibi in eodem testamento legatum relictum est, non amittit.

5. Conversely, if a tutor, in the name of his pupil, to whom nothing has been left, attacks as inofficious the testament of the pupil's father, and attacks it unsuccessfully, he does not lose any legacy that may have been left to himself in the same testament.

D. v. 2. 30. 1.

Any one who unsuccessfully attacked usque ad sententiam a testament as inofficious, forfeited to the fiscus whatever was given him by the testament; but not if he desisted from the action (D. v. 2. 8. 14).

6. Igitur quantam quis debet habere, ut de inofficioso testamento agere non possit: sive jure hereditario sive jure legati vel fideicommissi, vel si mortis causa ei quarta donata fuerit, vel inter vivos in his tantummodo casibus, quorum nostra constitutio mentionem facit, vel aliis modis, qui constitutionibus continentur.

6. That a person should be debarred from bringing the action de inofficioso testamento, it is necessary that he should have a fourth, either by hereditary right, or by a legacy or a fideicommissum, or by a donatio mortis causa, or a donatio inter vivos in the cases mentioned in our constitution, or by any of the other means set forth in the constitutions.

7. Quod autem de quarta diximus, ita intellegendum est, ut, sive unus fuerit sive plures, quibus agere de inofficioso testamento permittitur, una quarta eis dari possit, ut pro rata distribuatur eis, id est pro virili portione, quarta.

7. What we have said of the fourth must be understood as meaning that, whether there is one person only or several, who can bring an action de inofficioso testamento, only one-fourth is to be distributed among all proportionally, that is, each is to have the fourth of his proper share.

D. v. 2. 8. 6 and 8; D. v. 2. 25. pr.; C. iii. 28. 29; C. iii. 35. 2.

If the donatio inter vivos had been made on the express condition that it should be reckoned as part of the quarta legitima (D. v. 2. 25; C. iii. 28. 35), or had been advanced for the purchase of a military rank (C. iii. 28. 30), or was such as unduly to diminish the testator's property, then it was taken into account in estimating how much the recipient was entitled to as his fourth; but, generally speaking, as it was the receipt of the fourth of that which a person would have received ab intestato that excluded him from bringing the action de inofficioso, the right to this action could not be taken away by the receipt of gifts, which, having been made inter vivos, could not have formed part of the inheritance ab intestato.

The words, vel aliis modis, &c., refer to sums given by parents to their children as part of dotes, and to donationes propter nuptias (C. iii. 28. 29), which were taken into account in reckoning the amount due as the portio legitima.

The right to the action de inofficioso might be extinguished, (1) by the person entitled to the quarta legitima dying without having manifested an intention to dispute the testament; if he had done so, the right to the action passed to his heirs (D. v. 2. 6. 2); (2) if he had allowed a time, fixed first at two an-

5. Sed et si e contrario pupilli nomine, cui nihil relictum fuerit, de inofficioso egerit et superatus est, ipse quod sibi in eodem testamento legatum relictum est, non amittit.

5. Conversely, if a tutor, in the name of his pupil, to whom nothing has been left, attacks as inofficious the testament of the pupil's father, and attacks it unsuccessfully, he does not lose any legacy that may have been left to himself in the same testament.

D. v. 2. 30. 1.

Any one who unsuccessfully attacked usque ad sententiam a testament as inofficious, forfeited to the fiscus whatever was given him by the testament; but not if he desisted from the action (D. v. 2. 8. 14).

6. Igitur quantam quis debet habere, ut de inofficioso testamento agere non possit: sive jure hereditario sive jure legati vel fideicommissi, vel si mortis causa ei quarta donata fuerit, vel inter vivos in his tantummodo casibus, quorum nostra constitutio mentionem facit, vel aliis modis, qui constitutionibus continentur.

6. That a person should be debarred from bringing the action de inofficioso testamento, it is necessary that he should have a fourth, either by hereditary right, or by a legacy or a fideicommissum, or by a donatio mortis causa, or a donatio inter vivos in the cases mentioned in our constitution, or by any of the other means set forth in the constitutions.

7. Quod autem de quarta diximus, ita intellegendum est, ut, sive unus fuerit sive plures, quibus agere de inofficioso testamento permittitur, una quarta eis dari possit, ut pro rata distribuatur eis, id est pro virili portione, quarta.

7. What we have said of the fourth must be understood as meaning that, whether there is one person only or several, who can bring an action de inofficioso testamento, only one-fourth is to be distributed among all proportionally, that is, each is to have the fourth of his proper share.

D. v. 2. 8. 6 and 8; D. v. 2. 25. pr.; C. iii. 28. 29; C. iii. 35. 2.

If the donatio inter vivos had been made on the express condition that it should be reckoned as part of the quarta legitima (D. v. 2. 25; C. iii. 28. 35), or had been advanced for the purchase of a military rank (C. iii. 28. 30), or was such as unduly to diminish the testator's property, then it was taken into account in estimating how much the recipient was entitled to as his fourth; but, generally speaking, as it was the receipt of the fourth of that which a person would have received ab intestato that excluded him from bringing the action de inofficioso, the right to this action could not be taken away by the receipt of gifts, which, having been made inter vivos, could not have formed part of the inheritance ab intestato.

The words, vel aliis modis, &c., refer to sums given by parents to their children as part of dotes, and to donationes propter nuptias (C. iii. 28. 29), which were taken into account in reckoning the amount due as the portio legitima.

The right to the action de inofficioso might be extinguished, (1) by the person entitled to the quarta legitima dying without having manifested an intention to dispute the testament; if he had done so, the right to the action passed to his heirs (D. v. 2. 6. 2); (2) if he had allowed a time, fixed first at two ar³

subsequently at five years (Cod. Theod. ii. 19. 5), to elapse without bringing the action; and (3) when he had acquiesced directly or indirectly in the testament; as, for instance, by making a contract with the persons instituted, in their capacity as heirs (D. v. 2. 20), or by a demand against those persons for the payment of a legacy, or by desisting in the action when once brought. (D. v. 2. 8. 1.)

Justinian, in his Novels, introduced considerable changes in the law on these points. First, if those entitled to the portio legitima were more than four in number, they divided between them one-half of the whole inheritance; if they were four or less than four, they divided between them a third of the whole inheritance. (Nov. 18. 1.) Secondly, those who could claim a portio legitima were required to be made heirs, and the testament was not to be upheld because those entitled to the portio legitima had something otherwise given them, as by legacy or trust. (Nov. 115. 3. 4.) Thirdly, if the testament was declared inofficious, it was only the institution of the heir or heirs that was to be set aside; the trusts, legacies, gifts of liberty, and appointments of tutors were to remain good. (Nov. 115. 4. 9.) And, fourthly, Justinian fixed and specified the reasons, such as attempts on the testator's life, accusing him of grave crime, &c., limiting them to fourteen in the case of descendants and to a less number in other cases, for any one of which a testator might disinherit or omit his descendants or ascendants or brothers or sisters; the one on which the testator had acted was to be expressly stated. (Nov. 115. 3. 4.)

TIT. XIX. DE HEREDUM QUALITATE ET DIFFERENTIA.

Heredes autem aut necessarii dicuntur aut sui et necessarii aut extranei.

Heirs are said to be necessarii, sui et necessarii, or extranei.

GAI. ii. 152.

1. Necessarius heres est servus heres institutus: ideo sic appellatur, quia, sive velit sive nolit, omnimodo post mortem testatoris protinus liber et necessarius heres fit. Unde qui facultates suas suspectas habent, solent servum suum primo aut secundo vel etiam ulteriore gradu heredem instituere, ut, si creditoribus satis non fiat, potius ejus heredis bona quam ipsius testatoris a creditoribus possideantur vel distrahantur vel inter eos dividantur. Pro hoc tamen incommodo illud ei commodum præstat, ut ea, quæ post mortem patroni sibi adquisierit, ipsi reserventur: et quamvis non

1. A necessary heir is a slave instituted heir; and he is so called, because, whether he wishes or not, at the death of the testator he becomes instantly free, and necessarily heir; he, therefore, who suspects that he is not in solvent circumstances, commonly institutes his slave to be his heir in the first, second, or some more remote place; so that, if he does not leave a sum equal to his debts, it may be the goods of this heir, and not those of the testator himself, that are seized or sold by his creditors, or divided among them. But, to compensate for this inconvenience, a slave enjoys the advantage of having reserved to him

subsequently at five years (Cod. Theod. ii. 19. 5), to elapse without bringing the action; and (3) when he had acquiesced directly or indirectly in the testament; as, for instance, by making a contract with the persons instituted, in their capacity as heirs (D. v. 2. 20), or by a demand against those persons for the payment of a legacy, or by desisting in the action when once brought. (D. v. 2. 8. 1.)

Justinian, in his Novels, introduced considerable changes in the law on these points. First, if those entitled to the portio legitima were more than four in number, they divided between them one-half of the whole inheritance; if they were four or less than four, they divided between them a third of the whole inheritance. (Nov. 18. 1.) Secondly, those who could claim a portio legitima were required to be made heirs, and the testament was not to be upheld because those entitled to the portio legitima had something otherwise given them, as by legacy or trust. (Nov. 115. 3. 4.) Thirdly, if the testament was declared inofficious, it was only the institution of the heir or heirs that was to be set aside; the trusts, legacies, gifts of liberty, and appointments of tutors were to remain good. (Nov. 115. 4. 9.) And, fourthly, Justinian fixed and specified the reasons, such as attempts on the testator's life, accusing him of grave crime, &c., limiting them to fourteen in the case of descendants and to a less number in other cases, for any one of which a testator might disinherit or omit his descendants or ascendants or brothers or sisters; the one on which the testator had acted was to be expressly stated. (Nov. 115. 3. 4.)

TIT. XIX. DE HEREDUM QUALITATE ET DIFFERENTIA.

Heredes autem aut necessarii dicuntur aut sui et necessarii aut extranei.

Heirs are said to be necessarii, sui et necessarii, or extranei.

GAL. ii. 152.

1. Necessarius heres est servus heres institutus: ideo sic appellatur, quia, sive velit sive nolit, omnimodo post mortem testatoris protinus liber et necessarius heres fit. Unde qui facultates suas suspectas habent, solent servum suum primo aut secundo vel etiam ulteriore gradu heredem instituere, ut, si creditoribus satis non fiat, potius ejus heredis bona quam ipsius testatoris a creditoribus possideantur vel distrahantur vel inter eos dividantur. Pro hoc tamen incommodo illud ei commodum præstat, ut ea, quæ post mortem patroni sibi adquisierit, ipsi reserventur: et quamvis non

1. A necessary heir is a slave instituted heir; and he is so called, because, whether he wishes or not, at the death of the testator he becomes instantly free, and necessarily heir; he, therefore, who suspects that he is not in solvent circumstances, commonly institutes his slave to be his heir in the first, second, or some more remote place; so that, if he does not leave a sum equal to his debts, it may be the goods of this heir, and not those of the testator himself, that are seized or sold by his creditors, or divided among them. But, to compensate for this inconvenience, a slave enjoys the advantage of having reserved to him sufficiant bona defuncti creditoribus, iterum ex ea causa res ejus, quas sibi adquisierit, non veneunt.

whatever he has acquired after the death of his patron; for although the goods of the deceased should be insufficient for the payment of his creditors, yet property so acquired by the slave is not on that account made the subject of a further sale.

GAI. ii. 153-155; D. xlii. 6. 1. 17.

The sale of goods for the payment of debts brought on the debtor an ignominy which a testator was very anxious his memory should escape.

The heres necessarius was legally bound by all the debts of the deceased; but the prætor made a change in the strict law, and permitted the goods of the deceased to be distinctly separated from the possessions of the heres necessarius, if the heres necessarius demanded, before in any way interfering with the goods of the deceased, that this separation should take place. When it did take place, the creditors could only recover from him the amount of what actually came into his hands as heir, while he could deduct from the inheritance all that he had acquired after he became sui juris (D. xlii. 6. 1. 18); and (as Ulpian in the passage quoted goes on to say) anything due to him from the testator, which Demangeat suggests, refers to the case of a gift by a third person of a legacy to a slave, si liber factus fuerit, in a testament of which the testator had been instituted heir.

This beneficium separationis, it may be mentioned, the right to have the goods of the heir separated from those of the testator, was sometimes accorded, in cases having nothing to do with a heres necessarius, in favour of the creditors of the testator. The heir might be insolvent, and then it was for their interest that the testator's property should be kept distinct. (D. xlii. 6. 1. 17.)

2. Sui autem et necessarii heredes sunt veluti filius, filia, nepos neptisque ex filio et deinceps ceteri liberi, qui modo in potestate morientis fuerint. Sed ut nepos neptisve sui heredes sint, non sufficit, eum eamve in potestate avi mortis tempore fuisse, sed opus est, ut pater ejus vivo patre suo desierit suus heres esse, aut morte interceptus aut qualibet alia ratione liberatus potestate: tunc enim nepos neptisve in locum patris sui succedit. Sed sui quidem heredes ideo appellantur, quia domestici heredes sunt et vivo quoque patre quodammodo domini existimantur. Unde etiam, si quis intestatus mortuus sit, prima causa est in successione liberorum. Necessarii vero ideo dicuntur, quia omnimodo, sive velint sive nolint, tam ab intestato quam ex testa-

2. Heirs are sui et necessarii, when they are, for instance, a son, a daughter, a grandson or granddaughter, by a son, or other direct descendants, provided they are in the power of the deceased at the time of his death. That grandchildren should be sui heredes, it is not enough that they were in the power of their grandfather at the time of his decease, but it is also requisite that their father should have ceased to be a suius heres in the lifetime of his father, having been either cut off by death, or otherwise freed from paternal authority; for then the grandson or granddaughter succeeds into the place of their father. Sui heredes are so called because they are family heirs, and, even in the lifetime of their father, are considered owners of the inheritance in a certain degree. Hence, in case of a person dying intestate his whatever he has acquired after the death of his patron; for although the goods of the deceased should be insufficient for the payment of his creditors, yet property so acquired by the slave is not on that account made the subject of a further sale.

sufficiant bona defuncti creditoribus, iterum ex ea causa res ejus, quas sibi adquisierit, non veneunt.

GAI. ii. 153-155; D. xlii. 6. 1. 17.

The sale of goods for the payment of debts brought on the debtor an ignominy which a testator was very anxious his memory should escape.

The heres necessarius was legally bound by all the debts of the deceased; but the prætor made a change in the strict law, and permitted the goods of the deceased to be distinctly separated from the possessions of the heres necessarius, if the heres necessarius demanded, before in any way interfering with the goods of the deceased, that this separation should take place. When it did take place, the creditors could only recover from him the amount of what actually came into his hands as heir, while he could deduct from the inheritance all that he had acquired after he became sui juris (D. xlii. 6. 1. 18); and (as Ulpian in the passage quoted goes on to say) anything due to him from the testator, which Demangeat suggests, refers to the case of a gift by a third person of a legacy to a slave, si liber factus fuerit, in a testament of which the testator had been instituted heir.

This beneficium separationis, it may be mentioned, the right to have the goods of the heir separated from those of the testator, was sometimes accorded, in cases having nothing to do with a heres necessarius, in favour of the creditors of the testator. The heir might be insolvent, and then it was for their interest that the testator's property should be kept distinct. (D. xlii. 6. 1. 17.)

2. Sui autem et necessarii heredes sunt veluti filius, filia, nepos neptisque ex filio et deinceps ceteri liberi, qui modo in potestate morientis fuerint. Sed ut nepos neptisve sui heredes sint, non sufficit, eum eamve in potestate avi mortis tempore fuisse, sed opus est, ut pater ejus vivo patre suo desierit suus heres esse, aut morte interceptus aut qualibet alia ratione liberatus potestate: tunc enim nepos neptisve in locum patris sui succedit. Sed sui quidem heredes ideo appellantur, quia domestici heredes sunt et vivo quoque patre quodammodo domini existimantur. Unde etiam, si quis intestatus mortuus sit, prima causa est in successione liberorum. Necessarii vero ideo dicuntur, quia omnimodo, sive velint sive nolint, tam ab intestato quam ex testa-

2. Heirs are sui et necessarii, when they are, for instance, a son, a daughter, a grandson or granddaughter, by a son, or other direct descendants, provided they are in the power of the deceased at the time of his death. That grandchildren should be sui heredes, it is not enough that they were in the power of their grandfather at the time of his decease, but it is also requisite that their father should have ceased to be a sui heres in the lifetime of his father, having been either cut off by death, or otherwise freed from paternal authority; for then the grandson or granddaughter succeeds into the place of their father. Sui heredes are so called because they are family heirs, and, even in the lifetime of their father, are considered owners of the inheritance in a certain degree. Hence, in case of a person dying intestate his children are first in succession. They are called necessary heirs, because, whether they wish or not, whether under a testament or in a succession ab intestato, they become heirs. But the prætor permits them to abstain from the inheritance if they wish, so that the goods may be taken possession of by the creditors rather as those of their ascendant than as belonging to them.

mento heredes fiunt. Sed his prætor permittit volentibus abstinere se ab hereditate, ut potius parentis quam ipsorum bona similiter a creditoribus possideantur.

GAI. II. 156-158.

There is no difficulty in understanding either who were sui heredes, or what was the position they occupied with reference to the inheritance. If the paterfamilias had no power of making a testament, those persons in his power, who became sui juris at his death, would necessarily have had the inheritance at his decease; they were in a manner, as the text says, owners during his lifetime of the inheritance, which must actually come into their possession at his death. And, although testaments were allowed to alter the legal succession, the rights of those who had this interest in the inheritance were so far guarded that it was necessary expressly to disinherit them in order to deprive them of their interest; while, on the other hand, if the testator appointed any one of them as his heir, he was considered thereby to exercise his patria potestas, so that the suius heres could not exercise any option as to accepting or refusing the inheritance, and was a heres necessarius, exactly as he was if he succeeded ab intestato, until the prætor interfered to enable him to escape the burden. In every case the suius heres took the inheritance or his share in it, and without any act or exercise of his own will; if he was insane or under the age of puberty, no authority was needed to enable him to accept it, and he never had to enter formally on an inheritance that belonged to him immediately the paterfamilias died, unless he was instituted by the paterfamilias only conditionally, and then the inheritance belonged to him immediately on the condition being fulfilled. If the grandson, instituted while his father was disinherited, was in the power of the deceased at the time of his death, he became suius heres et necessarius, but becoming, on the testator's death, in the power of his own father, immediately placed his father in the position he himself occupied—patrem suum sine aditione heredem faciet et quidem necessarium. (D. xxix. 2. 6. 5.)

The inheritance was, according to the notions of early law, the property not so much of the individual, as of the family, and so the term sui heredes means persons who took an inheritance that was their own, who were heirs not of the paterfamilias, but of themselves, and being, as Cujacius expresses it by a Greek equivalent, αὐτοκληρονόμοι, took what thus belonged to them already, and only received possession of that over which, as the children are first in succession. They are called necessary heirs, because, whether they wish or not, whether under a testament or in a succession ab intestato, they become heirs. But the prætor permits them to abstain from the inheritance if they wish, so that the goods may be taken possession of by the creditors rather as those of their ascendant than as belonging to them.

mento heredes fiunt. Sed his prætor permittit volentibus abstinere se ab hereditate, ut potius parentis quam ipsorum bona similiter a creditoribus possideantur.

GAL. II. 156-158.

There is no difficulty in understanding either who were sui heredes, or what was the position they occupied with reference to the inheritance. If the paterfamilias had no power of making a testament, those persons in his power, who became sui juris at his death, would necessarily have had the inheritance at his decease; they were in a manner, as the text says, owners during his lifetime of the inheritance, which must actually come into their possession at his death. And, although testaments were allowed to alter the legal succession, the rights of those who had this interest in the inheritance were so far guarded that it was necessary expressly to disinherit them in order to deprive them of their interest; while, on the other hand, if the testator appointed any one of them as his heir, he was considered thereby to exercise his patria potestas, so that the suius heres could not exercise any option as to accepting or refusing the inheritance, and was a heres necessarius, exactly as he was if he succeeded ab intestato, until the prætor interfered to enable him to escape the burden. In every case the suius heres took the inheritance or his share in it, and without any act or exercise of his own will; if he was insane or under the age of puberty, no authority was needed to enable him to accept it, and he never had to enter formally on an inheritance that belonged to him immediately the paterfamilias died, unless he was instituted by the paterfamilias only conditionally, and then the inheritance belonged to him immediately on the condition being fulfilled. If the grandson, instituted while his father was disinherited, was in the power of the deceased at the time of his death, he became suius heres et necessarius, but becoming, on the testator's death, in the power of his own father, immediately placed his father in the position he himself occupied—patrem suum sine aditione heredem faciet et quidem necessarium. (D. xxix. 2. 6. 5.)

The inheritance was, according to the notions of early law, the property not so much of the individual, as of the family, and so the term sui heredes means persons who took an inheritance that was their own, who were heirs not of the paterfamilias, but of themselves, and being, as Cujacius expresses it by a Greek equivalent, αὐτοκληρονόμοι, took what thus belonged to them already, and only received possession of that over which, as the

A difference still remained with respect to the gifts of liberty to a slave. (Vid. Tit. 24. 2.) A direct legacy of liberty made the slave the libertus of the testator; a gift of liberty by a fideicommissum made the slave the libertus of the fideicommissarius.

4. Non solum autem testatoris vel heredis res, sed et aliena legari potest: ita ut heres cogatur redimere eam et præstare vel, si non potest redimere, æstimationem ejus dare. Sed si talis res sit, cujus non est commercium, nec æstimatio ejus debetur, sicuti si campum Martium vel basilicam vel templa vel quæ publico usui destinata sunt, legaverit; nam nullius momenti legatum est. Quod autem diximus, alienam rem posse legari, ita intelligendum est, si defunctus sciebat, alienam rem esse, non et si ignorabat; forsitan enim, si scisset alienam, non legasset: et ita divus Pius rescripsit. Et verius est, ipsum qui agit, id est legatarium, probare oportere, scisse alienam rem legare defunctum, non heredem probare oportere, ignorasse alienam, quia semper necessitas probandi incumbit illi, qui agit.

4. A testator may not only give as a legacy his own property, or that of his heir, but also the property of others. The heir is then obliged either to purchase and deliver it, or, if it cannot be bought, to give its value. But, if the thing given is not in its nature a subject of commerce, or purchasable, the heir is not bound to pay the value to the legatee; as if a man should bequeath the Campus Martius, a basilica, temples, or any of the things appropriated to public purposes: for such a legacy is of no effect. But when we say that a testator may give the goods of another as a legacy, we must be understood to mean, that this can only be done if the deceased knew that what he bequeathed belonged to another, and not if he was ignorant of it; since, if he had known it, he would not perhaps have left such a legacy. To this effect is a rescript of the Emperor Antoninus. It is also the better opinion that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff, that is, the legatee, to prove that the deceased knew that what he left belonged to another, not upon the heir to prove that the deceased did not know it; for the burden of proof always lies upon the person who brings the action.

GAR. ii. 202; D. xxx. 39. 7-10; D. xxxi. 67. 8; C. vi. 37. 10; D. xxii. 3. 21.

A basilica was a building which was used as a court of law, and also as a resort of merchants and men of business.

There are some exceptions to the rule as to the burden of proof; e.g. in some cases where the plaintiff is a minor or a woman (D. xxii. 3. 25. 1). Thus in the action of a pupil against a magistrate (Bk. i. Tit. 24. 2), the burden of proof lies on the magistrate (D. xxvii. 8. 1. 13).

5. Sed et si rem obligatam creditori aliquis legaverit, necesse habet heres luere. Et hoc quoque casu idem placet, quod in re aliena, ut ita demum luere necesse habeat heres, si sciebat defunctus, rem obligatam esse: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Si tamen defunctus voluit legatarium luere et hoc expressit, non debet heres eam luere.

5. If a testator gives as a legacy anything in pledge to a creditor, the heir is bound to redeem it. But in this case, as in that of the property of another, the heir is not bound to redeem it, unless the deceased knew that the thing was pledged; and this the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript. But when it has been the wish of the deceased that the legatee should redeem the thing,

A difference still remained with respect to the gifts of liberty to a slave. (Vid. Tit. 24. 2.) A direct legacy of liberty made the slave the libertus of the testator; a gift of liberty by a fideicommissum made the slave the libertus of the fideicommissarius.

4. Non solum autem testatoris vel heredis res, sed et aliena legari potest: ita ut heres cogatur redimere eam et præstare vel, si non potest redimere, æstimationem ejus dare. Sed si talis res sit, cujus non est commercium, nec æstimatio ejus debetur, sicuti si campum Martium vel basilicam vel templa vel quæ publico usui destinata sunt, legaverit; nam nullius momenti legatum est. Quod autem diximus, alienam rem posse legari, ita intellegendum est, si defunctus sciebat, alienam rem esse, non et si ignorabat; forsitan enim, si scisset alienam, non legasset: et ita divus Pius rescripsit. Et verius est, ipsum qui agit, id est legatarium, probare oportere, scisse alienam rem legare defunctum, non heredem probare oportere, ignorasse alienam, quia semper necessitas probandi incumbit illi, qui agit.

4. A testator may not only give as a legacy his own property, or that of his heir, but also the property of others. The heir is then obliged either to purchase and deliver it, or, if it cannot be bought, to give its value. But, if the thing given is not in its nature a subject of commerce, or purchasable, the heir is not bound to pay the value to the legatee; as if a man should bequeath the Campus Martius, a basilica, temples, or any of the things appropriated to public purposes: for such a legacy is of no effect. But when we say that a testator may give the goods of another as a legacy, we must be understood to mean, that this can only be done if the deceased knew that what he bequeathed belonged to another, and not if he was ignorant of it; since, if he had known it, he would not perhaps have left such a legacy. To this effect is a rescript of the Emperor Antoninus. It is also the better opinion that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff, that is, the legatee, to prove that the deceased knew that what he left belonged to another, not upon the heir to prove that the deceased did not know it; for the burden of proof always lies upon the person who brings the action.

GAR. ii. 202; D. xxx. 39. 7-10; D. xxxi. 67. 8; C. vi. 37. 10; D. xxii. 3. 21.

A basilica was a building which was used as a court of law, and also as a resort of merchants and men of business.

There are some exceptions to the rule as to the burden of proof; e.g. in some cases where the plaintiff is a minor or a woman (D. xxii. 3. 25. 1). Thus in the action of a pupil against a magistrate (Bk. i. Tit. 24. 2), the burden of proof lies on the magistrate (D. xxvii. 8. 1. 13).

5. Sed et si rem obligatam creditori quis legaverit, necesse habet heres luere. Et hoc quoque casu idem placet, quod in re aliena, ut ita demum luere necesse habeat heres, si sciebat defunctus, rem obligatam esse: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Si tamen defunctus voluit legatarium luere et hoc expressit, non debet heres eam luere.

5. If a testator gives as a legacy anything in pledge to a creditor, the heir is bound to redeem it. But in this case, as in that of the property of another, the heir is not bound to redeem it, unless the deceased knew that the thing was pledged; and this the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript. But when it has been the wish of the deceased that the legatee should redeem the thing, and he has expressly said so, the heir is not bound to redeem it.

D. xxx. 57.

6. Si res aliena legata fuerit et ejus, vivo testatore, legatarius dominus factus fuerit, si quidem ex causa emptionis, ex testamento actione pretium consequi potest: si vero ex causa lucrativa, veluti ex donatione vel ex alia simili causa, agere non potest. Nam traditum est, duas lucrativas causas in eundem hominem et in eandem rem concurrere non posse. Hac ratione si ex duobus testamentis eadem res eidem debeatur, interest, utrum rem an aestimationem ex testamento consecutus est: nam si rem, agere non potest, quia habet eam ex causa lucrativa, si aestimationem, agere potest.

6. If a thing belonging to another is given as a legacy, and becomes the property of the legatee in the lifetime of the testator, then, if it becomes so by purchase, the legatee may recover the value by an action founded on the testament; but if the legatee obtained it by any way of clear gain to him, as by gift, or any similar mode, he cannot bring such an action, for it is a received rule, that two modes of acquiring, each being one of clear gain, can never meet in the same person with regard to the same thing. If, therefore, the same thing be given by two testaments to the same person, it makes a difference, whether the legatee has obtained the thing itself, or the value of it, under the first, for, if he has already received the thing itself, he cannot bring an action, since he has received it by a mode of clear gain to him; but, if he has received the value only, he may bring an action.

D. xxx. 108; D. xlv. 7. 17; D. xxx. 34. 2.

It may be observed, that if a person acquired the subject of a legacy by a causa lucrativa during the lifetime of the testator, and the legacy was made, not in his own favour directly, but was given to his slave, or a descendant in his power, he could recover the value of the thing given from the heir. In such a case the two causae lucrativae were not considered so to unite in one person as to violate the general rule, although, in fact, the result was the same as if the rule had been directly violated. (D. xxx. 108.)

In the beginning of this paragraph it is said that if the legatee acquired the thing during the lifetime of the testator by a causa lucrativa, he could not regain it or its value by an action. The vivo testatore is merely an example; it would be the same if the legatee acquired the thing by a causa lucrativa at any time before receiving it by way of legacy. Another instance of the principle is given in the ninth paragraph.

7. Ea quoque res, quae in rerum natura non est, si modo futura est, recte legatur, veluti fructus, qui in illo fundo nati erunt, aut quod ex illa ancilla natum erit.

7. A thing not in existence, but which one day will be in existence, may be properly given as a legacy, as, for instance, the fruits which shall grow on such a farm, or the child which shall be born of such a slave.

GAI. ii. 203.

8. Si eadem res duobus legata sit sive conjunctim sive disjunctim, si ambo perveniant ad legatum, scinditur inter eos legatum: si alter de-

8. If the same thing is given as a legacy to two persons, either conjointly or separately, and both take the legacy, it is divided between them. But if and he has expressly said so, the heir is not bound to redeem it.

D. xxx. 57.

6. Si res aliena legata fuerit et ejus, vivo testatore, legatarius dominus factus fuerit, si quidem ex causa emptionis, ex testamento actione pretium consequi potest: si vero ex causa lucrativa, veluti ex donatione vel ex alia simili causa, agere non potest. Nam traditum est, duas lucrativas causas in eundem hominem et in eandem rem concurrere non posse. Hac ratione si ex duobus testamentis eadem res eidem debeatur, interest, utrum rem an aestimationem ex testamento consecutus est: nam si rem, agere non potest, quia habet eam ex causa lucrativa, si aestimationem, agere potest.

6. If a thing belonging to another is given as a legacy, and becomes the property of the legatee in the lifetime of the testator, then, if it becomes so by purchase, the legatee may recover the value by an action founded on the testament; but if the legatee obtained it by any way of clear gain to him, as by gift, or any similar mode, he cannot bring such an action, for it is a received rule, that two modes of acquiring, each being one of clear gain, can never meet in the same person with regard to the same thing. If, therefore, the same thing be given by two testaments to the same person, it makes a difference, whether the legatee has obtained the thing itself, or the value of it, under the first, for, if he has already received the thing itself, he cannot bring an action, since he has received it by a mode of clear gain to him; but, if he has received the value only, he may bring an action.

D. xxx. 108; D. xlv. 7. 17; D. xxx. 34. 2.

It may be observed, that if a person acquired the subject of a legacy by a causa lucrativa during the lifetime of the testator, and the legacy was made, not in his own favour directly, but was given to his slave, or a descendant in his power, he could recover the value of the thing given from the heir. In such a case the two causae lucrativae were not considered so to unite in one person as to violate the general rule, although, in fact, the result was the same as if the rule had been directly violated. (D. xxx. 108.)

In the beginning of this paragraph it is said that if the legatee acquired the thing during the lifetime of the testator by a causa lucrativa, he could not regain it or its value by an action. The vivo testatore is merely an example; it would be the same if the legatee acquired the thing by a causa lucrativa at any time before receiving it by way of legacy. Another instance of the principle is given in the ninth paragraph.

7. Ea quoque res, quae in rerum natura non est, si modo futura est, recte legatur, veluti fructus, qui in illo fundo nati erunt, aut quod ex illa ancilla natum erit.

7. A thing not in existence, but which one day will be in existence, may be properly given as a legacy, as, for instance, the fruits which shall grow on such a farm, or the child which shall be born of such a slave.

GAL. ii. 203.

8. Si eadem res duobus legata sit sive conjunctim sive disjunctim, si ambo perveniant ad legatum, scinditur inter eos legatum: si alter de-

8. If the same thing is given as a legacy to two persons, either conjointly or separately, and both take the legacy, it is divided between them. But if ficiat, quia aut spreverit legatum aut vivo testatore decesserit aut alio quolibet modo defecerit, totum ad collegatarium pertinet. Coniunctim autem legatur, veluti si quis dicat 'Titio et Seio hominem Stichum do lego:' disjunctim ita 'Titio hominem Stichum do lego, Seio Stichum do lego.' Sed et si expresserit 'eundem hominem Stichum,' æque disjunctim legatum intellegitur.

either of the legatees fails to take it either from refusing it or from dying in the lifetime of the testator, or from any other reason, the whole goes to his co-legatee. A legacy is given conjointly, if a testator says, 'I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Titius and Seius:' but separately, if he says, 'I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Titius; I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Seius.' And even if the testator says, that he gives the same slave Stichus, yet the legacy is still taken to be given separately.

GAI. ii. 199.

A legacy might be void originally, when it was said to be taken pro non scripto, i.e. as if it had never been inserted; or it might be valid originally, and yet before the rights of the legatee were fixed (i.e., to use the technical term (see note on paragr. 20), before the dies cedens) the legatee might die, or refuse the legacy, or become incapable to take, when the legacy was called irritum or destitutum; or the rights of the legatee might be fixed, but before the legacy was actually delivered over to him, it might be taken away from him on account of something rendering him unworthy to receive it; the legacy was then called ereptitum (quæ ut indignis eripiuntur). If there were no co-legatees, the legacy, if ereptitum, went to the fiscus; in the two other cases the failure of the legacy was for the benefit of the heir. The legacies were burdens with which he might have been, but was not, charged.

But if there was a co-legatee the case was different. Co-legatees might be created, according to a division made by Paulus (D. 1. 16. 142), re, re et verbis, or verbis; re being equivalent to the disjunctim of the text, when the same gift was made separately to two or more persons; re et verbis, equivalent to the coniunctim of the text, when the same thing was given at once to two or more; and verbis, in which the joint legacy was only apparent, the gift being made at once to two or more, but their respective shares being assigned them, as 'lego Titio et Seio ex æquis partibus.'

The rights of co-legatees were very different at different periods of Roman law. I. Originally the interest of the co-legatee was determined by the formula under which the legacy was given. If it was per vindicationem, the right to the property in the whole thing given passed to each legatee. They had to divide it between them, but each had a right, as against the heir, to claim the whole. If one of them failed to take, the whole passed to the other. (GAI. ii. 199.) If it was given per damnationem, no right to the property passed, but each legatee was a creditor of the heir in respect of the thing given, and a difference was made according as the thing was given coniunctim or disjunctim. In the former case, each of the co-legatees, if there were two, was entitled to half only, and if either could not take, his half remained in the inheritance for the benefit of the heir. If the legacy was given disjunctim, then each had a claim fiat, quia aut spreverit legatum aut vivo testatore decesserit aut alio quolibet modo defecerit, totum ad collegatarium pertinet. Conjunctim autem legatur, veluti si quis dicat 'Titio et Seio hominem Stichum do lego:' disjunctim ita 'Titio hominem Stichum do lego, Seio Stichum do lego.' Sed et si expresserit 'eundem hominem Stichum,' æque disjunctim legatum intellegitur.

either of the legatees fails to take it either from refusing it or from dying in the lifetime of the testator, or from any other reason, the whole goes to his co-legatee. A legacy is given conjointly, if a testator says, 'I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Titius and Seius;' but separately, if he says, 'I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Titius; I give as a legacy my slave Stichus to Seius.' And even if the testator says, that he gives the same slave Stichus, yet the legacy is still taken to be given separately.

GAI. ii. 199.

A legacy might be void originally, when it was said to be taken pro non scripto, i.e. as if it had never been inserted; or it might be valid originally, and yet before the rights of the legatee were fixed (i.e., to use the technical term (see note on paragr. 20), before the dies cedens) the legatee might die, or refuse the legacy, or become incapable to take, when the legacy was called irritum or destitutum; or the rights of the legatee might be fixed, but before the legacy was actually delivered over to him, it might be taken away from him on account of something rendering him unworthy to receive it; the legacy was then called eriptitium (quæ ut indignis eripiuntur). If there were no co-legatees, the legacy, if eriptitium, went to the fiscus; in the two other cases the failure of the legacy was for the benefit of the heir. The legacies were burdens with which he might have been, but was not, charged.

But if there was a co-legatee the case was different. Co-legatees might be created, according to a division made by Paulus (D. 1. 16. 142), re, re et verbis, or verbis; re being equivalent to the disjunctim of the text, when the same gift was made separately to two or more persons; re et verbis, equivalent to the conjunctim of the text, when the same thing was given at once to two or more; and verbis, in which the joint legacy was only apparent, the gift being made at once to two or more, but their respective shares being assigned them, as 'lego Titio et Seio ex æquis partibus.'

The rights of co-legatees were very different at different periods of Roman law. I. Originally the interest of the co-legatee was determined by the formula under which the legacy was given. If it was per vindicationem, the right to the property in the whole thing given passed to each legatee. They had to divide it between them, but each had a right, as against the heir, to claim the whole. If one of them failed to take, the whole passed to the other. (GAI. ii. 199.) If it was given per damnationem, no right to the property passed, but each legatee was a creditor of the heir in respect of the thing given, and a difference was made according as the thing was given conjunctim or disjunctim. In the former case, each of the co-legatees, if there were two, was entitled to half only, and if either could not take, his half remained in the inheritance for the benefit of the heir. If the legacy was given disjunctim, then each had a claim against the heir for the whole, and if one got the thing from the heir, the other could get its value. (GAI. ii. 205.) If the legacy was given sinendi modo, and conjunctim, each could take a half only. If given disjunctim, according to some it was as if given per damnationem; according to others, if the heir allowed either co-legatee to take the thing, he had done his duty, and the co-legatee got nothing. (GAI. ii. 215.) If the legacy was given per praeceptionem, the effect as between co-legatees was the same as in the case of legacies given per vindicationem. (GAI. ii. 223.)

II. The lex Julia de maritandis ordinibus (B.C. 13) and the lex Papia Poppea (A.D. 9), which are usually spoken of as one law, lex Julia et Papia, introduced great changes in testamentary law; the former to prevent unequal marriages, as of a senator with a liberta, and the latter to promote marriage and the birth of children. Two classes of persons, caelibes and orbi, were affected with incapacities. They might be instituted or have legacies given them, i.e. the institution or gift was not void, but the benefit derivable from it was taken away from them and given to some one else. By caelibes was meant a man between the ages of twenty and sixty, or a woman between the ages of twenty and fifty, who had not been married or was a widower or widow. (ULP. Reg. 16. 1.) Men had a hundred days from the death of the testator in which they might marry, and thus avoid the penalties attaching to celibacy, and women were allowed two years from the death of a husband, and eighteen months from the time of divorce, in which to remarry. (ULP. Reg. 14. and 17. 1.) By orbus was meant a man between twenty-five and sixty, and a woman between twenty and fifty, who had not a child living at the time of the accrual of the right to take under the testament. Adoptive children could not be counted, a senatusconsultum having been passed to exclude them. The lex Papia fixed the time of accrual of rights under a testament, the dies cedens, as it was technically termed, at the date of the opening of the testament, instead of the date of the testator's death, which had previously been the legal date.

The caelibes lost all, and the orbus one-half, of what was given him, and this lapsed portion (caducum, veluti ceciderit ab eo, ULP. Reg. 17. 1) was given to some one else. These caduca produced by the person to whom they were given not being capable of taking them were not the only interests dealt with by the lex Papia. If a gift was originally invalid, as if it was given to a person already dead at the date when the testament was made, the gift was looked on as if it had never been made at all, pro non scripto. With such gifts the lex Papia had nothing to do. But a gift might have been valid originally and then become invalid, as if, e.g., it had been given to a person who died after the making of the testament and before the death of the testator. The old law prescribed how they should be treated, and gave them by accrual to co-heirs if given to an heir, or allowed them to fall in as part of the inheritance if given to a legatee. Such vacant things, however, were affected by the lex Papia. They were said to be in causa caduci; and the caduca against the heir for the whole, and if one got the thing from the heir, the other could get its value. (GAI. ii. 205.) If the legacy was given sinendi modo, and conjunctim, each could take a half only. If given disjunctim, according to some it was as if given per damnationem; according to others, if the heir allowed either co-legatee to take the thing, he had done his duty, and the co-legatee got nothing. (GAI. ii. 215.) If the legacy was given per praeceptionem, the effect as between co-legatees was the same as in the case of legacies given per vindicationem. (GAI. ii. 223.)

II. The lex Julia de maritandis ordinibus (B.C. 13) and the lex Papia Poppea (A.D. 9), which are usually spoken of as one law, lex Julia et Papia, introduced great changes in testamentary law; the former to prevent unequal marriages, as of a senator with a liberta, and the latter to promote marriage and the birth of children. Two classes of persons, caelibes and orbi, were affected with incapacities. They might be instituted or have legacies given them, i.e. the institution or gift was not void, but the benefit derivable from it was taken away from them and given to some one else. By caelibes was meant a man between the ages of twenty and sixty, or a woman between the ages of twenty and fifty, who had not been married or was a widower or widow. (ULP. Reg. 16. 1.) Men had a hundred days from the death of the testator in which they might marry, and thus avoid the penalties attaching to celibacy, and women were allowed two years from the death of a husband, and eighteen months from the time of divorce, in which to remarry. (ULP. Reg. 14. and 17. 1.) By orbus was meant a man between twenty-five and sixty, and a woman between twenty and fifty, who had not a child living at the time of the accrual of the right to take under the testament. Adoptive children could not be counted, a senatusconsultum having been passed to exclude them. The lex Papia fixed the time of accrual of rights under a testament, the dies cedens, as it was technically termed, at the date of the opening of the testament, instead of the date of the testator's death, which had previously been the legal date.

The caelibes lost all, and the orbus one-half, of what was given him, and this lapsed portion (caducum, veluti ceciderit ab eo, ULP. Reg. 17. 1) was given to some one else. These caduca produced by the person to whom they were given not being capable of taking them were not the only interests dealt with by the lex Papia. If a gift was originally invalid, as if it was given to a person already dead at the date when the testament was made, the gift was looked on as if it had never been made at all, pro non scripto. With such gifts the lex Papia had nothing to do. But a gift might have been valid originally and then become invalid, as if, e.g., it had been given to a person who died after the making of the testament and before the death of the testator. The old law prescribed how they should be treated, and gave them by accrual to co-heirs if given to an heir, or allowed them to fall in as part of the inheritance if given to a legatee. Such vacant things, however, were affected by the lex Papia. They were said to be in causa caduci; and the caduca and the things in causa caduci devolved together to those who had the jus caduca vindicandi.

In the first place there were certain excepted persons, among others cognates of the testator up to the sixth degree (ULP. Reg. 16. 1), who were not affected by the lex Papia at all. They lost nothing if they were cælibes or orbi; they were said to be solidi capaces, capable of taking all the testament gave them. But they did not take caduca under the special provisions of the lex Papia; therefore if not patres they could only get caduca by being made substituted heirs. (See note on Title 15.) Ascendants and descendants up to the third degree had greater privileges. They were solidi capaces, losing nothing by being cælibes or orbi; they could themselves take caduca under the lex Papia; and they had, moreover, the jus antiquum, enjoying the rights of accrual of the old law. (ULP. Reg. 18.)

Apart from them it was the patres (i.e. persons having a husband or wife and one child living), mentioned in the testament, who took the caduca and the things in causa caduci, legatees taking before heirs. If there were no persons answering to this description, the cerarium, or treasury of the people, as opposed to the fiscus, or treasury of the emperor, took them. But the object of the law was not to get money for the treasury, but to reward marriage and the birth of children, and this is why testators were allowed to substitute heirs (who, of course, unless near relations or patres, could not take) so as to prevent the cerarium taking.

Where there were co-legatees, the caduca of co-legatees were given, in the first place, to co-legatees who were patres; but it was only those joined re et verbis, and those joined verbis, who had to be considered for this purpose. For those joined re were each entitled to the whole thing, and so any one co-legatee capable of taking was entitled to the whole by the form of the gift. If there were no co-legatees who were patres, the legacies went to the heirs who were patres. If there were none, then to legatees generally who had children. If none had children, then to the cerarium. (GAI. ii. 206, 207, 286.) Any legacy given by the lex Papia Poppæa might be refused; if accepted, it passed with all the burdens attaching to it. Caduca cum suo onere fiunt. (ULP. Reg. 17. 2.) By a constitution of Caracalla (ULP. Reg. 17. 2), all caduca were given to the fiscus, the distinction between the cerarium and the fiscus having ceased to exist.

III. Constantine abolished the law of incapacity arising from celibacy and orbitas. (C. viii. 58.) And Justinian did away with all the law of caduca springing out of the lex Papia Poppæa. The distinction between the kinds of legacies being no longer in existence, new provisions on the subject were made. (C. vi. 51.) The right to bring a real action was to attach to every legacy; and co-legatees were placed in the position they would have occupied before the lex Papia Poppæa; but it was enacted that in every case of a gift to a co-legatee failing, an accrual should take place to the other or others joined with him. If they were joined re, the accrual

Consol

Justinian

I Real action to be brought

II Gift failing

accrual should take place to the other or others joined with him and the things in causa caduci devolved together to those who had the jus caduca vindicandi.

In the first place there were certain excepted persons, among others cognates of the testator up to the sixth degree (ULP. Reg. 16. 1), who were not affected by the lex Papia at all. They lost nothing if they were celibes or orbi; they were said to be solidi capaces, capable of taking all the testament gave them. But they did not take caduca under the special provisions of the lex Papia; therefore if not patres they could only get caduca by being made substituted heirs. (See note on Title 15.) Ascendants and descendants up to the third degree had greater privileges. They were solidi capaces, losing nothing by being celibes or orbi; they could themselves take caduca under the lex Papia; and they had, moreover, the jus antiquum, enjoying the rights of accretion of the old law. (ULP. Reg. 18.)

Apart from them it was the patres (i.e. persons having a husband or wife and one child living), mentioned in the testament, who took the caduca and the things in causa caduci, legatees taking before heirs. If there were no persons answering to this description, the ærarium, or treasury of the people, as opposed to the fiscus, or treasury of the emperor, took them. But the object of the law was not to get money for the treasury, but to reward marriage and the birth of children, and this is why testators were allowed to substitute heirs (who, of course, unless near relations or patres, could not take) so as to prevent the ærarium taking.

Where there were co-legatees, the caduca of co-legatees were given, in the first place, to co-legatees who were patres; but it was only those joined re et verbis, and those joined verbis, who had to be considered for this purpose. For those joined re were each entitled to the whole thing, and so any one co-legatee capable of taking was entitled to the whole by the form of the gift. If there were no co-legatees who were patres, the legacies went to the heirs who were patres. If there were none, then to legatees generally who had children. If none had children, then to the ærarium. (GAI. ii. 206, 207, 286.) Any legacy given by the lex Papia Poppæa might be refused; if accepted, it passed with all the burdens attaching to it. Caduca cum suo onere fiunt. (ULP. Reg. 17. 2.) By a constitution of Caracalla (ULP. Reg. 17. 2), all caduca were given to the fiscus, the distinction between the ærarium and the fiscus having ceased to exist.

III. Constantine abolished the law of incapacity arising from celibacy and orbitas. (C. viii. 58.) And Justinian did away with all the law of caduca springing out of the lex Papia Poppæa. The distinction between the kinds of legacies being no longer in existence, new provisions on the subject were made. (C. vi. 51.) The right to bring a real action was to attach to every legacy; and co-legatees were placed in the position they would have occupied before the lex Papia Poppæa; but it was enacted that in every case of a gift to a co-legatee failing, an accretion should take place to the other or others joined with him. If they were joined re, the accretion

Corollary
Justinian
I Real action to be brought II Gift failing to legatee accrual to other legatees

was said to be obligatory on those conjoined; but the burdens of the legacy did not pass with it. Really there was no accrual at all; the co-legatees were in the same position as if the gift had only been made to one. If the co-legatees were joined re et verbis, the accrual was voluntary, but the burdens of the legacy passed with it. The co-legatees were looked upon as having really distinct interests, and therefore, if the gift to one failed, the others had something to receive. But, at the same time, they took the share they gained, with all its burdens; it might, for instance, be encumbered with a fideicommissum. Legatees joined only verbis were not, properly speaking, co-legatees at all, and Justinian does not permit any accrual between them. There was thus a clear distinction made between legacies given jointly to legatees re et verbis and those given verbis. In both distinct interests were in effect given to all the legatees; but in the former case these interests were so united, that, through the failure of the legacy of one legatee, his interest accrued to those joined with him.

If the rights of a co-legatee were once fixed, then even if he died before he received his legacy, the accrual on any failure still took place for his benefit, or rather that of his representatives, and was said to be given to his pars or share. (D. vii. 1. 33. 1.)

9. Si cui fundus alienus legatus fuerit et emerit proprietatem detracto usufructu et ususfructus ad eum pervenerit et postea ex testamento agat, recte eum agere et fundum petere Julianus ait, quia ususfructus in petitione servitutis locum optinet; sed officio judicis contineri, ut deducto usufructu jubeat estimationem præstari.

9. If a testator gives as a legacy land belonging to another, and the legatee purchases the bare ownership minus the usufruct, and the usufruct comes to him, and he afterwards brings an action under the testament, Julian says that an action claiming the land is well brought, because, in this claim, the usufruct is regarded as a servitude only. But it is the duty of a judge, in this case, to order the value of the property, deducting the usufruct, to be paid.

D. xxx. 82. 2. 3; D. l. 16. 25.

A fundus, or landed estate, is left by legacy; the legatee buys the naked ownership, but receives by a causa lucrativa (this is expressed by pervenerit) the usufruct. He is, of course, entitled to receive the value of what he has bought, but not of that which has already come to him by a causa lucrativa. Supposing he wishes to recover by action the value of the naked ownership from the heir, he can only demand exactly that which was given him by the testament. He therefore asks for the fundus; but the fundus includes both the naked ownership and the usufruct. Will he not, then, be asking too much, and thus fail in his action from what was termed plus petitio? (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 33.) Julian answers that he will not, because in every demand of a fundus the plaintiff must necessarily ask for it, subject to all its servitudes. Usufruct was a servitude, and therefore, in demanding the fundus from the heir, he does not demand the usufruct, if the fundus is subject to such a servitude.

was said to be obligatory on those conjoined; but the burdens of the legacy did not pass with it. Really there was no accrual at all; the co-legatees were in the same position as if the gift had only been made to one. If the co-legatees were joined re et verbis, the accrual was voluntary, but the burdens of the legacy passed with it. The co-legatees were looked upon as having really distinct interests, and therefore, if the gift to one failed, the others had something to receive. But, at the same time, they took the share they gained, with all its burdens; it might, for instance, be encumbered with a fideicommissum. Legatees joined only verbis were not, properly speaking, co-legatees at all, and Justinian does not permit any accrual between them. There was thus a clear distinction made between legacies given jointly to legatees re et verbis and those given verbis. In both distinct interests were in effect given to all the legatees; but in the former case these interests were so united, that, through the failure of the legacy of one legatee, his interest accrued to those joined with him.

If the rights of a co-legatee were once fixed, then even if he died before he received his legacy, the accrual on any failure still took place for his benefit, or rather that of his representatives, and was said to be given to his pars or share. (D. vii. 1. 33. 1.)

9. Si cui fundus alienus legatus fuerit et emerit proprietatem detracto usufructu et ususfructus ad eum pervenerit et postea ex testamento agat, recte eum agere et fundum petere Julianus ait, quia ususfructus in petitione servitutis locum optinet; sed officio judicis contineri, ut deducto usufructu jubeat estimationem præstari.

9. If a testator gives as a legacy land belonging to another, and the legatee purchases the bare ownership minus the usufruct, and the usufruct comes to him, and he afterwards brings an action under the testament, Julian says that an action claiming the land is well brought, because, in this claim, the usufruct is regarded as a servitude only. But it is the duty of a judge, in this case, to order the value of the property, deducting the usufruct, to be paid.

D. xxx. 82. 2. 3; D. l. 16. 25.

A fundus, or landed estate, is left by legacy; the legatee buys the naked ownership, but receives by a causa lucrativa (this is expressed by pervenerit) the usufruct. He is, of course, entitled to receive the value of what he has bought, but not of that which has already come to him by a causa lucrativa. Supposing he wishes to recover by action the value of the naked ownership from the heir, he can only demand exactly that which was given him by the testament. He therefore asks for the fundus; but the fundus includes both the naked ownership and the usufruct. Will he not, then, be asking too much, and thus fail in his action from what was termed plus petitio? (See Bk. iv. Tit. 6. 33.) Julian answers that he will not, because in every demand of a fundus the plaintiff must necessarily ask for it, subject to all its servitudes. Usufruct was a servitude, and therefore, in demanding the fundus from the heir, he does not demand the usufruct, if the fundus is subject to such a servitude.

10. Sed si rem legatarii quis ei legaverit, inutile legatum est, quia quod proprium est ipsius, amplius ejus fieri non potest: et licet alienaverit eam, non debetur nec ipsa nec aestimatio ejus.

10. If a testator gives as a legacy anything that already belongs to the legatee, the legacy is useless; for what is already the property of a legatee cannot become more so. And, although the legatee has parted with the thing bequeathed, he would not be entitled to receive either the thing itself or its value.

D. xxx. 41. 2.

Et licet alienaverit eam. This is an application of what was called the rule of Cato, regula Catoniana (perhaps Cato Major), viz. Quod, si testamenti facti tempore decessisset testator, inutile foret, id legatum quandocumque decesserit non valere (D. xxxiv. 7. 1. pr.), i.e. a legacy invalid when the testament was made, could never become valid.

11. Si quis rem suam quasi alienam legaverit, valet legatum: nam plus valet, quod in veritate est, quam quod in opinione. Sed et si legatarii putavit, valere constat, quia exitum voluntas defuncti potest habere.

11. If a testator gives a thing belonging to himself, as if it was the property of another, the legacy is valid; for its validity is decided by what is the real state of the case, not by what he thinks. And if the testator imagines that what he gives belongs already to the legatee, yet, if it does not, the legacy is certainly valid, because the wish of the deceased can thus take effect.

D. xl. 2. 4. 1.

Quasi alienam: in the converse case the legacy is bad (par. 4). The words 'plus valet quod,' &c., are not the statement of a general rule of law, but merely of what happens under the particular circumstances referred to. Under other circumstances, exactly the opposite is laid down. Ulpian says, for instance, that a person thinking himself a necessarius heres, but really not being so, could not repudiate the inheritance, nam plus est in opinione quam in veritate. (D. xxix. 2. 15.)

12. Si rem suam legaverit testator posteaque eam alienaverit, Celsus existimat, si non adimendi animo vendidit, nihilo minus deberi, idque divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Iidem rescripserunt, eum, qui post testamentum factum prædia, quæ legata erant, pignori dedit, admisse legatum non videri et ideo legatarium cum herede agere posse, ut prædia a creditore luantur. Si vero quis partem rei legatæ alienaverit, pars, quæ non est alienata, omnimodo debetur, pars autem alienata ita debetur, si non adimendi animo alienata sit.

12. If a testator gives his own property as a legacy, and afterwards alienates it, it is the opinion of Celsus that the legatee is entitled to the legacy, if the testator did not sell with an intention to revoke the legacy. The Emperors Severus and Antoninus have published a rescript to this effect. And they have also decided by rescript, that if any person, after making his testament, pledges immovables which he has given as a legacy, he is not to be taken to have thereby revoked the legacy; and that the legatee may, by bringing an action against the heir, compel him to redeem the property. If, again, a part of the thing given as a legacy is alienated, the legatee is of course still entitled

10. Sed si rem legatarii quis ei legaverit, inutile legatum est, quia quod proprium est ipsius, amplius ejus fieri non potest: et licet alienaverit eam, non debetur nec ipsa nec aestimatio ejus.

10. If a testator gives as a legacy anything that already belongs to the legatee, the legacy is useless; for what is already the property of a legatee cannot become more so. And, although the legatee has parted with the thing bequeathed, he would not be entitled to receive either the thing itself or its value.

D. xxx. 41. 2.

Et licet alienaverit eam. This is an application of what was called the rule of Cato, regula Catoniana (perhaps Cato Major), viz. Quod, si testamenti facti tempore decessisset testator, inutile foret, id legatum quandocumque decesserit non valere (D. xxxiv. 7. 1. pr.), i.e. a legacy invalid when the testament was made, could never become valid.

11. Si quis rem suam quasi alienam legaverit, valet legatum: nam plus valet, quod in veritate est, quam quod in opinione. Sed et si legatarii putavit, valere constat, quia exitum voluntas defuncti potest habere.

11. If a testator gives a thing belonging to himself, as if it was the property of another, the legacy is valid; for its validity is decided by what is the real state of the case, not by what he thinks. And if the testator imagines that what he gives belongs already to the legatee, yet, if it does not, the legacy is certainly valid, because the wish of the deceased can thus take effect.

D. xl. 2. 4. 1.

Quasi alienam: in the converse case the legacy is bad (par. 4). The words 'plus valet quod,' &c., are not the statement of a general rule of law, but merely of what happens under the particular circumstances referred to. Under other circumstances, exactly the opposite is laid down. Ulpian says, for instance, that a person thinking himself a necessarius heres, but really not being so, could not repudiate the inheritance, nam plus est in opinione quam in veritate. (D. xxix. 2. 15.)

12. Si rem suam legaverit testator posteaque eam alienaverit, Celsus existimat, si non adimendi animo vendidit, nihilo minus deberi, idque divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Idem rescripserunt, eum, qui post testamentum factum prædia, quæ legata erant, pignori dedit, ademisse legatum non videri et ideo legatarium cum herede agere posse, ut prædia a creditore luantur. Si vero quis partem rei legatæ alienaverit, pars, quæ non est alienata, omnimodo debetur, pars autem alienata ita debetur, si non adimendi animo alienata sit.

12. If a testator gives his own property as a legacy, and afterwards alienates it, it is the opinion of Celsus that the legatee is entitled to the legacy, if the testator did not sell with an intention to revoke the legacy. The Emperors Severus and Antoninus have published a rescript to this effect. And they have also decided by rescript, that if any person, after making his testament, pledges immovables which he has given as a legacy, he is not to be taken to have thereby revoked the legacy; and that the legatee may, by bringing an action against the heir, compel him to redeem the property. If, again, a part of the thing given as a legacy is alienated, the legatee is of course still entitled to the part which remains unalienated, but is entitled to that which is alienated only if it appears not to have been alienated with the intention of taking away the legacy.

GAI. ii. 198; D. xxxii. 11. 12; C. vi. 37. 3; D. xxx. 8. pr.

Gaius informs us that the opinion confirmed by Severus and Antoninus was not that generally entertained when he wrote. When the legacy was given per vindicationem, it seemed impossible that if the thing was alienated the legatee could take anything; and even if it was per damnationem, though there was nothing in the nature of the legacy to prevent the legatee making a valid claim (licet ipso jure debeatur legatum), it was considered that he might be repelled by an exception, because he would be acting against the wishes of the deceased. (GAI. ii. 198.)

13. Si quis debitori suo liberationem legaverit, legatum utile est et neque ab ipso debitore neque ab herede ejus potest heres petere nec ab alio, qui heredis loco est: sed et potest a debitore conveniri, ut liberet eum. Potest autem quis vel ad tempus jubere, ne heres petat.

13. If a testator gives as a legacy to his debtor a discharge from his debt, the legacy is valid, and the heir cannot recover the debt from the debtor, his heir, or any one in the place of his heir. The debtor may by action compel the heir to free him from his obligation. A man may also forbid his heir to demand payment of a debt during a certain time.

D. xxxiv. 3, pr. and 3; D. xxxiv. 8. 1.

The debt was not extinguished by the legacy of liberatio. But if the heir sued the debtor, then the debtor could repel him by the plea of fraud (exceptio doli mali), and, if the debtor wished, he could, by suing under the testament, compel the heir to release the debt, by consent only, if the obligation had been made in that manner, by acceptilatio, i.e. by the heir acknowledging the receipt of the thing owed (see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 1), if it had not.

A discharge from debt might be made indirectly by giving as a legacy to the debtor the chirographum, or bond by which he was bound; it would be valid quasi pro fideicommisso. (D. xxxiv. 3. 1, 2.)

Vel ad tempus. The effect of such a legacy was that if the heir sued the legatee before the time had expired, he could be repelled by an exception of dolus malus.

14. Ex contrario si debitor creditori suo quod debet, legaverit, inutile est legatum, si nihil plus est in legato quam in debito, quia nihil amplius habet per legatum. Quodsi in diem vel sub condicione debitum ei pure legaverit, utile est legatum propter representationem. Quodsi vivo testatore dies venerit aut condicio extiterit, Papinianus scripsit, utile esse nihilo minus legatum, quia semel constituit. Quod et ve-

* 14. Conversely, a legacy given by a debtor to his creditor of the money which he owes him, is ineffectual if it includes nothing more than the debt did, for the creditor thus receives no benefit from the legacy. But if a debtor gives absolutely as a legacy to his creditor what was due only on the expiration of a term or on the accomplishment of a condition, the legacy is effectual, because it thus becomes due before the debt. Papinian decides, to the part which remains unalienated, but is entitled to that which is alienated only if it appears not to have been alienated with the intention of taking away the legacy.

GAI. ii. 198; D. xxxii. 11. 12; C. vi. § 7. 3; D. xxx. 8. pr.

Gaius informs us that the opinion confirmed by Severus and Antoninus was not that generally entertained when he wrote. When the legacy was given per vindicationem, it seemed impossible that if the thing was alienated the legatee could take anything; and even if it was per damnationem, though there was nothing in the nature of the legacy to prevent the legatee making a valid claim (licet ipso jure debeat legatum), it was considered that he might be repelled by an exception, because he would be acting against the wishes of the deceased. (GAI. ii. 198.)

13. Si quis debitori suo liberationem legaverit, legatum utile est et neque ab ipso debitore neque ab herede ejus potest heres petere nec ab alio, qui heredis loco est: sed et potest a debitore conveniri, ut liberet eum. Potest autem quis vel ad tempus jubere, ne heres petat.

13. If a testator gives as a legacy to his debtor a discharge from his debt, the legacy is valid, and the heir cannot recover the debt from the debtor, his heir, or any one in the place of his heir. The debtor may by action compel the heir to free him from his obligation. A man may also forbid his heir to demand payment of a debt during a certain time.

D. xxxiv. 3, pr. and 3; D. xxxiv. 8. 1.

The debt was not extinguished by the legacy of liberatio. But if the heir sued the debtor, then the debtor could repel him by the plea of fraud (exceptio doli mali), and, if the debtor wished, he could, by suing under the testament, compel the heir to release the debt, by consent only, if the obligation had been made in that manner, by acceptilatio, i.e. by the heir acknowledging the receipt of the thing owed (see Bk. iii. Tit. 29. 1), if it had not.

A discharge from debt might be made indirectly by giving as a legacy to the debtor the chirographum, or bond by which he was bound; it would be valid quasi pro fideicommisso. (D. xxxiv. 3. 1, 2.)

Vel ad tempus. The effect of such a legacy was that if the heir sued the legatee before the time had expired, he could be repelled by an exception of dolus malus.

14. Ex contrario si debitor creditori suo quod debet, legaverit, inutile est legatum, si nihil plus est in legato quam in debito, quia nihil amplius habet per legatum. Quodsi in diem vel sub condicione debitum ei pure legaverit, utile est legatum propter representationem. Quodsi vivo testatore dies venerit aut condicio extiterit, Papinianus scripsit, utile esse nihilo minus legatum, quia semel constituit. Quod et ve-

14. Conversely, a legacy given by a debtor to his creditor of the money which he owes him, is ineffectual if it includes nothing more than the debt did, for the creditor thus receives no benefit from the legacy. But if a debtor gives absolutely as a legacy to his creditor what was due only on the expiration of a term or on the accomplishment of a condition, the legacy is effectual, because it thus becomes due before the debt. Papinian decides, rum est: non enim placuit sententia existimantium, extinctum esse legatum, quia in eam causam pervenit, a qua incipere non potest.

that if the term expires, or the condition is accomplished, in the lifetime of the testator, the legacy is nevertheless effectual, because it was once good; which is true. For we reject the opinion that a legacy once good afterwards becomes extinct, because circumstances have arisen which would have prevented its being originally valid.

D. xxxv. 2. 1. 10; D. xxxv. 2. 5; D. xxxi. 82. pr.

15. Sed si uxori maritus dotem legaverit, valet legatum, quia plenius est legatum quam de dote actio. Sed si quam non acceperit dotem legaverit, divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt, si quidem simpliciter legaverit, inutile esse legatum: si vero certa pecunia vel certum corpus aut instrumentum dotis in prælegando demonstrata sunt, valere legatum.

15. If a man gives as a legacy to his wife her dos, the legacy is valid, for the legacy is more beneficial than the action she might maintain for the recovery of her dos. But if he bequeaths to his wife her dos, which he has never actually received, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript, that if the dos is given without any specification, the legacy is void; but if in the terms of the gift a particular sum or thing, or a certain sum mentioned in the dotal act, is specified as to be received as a legacy before it could be received as dos, the legacy is valid.

D. xxxiii. 4. 1. 2, 7, 8.

In the de dote, or, as it was otherwise called, the rei uxoris actio, certain delays in the restitution of the dowry were permitted; and sums expended for the improvement of the property of the wife might be set off against the claim. The legacy had to be paid without delay, and no set-off was admissible. It was from the dowry being thus restored, when made the subject of a legacy, sooner than when the action was brought, that the expression prælegare dotem was used; the dos was given by legacy (legare) sooner (præ) than it could otherwise be obtained.

By the words 'certa pecunia,' &c., is meant that if the testator said, 'I give to my wife the sum she brought me as dowry,' and she had not brought anything, the legacy would be useless; but if he said, 'I give her the 100 aurei she brought me,' then the words referring to her having brought them would be only a falsa demonstratio, that is, an unnecessary particularity of expression, which would be passed over as if not written. (C. vi. 44. 3.)

Instrumentum dotis. So, if the testator said, 'I give the property mentioned in the act of dowry,' if there were no act of dowry, the gift would be useless; but if he said, 'I give such or such a particular thing mentioned in the act of dowry,' if there was no act of dowry, the wife would receive the thing specified, and the words, 'mentioned in the act of dowry,' would be treated as superfluous.

16. Si res legata sine facto heredis perierit, legatario decedit. Et si servus alienus legatus sine facto

16. If a thing given as a legacy perishes without the act of the heir, the loss falls upon the legatee. And, Thing given as legacy the act of her loss

rum est: non enim placuit sententia existimantium, extinctum esse legatum, quia in eam causam pervenit, a qua incipere non potest.

that if the term expires, or the condition is accomplished, in the lifetime of the testator, the legacy is nevertheless effectual, because it was once good; which is true. For we reject the opinion that a legacy once good afterwards becomes extinct, because circumstances have arisen which would have prevented its being originally valid.

D. xxxv. 2. 1. 10; D. xxxv. 2. 5; D. xxxi. 82. pr.

15. Sed si uxori maritus dotem legaverit, valet legatum, quia plenius est legatum quam de dote actio. Sed si quam non acceperit dotem legaverit, divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt, si quidem simpliciter legaverit, inutile esse legatum: si vero certa pecunia vel certum corpus aut instrumentum dotis in prælegando demonstrata sunt, valere legatum.

15. If a man gives as a legacy to his wife her dos, the legacy is valid, for the legacy is more beneficial than the action she might maintain for the recovery of her dos. But if he bequeaths to his wife her dos, which he has never actually received, the Emperors Severus and Antoninus have decided by a rescript, that if the dos is given without any specification, the legacy is void; but if in the terms of the gift a particular sum or thing, or a certain sum mentioned in the dotal act, is specified as to be received as a legacy before it could be received as dos, the legacy is valid.

D. xxxiii. 4. 1. 2, 7, 8.

In the de dote, or, as it was otherwise called, the rei uxoris actio, certain delays in the restitution of the dowry were permitted; and sums expended for the improvement of the property of the wife might be set off against the claim. The legacy had to be paid without delay, and no set-off was admissible. It was from the dowry being thus restored, when made the subject of a legacy, sooner than when the action was brought, that the expression prælegare dotem was used; the dos was given by legacy (legare) sooner (præ) than it could otherwise be obtained.

By the words 'certa pecunia,' &c., is meant that if the testator said, 'I give to my wife the sum she brought me as dowry,' and she had not brought anything, the legacy would be useless; but if he said, 'I give her the 100 aurei she brought me,' then the words referring to her having brought them would be only a falsa demonstratio, that is, an unnecessary particularity of expression, which would be passed over as if not written. (C. vi. 44. 3.)

Instrumentum dotis. So, if the testator said, 'I give the property mentioned in the act of dowry,' if there were no act of dowry, the gift would be useless; but if he said, 'I give such or such a particular thing mentioned in the act of dowry,' if there was no act of dowry, the wife would receive the thing specified, and the words, 'mentioned in the act of dowry,' would be treated as superfluous.

16. Si res legata sine facto heredis perierit, legatario decedit. Et si servus alienus legatus sine facto

16. If a thing given as a legacy perishes without the act of the heir, the loss falls upon the legatee. And,

Man giving to his wife her dos

Thing given as a legacy

heredis manumissus fuerit, non tenetur heres. Si vero heredis servus legatus fuerit et ipse eum manumiserit, teneri eum, Julianus scripsit, nec interest, scierit an ignoraverit, a se legatum esse. Sed et si alii donaverit servum et is, cui donatus est, eum manumiserit, tenetur heres, quamvis ignoraverit, a se eum legatum esse.

if the slave of another, given as a legacy, should be manumitted without the act of the heir, the heir is not answerable. But if a testator gives as a legacy the slave of his heir, who afterwards manumits that slave, Julian says that the heir is answerable, whether he knew or not that the slave was given away from him as a legacy. And it would be the same if the heir had made a present of the slave to any one who had enfranchised him: the heir, though ignorant of the legacy, would be answerable.

, D. xxx. 35; D. xxx. 112. 1.

The manumission, of course, is good; it is the caestimatio in respect of which the heir is bound.

17. Si quis ancillas cum suis natis legaverit, etiamsi ancillæ mortuæ fuerint, partus legato cedunt. Idem est, si ordinarii servi cum vicariis legati fuerint, ut, licet mortui sint ordinarii, tamen vicarii legato cedant. Sed si servus cum peculio fuerit legatus, mortuo servo vel manumisso vel alienato, et peculii legatum extinguitur. Idem est, si fundus instructus vel cum instrumento legatus fuerit: nam fundo alienato et instrumenti legatum extinguitur.

17. If a testator bequeaths his female slaves and their offspring, although the mothers die, the issue goes to the legatee. And it is the same if ordinary slaves are bequeathed together with vicarial, so that although the ordinary slaves die, yet the vicarial slaves will pass by virtue of the gift. But, where a slave is bequeathed with his peculium, and afterwards dies, or is manumitted, or alienated, the legacy of the peculium becomes extinct. It is the same if the testator gives as a legacy, land 'provided with instruments of use or ornament,' or 'with its instruments of culture.' If the land is alienated, the legacy of the instruments is extinguished.

D. xxxiii. 8. 1, 2, 3, 4; D. xxxiii. 7. 1.

An ordinarius servus was a slave who had a special office in the establishment, as cook, barber, baker, &c. The vicarii were his attendants, and were generally reckoned as part of his peculium. But in the case of this legacy, the law considered them as having an independent existence (propter dignitatem hominis), and not merely as accessories to the ordinarii. So, the children of a female slave are not treated as mere accessories to her. (See Tit. 1. 37.) Had they been so, they could not have passed without the principal to which they were attached.

Fundus instructus is land, with everything on it, whether for use or ornament; fundus cum instrumento, land, with the instruments of its culture only. (D. xxxiii. 7. 12. 27.)

18. Si grex legatus fuerit posteaque ad unam ovem pervenerit, quod superfuerit, vindicari potest.

18. If a flock is given as a legacy, and it is afterwards reduced to a single sheep, the legatee can claim by real action what remains.

D. xxx. 22.

heredis manumissus fuerit, non tenetur heres. Si vero heredis servus legatus fuerit et ipse eum manumiserit, teneri eum, Julianus scripsit, nec interest, scierit an ignoraverit, a se legatum esse. Sed et si alii donaverit servum et is, cui donatus est, eum manumiserit, tenetur heres, quamvis ignoraverit, a se eum legatum esse.

if the slave of another, given as a legacy, should be manumitted without the act of the heir, the heir is not answerable. But if a testator gives as a legacy the slave of his heir, who afterwards manumits that slave, Julian says that the heir is answerable, whether he knew or not that the slave was given away from him as a legacy. And it would be the same if the heir had made a present of the slave to any one who had enfranchised him: the heir, though ignorant of the legacy, would be answerable.

, D. xxx. 35; D. xxx. 112. 1.

The manumission, of course, is good; it is the caestimatio in respect of which the heir is bound.

17. Si quis ancillas cum suis natis legaverit, etiamsi ancillæ mortuæ fuerint, partus legato cedunt. Idem est, si ordinarii servi cum vicariis legati fuerint, ut, licet mortui sint ordinarii, tamen vicarii legato cedant. Sed si servus cum peculio fuerit legatus, mortuo servo vel manumisso vel alienato, et peculii legatum extinguitur. Idem est, si fundus instructus vel cum instrumento legatus fuerit: nam fundo alienato et instrumenti legatum extinguitur.

17. If a testator bequeaths his female slaves and their offspring, although the mothers die, the issue goes to the legatee. And it is the same if ordinary slaves are bequeathed together with vicarial, so that although the ordinary slaves die, yet the vicarial slaves will pass by virtue of the gift. But, where a slave is bequeathed with his peculium, and afterwards dies, or is manumitted, or alienated, the legacy of the peculium becomes extinct. It is the same if the testator gives as a legacy, land 'provided with instruments of use or ornament,' or 'with its instruments of culture.' If the land is alienated, the legacy of the instruments is extinguished.

D. xxxiii. 8. 1, 2, 3, 4; D. xxxiii. 7. 1.

An ordinarius servus was a slave who had a special office in the establishment, as cook, barber, baker, &c. The vicarii were his attendants, and were generally reckoned as part of his peculium. But in the case of this legacy, the law considered them as having an independent existence (propter dignitatem hominis), and not merely as accessories to the ordinarii. So, the children of a female slave are not treated as mere accessories to her. (See Tit. 1. 37.) Had they been so, they could not have passed without the principal to which they were attached.

Fundus instructus is land, with everything on it, whether for use or ornament; fundus cum instrumento, land, with the instruments of its culture only. (D. xxxiii. 7. 12. 27.)

18. Si grex legatus fuerit posteaque ad unam ovem pervenerit, quod superfuerit, vindicari potest.

18. If a flock is given as a legacy, and it is afterwards reduced to a single sheep, the legatee can claim by real action what remains.

D. xxx. 22.

He may claim the remainder, that is the one sheep left, although one sheep does not form a flock.

19. Grege autem legato etiam eas oves, quæ post testamentum factum gregi adiciuntur, legato cedere, Julianus ait: esse enim gregis unum corpus ex distantibus capitibus, sicuti ædium unum corpus est ex cohærentibus lapidibus: ædibus denique legatis, columnas et marmora, quæ post testamentum factum adjecta sunt, legato cedere.

19. If a flock is given as a legacy, any sheep that may be added to the flock after the making of the testament will, according to Julian, pass to the legatee. For a flock is one body, consisting of several different heads, as a house is one body, composed of several stones joined together. So, when a building is given as a legacy, any marble or pillars which may be added after the testament is made will pass by the legacy.

D. xxx. 21.

20. Si peculium legatum fuerit, sine dubio quidquid peculio accedit vel decedit vivo testatore, legatarii lucro vel damno est. Quodsi post mortem testatoris ante aditam hereditatem servus adquisierit, Julianus ait, si quidem ipsi manumisso peculium legatum fuerit, omne, quod ante aditam hereditatem adquisitum est, legatario cedere, quia dies hujus legati ab adita hereditate cedit: sed si extraneo peculium legatum fuerit, non cedere ea legata, nisi ex rebus peculiaribus auctum fuerit. Peculium autem nisi legatum fuerit, manumisso non debetur, quamvis si vivus manumiserit, sufficit, si non adimatur: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Iidem rescripserunt, peculio legato, non videri id relictum, ut petitionem habeat pecuniæ, quam in rationes dominicas impendit. Iidem rescripserunt, peculium videri legatum, cum rationibus redditis liber esse jussus est et ex eo reliquas inferre.

20. If a peculium is given in a legacy, it is certain that if it is increased or diminished in the lifetime of the testator, it is so much gained or lost to the legatee. And if a slave acquires anything between the death of the testator and the time of the heir entering on the inheritance, Julian makes this distinction: if it is to the slave himself, that the peculium, together with his enfranchisement, is given, then all that is acquired before the heir enters on the inheritance goes to the legatee, for the right to such a legacy is not fixed until the inheritance is entered on. But if it is to a stranger that the peculium is given, then anything so acquired will not pass to the legatee, unless the acquisition was made by means of something forming part of the peculium. His peculium does not go to a slave manumitted by testament, unless expressly given to him; although, if a master in his lifetime manumits his slave, it is enough if he does not expressly take the peculium away from him; and to this effect the Emperors Severus and Antoninus issued a rescript. They have also decided by rescript, that when his peculium is given as a legacy to a slave, this does not entitle him to demand what he may have expended for the use of his master. The same emperors have further decided by rescript, that a slave is to be considered to have had his peculium given him by legacy when the testator says he shall be free as soon as he has brought in his accounts, and made up any deficiency out of his peculium.

D. xxxiii. 8. 8. 8; D. xxxiii. 8. 6. 4, 5; D. xxxiii. 8. 8. 7; D. xv. 1. 53.

Dies cedit, 'the day begins,' and dies venit, 'the day is come,' are the two expressions in Roman law which signify the vesting or

He may claim the remainder, that is the one sheep left, although one sheep does not form a flock.

19. Grege autem legato etiam eas oves, quæ post testamentum factum gregi adiciuntur, legato cedere, Julianus ait: esse enim gregis unum corpus ex distantibus capitibus, sicuti ædium unum corpus est ex coherentibus lapidibus: ædibus denique legatis, columnas et marmora, quæ post testamentum factum adjecta sunt, legato cedere.

19. If a flock is given as a legacy, any sheep that may be added to the flock after the making of the testament will, according to Julian, pass to the legatee. For a flock is one body, consisting of several different heads, as a house is one body, composed of several stones joined together. So, when a building is given as a legacy, any marble or pillars which may be added after the testament is made will pass by the legacy.

D. xxx. 21.

20. Si peculium legatum fuerit, sine dubio quidquid peculio accedit vel decedit vivo testatore, legatarii lucro vel damno est. Quodsi post mortem testatoris ante aditam hereditatem servus adquisierit, Julianus ait, si quidem ipsi manumisso peculium legatum fuerit, omne, quod ante aditam hereditatem acquisitum est, legatario cedere, quia dies hujus legati ab adita hereditate cedit: sed si extraneo peculium legatum fuerit, non cedere ea legata, nisi ex rebus peculiaribus auctum fuerit. Peculium autem nisi legatum fuerit, manumisso non debetur, quamvis si vivus manumiserit, sufficit, si non adimatur: et ita divi Severus et Antoninus rescripserunt. Iidem rescripserunt, peculio legato, non videri id relictum, ut petitionem habeat pecuniæ, quam in rationes dominicas impendit. Iidem rescripserunt, peculium videri legatum, cum rationibus redditus liber esse jussus est et ex eo reliquas inferre.

20. If a peculium is given in a legacy, it is certain that if it is increased or diminished in the lifetime of the testator, it is so much gained or lost to the legatee. And if a slave acquires anything between the death of the testator and the time of the heir entering on the inheritance, Julian makes this distinction: if it is to the slave himself that the peculium, together with his enfranchisement, is given, then all that is acquired before the heir enters on the inheritance goes to the legatee, for the right to such a legacy is not fixed until the inheritance is entered on. But if it is to a stranger that the peculium is given, then anything so acquired will not pass to the legatee, unless the acquisition was made by means of something forming part of the peculium. His peculium does not go to a slave manumitted by testament, unless expressly given to him; although, if a master in his lifetime manumits his slave, it is enough if he does not expressly take the peculium away from him; and to this effect the Emperors Severus and Antoninus issued a rescript. They have also decided by rescript, that when his peculium is given as a legacy to a slave, this does not entitle him to demand what he may have expended for the use of his master. The same emperors have further decided by rescript, that a slave is to be considered to have had his peculium given him by legacy when the testator says he shall be free as soon as he has brought in his accounts, and made up any deficiency out of his peculium.

D. xxxiii. 8. 8. 8; D. xxxiii. 8. 6. 4, 5; D. xxxiii. 8. 8. 7; D. xv. 1. 58.

Dies cedit, 'the day begins,' and dies venit, 'the day is come,' are the two expressions in Roman law which signify the vesting or fixing of an interest, and the interest becoming a present one. Cedere diem (says Ulpian, D. l. 16. 213) significat incipere deberi pecuniam; venire diem significat eum diem venisse, quo pecunia peti potest. Cedit dies may therefore be translated, 'the time when the right to the thing is fixed'; venit dies, 'the time when the thing may be demanded.' For instance, if A buys a horse of B, without any terms being attached to the purchase, the right of B in the purchase-money is fixed at once, and also he may at once demand it, et cessit et venit dies. If A agrees that the purchase-money shall be paid by instalments, then dies cessit, B has a fixed interest in the money; but the dies can only be said venisse as each instalment falls due, and with regard only to the portion becoming due. If, again, A only buys it on condition that C will lend him the money, then, until C has done so, neque cessit neque venit dies, B has no fixed interest in, or right to, the purchase-money until the condition is accomplished. With regard to legacies, the dies cedens, the time at which the eventual rights of the legatee were fixed, was the day of the testator's death, excepting when the vesting or fixing of these rights was suspended by a condition in the testament itself. The dies veniens, the time when the thing given could be demanded, was not till the heir entered on the inheritance, and there was thus some one of whom to make the demand; if the legacy was given after a term, or on a condition, the demand, of course, could not be made (dies non venit) until the term had expired, or the condition was fulfilled.

An alteration was made by the lex Papia Poppæa in fixing the dies cedens at the day when the testament was opened, not at that when the testator died (see note to paragr. 8); but this had been done away with, and the old law was in force under Justinian (C. vi. 51. 1. 1.)

The legatee had the thing given exactly as it was at the time of the dies cedens. He took it, with all the gains and losses that had accrued to it since the date of the testator's death, and directly his rights were fixed, they were transmissible to his heirs.

But if a testator gave his liberty to one of his slaves as a legacy, there was in this case an exception to the rule that the dies cedens dates from the death of the testator. If the gift of liberty was given to a slave as a legacy, he could not begin to acquire for his own benefit until an heir had entered on the inheritance, as it was requisite there should be some one to free him. The peculium, therefore, if given to him, would be such as it was when the heir entered on the inheritance; while, if the peculium was given to a stranger, it would be such as it was at the death of the testator, excepting when the peculium was augmented by things derived from itself (ex rebus peculiaribus), as, for instance, if sheep or cattle, forming part of the peculium, had young.

There was another case, that of personal servitudes, in which the dies cedens dated from the entrance on the inheritance, not from the death of the testator. These servitudes were exclusively attached fixing of an interest, and the interest becoming a present one. Cedere diem (says Ulpian, D. l. 16. 213) significat incipere deberi pecuniam; venire diem significat eum diem venisse, quo pecunia peti potest. Cedit dies may therefore be translated, 'the time when the right to the thing is fixed'; venit dies, 'the time when the thing may be demanded.' For instance, if A buys a horse of B, without any terms being attached to the purchase, the right of B in the purchase-money is fixed at once, and also he may at once demand it, et cessit et venit dies. If A agrees that the purchase-money shall be paid by instalments, then dies cessit, B has a fixed interest in the money; but the dies can only be said venisse as each instalment falls due, and with regard only to the portion becoming due. If, again, A only buys it on condition that C will lend him the money, then, until C has done so, neque cessit neque venit dies, B has no fixed interest in, or right to, the purchase-money until the condition is accomplished. With regard to legacies, the dies cedens, the time at which the eventual rights of the legatee were fixed, was the day of the testator's death, excepting when the vesting or fixing of these rights was suspended by a condition in the testament itself. The dies veniens, the time when the thing given could be demanded, was not till the heir entered on the inheritance, and there was thus some one of whom to make the demand; if the legacy was given after a term, or on a condition, the demand, of course, could not be made (dies non venit) until the term had expired, or the condition was fulfilled.

An alteration was made by the lex Papia Poppæa in fixing the dies cedens at the day when the testament was opened, not at that when the testator died (see note to paragr. 8); but this had been done away with, and the old law was in force under Justinian (C. vi. 51. 1. 1.)

The legatee had the thing given exactly as it was at the time of the dies cedens. He took it, with all the gains and losses that had accrued to it since the date of the testator's death, and directly his rights were fixed, they were transmissible to his heirs.

But if a testator gave his liberty to one of his slaves as a legacy, there was in this case an exception to the rule that the dies cedens dates from the death of the testator. If the gift of liberty was given to a slave as a legacy, he could not begin to acquire for his own benefit until an heir had entered on the inheritance, as it was requisite there should be some one to free him. The peculium, therefore, if given to him, would be such as it was when the heir entered on the inheritance; while, if the peculium was given to a stranger, it would be such as it was at the death of the testator, excepting when the peculium was augmented by things derived from itself (ex rebus peculiaribus), as, for instance, if sheep or cattle, forming part of the peculium, had young.

There was another case, that of personal servitudes, in which the dies cedens dated from the entrance on the inheritance, not from the death of the testator. These servitudes were exclusively attached to the person of the legatee, and as they were not transmissible to his heirs, there could be no interest in them until the actual enjoyment of them was commenced.

When the master enfranchised his slave himself, he was present to demand the peculium, and if he did not, it was considered evident that he intended the slave to keep it. Not so in a legacy of liberty, in giving which the master might so easily forget the peculium that some expressions were required to show that he remembered it, and wished to give it to the slave.

The terms of the second rescript referred to in the text are given by Ulpian (D. xxxiii. 8. 6. 4).

21. Tam autem corporales res quam incorporales legari possunt. Et ideo quod defuncto debetur, potest alicui legari, ut actiones suas heres legatario præstet, nisi exegerit vivus testator pecuniam: nam hoc casu legatum extinguitur. Sed et tale legatum valet: 'damnas esto heres domum illius reficere' vel 'illum ære alieno liberare.'

21. Things corporeal and incorporeal may be equally well given as a legacy. Thus, the testator may give a debt due to him, and the heir is then obliged to use his actions for the benefit of the legatee, unless the testator in his lifetime exacted payment, for in this case the legacy would become extinct. Such a legacy as this is also good: 'Let my heir be bound to rebuild the house of such a one,' or 'to free him from his debts.'

D. xxx. 41. pr.; D. xxx. 39. 8, 4.

The legacy of a debt due to the testator was usually called legatum nominis. (See D. xxx. 44. 6.) Of course the legatee could sue for it only in the name of the heir.

22. Si generaliter servus vel alia res legetur, electio legatarii est, nisi aliud testator dixerit.

22. If a testator gives a slave or anything else as a legacy, without specifying a particular slave or thing, the choice belongs to the legatee, unless the testator has expressed the contrary.

D. xxx. 108. 2.

The jurists took care to lay down, with respect to what was called a legatum generis, that the class of objects must not be one too wide. Legatum nisi certæ rei sit et ad certam personam deferatur, nullius est momenti. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 6. 13.) For instance, the gift of 'an animal' would have seemed rather intended to mock than to benefit the legatee; so the gift of a house if the testator had no houses, magis derisorium quam utile legatum. (D. xxx. 71.)

Before Justinian, it depended on the formula with which the legacy was given whether the choice of the particular thing to be given to the legatee belonged to the heir or the legatee. In a legacy per vindicationem it belonged to the latter; there was a real action in which the legatee must specify the particular thing that he claims. In a legacy per damnationem it belonged to the heir; there was only a personal action against the heir as debtor, and the debtor might discharge the obligation in the way most beneficial to himself. (ULP. Reg. 24. 14.)

to the person of the legatee, and as they were not transmissible to his heirs, there could be no interest in them until the actual enjoyment of them was commenced.

When the master enfranchised his slave himself, he was present to demand the peculium, and if he did not, it was considered evident that he intended the slave to keep it. Not so in a legacy of liberty, in giving which the master might so easily forget the peculium that some expressions were required to show that he remembered it, and wished to give it to the slave.

The terms of the second rescript referred to in the text are given by Ulpian (D. xxxiii. 8. 6. 4).

21. Tam autem corporales res quam incorporales legari possunt. Et ideo quod defuncto debetur, potest alicui legari, ut actiones suas heres legatario præstet, nisi exegerit vivus testator pecuniam: nam hoc casu legatum extinguitur. Sed et tale legatum valet: 'damnas esto heres domum illius reficere' vel 'illum ære alieno liberare.'

21. Things corporeal and incorporeal may be equally well given as a legacy. Thus, the testator may give a debt due to him, and the heir is then obliged to use his actions for the benefit of the legatee, unless the testator in his lifetime exacted payment, for in this case the legacy would become extinct. Such a legacy as this is also good: 'Let my heir be bound to rebuild the house of such a one,' or 'to free him from his debts.'

D. xxx. 41. pr.; D. xxx. 39. 8, 4.

The legacy of a debt due to the testator was usually called legatum nominis. (See D. xxx. 44. 6.) Of course the legatee could sue for it only in the name of the heir.

22. Si generaliter servus vel alia res legetur, electio legatarii est, nisi aliud testator dixerit.

22. If a testator gives a slave or anything else as a legacy, without specifying a particular slave or thing, the choice belongs to the legatee, unless the testator has expressed the contrary.

D. xxx. 108. 2.

The jurists took care to lay down, with respect to what was called a legatum generis, that the class of objects must not be one too wide. Legatum nisi certæ rei sit et ad certam personam deferatur, nullius est momenti. (PAUL. Sent. iii. 6. 13.) For instance, the gift of 'an animal' would have seemed rather intended to mock than to benefit the legatee; so the gift of a house if the testator had no houses, magis derisorium quam utile legatum. (D. xxx. 71.)

Before Justinian, it depended on the formula with which the legacy was given whether the choice of the particular thing to be given to the legatee belonged to the heir or the legatee. In a legacy per vindicationem it belonged to the latter; there was a real action in which the legatee must specify the particular thing that he claims. In a legacy per damnationem it belonged to the heir; there was only a personal action against the heir as debtor, and the debtor might discharge the obligation in the way most beneficial to himself. (ULP. Reg. 24. 14.)

The main difference between a legatum generis and a legatum optionis was that in the latter the legatee could choose the best of the kind in the possession of the testator; in the former the legatee could not choose the best, nor the heir the worst. (D. xxx. 37.)

23. Optionis legatum, id est ubi testator ex servis suis vel aliis rebus optare legatarium jusserat, habebat in se condicionem, et ideo nisi ipse legatarius vivus optaverat, ad heredem legatum non trans mittebat. Sed ex constitutione nostra et hoc in meliorem statum reformatum est et data est licentia et heredi legatarii optare, licet vivus legatarius hoc non fecit. Et diligentiore tractatu habito, et hoc in nostra constitutione additum est, sive plures legatarii existant, quibus optio relicta est, et dissentiant in corpore eligendo, sive unius legatarii plures heredes, et inter se circa optandum dissentiant, alio aliud corpus eligere cupiente, ne pereat legatum (quod plerique prudentium contra benevolentiam introducebant), fortunam esse hujus optionis judicem et sorte esse hoc dirimendum, ut, ad quem sors perveniat, illius sententia in optione præcellat.

23. The legacy of election, that is when a testator directs his legatee to choose any one from among his slaves, or any other class of things, was formerly held to imply a condition, so that if the legatee in his lifetime did not make the election he did not transmit the legacy to his heir. But, by our constitution, we have altered this for the better, and the heir of the legatee is now permitted to elect, although the legatee in his lifetime has not done so. And, pursuing the subject still further, we have added, that if there are several legatees to whom an option is left, and they differ in their choice, or if there are many heirs of one legatee, and they cannot agree what to choose, one choosing one thing and another another thing, then to prevent the legacy becoming ineffectual, which the generality of ancient lawyers, contrary to all equity, decided would be the case, fortune must be the arbitress of the choice, and the dispute must be decided by lot, so that his choice, to whom the lot falls, shall prevail.

D. xl. 9. 3; D. xxxvi. 2. 12. 8; C. vi. 43. 3. pr. and 1.

When once the dies cedens had fixed the rights of the legatee, he could transmit to his heirs all the rights he had himself. To this the Roman lawyers considered the legatum optionis an exception, as intended to be personal to the legatee himself. Justinian decides that the exception shall not exist. (C. vi. 43. 3. 1.) We must distinguish the legatum generis, where an object, though an uncertain one, was given, from the legatum optionis, where only the right to select an object was given. The former was never treated as an exception to the general rule of the dies cedens. (D. xxxiii. 5. 19.)

A testator might also leave as a legacy a part, as e.g. the half, of the inheritance (Tit. 23. 5. note); but still the heir took the whole inheritance as heir, and then had to divide it with the legatarius partarius, although the legatee was really not getting a particular thing, but a share of a universal succession. (GAI. ii. 254.)

24. Legari autem illis solis potest, cum quibus testamenti factio est.

24. A legacy can be given to those only, with whom there is testamenti factio.

D. xli. 8. 7.

The main difference between a legatum generis and a legatum optionis was that in the latter the legatee could choose the best of the kind in the possession of the testator; in the former the legatee could not choose the best, nor the heir the worst. (D. xxx. 37.)

23. Optionis legatum, id est ubi testator ex servis suis vel aliis rebus optare legatarius jusserat, habebat in se condicionem, et ideo nisi ipse legatarius vivus optaverat, ad heredem legatum non trans mittebat. Sed ex constitutione nostra et hoc in meliorem statum reformatum est et data est licentia et heredi legatarii optare, licet vivus legatarius hoc non fecit. Et diligentiore tractatu habito, et hoc in nostra constitutione additum est, sive plures legatarii existant, quibus optio relicta est, et dissentiant in corpore eligendo, sive unius legatarii plures heredes, et inter se circa optandum dissentiant, alio aliud corpus eligere cupiente, ne pereat legatum (quod plerique prudentium contra benevolentiam introducebant), fortunam esse hujus optionis judicem et sorte esse hoc dirimendum, ut, ad quem sors perveniat, illius sententia in optione præcellat.

23. The legacy of election, that is when a testator directs his legatee to choose any one from among his slaves, or any other class of things, was formerly held to imply a condition, so that if the legatee in his lifetime did not make the election he did not transmit the legacy to his heir. But, by our constitution, we have altered this for the better, and the heir of the legatee is now permitted to elect, although the legatee in his lifetime has not done so. And, pursuing the subject still further, we have added, that if there are several legatees to whom an option is left, and they differ in their choice, or if there are many heirs of one legatee, and they cannot agree what to choose, one choosing one thing and another another thing, then to prevent the legacy becoming ineffectual, which the generality of ancient lawyers, contrary to all equity, decided would be the case, fortune must be the arbitress of the choice, and the dispute must be decided by lot, so that his choice, to whom the lot falls, shall prevail.

D. xl. 9. 3; D. xxxvi. 2. 12. 8; C. vi. 43. 3. pr. and 1.

When once the dies cedens had fixed the rights of the legatee, he could transmit to his heirs all the rights he had himself. To this the Roman lawyers considered the legatum optionis an exception, as intended to be personal to the legatee himself. Justinian decides that the exception shall not exist. (C. vi. 43. 3. 1.) We must distinguish the legatum generis, where an object, though an uncertain one, was given, from the legatum optionis, where only the right to select an object was given. The former was never treated as an exception to the general rule of the dies cedens. (D. xxxiii. 5. 19.)

A testator might also leave as a legacy a part, as e.g. the half, of the inheritance (Tit. 23. 5. note); but still the heir took the whole inheritance as heir, and then had to divide it with the legatarius partitarius, although the legatee was really not getting a particular thing, but a share of a universal succession. (Gai. ii. 254.)

24. Legari autem illis solis potest, cum quibus testamenti factio est.

24. A legacy can be given to those only, with whom there is testamenti factio.

D. xli. 8. 7.

See note on Tit. 10. 6.

25. Incertis vero personis neque legata neque fideicommissa olim relinqui concessum erat: nam nec miles quidem incertæ personæ poterat relinquere, ut divus Hadrianus rescripsit. Incerta autem persona videbatur, quam incerta opinione animo suo testator subiciebat, veluti si quis ita dicat: 'quicumque filio meo in matrimonium filiam suam collocaverit, ei heres meus illum fundum dato:' illud quoque, quod his relinquebatur, qui post testamentum scriptum primi consules designati erunt, æque incertæ personæ legari videbatur: et denique multæ aliæ hujusmodi species sunt. Libertas quoque non videbatur posse incertæ personæ dari, quia placebat nominatim servos liberari. Tutor quoque certus dari debebat. Sub certa vero demonstratione, id est ex certis personis incertæ personæ recte legabatur, veluti 'ex cognatis meis, qui nunc sunt, si quis filiam meam uxorem duxerit, ei heres meus illam rem dato.' Incertis autem personis legata vel fideicommissa relicta et per errorem soluta repeti non posse, sacris constitutionibus cautum erat.

25. Formerly it was not permitted that either legacies or fideicommissa should be given to uncertain persons, and even a soldier could not leave anything to an uncertain person, as the Emperor Hadrian decided by rescript. By an uncertain person was meant one who was not present to the mind of the testator in any definite manner, as if he should say: 'Whoever shall give his daughter in marriage to my son, to him let my heir give such a piece of land.' So, if he had left anything to the persons first appointed consuls after his testament was written, this also would have been a gift to uncertain persons; and there are many other similar examples. Freedom likewise could not be conferred upon an uncertain person, for it was necessary that all slaves should be enfranchised by name. A person too named as tutor was required to be certain. But a legacy given with a certain description, that is, to an uncertain person among a number of persons certain, was valid, as: 'Among my existing cognati, if any one shall marry my daughter, let my heir give him such a thing.' But, if a legacy or fideicommissum to uncertain persons had been paid by mistake, it was provided by the constitutions, that such persons could not be called on to refund.

GAI. ii. 238, 239.

Neque fideicommissa. It was by a senatusconsultum, in the time of Hadrian, that the law was thus settled with respect to fideicommissa. (GAI. ii. 287.) Previously, a gift by way of fideicommissum to an uncertain person had been valid.

The lex Furia Caninia (GAI. ii. 239) required that slaves to whom freedom was given by testament should be expressly named, jubet nominatim servos liberari.

26. Postumo quoque alieno inutiliter legabatur: est autem alienus postumus, qui natus inter suos heredes testatoris futurus non est: ideoque ex emancipato filio conceptus nepos extraneus erat postumus avo.

26. Formerly, too, a legacy to a posthumous stranger was ineffectual. A posthumous stranger is any one who, on being born, would not be numbered among the sui heredes of the testator; and so a posthumous grandson, the issue of an emancipated son, was a posthumous stranger with regard to his grandfather.

GAI. ii. 241.

Legacy to posthumous

Stranger effectual if issue of emancipated
son

See note on Tit. 10. 6.

25. Incertis vero personis neque legata neque fideicommissa olim relinqui concessum erat: nam nec miles quidem incertæ personæ poterat relinquere, ut divus Hadrianus rescriptis. Incerta autem persona videbatur, quam incerta opinione animo suo testator subiciebat, veluti si quis ita dicat: 'quicumque filio meo in matrimonium filiam suam collocaverit, ei heres meus illum fundum dato:' illud quoque, quod his relinquebatur, qui post testamentum scriptum primi consules designati erunt, æque incertæ personæ legari videbatur: et denique multæ aliæ hujusmodi species sunt. Libertas quoque non videbatur posse incertæ personæ dari, quia placebat nominatim servos liberari. Tutor quoque certus dari debebat. Sub certa vero demonstratione, id est ex certis personis incertæ personæ recte legabatur, veluti 'ex cognatis meis, qui nunc sunt, si quis filiam meam uxorem duxerit, ei heres meus illam rem dato.' Incertis autem personis legata vel fideicommissa relicta et per errorem soluta repeti non posse, sacris constitutionibus cautum erat.

25. Formerly it was not permitted that either legacies or fideicommissa should be given to uncertain persons, and even a soldier could not leave anything to an uncertain person, as the Emperor Hadrian decided by rescript. By an uncertain person was meant one who was not present to the mind of the testator in any definite manner, as if he should say: 'Whoever shall give his daughter in marriage to my son, to him let my heir give such a piece of land.' So, if he had left anything to the persons first appointed consuls after his testament was written, this also would have been a gift to uncertain persons; and there are many other similar examples. Freedom likewise could not be conferred upon an uncertain person, for it was necessary that all slaves should be enfranchised by name. A person too named as tutor was required to be certain. But a legacy given with a certain description, that is, to an uncertain person among a number of persons certain, was valid, as: 'Among my existing cognati, if any one shall marry my daughter, let my heir give him such a thing.' But, if a legacy or fideicommissum to uncertain persons had been paid by mistake, it was provided by the constitutions, that such persons could not be called on to refund.

GAI. II. 238, 239.

Neque fideicommissa. It was by a senatusconsultum, in the time of Hadrian, that the law was thus settled with respect to fideicommissa. (GAI. II. 287.) Previously, a gift by way of fideicommissum to an uncertain person had been valid.

The lex Furia Caninia (GAI. II. 239) required that slaves to whom freedom was given by testament should be expressly named, jubet nominatim servos liberari.

26. Postumo quoque alieno inutiliter legabatur: est autem alienus postumus, qui natus inter suos heredes testatoris futurus non est: ideoque ex emancipato filio conceptus nepos extraneus erat postumus avo.

26. Formerly, too, a legacy to a posthumous stranger was ineffectual. A posthumous stranger is any one who, on being born, would not be numbered among the sui heredes of the testator; and so a posthumous grandson, the issue of an emancipated son, was a posthumous stranger with regard to his grandfather.

GAI. II. 241.

Legacy to posthumous

Stranger
effectual if issue of emancipated
son

We have already seen (see Tit. 13. 1) how the rigour of this principle came to be modified with respect to a posthumous sui heres. It was as an incerta persona that the posthumous child was originally excluded from taking either as heir or legatee. (GAI. ii. 242.)

27. Sed nec hujusmodi species penitus est sine justa emendatione derelicta, cum in nostro codice constitutio posita est, per quam et huic parti medevimus non solum in hereditatibus, sed etiam in legatis et fideicommissis: quod evidenter ex ipsius constitutionis lectione clarescit. Tutor autem nec per nostram constitutionem incertus dari debet, quia certo iudicio debet quis pro tutela suae posteritati cavere.

27. These points have not, however, been left without proper alteration, for a constitution has been placed in our code by which the law has been altered, not only as regards inheritances, but also as regards legacies and fideicommissa. This alteration will appear from the constitution itself. But not even by our constitution is the nomination of an uncertain tutor permitted, for it is incumbent upon every father to take care that his posterity have a tutor by a determinate appointment.

C. vi. 48.

There was, probably, a constitution treating of this subject inserted in the first Code (see Introd. sec. 29), which was not given in the Code we now have.

28. Postumus autem alienus heres institui et antea poterat et nunc potest, nisi in utero ejus sit, quæ jure nostra uxor esse non potest.

28. Yet a posthumous stranger could formerly, and may now, be appointed heir, unless it appears that he has been conceived by a woman who by law could not have been married to his father.

GAI. ii. 242, 287; D. xxviii. 2. 9. 1, 4.

Posthumous children, who, on birth, would not be among the testator's sui heredes (this is the meaning of alienus), could not be instituted heirs under the civil law; but the prætor gave them, if instituted, the possessio bonorum. Justinian permitted their institution. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.)

Nisi in utero ejus sit, that is, unless the posthumous child is the child of the testator, and of a woman whom the testator cannot marry.

29. Si quis in nomine, cognomine, prænomine legatarii erraverit testator, si de persona constat, nihilo minus valet legatum. Idem in heredibus servatur: et recte; nomina enim significandorum hominum gratia reperta sunt, qui si quolibet alio modo intellegantur, nihil interest.

29. Although a testator may have mistaken the nomen, cognomen, or prænomen of a legatee, yet, if it is certain who is the person meant, the legacy is valid. The same holds good as to heirs, and with reason; for the use of names is but to point out persons; and, if they can be distinguished by any other method, it is the same thing.

30. Huic proxima est illa juris regula, falsa demonstratione legatum non peremi, veluti si quis ita

30. Closely akin to this is the rule of law, that a legacy is not rendered void by a false description. For in-

We have already seen (see Tit. 13. 1) how the rigour of this principle came to be modified with respect to a posthumous sui heres. It was as an incerta persona that the posthumous child was originally excluded from taking either as heir or legatee. (GAI. ii. 242.)

27. Sed nec hujusmodi species penitus est sine justa emendatione derelicta, cum in nostro codice constitutio posita est, per quam et huic parti medevimus non solum in hereditatibus, sed etiam in legatis et fideicommissis: quod evidenter expressius constitutionis lectione clarescit. Tutor autem nec per nostram constitutionem incertus dari debet, quia certo iudicio debet quis pro tutela suæ posteritati cavere.

27. These points have not, however, been left without proper alteration, for a constitution has been placed in our code by which the law has been altered, not only as regards inheritances, but also as regards legacies and fideicommissa. This alteration will appear from the constitution itself. But not even by our constitution is the nomination of an uncertain tutor permitted, for it is incumbent upon every father to take care that his posterity have a tutor by a determinate appointment.

C. vi. 48.

There was, probably, a constitution treating of this subject inserted in the first Code (see Introd. sec. 29), which was not given in the Code we now have.

28. Postumus autem alienus heres institui et antea poterat et nunc potest, nisi in utero ejus sit, quæ jure nostra uxor esse non potest.

28. Yet a posthumous stranger could formerly, and may now, be appointed heir, unless it appears that he has been conceived by a woman who by law could not have been married to his father.

GAI. ii. 242, 287; D. xxviii. 2. 9. 1, 4.

Posthumous children, who, on birth, would not be among the testator's sui heredes (this is the meaning of alienus), could not be instituted heirs under the civil law; but the prætor gave them, if instituted, the possessio bonorum. Justinian permitted their institution. (See Bk. iii. Tit. 9. pr.)

Nisi in utero ejus sit, that is, unless the posthumous child is the child of the testator, and of a woman whom the testator cannot marry.

29. Si quis in nomine, cognomine, prænomine legatarii erraverit testator, si de persona constat, nihilo minus valet legatum. Idem in heredibus servatur: et recte; nomina enim significandorum hominum gratia reperta sunt, qui si quolibet alio modo intellegantur, nihil interest.

29. Although a testator may have mistaken the nomen, cognomen, or prænomen of a legatee, yet, if it is certain who is the person meant, the legacy is valid. The same holds good as to heirs, and with reason; for the use of names is but to point out persons; and, if they can be distinguished by any other method, it is the same thing.

30. Huic proxima est illa juris regula, falsa demonstratione legatum non peremi, veluti si quis ita

30. Closely akin to this is the rule of law, that a legacy is not rendered void by a false description. For inlegaverit 'Stichum servum meum vernam do lego : ' licet enim non verna, sed emptus sit, si de servo ta-men constat, utile est legatum. Et convenienter si ita demonstraverit

'Stichum servum, quem a Seio emi,' sitque ab alio emptus, utile legatum
est, si de servo constat.

stance, if the testator was to say, 'I give as a legacy Stichus born my slave;'
in this case, although Stichus was not born in the family, but bought, yet, if it is certain who is meant, the legacy is valid. And in the same way if a testator marks out the particular slave in this way : 'I give Stichus my slave, whom I bought of Seius;' yet, although he was bought of another, the legacy is good, if no doubt exists as to the slave intended to be given.

D. xxxv. 1. 17. pr. and 1.

31. Longe magis legato falsa causa non nocet. Veluti cum ita quis dixerit : 'Titio, quia absente me negotia mea curavit, Stichum do lego,' vel ita : 'Titio, quia patrocinio ejus capitali crimine liberatus sum, Stichum do lego : ' licet enim neque negotia testatoris umquam gessit Titius neque patrocinio ejus liberatus est, legatum tamen valet. Sed si condicionaliter enuntiata fuerit causa, aliud juris est, veluti hoc modo : 'Titio, si negotia mea curavit, fundum do lego.'

31. Much less is a legacy rendered invalid by a false reason being assigned for giving it; as, if a testator says, 'I give my slave Stichus to Titius, because he took care of my affairs in my absence;' or, 'because I was acquitted upon a capital accusation by his undertaking my defence.' For although Titius has never taken care of the affairs of the deceased, and although the testator was never acquitted by means of Titius defending him, the legacy will be valid. But it is quite different if the reason has been assigned under the form of a condition, as, 'I give to Titius such a piece of ground, if he has taken care of my affairs.'

D. xxxv. 1. 17. 2, 3.

Ulpian shortly sums up the law of this and the previous paragraph by the rule 'Neque ex falsa demonstratione, neque ex falsa causa legatum infirmatur.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 19.)

Of course if for making the legacy the legacy was so given as to constitute a condition, the legacy was only valid if the condition had been accomplished.

32. An servo heredis recte legamus, quæritur. Et constat, pure inutiliter legari nec quidquam proficere, si vivo testatore de potestate heredis exierit, quia quod inutile foret legatum, si statim post factum testamentum decessisset testator, hoc non debet ideo valere, quia diutius testator vixerit. Sub condizione vero recte legatur, ut re-quiramus, an, quo tempore dies legati cedit, in potestate heredis non sit.

32. The question has been raised whether a testator can give a legacy to the slave of his heir; and it is evident that such a legacy, if given absolutely, is quite ineffectual, nor is it at all helped by the slave having been freed from the power of the heir in the lifetime of the testator; for a legacy which would have been void if the testator had expired immediately after he had made the testament, ought not to become valid merely because he happened to live longer. But a testator may give the legacy to the slave under a condition, and then we have to inquire whether, at the time when the right to the legacy vests, the slave has ceased to be in the power of the heir.

GAI. ii. 244; D. xxxiv. 7. 1.

legaverit 'Stichum servum meum vernam do lego : ' licet enim non verna, sed emptus sit, si de servo ta-men constat, utile est legatum. Et convenienter si ita demonstraverit
'Stichum servum, quem a Seio emi,' sitque ab alio emptus, utile legatum
est, si de servo constat.

stance, if the testator was to say, 'I give as a legacy Stichus born my slave;' in this case, although Stichus was not born in the family, but bought, yet, if it is certain who is meant, the legacy is valid. And in the same way if a testator marks out the particular slave in this way : 'I give Stichus my slave, whom I bought of Seius ;' yet, although he was bought of another, the legacy is good, if no doubt exists as to the slave intended to be given.

D. xxxv. 1. 17. pr. and 1.

31. Longe magis legato falsa causa non nocet. Veluti cum ita quis dixerit : 'Titio, quia absente me negotia mea curavit, Stichum do lego,' vel ita : 'Titio, quia patrocini-eius capitali crimine liberatus sum, Stichum do lego : ' licet enim neque negotia testatoris unquam gessit Titius neque patrocini-eius liberatus est, legatum tamen valet. Sed si condicionaliter enuntiata fuerit causa, aliud juris est, veluti hoc modo : 'Titio, si negotia mea curavit, fundum do lego.'

31. Much less is a legacy rendered invalid by a false reason being assigned for giving it ; as, if a testator says, 'I give my slave Stichus to Titius, because he took care of my affairs in my absence ;' or, 'because I was acquitted upon a capital accusation by his undertaking my defence.' For although Titius has never taken care of the affairs of the deceased, and although the testator was never acquitted by means of Titius defending him, the legacy will be valid. But it is quite different if the reason has been assigned under the form of a condition, as, 'I give to Titius such a piece of ground, if he has taken care of my affairs.'

D. xxxv. 1. 17. 2, 3.

Ulpian shortly sums up the law of this and the previous paragraph by the rule 'Neque ex falsa demonstratione, neque ex falsa causa legatum infirmatur.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 19.)

Of course if the reason for making the legacy was so given as to constitute a condition, the legacy was only valid if the condition had been accomplished.

32. An servo heredis recte legamus, quæritur. Et constat, pure inutiliter legari nec quidquam proficere, si vivo testatore de potestate heredis exierit, quia quod inutile foret legatum, si statim post factum testamentum decessisset testator, hoc non debet ideo valere, quia diutius testator vixerit. Sub conditione vero recte legatur, ut requiramus, an, quo tempore dies legati cedit, in potestate heredis non sit.

32. The question has been raised whether a testator can give a legacy to the slave of his heir ; and it is evident that such a legacy, if given absolutely, is quite ineffectual, nor is it at all helped by the slave having been freed from the power of the heir in the lifetime of the testator ; for a legacy which would have been void if the testator had expired immediately after he had made the testament, ought not to become valid merely because he happened to live longer. But a testator may give the legacy to the slave under a condition, and then we have to inquire whether, at the time when the right to the legacy vests, the slave has ceased to be in the power of the heir.

GAI. ii. 244 ; D. xxxiv. 7. 1.

This paragraph is based on the regula Catoniana (see note on paragraph 10), though no express allusion to it is made. As to the doubts entertained on the subject, see GAI. ii. 244.

33. Ex diverso herede instituto servo, quin domino recte etiam sine condicione legetur, non dubitatur. Nam et si statim post factum testamentum decesserit testator, non tamen apud eum, qui heres sit, dies legati cedere intellegitur, cum hereditas a legato separata sit et possit per eum servum alius heres effici, si prius, quam jussu domini adeat, in alterius potestatem translatus sit, vel manumissus ipse heres efficitur; quibus casibus utile est legatum: quodsi in eadem causa permanerit et jussu legatarii adierit, evanescit legatum.

33. On the other hand, it is not doubted, but that if a slave is appointed heir, a legacy may be given to his master even unconditionally; for, although the testator should die immediately after making the testament, still the right to the legacy is not taken to vest in him who is heir; for the inheritance is separated from the legacy, and another may become heir by means of the slave, if he should be transferred to the power of a new master, before he has entered upon the inheritance at the command of the master, who is the legatee; or the slave himself, if enfranchised, may become heir; and, in these cases, the legacy would be good. But, if the slave should remain in the same state, and enter upon the inheritance by order of the legatee, the legacy is at an end.

GAI. ii. 245.

The eventual right to the legacy vests in the legatee from the date of the testator's death, but the right to claim the legacy does not accrue to the legatee until the heir has entered on the inheritance. It is the legatee, not the heir, in whom the eventual right vests. Now, if the slave, in the case discussed in the text, entered on the inheritance by the command of his master, the legatee, the master, through the slave, would be heir and also legatee, and so the legacy would merge, or fade away (evanescit), in the inheritance. But until the inheritance is entered on, the legatee keeps his position of having a vested right in the legacy, and it may happen that the slave will not then hold such a character as will cause this merger of the legacy in the inheritance. He may have been emancipated, and will then take as heir for himself, or he may have been transferred to another master, and will take for his new owner.

34. Ante heredis institutionem inutiliter antea legabatur, scilicet quia testamenta vim ex institutione heredum accipiunt et ob id veluti caput atque fundamentum intellegitur totius testamenti heredis institutio. Pari ratione nec libertas ante heredis institutionem dari poterat. Sed quia incivile esse putavimus, ordinem quidem scripturæ sequi (quod et ipsi antiquitati vituperandum fuerat visum), sperni autem testatoris voluntatem; per no-

34. Formerly, a legacy placed before the institution of the heir was ineffectual, because a testament receives its efficacy from the institution of the heir; and it is thus that the institution of the heir is looked on as the head and the foundation of the whole testament. So, too, freedom could not be given before the institution of the heir. But we have thought it unreasonable that the mere order of writing should be attended to—a thing of which the ancients themselves seem to have

This paragraph is based on the regula Catoniana (see note on paragraph 10), though no express allusion to it is made. As to the doubts entertained on the subject, see GAI. ii. 244.

33. Ex diverso herede instituto servo, quin domino recte etiam sine condicione legetur, non dubitatur. Nam et si statim post factum testamentum decesserit testator, non tamen apud eum, qui heres sit, dies legati cedere intellegitur, cum hereditas a legato separata sit et possit per eum servum alius heres effici, si prius, quam jussu domini adeat, in alterius potestatem translatus sit, vel manumissus ipse heres efficitur; quibus casibus utile est legatum: quodsi in eadem causa permanerit et jussu legatarii adierit, evanescit legatum.

33. On the other hand, it is not doubted, but that if a slave is appointed heir, a legacy may be given to his master even unconditionally; for, although the testator should die immediately after making the testament, still the right to the legacy is not taken to vest in him who is heir; for the inheritance is separated from the legacy, and another may become heir by means of the slave, if he should be transferred to the power of a new master, before he has entered upon the inheritance at the command of the master, who is the legatee; or the slave himself, if enfranchised, may become heir; and, in these cases, the legacy would be good. But, if the slave should remain in the same state, and enter upon the inheritance by order of the legatee, the legacy is at an end.

GAI. ii. 245.

The eventual right to the legacy vests in the legatee from the date of the testator's death, but the right to claim the legacy does not accrue to the legatee until the heir has entered on the inheritance. It is the legatee, not the heir, in whom the eventual right vests. Now, if the slave, in the case discussed in the text, entered on the inheritance by the command of his master, the legatee, the master, through the slave, would be heir and also legatee, and so the legacy would merge, or fade away (evanescit), in the inheritance. But until the inheritance is entered on, the legatee keeps his position of having a vested right in the legacy, and it may happen that the slave will not then hold such a character as will cause this merger of the legacy in the inheritance. He may have been emancipated, and will then take as heir for himself, or he may have been transferred to another master, and will take for his new owner.

34. Ante heredis institutionem inutiliter antea legabatur, scilicet quia testamenta vim ex institutione heredum accipiunt et ob id veluti caput atque fundamentum intellegitur totius testamenti heredis institutio. Pari ratione nec libertas ante heredis institutionem dari poterat. Sed quia incivile esse putavimus, ordinem quidem scripturæ sequi (quod et ipsi antiquitati vituperandum fuerat visum), sperni autem testatoris voluntatem; per no-

34. Formerly, a legacy placed before the institution of the heir was ineffectual, because a testament receives its efficacy from the institution of the heir; and it is thus that the institution of the heir is looked on as the head and the foundation of the whole testament. So, too, freedom could not be given before the institution of the heir. But we have thought it unreasonable that the mere order of writing should be attended to—a thing of which the ancients themselves seem to have greatly disapproved—and that the intentions of the testator should be thus set at naught. We have, therefore, by our constitution, amended the law on this point; so that a legacy, and much more a grant of liberty, which is always favoured, may now be given before the institution of an heir, or among the institutions of heirs where more than one.

stram constitutionem et hoc vitium emendavimus, ut liceat et ante heredis institutionem et inter medias heredum institutiones legatum relinquere et multo magis libertatem, cujus usus favorabilior est.

GAI. ii. 229, 230; C. vi. 23. 24.

The nomination of a tutor, as not constituting any burden on the inheritance, had already been considered by the Proculians to be an exception to the rule, that nothing in a testament could be valid that preceded the institution of the heir. (GAI. ii. 231.)

35. Post mortem quoque heredis aut legatarii simili modo inutiliter legabatur: veluti si quis ita dicat: 'Cum heres meus mortuus erit, do lego:' item 'pridie quam heres aut legatarius morietur.' Sed simili modo et hoc correximus, firmitatem hujusmodi legatis ad fideicommissorum similitudinem præstantes, ne vel in hoc casu deterior causa legatorum quam fideicommissorum inveniatur.

35. So, too, a legacy made to take effect after the death of an heir or legatee, was ineffectual; as, if a testator said, 'When my heir is dead, I give as a legacy,' or thus, 'I give as a legacy on the day preceding the day of the death of my heir, or of my legatee.' But we have corrected the ancient rule in this respect, by giving all such legacies the same validity as fideicommissa; so that, even in this case, the position of legacies may not be found inferior to that of fideicommissa.

GAI. ii. 232; C. iv. 11.

Gaius remarks, that the second of these forms, Pridie quam, though objected to because the time when the right was fixed could not be known until the heir was dead, was not objected to on any very good ground. For all that the principles of law forbade, that the interest should not be fixed until after the death of the heir, for then it would have been the heir's heir, and not the heir, that was charged; and that it should not be fixed until after the death of the legatee, for if he had no vested interest in his life, he could have nothing to transmit. But a legacy made so as to give a fixed right the day before either of their deaths, was not open to the same objections.

36. Poenæ quoque nomine inutiliter legabatur et adimebatur vel transferebatur. Poenæ autem nomine legari videtur, quod coercendi heredis causa relinquitur, quo magis is aliquid faciat aut non faciat: veluti si quis ita scripserit: 'Heres meus si filiam suam in matrimonium Titio collocaverit' (vel ex diverso 'si non collocaverit'), 'dato decem aureos Seio,' aut si ita scripserit: 'Heres meus si servum Stichum alienaverit' (vel ex diverso 'si non

36. Also formerly, if a testator had given, revoked, or transferred a legacy by way of penalty, he would have done so ineffectually. A legacy is considered as given by way of a penalty, when it is intended to constrain an heir to do or not to do something; as, if a testator has said, 'If my heir gives his daughter in marriage to Titius,' or 'if he does not give her in marriage to Titius, let him pay ten aurei to Seius;' or thus, 'If my heir shall alienate my slave Stichus,' or 'if my heir shall not greatly disapproved—and that the intentions of the testator should be thus set at naught. We have, therefore, by our constitution, amended the law on this point; so that a legacy, and much more a grant of liberty, which is always favoured, may now be given before the institution of an heir, or among the institutions of heirs where more than one.

stram constitutionem et hoc vitium emendavimus, ut liceat et ante heredis institutionem et inter medias heredum institutiones legatum relinquere et multo magis libertatem, cuius usus favorabilior est.

GAI. ii. 229, 230; C. vi. 23. 24.

The nomination of a tutor, as not constituting any burden on the inheritance, had already been considered by the Proculians to be an exception to the rule, that nothing in a testament could be valid that preceded the institution of the heir. (GAI. ii. 231.)

35. Post mortem quoque heredis aut legatarii simili modo inutiliter legabatur: veluti si quis ita dicat: 'Cum heres meus mortuus erit, do lego:' item 'pridie quam heres aut legatarius morietur.' Sed simili modo et hoc correximus, firmitatem hujusmodi legatis ad fideicommissorum similitudinem præstantes, ne vel in hoc casu deterior causa legatorum quam fideicommissorum inveniatur.

35. So, too, a legacy made to take effect after the death of an heir or legatee, was ineffectual; as, if a testator said, 'When my heir is dead, I give as a legacy,' or thus, 'I give as a legacy on the day preceding the day of the death of my heir, or of my legatee.' But we have corrected the ancient rule in this respect, by giving all such legacies the same validity as fideicommissa; so that, even in this case, the position of legacies may not be found inferior to that of fideicommissa.

GAI. ii. 232; C. iv. 11.

Gaius remarks, that the second of these forms, Pridie quam, though objected to because the time when the right was fixed could not be known until the heir was dead, was not objected to on any very good ground. For all that the principles of law forbade was, that the interest should not be fixed until after the death of the heir, for then it would have been the heir's heir, and not the heir, that was charged; and that it should not be fixed until after the death of the legatee, for if he had no vested interest in his life, he could have nothing to transmit. But a legacy made so as to give a fixed right the day before either of their deaths, was not open to the same objections.

36. Poenæ quoque nomine inutiliter legabatur et adimebatur vel transferebatur. Poenæ autem nomine legari videtur, quod coercendi heredis causa relinquitur, quo magis is aliquid faciat aut non faciat: veluti si quis ita scripserit: 'Heres meus si filiam suam in matrimonium Titio collocaverit' (vel ex diverso 'si non collocaverit'), 'dato decem aureos Seio,' aut si ita scripserit: 'Heres meus si servum Stichum alienaverit' (vel ex diverso 'si non alienaverit'), 'Titio decem aureos dato.' Et in tantum hæc regula observabatur, ut perquam pluribus principalibus constitutionibus significetur, nec principem quidem agnoscere, quod ei pœnæ nomine legatum sit. Nec ex militis quidem testamento talia legata valebant, quamvis alias militum voluntates in ordinandis testamentis valde observantur. Quin etiam nec libertatem pœnæ nomine dari posse placebat. Eo amplius nec heredem pœnæ nomine adici posse Sabinus existimabat, veluti si quis ita dicat: 'Titius heres esto: si Titius filiam suam Seio in matrimonium collocaverit, Seius quoque heres esto:' nihil enim intererat, qua ratione Titius coerceatur, utrum legati datione an coheredis adjectione. At hujusmodi scrupulositas nobis non placuit et generaliter ea, quæ relinquuntur, licet pœnæ nomine fuerint relicta vel adempta vel in alios translata, nihil distare a ceteris legatis constituimus vel in dando vel in adimendo vel in transferendo: exceptis his videlicet, quæ impossibilia sunt vel legibus interdicta aut alias probrosa: hujusmodi enim testatorum dispositiones valere, secta temporum meorum non patitur.

36. Also formerly, if a testator had given, revoked, or transferred a legacy by way of penalty, he would have done so ineffectually. A legacy is considered as given by way of a penalty, when it is intended to constrain an heir to do or not to do something; as, if a testator has said, 'If my heir gives his daughter in marriage to Titius,' or 'if he does not give her in marriage to Titius, let him pay ten aurei to Seius;' or thus, 'If my heir shall alienate my slave Stichus,' or 'if my heir shall not

GAI. II. 235, 236, 243; C. VI. 41.

alienate my slave Stichus, let him pay ten aurei to Titius.' And this rule was so rigorously observed, that it was expressly ordained by many constitutions, that even the emperor would not accept a legacy which was given by way of a penalty. Nor could such a legacy be valid, even when given by the testament of a soldier; although, in other respects, the intention of a testator in a military testament was scrupulously adhered to. And even freedom could not be given by way of a penalty. Still less, in the opinion of Sabinus, could another heir be added; as if, for instance, a testator said, 'Let Titius be my heir, but if he gives his daughter in marriage to Seius, let Seius also be my heir.' For it made no difference how Titius was put under constraint, whether by the gift of a legacy, or the addition of a co-heir. But this kind of tendency to create difficulties has not pleased us, and we have therefore ordained generally that things left, revoked, or transferred by way of penalty, shall be treated as other legacies, with the exception of anything that may be impossible, prohibited by law, or contrary to morality. For the principles of our age will not permit testamentary dispositions of such a character.

It is rather difficult to say how this rule sprang up in Roman law, or how the gift of a legacy pœnæ nomine differed from an ordinary condition. Theophilus, in his Paraphrase, gives as one reason that a legacy ought to spring from a feeling of kindness to the legatee, and not be used as a means to punish another. For want of a better reason, we may be content with this.

The sections of this Title may be arranged under five heads. The first treats of the definition and general notions of a legacy (paragr. 1, 2, 3, 8); the second treats of the objects given as legacies (paragr. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 21, 22, and 23); the third treats of the persons to whom legacies can be given (paragr. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 32, and 33); the fourth of rules as to the position, terms, and construction of legacies (paragr. 29, 30, 31, 34, 35, and 36); and the fifth, of the loss, diminution, or increase of things given as legacies (paragr. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20). X O X

TIT. XXI. DE ADEPTIONE LEGATORUM.

Ademptio legatorum, sive eodem testamento adimantur sive codicillis,

The revocation of a legacy, whether made in the same testament or in a alienaverit'), 'Titio decem aureos dato.' Et in tantum hæc regula observabatur, ut perquam pluribus principalibus constitutionibus significetur, nec principem quidem agnoscere, quod ei pænæ nomine legatum sit. Nec ex militis quidem testamento talia legata valebant, quamvis alias militum voluntates in ordinandis testamentis valde observantur. Quin etiam nec libertatem pænæ nomine dari posse placebat. Eo amplius nec heredem pænæ nomine adici posse Sabinus existimabat, veluti si quis ita dicat: 'Titius heres esto: si Titius filiam suam Seio in matrimonium collocaverit, Seius quoque heres esto:' nihil enim intererat, qua ratione Titius coerceatur, utrum legati datione an coheredis adjectione. At hujusmodi scrupulositas nobis non placuit et generaliter ea, quæ relinquuntur, licet pænæ nomine fuerint relicta vel adempta vel in alios translata, nihil distare a ceteris legatis constituimus vel in dando vel in adimendo vel in transferendo: exceptis his videlicet, quæ impossibilia sunt vel legibus interdicta aut alias probrosa: hujusmodi enim testatorum dispositiones valere, secta temporum meorum non patitur.

alienate my slave Stichus, let him pay ten aurei to Titius.' And this rule was so rigorously observed, that it was expressly ordained by many constitutions, that even the emperor would not accept a legacy which was given by way of a penalty. Nor could such a legacy be valid, even when given by the testament of a soldier; although, in other respects, the intention of a testator in a military testament was scrupulously adhered to. And even freedom could not be given by way of a penalty. Still less, in the opinion of Sabinus, could another heir be added; as if, for instance, a testator said, 'Let Titius be my heir, but if he gives his daughter in marriage to Seius, let Seius also be my heir.' For it made no difference how Titius was put under constraint, whether by the gift of a legacy, or the addition of a co-heir. But this kind of tendency to create difficulties has not pleased us, and we have therefore ordained generally that things left, revoked, or transferred by way of penalty, shall be treated as other legacies, with the exception of anything that may be impossible, prohibited by law, or contrary to morality. For the principles of our age will not permit testamentary dispositions of such a character.

GAI. II. 235, 236, 243; C. VI. 41.

It is rather difficult to say how this rule sprang up in Roman law, or how the gift of a legacy pænæ nomine differed from an ordinary condition. Theophilus, in his Paraphrase, gives as one reason that a legacy ought to spring from a feeling of kindness to the legatee, and not be used as a means to punish another. For want of a better reason, we may be content with this.

The sections of this Title may be arranged under five heads. The first treats of the definition and general notions of a legacy (paragr. 1, 2, 3, 8); the second treats of the objects given as legacies (paragr. 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 21, 22, and 23); the third treats of the persons to whom legacies can be given (paragr. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 32, and 33); the fourth of rules as to the position, terms, and construction of legacies (paragr. 29, 30, 31, 34, 35, and 36); and the fifth, of the loss, diminution, or increase of things given as legacies (paragr. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20). X O X

TIT. XXI. DE ADEPTIONE LEGATORUM.

Adeptio legatorum, sive eodem testamento adimantur sive codicillis,

The revocation of a legacy, whether made in the same testament or in a firma est, sive contrariis verbis fiat ademptio, veluti si, quod ita quis legaverit 'do lego,' ita adimatur 'non do non lego,' sive non contrariis, id est aliis quibuscumque verbis.

codicil, is valid, and may be made in terms contrary to those of the gift, as when a testator gives in these terms, 'I give as a legacy,' and revokes it by saying, 'I do not give as a legacy;' or in terms not contrary, that is, in any other form of expression.

D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11.

It was considered necessary, in the times when weight was attached to the formula under which the legacy was given, that the legacy should be revoked by words exactly opposite (contrariis verbis) to those by which it was given, as in a legacy per vindicationem the revocation ought to have been by the words 'non do non lego.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 29.)

The text only speaks of direct revocation of legacies by an express declaration of the testator's wishes in some testamentary document; but it was also revoked by the mere wish of the testator (nuda voluntate, D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11) that it should be revoked being in any way declared. In such a case the legacy was not, strictly speaking, taken away; but the legatee who brought an action for it might be repelled by an exception of dolus malus. We have seen, in the last Title (paragr. 12), that a sale of the thing given as a legacy was held to be or not to be a revocation of the legacy, according as the testator intended or did not intend that such should be its effect.

A legacy was also considered to be revoked by implication if something occurred after it was given which made it impossible to believe that the testator could have continued to wish the legatee to profit by his bounty; as, for instance, if a notorious and deadly enmity sprang up between them. (D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11.)

1. Transferri quoque legatum ab alio ad alium potest, veluti si quis ita dixerit: 'hominem Stichum, quem Titio legavi, Seio do lego,' sive in eodem testamento sive in codicillis hoc fecerit: quo casu simul Titio adimi videtur et Seio dari.

1. A legacy may also be transferred from one person to another; as, 'I give as a legacy to Seius my slave Stichus, whom I have given as a legacy to Titius,' whether this be done in the same testament or in codicils; and in this case it seems that at the same time a legacy is taken from Titius and given to Seius.

D. xxxiv. 4. 5.

The translation had two effects: it took away a legacy from one person and gave it to another; but it might have either effect without the other. The original legatee might be dead, and thus the legacy useless, and yet the gift to the new legatee would be valid; or the new legatee might subsequently die, or he might not have testamenti factio with the testator, and yet the legacy would be lost to the original legatee. (D. xxxiv. 4. 20.)

firma est, sive contrariis verbis fiat ademptio, veluti si, quod ita quis legaverit 'do lego,' ita adimatur 'non do non lego,' sive non contrariis, id est aliis quibuscumque verbis.

codicil, is valid, and may be made in terms contrary to those of the gift, as when a testator gives in these terms, 'I give as a legacy,' and revokes it by saying, 'I do not give as a legacy;' or in terms not contrary, that is, in any other form of expression.

D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11.

It was considered necessary, in the times when weight was attached to the formula under which the legacy was given, that the legacy should be revoked by words exactly opposite (contrariis verbis) to those by which it was given, as in a legacy per vindicationem the revocation ought to have been by the words 'non do non lego.' (ULP. Reg. 24. 29.)

The text only speaks of direct revocation of legacies by an express declaration of the testator's wishes in some testamentary document; but it was also revoked by the mere wish of the testator (nuda voluntate, D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11) that it should be revoked being in any way declared. In such a case the legacy was not, strictly speaking, taken away; but the legatee who brought an action for it might be repelled by an exception of dolus malus. We have seen, in the last Title (paragr. 12), that a sale of the thing given as a legacy was held to be or not to be a revocation of the legacy, according as the testator intended or did not intend that such should be its effect.

A legacy was also considered to be revoked by implication if something occurred after it was given which made it impossible to believe that the testator could have continued to wish the legatee to profit by his bounty; as, for instance, if a notorious and deadly enmity sprang up between them. (D. xxxiv. 4. 3. 11.)

1. Transferri quoque legatum ab alio ad alium potest, veluti si quis ita dixerit: 'hominem Stichum, quem Titio legavi, Seio do lego,' sive in eodem testamento sive in codicillis hoc fecerit: quo casu simul Titio adimi videtur et Seio dari.

1. A legacy may also be transferred from one person to another; as, 'I give as a legacy to Seius my slave Stichus, whom I have given as a legacy to Titius,' whether this be done in the same testament or in codicils; and in this case it seems that at the same time a legacy is taken from Titius and given to Seius.

D. xxxiv. 4. 5.

The translation had two effects: it took away a legacy from one person and gave it to another; but it might have either effect without the other. The original legatee might be dead, and thus the legacy useless, and yet the gift to the new legatee would be valid; or the new legatee might subsequently die, or he might not have testamenti factio with the testator, and yet the legacy would be lost to the original legatee. (D. xxxiv. 4. 20.)

TIT. XXII. DE LEGE FALCIDIA.

Superest, ut de lege Falcidia dispiciamus, qua modus novissime legatis impositus est. Cum enim olim lege duodecim tabularum libera erat legandi potestas, ut liceret vel totum patrimonium legatis erogare (quippe ea lege ita cautum esset: 'uti legassit suet rei ita jus esto'): visum est hanc legandi licentiam coartare, idque ipsorum testatorum gratia provisum est ob id, quod plerumque intestati moriebantur, recusantibus scriptis heredibus pro nullo aut minimo lucro hereditates adire. Et cum super hoc tam lex Furia quam lex Voconia latae sunt, quarum neutra sufficiens ad rei consummationem videbatur: novissime lata est lex Falcidia, qua cavetur, ne plus legare liceat, quam dodrantem totorum bonorum, id est ut, sive unus heres institutus esset sive plures, apud eum eosque pars quarta remaneret.

It remains to speak of the lex Falcidia, by which legacies have received their latest limitations. By the law of the Twelve Tables, a testator was permitted to dispose of his whole patrimony in legacies; for the law said, 'As a man has disposed of his property, so let the law be;' but it was thought proper to restrain this license even for the benefit of testators themselves, because they frequently died intestate, the heirs they instituted refusing to enter upon an inheritance from which they could receive little or no profit. With this object the lex Furia and the lex Voconia were passed; and lastly, as neither of these was found adequate to the purpose, the lex Falcidia was enacted, which forbids a testator to give more in legacies than three-fourths of all his property; so that, whether there be one or more heirs instituted, there must remain to him, or them, at least one-fourth part of the whole.

GAI. II. 224-227.

The lex Furia testamentaria, which must not be confounded with the lex Furia or Fusia Caninia, restraining the testamentary manumission of slaves (Bk. i. Tit. 7), was a plebiscitum, probably of the year 571 A.U.C. Gaius thus acquaints us with its provisions:—'Qua, exceptis personis quibusdam (see ULP. Reg. xxviii. 7), ceteris plus mille assibus legatorum nomine mortisve causa capere permissum non est:' more than 1,000 asses could not be given as a legacy. The law failed to effect its object, as the testator was not restrained in the number of legacies he might give, but only in the amount of each legacy. (GAI. II. 225.)

The lex Voconia, also called testamentaria, was a plebiscitum, of which the year 585 A.U.C. is given as the date. Gaius says of it, 'Qua cautum est, ne cui plus legatorum nomine mortisve causa capere liceret, quam heredes caperent:' no legatee was to have more than each heir had. This law also failed in its object; as, by multiplying the number of legatees and giving each a trifling amount, the sum received by the heirs, which would be equally small, might be too trifling to make it worth their while to enter on the inheritance. (GAI. II. 226.)

The lex Falcidia (see note on Tit. 18. 3) was a plebiscitum passed in the year 714 A.U.C. Its principles were extended to fideicommissa by the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (see next Title, paragr. 5), to fideicommissa imposed on heredes ab intestato by a rescript of Antoninus Pius (D. xxxv. 2. 18); to donations mortis

TIT. XXII. DE LEGE FALCIDIA.

Superest, ut de lege Falcidia discipiamus, qua modus novissime legatis impositus est. Cum enim olim lege duodecim tabularum libera erat legandi potestas, ut liceret vel totum patrimonium legatis erogare (quippe ea lege ita cautum esset: 'uti legassit suet rei ita jus esto'): visum est hanc legandi licentiam coartare, idque ipsorum testatorum gratia provisum est ob id, quod plerumque intestati moriebantur, recusantibus scriptis heredibus pro nullo aut minimo lucro hereditates adire. Et cum super hoc tam lex Furia quam lex Voconia latae sunt, quarum neutra sufficiens ad rei consummationem videbatur: novissime lata est lex Falcidia, qua cavetur, ne plus legare liceat, quam dodrantem totorum bonorum, id est ut, sive unus heres institutus esset sive plures, apud eum eosve pars quarta remaneret.

It remains to speak of the lex Falcidia, by which legacies have received their latest limitations. By the law of the Twelve Tables, a testator was permitted to dispose of his whole patrimony in legacies; for the law said, 'As a man has disposed of his property, so let the law be;' but it was thought proper to restrain this license even for the benefit of testators themselves, because they frequently died intestate, the heirs they instituted refusing to enter upon an inheritance from which they could receive little or no profit. With this object the lex Furia and the lex Voconia were passed; and lastly, as neither of these was found adequate to the purpose, the lex Falcidia was enacted, which forbids a testator to give more in legacies than three-fourths of all his property; so that, whether there be one or more heirs instituted, there must remain to him, or them, at least one-fourth part of the whole.

GAI. II. 224-227.

The lex Furia testamentaria, which must not be confounded with the lex Furia or Fusia Caninia, restraining the testamentary manumission of slaves (Bk. i. Tit. 7), was a plebiscitum, probably of the year 571 A.U.C. Gaius thus acquaints us with its provisions:—'Qua, exceptis personis quibusdam (see ULP. Reg. xxviii. 7), ceteris plus mille assibus legatorum nomine mortisve causa capere permissum non est:' more than 1,000 asses could not be given as a legacy. The law failed to effect its object, as the testator was not restrained in the number of legacies he might give, but only in the amount of each legacy. (GAI. II. 225.)

The lex Voconia, also called testamentaria, was a plebiscitum, of which the year 585 A.U.C. is given as the date. Gaius says of it, 'Qua cautum est, ne cui plus legatorum nomine mortisve causa capere liceret, quam heredes caperent:' no legatee was to have more than each heir had. This law also failed in its object; as, by multiplying the number of legatees and giving each a trifling amount, the sum received by the heirs, which would be equally small, might be too trifling to make it worth their while to enter on the inheritance. (GAI. II. 226.)

The lex Falcidia (see note on Tit. 18. 3) was a plebiscitum passed in the year 714 A.U.C. Its principles were extended to fideicommissa by the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (see next Title, paragr. 5), to fideicommissa imposed on heredes ab intestato by a rescript of Antoninus Pius (D. xxxv. 2. 18); to donations mortis

causa by a rescript of Severus and Antoninus (C. vi. 50. 5); and lastly, to donations between husband and wife (C. vi. 50. 12). The mode in which the heir would avail himself of the lex Falcidia would be by repelling, by an exception, the legatee who demanded the whole of his legacy, when less than the whole was due by the lex Falcidia.

The part reserved to the heir is spoken of by the jurists as quarta or Falcidia. The commentators more usually employ the full term quarta Falcidia.

1. Et cum quaesitum esset, duobus heredibus institutis, veluti Titio et Seio, si Titii pars aut tota exhausta sit legatis, quæ nominatim ab eo data sunt, aut supra modum onerata, a Seio vero aut nulla relicta sint legata, aut quæ partem ejus dumtaxat in partem dimidiam minuunt, an, quia is quartam partem totius hereditatis aut amplius habet, Titio nihil ex legatis, quæ ab eo relicta sunt, retinere liceret: placuit, ut quartam partem suæ partis salvam habeat, posse retinere: etenim in singulis heredibus ratio legis Falcidiæ ponenda est.

1. When two heirs are instituted, as Titius and Seius, a question has been raised: supposing the share of Titius in the inheritance is either entirely absorbed, or very heavily burdened with legacies specifically charged upon it, while the share of Seius is wholly free, or has legacies charged on it only up to half its amount, in such a case does the circumstance of Seius having a clear fourth or more of the inheritance prevent Titius from retaining, out of the legacies charged upon his share, enough to secure a fourth part of his own moiety to himself? It has been decided that Titius may retain the fourth of his own share, for the calculation of the lex Falcidia is applicable to each heir separately.

D. xxxv. 2. 77.

The testator is here supposed to give a distinct share of his inheritance to two different persons, and to burden one share with legacies while leaving the other free. The heir whose share is burdened is entitled to have a clear fourth of his share, although the legatees would be getting less in the whole than three-fourths of the inheritance. The reason was probably this:—Under the old civil law, if one heir refused to enter, his share accrued to the co-heir who did enter free of all burdens (sine onere). Unless, therefore, the heir whose share was burdened had been induced by the right of retaining the Falcidian fourth to enter, he would have refused to enter, and his share would have accrued sine onere to the co-heir, and the legatees would have got nothing. Under the leges caducariæ the accrual took place cum onere; but even then, although, if the free share accrued to the owner of the burdened share, the two were taken as one for the benefit of the legatees, and the heir who took both could take nothing more than a fourth of the two conjoined, if the legacies were sufficient to exhaust the remainder, yet, if the burdened share accrued to the owner of the free share, he kept his free share unimpaired, and was allowed to keep a clear fourth of the burdened share. (D. xxxv. 2. 78.)

2. Quantitas autem patrimonii, ad quam ratio legis Falcidiæ red-

2. In order to apply the lex Falcidia, regard is had to the value of causa by a rescript of Severus and Antoninus (C. vi. 50. 5); and lastly, to donations between husband and wife (C. vi. 50. 12). The mode in which the heir would avail himself of the lex Falcidia would be by repelling, by an exception, the legatee who demanded the whole of his legacy, when less than the whole was due by the lex Falcidia.

The part reserved to the heir is spoken of by the jurists as quarta or Falcidia. The commentators more usually employ the full term quarta Falcidia.

1. Et cum quæsitum esset, duobus heredibus institutis, veluti Titio et Seio, si Titii pars aut tota exhausta sit legatis, quæ nominatim ab eo data sunt, aut supra modum onerata, a Seio vero aut nulla relicta sint legata, aut quæ partem ejus dumtaxat in partem dimidiam minuunt, an, quia is quartam partem totius hereditatis aut amplius habet, Titio nihil ex legatis, quæ ab eo relicta sunt, retinere liceret: placuit, ut quartam partem suæ partis salvam habeat, posse retinere: etenim in singulis heredibus ratio legis Falcidiæ ponenda est.

1. When two heirs are instituted, as Titius and Seius, a question has been raised: supposing the share of Titius in the inheritance is either entirely absorbed, or very heavily burdened with legacies specifically charged upon it, while the share of Seius is wholly free, or has legacies charged on it only up to half its amount, in such a case does the circumstance of Seius having a clear fourth or more of the inheritance prevent Titius from retaining, out of the legacies charged upon his share, enough to secure a fourth part of his own moiety to himself? It has been decided that Titius may retain the fourth of his own share, for the calculation of the lex Falcidia is applicable to each heir separately.

D. xxxv. 2. 77.

The testator is here supposed to give a distinct share of his inheritance to two different persons, and to burden one share with legacies while leaving the other free. The heir whose share is burdened is entitled to have a clear fourth of his share, although the legatees would be getting less in the whole than three-fourths of the inheritance. The reason was probably this:—Under the old civil law, if one heir refused to enter, his share accrued to the co-heir who did enter free of all burdens (sine onere). Unless, therefore, the heir whose share was burdened had been induced by the right of retaining the Falcidian fourth to enter, he would have refused to enter, and his share would have accrued sine onere to the co-heir, and the legatees would have got nothing. Under the leges caducariæ the accrual took place cum onere; but even then, although, if the free share accrued to the owner of the burdened share, the two were taken as one for the benefit of the legatees, and the heir who took both could take nothing more than a fourth of the two conjoined, if the legacies were sufficient to exhaust the remainder, yet, if the burdened share accrued to the owner of the free share, he kept his free share unimpaired, and was allowed to keep a clear fourth of the burdened share. (D. xxxv. 2. 78.)

2. Quantitas autem patrimonii, ad quam ratio legis Falcidiæ red-

2. In order to apply the lex Falcidia, regard is had to the value of igitur, mortis tempore spectatur. Itaque si verbi gratia is, qui centum aureorum patrimonium habebat, centum aureos legaverit, nihil legatariis prodest, si ante aditam hereditatem per servos hereditarios aut ex partu ancillarum hereditariam aut ex fetu pecorum tantum accesserit hereditati, ut, centum aureis legatorum nomine erogatis, heres quartam partem hereditatis habiturus sit, sed necesse est, ut nihilo minus quarta pars legatis detrahatur. Ex diverso si septuaginta quinque legaverit et ante aditam hereditatem in tantum decreverint bona incendiis forte aut naufragiis aut morte servorum, ut non amplius quam septuaginta quinque aureorum substantia vel etiam minus relinquatur, solida legata debentur. Nec ea res dam-nosa est heredi, cui liberum est non adire hereditatem: quæ res efficit, ut necesse sit legatariis, ne destituto testamento nihil consequantur, cum herede in portione pacisci.

the estate at the time of the testator's death. Thus, for instance, if he, who is worth a hundred aurei at his decease, bequeaths the whole hundred in legacies, the legatees receive no advantage, if the inheritance, before it is entered upon, should so increase by the labour of its slaves, the birth of children to female slaves, or the produce of cattle, that, after a full payment of the one hundred aurei in legacies, a clear fourth of the whole estate would remain to the heir, for the legacies notwithstanding would still be liable to a deduction of one-fourth. Conversely, if the testator has given only seventy-five aurei in legacies, then although, before the entrance of the heir, the estate should so decrease by fire, shipwreck, or the loss of slaves, that its whole value should not be more than seventy-five aurei or less, yet the legacies would still be due without deduction. Nor is this prejudicial to the heir, who is at liberty to refuse to enter on the inheritance, but it obliges the legatees to come to terms with the heir, so as to let him get a part, lest, if the testament is abandoned, they may lose the whole.

D. xxxv. 2. 73. pr.

The calculation under the lex Falcidia was made at the time of the testator's death, in accordance with the rule by which the dies cedens for most legacies was fixed at that time. It was, moreover, made then, even if the dies cedens was fixed at some other time. Between the death of the testator and the time of the heir entering on the inheritance, the estate might be so deteriorated as to make it disadvantageous to the heir to enter; and in order to persuade him to do so, the legatees would have to enter into a compromise with him.

con fr debet

3. Cum autem ratio legis Falcidiae ponitur, ante deducitur æs alienum, item funeris impensa et pretia servorum manumissorum, tunc deinde in reliquo ita ratio habetur, ut ex eo quarta pars apud heredes remaneat, tres vero partes inter legatarios distribuantur, pro rata scilicet portione ejus, quod cuique eorum legatum fuerit. Itaque si fingamus, quadringentos aureos legatos esse et patrimonii quantitatem, ex qua legata erogari oportet, quadringentorum esse, quarta pars singulis legatariis detrahi debet.

3. When the calculation of the lex Falcidia is made, the testator's debts, his funeral expenses, and the price of the manumission of slaves, are deducted, then what remains is divided, so that a fourth part remains for the heir, and the other three parts are divided among the legatees in proportion to the amount of their respective legacies: for example, let us suppose that four hundred aurei have been given in legacies, and the estate out of which the legacies are to be paid is worth no more, each legatee must have a fourth part subigitur, mortis tempore spectatur. Itaque si verbi gratia is, qui centum aureorum patrimonium habebat, centum aureos legaverit, nihil legatariis prodest, si ante aditam hereditatem per servos hereditarios aut ex partu ancillarum hereditariam aut ex fetu pecorum tantum accesserit hereditati, ut, centum aureis legatorum nomine erogatis, heres quartam partem hereditatis habiturus sit, sed necesse est, ut nihilo minus quarta pars legatis detrahatur. Ex diverso si septuaginta quinque legaverit et ante aditam hereditatem in tantum decreverint bona incendiis forte aut naufragiis aut morte servorum, ut non amplius quam septuaginta quinque aureorum substantia vel etiam minus relinquatur, solida legata debentur. Nec ea res dam-nosa est heredi, cui liberum est non adire hereditatem: quæ res efficit, ut necesse sit legatariis, ne destituto testamento nihil consequantur, cum herede in portione pacisci.

the estate at the time of the testator's death. Thus, for instance, if he, who is worth a hundred aurei at his decease, bequeaths the whole hundred in legacies, the legatees receive no advantage, if the inheritance, before it is entered upon, should so increase by the labour of its slaves, the birth of children to female slaves, or the produce of cattle, that, after a full payment of the one hundred aurei in legacies, a clear fourth of the whole estate would remain to the heir, for the legacies notwithstanding would still be liable to a deduction of one-fourth. Conversely, if the testator has given only seventy-five aurei in legacies, then although, before the entrance of the heir, the estate should so decrease by fire, shipwreck, or the loss of slaves, that its whole value should not be more than seventy-five aurei or less, yet the legacies would still be due without deduction. Nor is this prejudicial to the heir, who is at liberty to refuse to enter on the inheritance, but it obliges the legatees to come to terms with the heir, so as to let him get a part, lest, if the testament is abandoned, they may lose the whole.

D. xxxv. 2. 73. pr.

The calculation under the lex Falcidia was made at the time of the testator's death, in accordance with the rule by which the dies cedens for most legacies was fixed at that time. It was, moreover, made then, even if the dies cedens was fixed at some other time. Between the death of the testator and the time of the heir entering on the inheritance, the estate might be so deteriorated as to make it disadvantageous to the heir to enter; and in order to persuade him to do so, the legatees would have to enter into a compromise with him.

ten for debts

3. Cum autem ratio legis Falcidiae ponitur, ante deducitur æs alienum, item funeris impensa et pretia servorum manumissorum, tunc deinde in reliquo ita ratio habetur, ut ex eo quarta pars apud heredes remaneat, tres vero partes inter legatarios distribuantur, pro rata scilicet portione ejus, quod cuique eorum legatum fuerit. Itaque si fingamus, quadringentos aureos legatos esse et patrimonii quantitatem, ex qua legata erogari oportet, quadringentorum esse, quarta pars singulis legatariis detrahi debet.

3. When the calculation of the lex Falcidia is made, the testator's debts, his funeral expenses, and the price of the manumission of slaves, are deducted, then what remains is divided, so that a fourth part remains for the heir, and the other three parts are divided among the legatees in proportion to the amount of their respective legacies: for example, let us suppose that four hundred aurei have been given in legacies, and the estate out of which the legacies are to be paid is worth no more, each legatee must have a fourth part subtracted from his legacy; but, if we suppose that the testator gave in legacies three hundred and fifty aurei, then an eighth ought to be deducted. And if he gave five hundred aurei in legacies, first a fifth must be deducted, and then a fourth. For that which exceeds the real value of the goods of the deceased must first be deducted, and then that which is to remain to the heir.

Quodsi trecentos quinquaginta legatos fingamus, octava debet detrahi. Quodsi quingentos legaverit, initio quinta, deinde quarta detrahi debet: ante enim detrahendum est, quod extra bonorum quantitatem est, deinde quod ex bonis apud heredem remanere oportet.

D. xxxv. 2. 1. 19; D. xxxv. 2. 39; D. xxxv. 2. 73. 5.

Octava debet detrahi, i.e. one eighth of the whole, or fifty aurei, must be deducted from the whole sum given to the different legatees, the sum to be deducted from each share being in proportion to the relative amount of that share. Each share would be diminished by one-seventh.

The lex Falcidia did not apply to military testaments. (D. xxxv. 2. 17.)

Under the new system regarding heirs invented by Justinian (see Tit. 19. 6) the heir entering with an inventory took the Falcidian fourth, unless the testator had expressly forbidden that he should take it; but the testator was now at liberty to deprive the heir of the Falcidian fourth, which previously he had not been. (Nov. 1. 2. 2.)

TIT. XXIII. DE FIDEICOMMISSARIIS HEREDITATIBUS.

Nunc transeamus ad fideicommissa. Et prius de hereditatibus fideicommissariis videamus.

Let us now pass to fideicommissa; and first we will treat of fideicommissary inheritances.

GAI. II. 246, 247.

Fideicommissa, that is, trusts, might be compared to the institution of heirs, if the trust embraced the whole inheritance, and to the gift of legacies, if it embraced only a part. In the former case they were termed by the jurists fideicommissariæ hereditates: in the latter, fideicommissa singularum rerum. The text proceeds to speak of the fideicommissariæ hereditates.

The word fideicommissum has been generally retained in the translation, instead of trusts, because, as fideicommissa include only trusts carrying out the last wishes of a deceased person, the word trusts, which is used much more widely in its application, might lead to confusion.

Ulpian gives (Reg. 25. 1) the following definition of a fideicommissum: 'Quod non civilibus verbis, sed precativè relinquitur; nec ex rigore juris civilis proficiscitur, sed ex voluntate datur relinquentis.'

1. Sciendum itaque est, omnia fideicommissa primis temporibus in-

1. At first fideicommissa were of little force; for no one was com-

fideicom

Quodsi trecentos quinquaginta legatos fingamus, octava debet detrahi. Quodsi quingentos legaverit, initio quinta, deinde quarta detrahi debet: ante enim detrahendum est, quod extra bonorum quantitatem est, deinde quod ex bonis apud heredem remanere oportet.

tracted from his legacy; but, if we suppose that the testator gave in legacies three hundred and fifty aurei, then an eighth ought to be deducted. And if he gave five hundred aurei in legacies, first a fifth must be deducted, and then a fourth. For that which exceeds the real value of the goods of the deceased must first be deducted, and then that which is to remain to the heir.

D. xxxv. 2. 1. 19; D. xxxv. 2. 39; D. xxxv. 2. 73. 5.

Octava debet detrahi, i.e. one eighth of the whole, or fifty aurei, must be deducted from the whole sum given to the different legatees, the sum to be deducted from each share being in proportion to the relative amount of that share. Each share would be diminished by one-seventh.

The lex Falcidia did not apply to military testaments. (D. xxxv. 2. 17.)

Under the new system regarding heirs invented by Justinian (see Tit. 19. 6) the heir entering with an inventory took the Falcidian fourth, unless the testator had expressly forbidden that he should take it; but the testator was now at liberty to deprive the heir of the Falcidian fourth, which previously he had not been. (Nov. 1. 2. 2.)

TIT. XXIII. DE FIDEICOMMISSARIIS HEREDITATIBUS.

Nunc transeamus ad fideicommissa. Et prius de hereditatibus fideicommissariis videamus.

Let us now pass to fideicommissa; and first we will treat of fideicommissary inheritances.

GAI. II. 246, 247.

Fideicommissa, that is, trusts, might be compared to the institution of heirs, if the trust embraced the whole inheritance, and to the gift of legacies, if it embraced only a part. In the former case they were termed by the jurists fideicommissariæ hereditates: in the latter, fideicommissa singularum rerum. The text proceeds to speak of the fideicommissariæ hereditates.

The word fideicommissum has been generally retained in the translation, instead of trusts, because, as fideicommissa include only trusts carrying out the last wishes of a deceased person, the word trusts, which is used much more widely in its application, might lead to confusion.

Ulpian gives (Reg. 25. 1) the following definition of a fideicommissum: 'Quod non civilibus verbis, sed precativè relinquitur; nec ex rigore juris civilis proficiscitur, sed ex voluntate datur relinquentis.'

1. Sciendum itaque est, omnia fideicommissa primis temporibus in-

1. At first fideicommissa were of little force; for no one was com-

fideicom

firma esse, quia nemo invitus cogebatur præstare id, de quo rogatus erat: quibus enim non poterant hereditates vel legata relinquere, si relinquebant, fidei committebant eorum, qui capere ex testamento poterant: et ideo fideicommissa appellata sunt, quia nullo vinculo juris, sed tantum pudore eorum, qui rogabantur, continebantur. Postea primus divus Augustus semel iterumque gratia personarum motus, vel quia per ipsius salutem rogatus quis diceretur, aut ob insignem quorundam perfidiam jussit consulibus auctoritatem suam interponere. Quod quia justum videbatur et populare erat, paulatim conversum est in adsiduam jurisdictionem: tantusque favor eorum factus est, ut paulatim etiam prætor proprius crearetur, qui fideicommissis jus diceret, quem fideicommissarium appellabant.

pelled against his will to perform what he was only requested to perform. When testators were desirous of giving an inheritance or legacy to persons, to whom they could not directly give either, they entrusted them to the good faith of some person capable of taking by testament; and fideicommissa were so called, because their performance could not be enforced by law, but depended solely upon the good faith of the person to whom they were entrusted. Afterwards, the Emperor Augustus, having been frequently moved by consideration for certain persons, or because the request was said to have been made in the name of the emperor's safety, or on account of some striking instance of perfidy, commanded the consuls to interpose their authority. Their intervention, being favoured as just by public opinion, gradually assumed the character of a regular jurisdiction, and trusts grew into such favour, that soon a special prætor was appointed to give judgment in these cases, and received the name of prætor fideicommissarius.

GAI. ii. 274, 275, 278, 285.

The freedom given by the introduction of obligatory trusts was singularly wide. A testator at the time of the introduction of fideicommissa, in order to give anything, was obliged to do so by a regular testament, to adopt prescribed formulæ, to use the Latin tongue. He could not give anything to a peregrinus, to a person proscribed, to a posthumous stranger, or to an uncertain person. The system of fideicommissa enabled him to give to almost any one he liked, and that in words the least formal, and even without a testament at all. (D. xxxii. 11. pr. and 21. pr.) The heredes ab intestato, if charged with a fideicommissum by the person to whose property they succeeded, were obliged to fulfil it (see par. 10). A man might give his whole inheritance by a fideicommissum to a woman whom he was prevented by the lex Voconia from instituting as heir (GAI. ii. 274); and Latini Juniani (see Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3) could take fideicommissa, though not inheritances or legacies. (GAI. ii. 275.) The license given to fideicommissa was, indeed, diminished by different enactments, and they were gradually placed more and more on the footing of legacies. Thus by one senatusconsultum, passed in the time of Hadrian, the power of giving a fideicommissum to a peregrinus (GAI. ii. 285), by another the power of giving one to a posthumous stranger or uncertain person, was taken away. (GAI. ii. 287.) Again, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum subjected fideicommissa to the rules of the lex Papia Poppæa (GAI. ii. 286);

firma esse, quia nemo invitus cogebatur præstare id, de quo rogatus erat: quibus enim non poterant hereditates vel legata relinquere, si relinquebant, fidei committebant eorum, qui capere ex testamento poterant: et ideo fideicommissa appellata sunt, quia nullo vinculo juris, sed tantum pudore eorum, qui rogabantur, continebantur. Postea primus divus Augustus semel iterumque gratia personarum motus, vel quia per ipsius salutem rogatus quis diceretur, aut ob insignem quorundam perfidiam jussit consulibus auctoritatem suam interponere. Quod quia justum videbatur et populare erat, paulatim conversum est in adsiduum jurisdictionem: tantusque favor eorum factus est, ut paulatim etiam prætor proprius crearetur, qui fideicommissis jus diceret, quem fideicommissarium appellabant.

pelled against his will to perform what he was only requested to perform. When testators were desirous of giving an inheritance or legacy to persons, to whom they could not directly give either, they entrusted them to the good faith of some person capable of taking by testament; and fideicommissa were so called, because their performance could not be enforced by law, but depended solely upon the good faith of the person to whom they were entrusted. Afterwards, the Emperor Augustus, having been frequently moved by consideration for certain persons, or because the request was said to have been made in the name of the emperor's safety, or on account of some striking instance of perfidy, commanded the consuls to interpose their authority. Their intervention, being favoured as just by public opinion, gradually assumed the character of a regular jurisdiction, and trusts grew into such favour, that soon a special prætor was appointed to give judgment in these cases, and received the name of prætor fideicommissarius.

GAI. ii. 274, 275, 278, 285.

The freedom given by the introduction of obligatory trusts was singularly wide. A testator at the time of the introduction of fideicommissa, in order to give anything, was obliged to do so by a regular testament, to adopt prescribed formulæ, to use the Latin tongue. He could not give anything to a peregrinus, to a person proscribed, to a posthumous stranger, or to an uncertain person. The system of fideicommissa enabled him to give to almost any one he liked, and that in words the least formal, and even without a testament at all. (D. xxxii. 11. pr. and 21. pr.) The heredes ab intestato, if charged with a fideicommissum by the person to whose property they succeeded, were obliged to fulfil it (see par. 10). A man might give his whole inheritance by a fideicommissum to a woman whom he was prevented by the lex Voconia from instituting as heir (GAI. ii. 274); and Latini Juniani (see Bk. i. Tit. 5. 3) could take fideicommissa, though not inheritances or legacies. (GAI. ii. 275.) The license given to fideicommissa was, indeed, diminished by different enactments, and they were gradually placed more and more on the footing of legacies. Thus by one senatusconsultum, passed in the time of Hadrian, the power of giving a fideicommissum to a peregrinus (GAI. ii. 285), by another the power of giving one to a posthumous stranger or uncertain person, was taken away. (GAI. ii. 287.) Again, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum subjected fideicommissa to the rules of the lex Papia Poppæa (GAI. ii. 286);

and a testamentary tutor could never be appointed by a fideicommissum. (GAI. ii. 289.) Fideicommissa were, indeed, always something beside and foreign to the nature of Roman law. Augustus merely ordered that, in a case of great hardship, the consuls should interfere. Then a magistrate was created whose business it was to interfere in cases which wanted it; but there was nothing like an action at law to enforce fideicommissa. (ULP. Reg. 25. 12.) The fideicommissarius applied for aid as having equity on his side; and if the magistrate chose to interfere, the regular course of the law was stayed, and the trust enforced. The proceeding was always extra ordinem (GAI. ii. 278), and the jurisdiction was exercised throughout the year, while legacies could only be claimed on days cum res aguntur, of which, under Marcus Aurelius, there were 230 in the year. (GAI. ii. 279; DEMANGEAT, i. 790.)

The fideicommissum itself did not, like a legacy, directly transfer the property in an inheritance or in any particular thing, and of course did not give any right to a real action. The giving up of the inheritance was, however, effected by the mere consent of the heir, even before tradition.

2. Imprimis igitur sciendum est, opus esse, ut aliquis recto jure testamento heres instituatur ejusque fidei committatur, ut eam hereditatem alii restituat: alioquin inutile est testamentum, in quo nemo heres instituitur. Cum igitur aliquis scripserit: 'Lucius Titius heres esto,' poterit adicere: 'rogo te, Luci Titi, ut, cum primum possis hereditatem meam adire, eam Gaio Seio reddas, restituas.' Potest autem quisque et de parte restituenda heredem rogare: et liberum est vel pure vel sub conditione relinquere fideicommissum vel ex die certo.

2. We must first observe that some one must be duly appointed heir in the testament; and then it must be entrusted to his good faith to give over the inheritance to some other person; for otherwise the testament is ineffectual, as being one in which no one is instituted heir. And, therefore, when a testator has said, 'Let Lucius Titius be my heir,' he may add, 'and I request you, Lucius Titius, that, so soon as you can enter upon my inheritance, you will make over and give it up to Gaius Seius.' A testator may also request his heir to give over a part of the inheritance only, and may leave the fideicommissum absolutely or conditionally, or from a certain day.

GAI. ii. 248, 250.

Of course, if there was no heir instituted, there could be no person to charge by testament with the trust (nemo fiduciarius); but the testator might charge the heredes ab intestato (par. 10).

The person who made the fideicommissum was termed the fideicommittens; the person requested to perform it, fiduciarius; and the person to be benefited by it, fideicommissarius.

3. Restituta autem hereditate, is quidem, qui restituit, nihilo minus heres permanet: is vero, qui recipit hereditatem, aliquando heredis aliquando legatarii loco habebatur.

3. After an heir has restored the inheritance, he still continues heir. But he, who receives the inheritance, was formerly sometimes considered in the light of an heir, and sometimes in that of a legatee.

GAI. ii. 251.

and a testamentary tutor could never be appointed by a fideicommissum. (GAI. ii. 289.) Fideicommissa were, indeed, always something beside and foreign to the nature of Roman law. Augustus merely ordered that, in a case of great hardship, the consuls should interfere. Then a magistrate was created whose business it was to interfere in cases which wanted it; but there was nothing like an action at law to enforce fideicommissa. (ULP. Reg. 25. 12.) The fideicommissarius applied for aid as having equity on his side; and if the magistrate chose to interfere, the regular course of the law was stayed, and the trust enforced. The proceeding was always extra ordinem (GAI. ii. 278), and the jurisdiction was exercised throughout the year, while legacies could only be claimed on days cum res aguntur, of which, under Marcus Aurelius, there were 230 in the year. (GAI. ii. 279; DEMANGEAT, i. 790.)

The fideicommissum itself did not, like a legacy, directly transfer the property in an inheritance or in any particular thing, and of course did not give any right to a real action. The giving up of the inheritance was, however, effected by the mere consent of the heir, even before tradition.

2. Imprimis igitur sciendum est, opus esse, ut aliquis recto jure testamento heres instituatur ejusque fidei committatur, ut eam hereditatem alii restituat: alioquin inutile est testamentum, in quo nemo heres instituitur. Cum igitur aliquis scripserit: 'Lucius Titius heres esto,' poterit adicere: 'rogo te, Luci Titi, ut, cum primum possis hereditatem meam adire, eam Gaio Seio reddas, restituas.' Potest autem quisque et de parte restituenda heredem rogare: et liberum est vel pure vel sub conditione relinquere fideicommissum vel ex die certo.

2. We must first observe that some one must be duly appointed heir in the testament; and then it must be entrusted to his good faith to give over the inheritance to some other person; for otherwise the testament is ineffectual, as being one in which no one is instituted heir. And, therefore, when a testator has said, 'Let Lucius Titius be my heir,' he may add, 'and I request you, Lucius Titius, that, so soon as you can enter upon my inheritance, you will make over and give it up to Gaius Seius.' A testator may also request his heir to give over a part of the inheritance only, and may leave the fideicommissum absolutely or conditionally, or from a certain day.

GAI. ii. 248, 250.

Of course, if there was no heir instituted, there could be no person to charge by testament with the trust (nemo fiduciarius); but the testator might charge the heredes ab intestato (par. 10).

The person who made the fideicommissum was termed the fideicommittens; the person requested to perform it, fiduciarius; and the person to be benefited by it, fideicommissarius.

3. Restituta autem hereditate, is quidem, qui restituit, nihilo minus heres permanet: is vero, qui recipit hereditatem, aliquando heredis aliquando legatarii loco habebatur.

3. After an heir has restored the inheritance, he still continues heir. But he, who receives the inheritance, was formerly sometimes considered in the light of an heir, and sometimes in that of a legatee.

GAI. ii. 251.

In order to protect himself, the heir who remained liable to all actions of creditors against the inheritance had recourse to a fiction of law. He sold the inheritance to the fideicommissarius, and they entered into mutual agreements called emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes (GAI. ii. 252), by which the fiduciarius, though remaining in the eye of the law responsible for the charges upon the inheritance, was protected from ultimate harm by having a remedy against the fideicommissarius, who in his turn bargained that the fiduciarius would hand everything over. Thus Gaius says of the fideicommissarius, 'Olim nec heredis loco erat, nec legatarii: sed potius emptoris.'

4. Et in Neronis quidem temporibus Trebellio Maximo et Annæo Seneca consulibus senatusconsultum factum est, quo cautum est, ut, si cui hereditas ex fideicommissi causa restituta sit, omnes actiones, quæ jure civili heredi et in heredem competere, ei et in eum darentur, cui ex fideicommisso restituta esset hereditas. Post quod senatusconsultum prætor utiles actiones ei et in eum, qui recepit hereditatem, quasi heredi et in heredem dare coepit.

4. During the reign of Nero, in the consulship of Trebellius Maximus and Annæus Seneca, a senatusconsultum was passed, providing that, after an inheritance had been restored under a fideicommissum, all actions, which by the civil law might be brought by or against the heir, should be permitted for and against him to whom the inheritance was restored. After this, the prætor began to give equitable actions for and against the person who received an inheritance, as if for and against an heir.

GAI. ii. 253; D. xxxi. 1. 2.

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum (A.D. 62) did away with the necessity of any such fiction as that of a sale. The fideicommissarius stepped at once into the place of the heres institutus. All the actions belonging to the inheritance were given him in the shape of actiones utiles. (See Introd. sec. 106.) If creditors sued the heres institutus, he had the exceptio restituta hereditatis; he might plead that he had given over the inheritance as he had been directed.

5. Sed quia heredes scripti, cum aut totam hereditatem aut pæne totam plerumque restituere rogabantur, adire hereditatem ob nullum vel minimum lucrum recusabant atque ob id extinguebantur fideicommissa; postea Vespasiani Augusti temporibus Pegaso et Pusione consulibus senatus censuit, ut ei, qui rogatus esset hereditatem restituere, perinde liceret quartam partem retinere, atque lege Falcidia ex legatis retinere conceditur. Ex singulis quoque rebus, quæ per fideicommissum relinquuntur, eadem retentio permessa est. Post quod senatusconsultum ipse heres onera hereditaria sustinebat: ille autem, qui ex fideicommisso recepit partem

5. But the instituted heirs, being in most cases requested to restore the whole, or almost the whole of an inheritance, often refused to accept it, as they would receive little or no advantage, and thus fideicommissa were frequently extinguished; and therefore, subsequently, during the reign of the Emperor Vespasian, in the consulship of Pegasus and Pusio, the senate decreed, that an heir, who was requested to restore an inheritance, might retain a fourth, just as in the case of legacies he might by the Falcidian law. And the same deduction is allowed in particular things, which are left by a fideicommissum. For some time after this senatusconsultum the heir alone bore the charges of the inheritance;

In order to protect himself, the heir who remained liable to all actions of creditors against the inheritance had recourse to a fiction of law. He sold the inheritance to the fideicommissarius, and they entered into mutual agreements called emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes (GAI. ii. 252), by which the fiduciarius, though remaining in the eye of the law responsible for the charges upon the inheritance, was protected from ultimate harm by having a remedy against the fideicommissarius, who in his turn bargained that the fiduciarius would hand everything over. Thus Gaius says of the fideicommissarius, 'Olim nec heredis loco erat, nec legatarii: sed potius emptoris.'

4. Et in Neronis quidem temporibus Trebellio Maximo et Annæo Seneca consulibus senatusconsultum factum est, quo cautum est, ut, si cui hereditas ex fideicommissi causa restituta sit, omnes actiones, quæ jure civili heredi et in heredem competere, ei et in eum darentur, cui ex fideicommisso restituta esset hereditas. Post quod senatusconsultum prætor utiles actiones ei et in eum, qui recepit hereditatem, quasi heredi et in heredem dare cepit.

4. During the reign of Nero, in the consulship of Trebellius Maximus and Annæus Seneca, a senatusconsultum was passed, providing that, after an inheritance had been restored under a fideicommissum, all actions, which by the civil law might be brought by or against the heir, should be permitted for and against him to whom the inheritance was restored. After this, the prætor began to give equitable actions for and against the person who received an inheritance, as if for and against an heir.

GAI. ii. 253; D. xxxi. 1. 2.

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum (A.D. 62) did away with the necessity of any such fiction as that of a sale. The fideicommissarius stepped at once into the place of the heres institutus. All the actions belonging to the inheritance were given him in the shape of actiones utiles. (See Introd. sec. 106.) If creditors sued the heres institutus, he had the exceptio restitutæ hereditatis; he might plead that he had given over the inheritance as he had been directed.

5. Sed quia heredes scripti, cum aut totam hereditatem aut pæne totam plerumque restituere rogabantur, adire hereditatem ob nullum vel minimum lucrum recusabant atque ob id extinguebantur fideicommissa; postea Vespasiani Augusti temporibus Pegaso et Pusione consulibus senatus censuit, ut ei, qui rogatus esset hereditatem restituere, perinde liceret quartam partem retinere, atque lege Falcidia ex legatis retinere conceditur. Ex singulis quoque rebus, quæ per fideicommissum relinquuntur, eadem retentio permissa est. Post quod senatusconsultum ipse heres onera hereditaria sustinebat: ille autem, qui ex fideicommisso recepit partem

5. But the instituted heirs, being in most cases requested to restore the whole, or almost the whole of an inheritance, often refused to accept it, as they would receive little or no advantage, and thus fideicommissa were frequently extinguished; and therefore, subsequently, during the reign of the Emperor Vespasian, in the consulship of Pegasus and Pusio, the senate decreed, that an heir, who was requested to restore an inheritance, might retain a fourth, just as in the case of legacies he might by the Falcidian law. And the same deduction is allowed in particular things, which are left by a fideicommissum. For some time after this senatusconsultum the heir alone bore the charges of the inheritance;

hereditatis, legatarii partiarum loco erat, id est ejus legatarii, cui pars bonorum legabatur. Quæ species legati partitio vocabatur, quia cum herede legatarius partiebatur hereditatem. Unde quæ solebant stipulationes inter heredem et partiarum legatarium interponi, eadem interponebantur inter eum, qui ex fideicommisso recepit hereditatem, et heredem, id est ut et lucrum et damnum hereditarium pro rata parte inter eos commune sit.

and he who had received a share or part of an inheritance, under a fideicommissum, was regarded as a part legatee, that is, a legatee having a legacy of a share of the property, a species of legacy which was called partition, because the legatee took a part of the inheritance together with the heir. Thus the same stipulations which were formerly in use between the heir and partary legatee, were likewise made between the person who received the inheritance under the fideicommissum and the heir, that is, they stipulated they would share the benefits and the charges of the inheritance between them, in proportion to their respective interests.

GAI. ii. 254.

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum protected the fiduciarius from any harm; but it gave him no incitement to enter on the inheritance. Why should he take an inheritance which he had instantly to transfer to another? The trust might thus perish; and, to remedy this, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (A.D. 73) permitted the heres institutus to retain a fourth, just as the lex Falcidia permitted in the case of legacies. Even the term quarta Falcidia was applied to the fourth retained by the fiduciarius heres. (D. ~~xxvi~~ l. 16. 9.) The fideicommissarius in this respect became exactly like a legatee. As having a definite part of the inheritance, he was considered in the light of a legatee of a part of the inheritance, and, as the text says (par. 3), the fideicommissarius was, under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, placed in the position of an heir, and under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum in that of a legatee.

A testator sometimes gave a legatee not a particular thing, but a certain share in his whole property. The legatee (then termed legatarius partiarum) took, in this case, per universitatem; but he was not thereby made an heir, not having been formally instituted; and if there was no heir who entered on the inheritance, the legacy was extinguished. The claims of creditors against the inheritance were made exclusively against the heir, and the heir alone could recover sums due to the inheritance. Thus it was necessary that, if the heir paid a creditor, the legatee should account to him for a part of the payment proportionate to his share of the inheritance; while if the legatee wished that his share should be increased by the payment of a debt due to the inheritance, he could only effect this through the heir. Accordingly they made stipulations with each other, termed stipulationes partis et pro parte. By one of these stipulations the heir bound the legatee to pay a proportion of sums expended in satisfaction of claims against the inheritance; by the other the legatee bound the heir to account hereditatis, legatarii partiarum loco erat, id est ejus legatarii, cui pars bonorum legabatur. Quæ species legati partitio vocabatur, quia cum herede legatarius partiebatur hereditatem. Unde quæ solebant stipulationes inter heredem et partiarum legatarium interponi, eadem interponebantur inter eum, qui ex fideicommisso recepit hereditatem, et heredem, id est ut et lucrum et damnum hereditarium pro rata parte inter eos commune sit.

and he who had received a share or part of an inheritance, under a fideicommissum, was regarded as a part legatee, that is, a legatee having a legacy of a share of the property, a species of legacy which was called partition, because the legatee took a part of the inheritance together with the heir. Thus the same stipulations which were formerly in use between the heir and partiar legatee, were likewise made between the person who received the inheritance under the fideicommissum and the heir, that is, they stipulated they would share the benefits and the charges of the inheritance between them, in proportion to their respective interests.

GAI. ii. 254.

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum protected the fiduciarius from any harm; but it gave him no incitement to enter on the inheritance. Why should he take an inheritance which he had instantly to transfer to another? The trust might thus perish; and, to remedy this, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (A.D. 73) permitted the heres institutus to retain a fourth, just as the lex Falcidia permitted in the case of legacies. Even the term quarta Falcidia was applied to the fourth retained by the fiduciarius heres. (D. ~~xxxvi~~ l. 16. 9.) The fideicommissarius in this respect became exactly like a legatee. As having a definite part of the inheritance, he was considered in the light of a legatee of a part of the inheritance, and, as the text says (par. 3), the fideicommissarius was, under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, placed in the position of an heir, and under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum in that of a legatee.

A testator sometimes gave a legatee not a particular thing, but a certain share in his whole property. The legatee (then termed legatarius partiarum) took, in this case, per universitatem; but he was not thereby made an heir, not having been formally instituted; and if there was no heir who entered on the inheritance, the legacy was extinguished. The claims of creditors against the inheritance were made exclusively against the heir, and the heir alone could recover sums due to the inheritance. Thus it was necessary that, if the heir paid a creditor, the legatee should account to him for a part of the payment proportionate to his share of the inheritance; while if the legatee wished that his share should be increased by the payment of a debt due to the inheritance, he could only effect this through the heir. Accordingly they made stipulations with each other, termed stipulationes partis et pro parte. By one of these stipulations the heir bound the legatee to pay a proportion of sums expended in satisfaction of claims against the inheritance; by the other the legatee bound the heir to account to him for his share of sums received in satisfaction of debts owing to the inheritance. The fideicommissarius was on the footing of such a legatee under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, and the stipulationes partis et pro parte were made between the heir and the fideicommissarius.

6. Ergo si quidem non plus quam dodrantem hereditatis scriptus heres rogatus sit restituere, tunc ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto restituebatur hereditas et in utrumque actiones hereditariæ pro rata parte dabantur: in heredem quidem jure civili. in eum vero, qui recipiebat hereditatem, ex senatusconsulto Trebelliano tamquam in heredem. At si plus quam dodrantem vel etiam totam hereditatem restituere rogatus sit, locus erat Pegasiano senatusconsulto, et heres, qui semel adierit hereditatem, si modo sua voluntate adierit, sive retinuerit quartam partem sive noluerit retinere, ipse universa onera hereditaria sustinebat. Sed quarta quidem retenta, quasi partis et pro parte stipulationes interponebantur tamquam inter partiarium legatarium et heredem: si vero totam hereditatem restituerit, emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes interponebantur. Sed si recuset scriptus heres adire hereditatem ob id, quod dicat, eam sibi suspectam esse quasi damnosam, cavetur Pegasiano senatusconsulto, ut desiderante eo, cui restituere rogatus est, jussu prætoris adeat et restituat hereditatem perindeque ei et in eum, qui recipit hereditatem, actiones dentur, acsi juris est ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto: quo casu nullis stipulationibus opus est, quia simul et huic, qui restituit, securitas datur et actiones hereditariæ ei et in eum transferuntur, qui recipit hereditatem, utroque senatusconsulto in hac specie concurrente.

6. Therefore, if the instituted heir was not requested to restore more than three-fourths of the inheritance, he restored such part in accordance with the provisions of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum; and all actions which concern an inheritance, might be brought against each according to their respective shares—against the heir, by the civil law, and against him who received the inheritance, by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, as though against an heir. But if the instituted heir was requested by the testator to restore the whole inheritance, or more than three-fourths, then the senatusconsultum Pegasianum became applicable; and the heir who had once entered on the inheritance, provided he did so voluntarily, was obliged to sustain all the charges of the inheritance, whether he had retained or had declined to retain his fourth. When the heir did retain a fourth part, what are called stipulations partis et pro parte were entered into, just as between a legatee of part and an heir; and, when the heir did not retain a fourth, then stipulations emptæ et venditæ hereditatis were entered into. But if the instituted heir refused to enter on the inheritance, alleging that he feared he should lose by doing so, it was provided, by the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, that, on the demand of him to whom he had been requested to restore the inheritance, he should, under an order of the prætor, enter on the inheritance, and give it over; and that all actions might be brought by or against him who received the inheritance, as in a case falling under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. And in this case stipulations are not necessary, for the heir, who restores the inheritance, is secured, and all actions concerning an inheritance are transferred to and against him, by whom it is received, there being, in this instance, a concurrent application of both senatusconsulta.

to him for his share of sums received in satisfaction of debts owing to the inheritance. The fideicommissarius was on the footing of such a legatee under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, and the stipulationes partis et pro parte were made between the heir and the fideicommissarius.

6. Ergo si quidem non plus quam dodrantem hereditatis scriptus heres rogatus sit restituere, tunc ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto restituebatur hereditas et in utrumque actiones hereditariæ pro rata parte dabantur: in heredem quidem jure civili. in eum vero, qui recipiebat hereditatem, ex senatusconsulto Trebelliano tamquam in heredem. At si plus quam dodrantem vel etiam totam hereditatem restituere rogatus sit, locus erat Pegasiano senatusconsulto, et heres, qui semel adierit hereditatem, si modo sua voluntate adierit, sive retinuerit quartam partem sive noluerit retinere, ipse universa onera hereditaria sustinebat. Sed quarta quidem retenta, quasi partis et pro parte stipulationes interponebantur tamquam inter partiarium legatarium et heredem: si vero totam hereditatem restituerit, emptæ et venditæ hereditatis stipulationes interponebantur. Sed si recuset scriptus heres adire hereditatem ob id, quod dicat, eam sibi suspectam esse quasi damnosam, cavetur Pegasiano senatusconsulto, ut desiderante eo, cui restituere rogatus est, jussu prætoris adeat et restitnat hereditatem perindeque ei et in eum, qui recipit hereditatem, actiones dentur, acsi juris est ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto: quo casu nullis stipulationibus opus est, quia simul et huic, qui restituit, securitas datur et actiones hereditariæ ei et in eum transferuntur, qui recipit hereditatem, utroque senatusconsulto in hac specie concurrente.

6. Therefore, if the instituted heir was not requested to restore more than three-fourths of the inheritance, he restored such part in accordance with the provisions of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum; and all actions which concern an inheritance, might be brought against each according to their respective shares—against the heir, by the civil law, and against him who received the inheritance, by the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, as though against an heir. But if the instituted heir was requested by the testator to restore the whole inheritance, or more than three-fourths, then the senatusconsultum Pegasianum became applicable; and the heir who had once entered on the inheritance, provided he did so voluntarily, was obliged to sustain all the charges of the inheritance, whether he had retained or had declined to retain his fourth. When the heir did retain a fourth part, what are called stipulations partis et pro parte were entered into, just as between a legatee of part and an heir; and, when the heir did not retain a fourth, then stipulations emptæ et venditæ hereditatis were entered into. But if the instituted heir refused to enter on the inheritance, alleging that he feared he should lose by doing so, it was provided, by the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, that, on the demand of him to whom he had been requested to restore the inheritance, he should, under an order of the prætor, enter on the inheritance, and give it over; and that all actions might be brought by or against him who received the inheritance, as in a case falling under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. And in this case stipulations are not necessary, for the heir, who restores the inheritance, is secured, and all actions concerning an inheritance are transferred to and against him, by whom it is received, there being, in this instance, a concurrent application of both senatusconsulta.

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum was not abrogated by the Pegasianum. They applied to different cases. If the fourth was expressly reserved to the heres fiduciarius, he took the other three parts, and immediately restored or transferred them to the fideicommissarius, who had the position of heres fideicommissarius, and all the actions belonging to the inheritance, so far as his share extended. But if the fourth was not reserved, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum became applicable. The fiduciarius heres retained the fourth, and the fideicommissarius held the position of a legatee. The heres institutus might, however, not choose to retain the fourth. He might enter on the inheritance, and at once voluntarily transfer the whole to the fideicommissarius. The jurists were divided in opinion as to the senatusconsultum under which he then entered (D. xxxvi. 1. 45.) Gaius thinks it was under the Pegasianum, for the actiones hereditariæ did not pass without stipulations. (GAI. ii. 257.) If he refused to enter on the inheritance, the prætor compelled him, by a power given in the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, and he was placed exactly in the same position as if he had entered under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. He had no fourth reserved for him; and all actions passed at once to the fideicommissarius.

7. Sed quia stipulationes ex senatusconsulto Pegasiano descendentes et ipsi antiquitati displicuerunt et quibusdam casibus captiosas eas homo excelsi ingenii Papinianus appellat et nobis in legibus magis simplicitas quam difficultas placet, ideo omnibus nobis suggestis tam similitudinibus quam differentiis utriusque senatusconsulti, placuit exploso senatusconsulto Pegasiano, quod postea supervenit, omnem auctoritatem Trebelliano senatusconsulto præstare, ut ex eo fideicommissariæ hereditates restituantur, sive habeat heres ex voluntate testatoris quartam sive plus sive minus sive penitus nihil, ut tunc, quando vel nihil vel minus quarta apud eum remaneat, liceat ei vel quartam vel quod deest, ex nostra auctoritate retinere vel repetere solum, quasi ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto pro rata portione actionibus tam in heredem quam in fideicommissarium competentibus. Si vero totam hereditatem sponte restituerit, omnes hereditariæ actiones fideicommissario et adversus eum competunt; sed etiam id, quod præcipuum Pegasiani senatusconsulti fuerat, ut, quando recusabat heres scriptus sibi datam hereditatem adire, necessitas ei imponeretur

7. But, as the stipulations, which arose from the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, were displeasing even to the ancients, and Papinian, a man of great genius, considers them in some cases as captious; and as we prefer simplicity to complexity in matters of law, we have been pleased, upon comparing the points of agreement and disagreement in these two senatusconsulta, to abrogate the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was subsequent to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, and to give an exclusive authority to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, by which all fideicommissary inheritances shall be restored for the future, whether the testator has given by his will a fourth part of his estate to the instituted heir, or more, or less, or nothing at all, so that, when nothing is given to the heir, or less than a fourth part, he may be permitted to retain a fourth, or as much as will make up the deficiency, by virtue of our authority, or to demand repayment of it if he has paid it over; and actions may be brought both against the heir and the fideicommissarius according to their respective interests, as if under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. But, should the heir voluntarily restore the whole inheritance, all actions concerning an inheritance may be brought

The senatusconsultum Trebellianum was not abrogated by the Pegasianum. They applied to different cases. If the fourth was expressly reserved to the heres fiduciarius, he took the other three parts, and immediately restored or transferred them to the fideicommissarius, who had the position of heres fideicommissarius, and all the actions belonging to the inheritance, so far as his share extended. But if the fourth was not reserved, the senatusconsultum Pegasianum became applicable. The fiduciarius heres retained the fourth, and the fideicommissarius held the position of a legatee. The heres institutus might, however, not choose to retain the fourth. He might enter on the inheritance, and at once voluntarily transfer the whole to the fideicommissarius. The jurists were divided in opinion as to the senatusconsultum under which he then entered (D. xxxvi. 1. 45.) Gaius thinks it was under the Pegasianum, for the actiones hereditariæ did not pass without stipulations. (GAI. ii. 257.) If he refused to enter on the inheritance, the prætor compelled him, by a power given in the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, and he was placed exactly in the same position as if he had entered under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. He had no fourth reserved for him; and all actions passed at once to the fideicommissarius.

7. Sed quia stipulationes ex senatusconsulto Pegasiano descendentes et ipsi antiquitati displicuerunt et quibusdam casibus captiosas eas homo excelsi ingenii Papinianus appellat et nobis in legibus magis simplicitas quam difficultas placet, ideo omnibus nobis suggestis tam similitudinibus quam differentiis utriusque senatusconsulti, placuit exploso senatusconsulto Pegasiano, quod postea supervenit, omnem auctoritatem Trebelliano senatusconsulto præstare, ut ex eo fideicommissariæ hereditates restituantur, sive habeat heres ex voluntate testatoris quartam sive plus sive minus sive penitus nihil, ut tunc, quando vel nihil vel minus quarta apud eum remaneat, liceat ei vel quartam vel quod deest, ex nostra auctoritate retinere vel repetere solum, quasi ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto pro rata portione actionibus tam in heredem quam in fideicommissarium competentibus. Si vero totam hereditatem sponte restituerit, omnes hereditariæ actiones fideicommissario et adversus eum competunt; sed etiam id, quod præcipuum Pegasiani senatusconsulti fuerat, ut, quando recusabat heres scriptus sibi datam hereditatem adire, necessitas ei imponeretur

7. But, as the stipulations, which arose from the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, were displeasing even to the ancients, and Papinian, a man of great genius, considers them in some cases as captious; and as we prefer simplicity to complexity in matters of law, we have been pleased, upon comparing the points of agreement and disagreement in these two senatusconsulta, to abrogate the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was subsequent to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, and to give an exclusive authority to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, by which all fideicommissary inheritances shall be restored for the future, whether the testator has given by his will a fourth part of his estate to the instituted heir, or more, or less, or nothing at all, so that, when nothing is given to the heir, or less than a fourth part, he may be permitted to retain a fourth, or as much as will make up the deficiency, by virtue of our authority, or to demand repayment of it if he has paid it over; and actions may be brought both against the heir and the fideicommissarius according to their respective interests, as if under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. But, should the heir voluntarily restore the whole inheritance, all actions concerning an inheritance may be brought

totam hereditatem volenti fideicommissario restituere et omnes ad eum et contra eum transirent actiones, et hoc transposuimus ad senatusconsultum Trebellianum, ut ex hoc solo et necessitas heredi imponatur, si ipso nolente adire fideicommissarius desiderat restitui sibi hereditatem, nullo nec damno nec commodo apud heredem manente.

by or against the fideicommissarius. And, as to the most important provision of the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, that, when an instituted heir refused to accept an inheritance, he might be constrained to restore it to the fideicommissarius if he demanded it, and that all actions should be transferred to and against him, we have transferred this provision to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, by which alone this obligation is now laid upon the heir, when he himself refuses to enter on the inheritance, and the fideicommissarius is desirous that it should be restored, the heir in this case receiving neither gain nor loss.

Justinian unites the two senatusconsulta into one, giving them the name of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. The heir is to retain a fourth, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, but actions are to be brought for or against the heir and the fideicommissarius in proportion to their shares, the fideicommissarius being thus in loco heredis as to his share, as under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. If the heir would not enter, then he was compelled to do so, but was protected against all loss, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum.

Repetere solutum. Before the legislation of Justinian, the heres could not re-demand the fourth, if he had once paid it over. (PAUL. Sent. iv. 3, 4.)

8. Nihil autem interest, utrum aliquis ex asse heres institutus aut totam hereditatem aut pro parte restituere rogatur, an ex parte heres institutus aut totam partem aut partis partem restituere rogatur: nam et hoc casu eadem observari præcepimus, quæ in totius hereditatis restitutione diximus.

8. But it makes no difference whether the heir is instituted to the whole inheritance, and is requested to restore the whole or a part, or whether, being instituted to a part only, he is requested to restore that entire part, or a portion of it; for we enjoin that the same rules be observed in the latter case, as in case of restitution of the whole.

GAI. ii. 259.

9. Si quis una aliqua re deducta sive præcepta, quæ quartam continent, veluti fundo vel alia re, rogatus sit restituere hereditatem, simili modo ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto restitutio fiat, perinde ac si quarta parte retenta rogatus esset reliquam hereditatem restituere. Sed illud interest, quod altero casu, id est cum deducta sive præcepta aliqua re restituitur hereditas in solidum ex eo senatusconsulto actiones transferuntur et res, quæ remanet apud heredem, sine ullo onere hereditario apud eum manet, quasi ex legato ei

9. If an heir is requested by a testator to give up an inheritance, after deducting or excepting some particular thing, equivalent to a fourth of the whole, as a piece of land, or anything else, he will give it up under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, exactly as if he had been requested to restore the remainder of an inheritance, after retaining a fourth. But there is this difference: in the first case, when an heir is requested to give up an inheritance, after deducting or excepting a particular thing, then, according to that senatuscon-

totam hereditatem volenti fideicommissario restituere et omnes ad eum et contra eum transirent actiones, et hoc transposuimus ad senatusconsultum Trebellianum, ut ex hoc solo et necessitas heredi imponatur, si ipso nolente adire fideicommissarius desiderat restitui sibi hereditatem, nullo nec damno nec commodo apud heredem manente.

by or against the fideicommissarius. And, as to the most important provision of the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, that, when an instituted heir refused to accept an inheritance, he might be constrained to restore it to the fideicommissarius if he demanded it, and that all actions should be transferred to and against him, we have transferred this provision to the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, by which alone this obligation is now laid upon the heir, when he himself refuses to enter on the inheritance, and the fideicommissarius is desirous that it should be restored, the heir in this case receiving neither gain nor loss.

Justinian unites the two senatusconsulta into one, giving them the name of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. The heir is to retain a fourth, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum, but actions are to be brought for or against the heir and the fideicommissarius in proportion to their shares, the fideicommissarius being thus in loco heredis as to his share, as under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum. If the heir would not enter, then he was compelled to do so, but was protected against all loss, as under the senatusconsultum Pegasianum.

Repetere solutum. Before the legislation of Justinian, the heres could not re-demand the fourth, if he had once paid it over. (PAUL. Sent. iv. 3, 4.)

8. Nihil autem interest, utrum aliquis ex asse heres institutus aut totam hereditatem aut pro parte restituere rogatur, an ex parte heres institutus aut totam partem aut partis partem restituere rogatur: nam et hoc casu eadem observari præcepimus, quæ in totius hereditatis restitutione diximus.

8. But it makes no difference whether the heir is instituted to the whole inheritance, and is requested to restore the whole or a part, or whether, being instituted to a part only, he is requested to restore that entire part, or a portion of it; for we enjoin that the same rules be observed in the latter case, as in case of restitution of the whole.

GAI. ii. 259.

9. Si quis una aliqua re deducta sive præcepta, quæ quartam continet, veluti fundo vel alia re, rogatus sit restituere hereditatem, simili modo ex Trebelliano senatusconsulto restitutio fiat, perinde ac si quarta parte retenta rogatus esset reliquam hereditatem restituere. Sed illud interest, quod altero casu, id est cum deducta sive præcepta aliqua re restituitur hereditas in solidum ex eo senatusconsulto actiones transferuntur et res, quæ remanet apud heredem, sine ullo onere hereditario apud eum manet, quasi ex legato ei

9. If an heir is requested by a testator to give up an inheritance, after deducting or excepting some particular thing, equivalent to a fourth of the whole, as a piece of land, or anything else, he will give it up under the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, exactly as if he had been requested to restore the remainder of an inheritance, after retaining a fourth. But there is this difference: in the first case, when an heir is requested to give up an inheritance, after deducting or excepting a particular thing, then, according to that senatuscon-

adquisita, altero vero casu, id est cum, quarta parte retenta, rogatus est heres restituere hereditatem et restituit, scindantur actiones et pro dodrante quidem transferantur ad fideicommissarium, pro quadrante remaneant apud heredem. Quin etiam licet in una re, qua deducta aut præcepta, restituere aliquis hereditatem rogatus est, maxima pars hereditatis contineatur, æque in solidum transferuntur actiones et secum deliberare debet is, cui restituitur hereditas, an expediat sibi restitui. Eadem scilicet interveniunt et si duabus pluribusve rebus deductis præceptisve restituere hereditatem rogatus sit. Sed et si certa summa deducta præceptave, quæ quartam vel etiam maximam partem hereditatis continet, rogatus sit aliquis hereditatem restituere, idem juris est. Quæ diximus de eo, qui ex asse heres institutus est, eadem transferimus et ad eum, qui ex parte heres scriptus est.

sultum, (all actions are transferred to and against the fideicommissarius, and what remains to the heir is free from all incumbrances connected with the inheritance, as if acquired by legacy. In the second case, when an heir is requested to give up an inheritance after retaining a fourth to himself, all actions are proportionably divided, those which regard the three-fourths of the estate being transferred to the fideicommissarius, and those which regard the one-fourth remaining to the heir. And, even if an heir is requested to give up an inheritance, after making a deduction or exception of some particular thing, which comprises the greatest part of the whole inheritance, all actions are still transferred to the fideicommissarius, who ought then to consider whether it will be expedient or not, that the inheritance should be given up to him. All this applies equally, whether an heir is requested to give up an inheritance after a deduction or exception of two, or more, particular things, or of a certain sum of money, which may comprise a fourth or even the greatest part of the inheritance. What we have said of an heir who is instituted to the whole of an inheritance, applies equally to one who is instituted only to a part.

D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 16. 21; D. xxxvi. 1. 30. 3.

If the testator gave a particular object to the heres institutus which was equal in value to the fourth of the inheritance, the law considered this as a specific legacy given to the heres. The fideicommissarius took the whole inheritance except this part, and all the actions of the whole inheritance were transferred to him. If the particular object did not equal a fourth, Marcian says that the emperor would not suffer the heir to claim any addition. (D. xxxvi. 1. 30. 4.) Justinian retains the distinction between a particular object being given, and a general direction to retain a fourth. But he decides that if a particular object was given not equal in value to a fourth, the heir may retain enough to complete his fourth, and that all actions relating to the part so retained shall pass to him, and all others to the fideicommissarius. (Cod. vi. 50. 11.)

10. Præterea intestatus quoque moriturus potest rogare eum, ad quem bona sua vel legitimo jure vel honorario pertinere intellegit, ut hereditatem suam totam partemve ejus aut rem aliquam, veluti fundum, ho-

10. Moreover, a man about to die intestate may request the person, to whom he knows his estate will pass, either by the civil or prætorian law, to give up to a third person the whole inheritance, or a part of it, or any par-

adquisita, altero vero casu, id est cum, quarta parte retenta, rogatus est heres restituere hereditatem et restituit, scindantur actiones et pro dodrante quidem transferantur ad fideicommissarium, pro quadrante remaneant apud heredem. Quin etiam licet in una re, qua deducta aut præcepta, restituere aliquis hereditatem rogatus est, maxima pars hereditatis contineatur, æque in solidum transferuntur actiones et secum deliberare debet is, cui restituitur hereditas, an expediat sibi restitui. Eadem scilicet interveniunt et si duabus pluribusve rebus deductis præceptisve restituere hereditatem rogatus sit. Sed et si certa summa deducta præceptave, quæ quartam vel etiam maximam partem hereditatis continet, rogatus sit aliquis hereditatem restituere, idem juris est. Quæ diximus de eo, qui ex asse heres institutus est, eadem transferimus et ad eum, qui ex parte heres scriptus est.

sultum, (all actions are transferred to and against the fideicommissarius, and what remains to the heir is free from all incumbrances connected with the inheritance, as if acquired by legacy. In the second case, when an heir is requested to give up an inheritance after retaining a fourth to himself, all actions are proportionably divided, those which regard the three-fourths of the estate being transferred to the fideicommissarius, and those which regard the one-fourth remaining to the heir. And, even if an heir is requested to give up an inheritance, after making a deduction or exception of some particular thing, which comprises the greatest part of the whole inheritance, all actions are still transferred to the fideicommissarius, who ought then to consider whether it will be expedient or not, that the inheritance should be given up to him. All this applies equally, whether an heir is requested to give up an inheritance after a deduction or exception of two, or more, particular things, or of a certain sum of money, which may comprise a fourth or even the greatest part of the inheritance. What we have said of an heir who is instituted to the whole of an inheritance, applies equally to one who is instituted only to a part.

D. xxxvi. 1. 1. 16. 21; D. xxxvi. 1. 30. 3.

If the testator gave a particular object to the heres institutus which was equal in value to the fourth of the inheritance, the law considered this as a specific legacy given to the heres. The fideicommissarius took the whole inheritance except this part, and all the actions of the whole inheritance were transferred to him. If the particular object did not equal a fourth, Marcian says that the emperor would not suffer the heir to claim any addition. (D. xxxvi. 1. 30. 4.) Justinian retains the distinction between a particular object being given, and a general direction to retain a fourth. But he decides that if a particular object was given not equal in value to a fourth, the heir may retain enough to complete his fourth, and that all actions relating to the part so retained shall pass to him, and all others to the fideicommissarius. (Cod. vi. 50. 11.)

10. Præterea intestatus quoque moriturus potest rogare eum, ad quem bona sua vel legitimo jure vel honorario pertinere intellegit, ut hereditatem suam totam partemve ejus aut rem aliquam, veluti fundum, ho-

10. Moreover, a man about to die intestate may request the person, to whom he knows his estate will pass, either by the civil or prætorian law, to give up to a third person the whole inheritance, or a part of it, or any particular thing, as a piece of land, a slave, or a sum of money. Legacies, on the contrary, are only valid when given by testament.

minem, pecuniam alicui restituat : cum alioquin legata nisi ex testamento non valeant.

GAI. ii. 270.

Antoninus Pius extended the provisions of the lex Falcidia and consequently of the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (D. xxxv. 2. 18), and the jurists those of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, to trusts imposed on heredes ab intestato. (D. xxxvi. 6. 1.)

11. Eum quoque, cui aliquid constituitur, potest rogare, ut id rursus alii totum aut partem vel etiam aliud aliquid restituat.

11. A fideicommissarius may also himself be requested to give up to another either the whole or part of what he receives, or even something else.

GAI. ii. 271.

The fideicommissarius, who was thus only a vehicle to pass on the inheritance to another fideicommissarius, could not retain a fourth for himself, if the heir had already retained a fourth. The object of the lex Falcidia was merely to secure an heir, not in all cases to give a fourth to the person who virtually had the inheritance; but when the heir entered on the inheritance by order of the prætor, and therefore did not retain a fourth, then the fideicommissarius stood in the place of the heir, so far as to be able to apply the lex Falcidia, as if representing the heir, against legatees, but not against a second fideicommissarius. (D. xxxvi. 1. 63. 11.)

12. Et quia prima fideicommissorum cunabula a fide heredum pendet et tam nomen quam substantiam acceperunt et ideo divus Augustus ad necessitatem juris ea detraxit : nuper et nos, eundem principem superare contententes, ex facto, quod Tribonianus vir excelsus, quæstor sacri palatii, suggestit, constitutionem fecimus, per quam disposuimus : si testator fidei heredis sui commisit, ut vel hereditatem vel speciale fideicommissum restituat, et neque ex scriptura neque ex quinque testium numero, qui in fideicommissis legitimus esse noscitur, res possit manifestari, sed vel pauciores quam quinque vel nemo penitus testis intervenerit, tunc sive pater heredis sive alius quicumque sit, qui fidem elegit heredis et ab eo aliquid restitui voluerit, si heres perfidia tentus adimplere fidem recusat negando, rem ita esse subsecutam, si fideicommissarius iussurandum ei detulerit, cum prius ipse

12. Originally all fiduciary gifts depended only upon the good faith of the heir : whence they took their name as well as their character. To remedy this, the Emperor Augustus made them obligatory in law, and we have lately endeavoured to surpass that prince; and, on the occasion of a case brought to our notice by the most eminent Tribonian, quæstor of our sacred palace, we have enacted by a constitution, that (if a testator has entrusted to the faith of his heir the restoration of an inheritance, or any particular thing, and the fact cannot be proved) either by any writing or by five witnesses (the legal number in such cases), there having been fewer, or perhaps no witnesses present, then, whether it is his father who has thus trusted to the good faith of the heir, and begged him to restore the inheritance, or whether it is any one else, if the heir perfidiously refuses to carry out the trust and denies the whole transaction, the fideicommissarius, having previ-

minem, pecuniam alicui restituat : cum alioquin legata nisi ex testamento non valeant.

ticular thing, as a piece of land, a slave, or a sum of money. Legacies, on the contrary, are only valid when given by testament.

GAI. ii. 270.

Antoninus Pius extended the provisions of the lex Falcidia and consequently of the senatusconsultum Pegasianum (D. xxxv. 2. 18), and the jurists those of the senatusconsultum Trebellianum, to trusts imposed on heredes ab intestato. (D. xxxvi. 6. 1.)

11. Eum quoque, cui aliquid constituitur, potest rogare, ut id rursus alii totum aut partem vel etiam aliud aliquid restituat.

11. A fideicommissarius may also himself be requested to give up to another either the whole or part of what he receives, or even something else.

GAI. ii. 271.

